

A. 3432.1

no 4040.50

1.11-12

1855/54

1856-7

BALLOU'S
PICTORIAL
DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION.

VOL. XI.

M. M. BALLOU,
PUBLISHER.

BOSTON

124.124

CITY OF BOSTON OF THE PUBLIC LIBRARY

Page.	Page.	Page.	Page.
Asmodeus in San Francisco..... 14	Early Life of Michael Angelo..... 26	Mary, my Sister..... 155	To a Friend..... 38
A Smuggler in spite of himself... 38	Evelyn Seymour..... 278	My Tutor's Niece..... 202	The Suicide..... 42
A Cure for Despondency..... 39		Mabel, the Rector's Ward..... 290,	To my Daughter Mary..... 43
Almost too Late..... 46		306, 322, 338, 334, 370, 386, 402	To Edith..... 58
A Truth..... 74	Forgive me..... 26	Not without Hope..... 135	The Parish Spectre..... 59
A Summer Watering Place..... 106	Florence Nightingale..... 86	Nellie Kent..... 326	The East Indiaman..... 70
Alessandrina of Russia..... 118	Foolish Tom Horn..... 254	Naval Farewell Serenade. A quar-	The Council Fire..... 75
A Tragedy of bygone Times..... 135	Falling Down..... 318	tette..... 379	The Wife's Stratagem..... 78
Apology to my Brother..... 150	Fort Niagara..... 326	Old Letters..... 59	The Unknown Artist..... 87
A Phantasy..... 158	First and Second Love..... 362	Onward..... 214	Time sets all Things Right..... 90
A Hot Night in the City..... 171		Our Allie..... 230	The Awakening..... 94
Ambition..... 186	Give me back my Lyre..... 411	On a Portrait of Washington..... 250	The Maker and Master..... 102
A Tale of Retribution..... 246	Hints in Housekeeping..... 7	On the Wharf..... 310	The Coquette..... 102
A Memory..... 282	Home..... 174	O, whence flies my Spirit?..... 395	To the Invisible..... 110
Ashmeade..... 346	Harper's Mill..... 394	Private Theatricals..... 134	The Little Orphan..... 122
Autumn's come..... 378		Pyrotechnics..... 170	The Crazy Captain..... 123
Autumn..... 382	I'll come again to thee..... 10	Patience..... 310	Town and Country..... 126
An Autumn Murmur..... 406	I ne'er acknowledged thee..... 42	Restoring a Husband..... 270	The Newport Belle..... 138
Autumn..... 414	It makes me sad to roam..... 54	Speak Kindly..... 7	The Adopted Child..... 139
Almost a Mistake..... 414	I dream of happy homes..... 106	Spencer's Fairy Queen..... 91	The Blind Boy..... 143
	I think of thee..... 198	Shadows..... 126	The Footfall on the Stairs..... 150
Battle of Brandywine..... 11	Impromptu..... 330	Snake Hunting..... 234	Too much haste to be rich..... 154
Blucher the Faithful..... 27	June..... 6	September Dream..... 294	The Canadian Fugitive..... 158
Birthplace of our Saviour..... 62	Johnny Clarence Phelps..... 56	Sister Emma..... 298	The Lost Heir..... 145, 162,
Boyhood..... 107	Knave's Last Prayer..... 190	Steen Kill..... 302	178, 194, 210, 226, 242, 258, 274
Bessie..... 118	Life Scenes long ago..... 10	Sixes and Sevens..... 302	The Cottage of my Mother..... 166
Bantam Stream..... 154	Lost..... 14	Sonnets..... 346	The Gardener's Boy..... 166
Beatrice: or, Love and Pride..... 182	Love forsaken..... 22	Serenade..... 410	The Child's Prayer..... 171
Boselli..... 347	Love lies bleeding..... 27		The Shipwreck..... 174
	Little Children..... 58	The Gipsy's Secret..... 130	The Night on Larn's Isle..... 182
Cologne—its Uses and Abuses..... 74	Life's Changes..... 94	2, 18, 34, 50, 66, 82, 98, 114, 130	The False Rhyme..... 190
Cloud Pictures..... 90	Lines written by my Mother..... 139	The Mutiny at Spithead..... 6	The History of Two Lives..... 198
Clementina the Actress..... 186	Lines to E. M. H..... 170	The Hunter's Morning Serenade..... 11	Town and Country..... 206
Contentment..... 202	Lundy's Lane..... 246	The Child of the Cascade..... 22	There is no Time like the Present..... 214
Catching a Minister..... 238	Love and Duty..... 334	The Bell Toller..... 30	The Prince of the Forest..... 215
	Letter from Paris..... 378	The Reformation..... 30	The Disenthralled..... 222
Dogs of Damascus..... 43	Mariette..... 54		The Old Mill Wheel..... 230
Dick Hardy's Chest..... 107	Myself..... 122		The Charter Oak..... 238
Dream Thoughts of Katie..... 262	My Brother's Star..... 142		The Pirate's Wife..... 250
Dream Land..... 362			The Storm at the Sepulchre..... 251
Dirge—O, Frost King, touch them			The Old Flute Player..... 251
lightly..... 396			The Magician's Doom..... 262
December..... 398			The Yonog Child's Prayer..... 266
			The Sale of a Kingdom..... 266
			'Twill ever be so..... 270
			The Princess of Babylon..... 276
			Touch me not..... 278
			Too Miserable by Half..... 282
			The Travelling Mania. A Domestic Sketch..... 283
			The Coaxer's Wife..... 294
			The Lunatic..... 298
			The Masquerade..... 299
			The Old Church..... 314
			The Rich Cousin..... 314
			The Painter's Widow..... 318
			The Magical Mango..... 323
			The Unfaithful Steward..... 327
			The Rival Lovers..... 330
			The Memory of Little Susie..... 334
			Tempora Mutant..... 343
			The Quarrel and the Crown..... 342
			The Virgin of Van Dyck..... 350
			To an Old Man..... 358
			The Wife and the Graduate..... 358
			The Atheist Silenced..... 359
			The Vicissitudes of Fortune..... 359
			The Deaf Beauty..... 366
			The Red Leaves..... 374
			The Mysterious Strangers..... 374
			The Peep through the Keyhole..... 378
			The Court Martial..... 382
			The Ruined Castle..... 390
			The Orphan's Fate..... 390
			The Collegians. A Tale of the South..... 395
			The Sisters of a King. A tale of the ninth century..... 398
			Trust in God. A Story for Christmas..... 406
			The Golden Death..... 410
			The Chace. A Sketch of Life on the Sea..... 411
			When I would Live..... 254
			Weenona..... 327
			Wrong and Injustice Defeated..... 379
			Yankee Spirit..... 359

INDEX TO ILLUSTRATIONS.

Page.	Page.	Page.	Page.
Australian Scenes..... 5	Elmira, N. Y..... 192	Louisville, Ky.—University..... 248	Portraits—Eugene Pierre Godard..... 172
Americans..... 101	Elizabeth City, N. J.—Elizabeth Port..... 216	Marine Hospital..... 249	Grant Thorburn..... 177
Alexander, Emperor of Russia, and his three Brothers..... 256	Liberty Hall..... 216	View from the corner of Green and Sixth Street..... 249	Albert W. Ladd..... 188
Allegorical Representation of Adam..... 272	Court House..... 216	Lancaster, Massachusetts—Industrial School..... 360	Otis P. Lord..... 204
Almshouse for Fatherless Children..... 303	Central View..... 217	Bridge..... 360	C. Gildermeister..... 208
American Envoy at Calcutta..... 252	Residence of Chancellor Williamson..... 217	Large Elm..... 361	G. J. B. Carstensen..... 208
Arm of Cowpens..... 296, 297	Caldwell's Monument..... 217	Church, Town-House, and Academy..... 361	Alexandre Dumas..... 220
Arnold Del Carpio, Illustrated..... 316	Egg Marketing in Ireland..... 341	Lytham, England..... 389	Prince William of Prussia..... 229
Arctic Hunt in Algeria..... 336	Fowle's New Iron Building, in Boston..... 37	Moorish Architecture..... 24	Henry Willard..... 236
Arctic Expedition, New York, by Gaslight..... 376	Flying Proas of the Ladrone Islands..... 200	Mont Blanc..... 92	Col. W. H. Spooner..... 252
Arctic Fight in Bayonne, France..... 384	Franklin Statue—Inauguration..... 232, 233	Messina Architecture..... 96	James Fenimore Cooper..... 268
Arctic and Pests, Hungary..... 396	French Soldiers' Return from War..... 240	Monte Men of 1776..... 137	Amasa J. Parker..... 234
Arms and Characteristics of the State of Delaware..... 1	Forrest, Edwin, in five Characters..... 320	Militia of 1856..... 137	Hannibal Hamlin..... 300
New Jersey..... 65	Folsom & Bowker's Bag Manufactory..... 324	Montreal, Canada..... 149	Madame Ida Pfeiffer..... 313
Rhode Island..... 161	Grand Ducal Palace, at Schwerin, Germany..... 25	Mormons crossing the Plains..... 177	Seth Cheney, Artist..... 332
Wisconsin..... 241	Grandfather's Visit..... 25	Mackrel Fishing..... 264, 265	W. W. Clapp..... 348
Indiana..... 289	Gladiatorial Table..... 188	Monument to the Pilgrims..... 284	Wyzeran Marshall..... 364
Kentucky..... 337	Gallery of the Cosmopolitan Art Association..... 308	McDonough's Victory on Lake Champlain..... 321	Col. James M. Thompson..... 380
Ohio..... 385	Statues and Busts..... 308, 309	Missionary Packet, Morning Star..... 396	Peter Nassan, the oldest man in America..... 380
Capital of Kansas, at Lecompton..... 12	Gipsey Camp..... 332	Merchants' Bank Building, Boston..... 401	John Neal..... 396
Chicago, Ill.—Light House, Block House, etc..... 40	Guatemala—Ancient City..... 373	Nazareth..... 9	George Vandenhoff..... 412
Reservoir..... 40	Modern City..... 373	Navy Yard at Charlestown..... 104	Ex-Queen of Oude..... 416
Reservoir Market, View of Randolph Street..... 41	Hug-Sen-Tsene, Insurgent Chief of China..... 20	Navigation of the Air..... 128	Returning from the Beach..... 69
Superior Institute, New York..... 44	Hunt & Webster's Sewing Machines..... 21	Newport and Covington, Kentucky—View of Free School, Newport..... 392	Rachel's Chateau, near Paris..... 112
Scenes..... 53	Hoboken, N. Y..... 145	City Hall and Court House, Covington..... 392	Rome, Ga..... 273
Church of St. Isaac, St. Petersburg, Russia..... 64	Hungarian Scenes..... 160	Market and Square, Covington..... 392	Regatta on the Thames, London..... 300
City Fishery..... 85	Water Carrier..... 181	Suspension Bridge over the Licking River..... 393	Royal Palace at Madrid..... 325
Cathedral—at Toledo..... 96	Shepherds..... 181	Barracks, Newport..... 393	Russian Boatmen on the River Neva..... 364
Cathedral—Messina..... 96	Hoboken, N. J., View in Washington Street..... 200	Oakland Female Institute..... 24	Spaniards and Rogers's Circus Company..... 16
Conjunction of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers..... 140	Harvesting in Normandy..... 340	Ostead..... 165	Shot Tower at St. Louis, Mo..... 17
Church of St. Catherine..... 149	Horse Exhibition in Boston..... 345, 346	Our New Publishing Hall..... 353	State Normal School, at Trenton, N. J..... 28
View of Good Hope Wagon..... 156	Highways and Byways of New York..... 400	Promenade Concert on Boston Common..... 108	Shaker Village, Canterbury, N. H..... 37
View of the Ford..... 172	Insane Asylum, at Northampton, Mass..... 136	Printers' Almshouse, Wood Green, Tottenham, England..... 124	Syracuse, N. Y..... 72
Chinese Lantern..... 181	Irish Leaper..... 176	Plants—Hemp, Cassava, Areog Saccharifera, Tobacco, Canawaba, Cotton, Tarmeric, Yam, Coffee..... 197	Orphan Asylum..... 73
Chinese Family..... 192	Italian Wine Carrier..... 368	Provinctown, Mass..... 328	Unitarian Church..... 73
Chinese Pit, near St. Louis, Mo..... 204	Jeddo, Capital of Japan..... 144	Portraits—James T. Fields..... 12	Market..... 73
Arm of Vendome, at Paris..... 208	Scene on the Road..... 144	Daniel J. Cohn, Chief of Police..... 28	Spearing the Narwhal..... 80
California Cabin at the Mines..... 220	Keokuk, Iowa—Gas Works..... 120	Earl of Cardigan..... 33	St. Nicholas Hotel, New York..... 81
Chinese Mountain Travelling Chair..... 293	Female Seminary..... 120	Dr. Winslow Lewis..... 44	Scene on South Boston Bridge..... 105
Chickering's Grand Piano Forte..... 325	View of the Levee..... 121	Hon. James Buchanan..... 49	St. Louis, Mo.—Court House..... 152
College of Nobles, at Moscow, Russia..... 348	Athenaeum..... 121	Hon. John C. Breckinridge..... 49	High School..... 152
California Indians, group of..... 377	Kane's Arctic Explorations..... 404, 405	Rev. J. Pierpont..... 76	Mercantile Library..... 152
China-Rock, on Ohio River..... 380	Lamartine's Residence in Paris..... 32	Thomas Comer..... 92	Medical Department..... 153
Chinese Stalking..... 76	Interior View..... 32	Rev. T. Starr King..... 92	Biddle Market..... 153
Chinese Vessels, at Amsterdam..... 105	Louvre, in Paris—Apollo Gallery..... 116	Col. J. C. Fremont..... 97	McDowell's College..... 153
Chinese Island Hospital, Boston Harbor..... 184	Ceiling of Apollo Gallery..... 116	W. T. Foster..... 108	Shanghai..... 181
Dining Room and Female Hospital..... 184	The Square Saloon..... 117	Felicia Vestval..... 113	Spanish Minstrels..... 257
Prison Chapel, Dormitory and School..... 185	Frieze of the Hall of the Seven Chimneys..... 117	Henry W. Herbert..... 124	Storming an old English Castle..... 261
Female Work Room and Nursery..... 185	Lowell Island, Salem Harbor..... 193	Fred. S. Cozzens..... 140	Statue of Benjamin Franklin..... 268
Cells..... 185	Lake Geneva, Switzerland..... 201	Smith O'Brien..... 149	Spanish Gipsy..... 288
Er, England—the Harbor..... 224	Louisville, Ky.—Speed Market..... 248	Pelag W. Chandler..... 156	State House, Springfield, Ill..... 305
Fort, Mich.—Old State House..... 280	Bridge over Beargrass Creek..... 248		Springfield, Ill.—Views in Washington St..... 312
Water Works..... 280			Railroad Station..... 312
Post Office..... 281			Court House and Bank..... 312
St. Ann's Church..... 281			Scenes in Europe—Pillchard Fishery..... 356
Odd Fellows' Hall..... 281			Lake Windemere..... 356
			Cornish Fisherwomen..... 356
			Lake of Tinshah..... 357
			View of Suez..... 357
			Oasis Southeast of Pelusium..... 357
			Schamyl, the celebrated Circassian Chief..... 372
			Servian Musicians..... 388
			Surry Gardens, London..... 389
			Seaside Sketches near Boston—Old Fish House, end of Chelsea Beach..... 408
			Eatw House, Long Island..... 408
			Atlantic House, Chelsea Beach..... 408
			Long Island Head Light..... 409
			Neptune House, Chelsea Beach..... 409
			Robinson Crusoe House, Chelsea Beach..... 409
			The Land of Eden..... 9
			The Bride Dressing for the Wedding..... 48
			Tea Party in Boston Harbor..... 56, 57
			The Shadow on the Wall..... 69
			The Young Artist..... 80
			The Belize..... 133
			Towing on the River..... 133
			Turf Carriers of Lochabar, Scotland..... 176
			The Riverside..... 209
			Tafts College, Medford, Mass..... 225
			The Village Postman..... 236
			Triumphal Arch, in Paris..... 244
			Throne Room of the Emperor of France..... 245
			The Harbor and City of Marseilles, France..... 293
			The Kremlin, at Moscow..... 304
			The Palace of Petrowski, at Moscow..... 304
			Truro, Mass.—Pond Village..... 328
			Highland Light..... 329
			Windmill, near Light House Beach..... 329
			Tyrolese Peasant at Vintage Time..... 341
			The Blacksmith's Shop.—an English Rural Scene..... 412
			U. S. Frigate Merrimac..... 351
			View of Court and Tremont Streets, Boston..... 8
			View of Mohawk Little Falls, New York..... 60
			Victoria—a Statue..... 112
			White Mountain Scenes.—Carriage Road..... 88
			Alpine House..... 88
			Dixville Notch..... 88
			Summit House..... 88
			View of Portland..... 89
			Crystal Cascade..... 89
			Mounts Washington, Jefferson and Adams..... 89
			From Randolph Hill..... 89
			Berlin Falls..... 89
			Washington Monument at N. Y..... 129
			Washington at Valley Forge..... 168, 169
			Webster's Homestead at Marshfield, Mass..... 188
			Windsor Castle, England..... 213
			Whampoa.—A Summer House and Pagoda..... 224
			Warwick Castle, England..... 229
			Water Carriers in the East..... 277
			Wine Making in Istria..... 341

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { CORNER OF TREMONT
AND BROMFIELD STS.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 5, 1856.

$3.00 PER ANNUM | VOL. XI. No. 1.—WHOLE No. 261.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

STATE OF DELAWARE.

The beautiful design below is from the pencil of Billings, and drawn and engraved expressly for the Pictorial. The armorial bearings of the State display the wheat-sheaf, a ship, etc., typical of the avocations of the citizens, the supporters being a farmer and a hunter. The motto is "liberty and independence." Below we have a party in a boat among the reeds, shooting the famous "canvass back ducks" that abound in the waters of the Delaware and Chesapeake. These birds are pronounced unequalled by epineurs, and large numbers of them are sent to the principal cities on the Atlantic coast. Delaware, the smallest State in the Union, with the exception of Rhode Island, was originally colonized at the suggestion of the renowned Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, although that monarch died ere the project was carried into effect. It was early in the year 1638 that the two vessels composing the expedition ascended Delaware Bay, and landing near the mouth of Christiana Creek, Peter Minuits, the governor, took formal possession. He named the creek, and a fort which he had immediately erected, after the young queen—Christiana. After some years, the colony fell into the hands of the Dutch, then of the English, then of the Pennsylvanians, and in 1775 it became an independent State. Gallant service did the Delaware troops, known as the "Blue Hen's Chickens," render in the Revolution. The population of Delaware is 91,532, of whom 2390 are slaves. The area of the State is 8,933,760 acres, of which 580,862 are improved. Yet there are 13,852 horses, 791 mules, 19,248 cows, 9797 working-oxen, 24,166 other cattle, 27,503 sheep, and 56,261 swine. The crops are proportionably large, for the farmers of Delaware thoroughly understand their vocation, and are blessed with a genial climate. Nor are their wives and daughters a whit the less active, their butter, made in 1850, amounting to 1,055,308 pounds, their cheese weighing 3187 pounds, and their honey and beeswax 41,248 pounds. Delaware contains 180 churches, of which 106 are Methodist, 26 Presbyterian, 21 Episcopal, and 12 Baptist. There is a college at Newark, founded in 1833, with a library of 5000 volumes. The amount expended for education in 1853 was $57,738, of which $33,829 is the income of a school fund. There are ten newspapers in Delaware—seven weekly and three semi-weekly, with an aggregate circulation of 421,000. Other States are larger, and richer, and more powerful, but Delaware, in many respects, has no equal. Traces of the old Scandinavian blood yet remain, and some of her sons occupy deservedly high positions in the national councils, the army and the navy. On page 11 will be found an interesting story illustrating the history of the State. For the year 1855, the State expenditures were $57,276 37; income from corporation taxes, dividends and interests on loans, licenses, forfeitures, etc., $53,697 06. The permanent resources of the State are, invested capital, $350,637 68; invested school fund, $435,505 83; total, $786,143 51. The common school system provides a free school within reach of every family. The districts are laid off, numbered and incorporated; 236 of them are organized. Each district entitles itself to a portion of the fund by establishing a school, and contributing towards its support not less than $25. But any district may lay any tax that may be deemed necessary for school purposes.

STATE OF DELAWARE.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE GIPSEY'S SECRET:

—OR—

THE LEAGUE OF GUILT.

A STORY OF HIGH AND HUMBLE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE CONTRABANDIST."

CHAPTER I.

THE GIPSEY CAMP AND QUEEN.

It was nearing the close of a warm, bright day in merry England's sweet May-time—the English May, of soft skies, and pleasant airs, of waving woods, of singing birds, and opening forest blooms, when two persons might have been seen riding leisurely along the pathway skirting steep wooded banks that overhang the beautiful Wye, in the neighborhood of the magnificent forest of Dean.

One of these was a graceful maiden of, perhaps, some eighteen years, with a slight yet beautifully moulded figure, whose symmetry was charmingly set off by the admirably fitting habit of dark green; and a sparkling, spirituelle countenance, lighted up by a pair of fine dark eyes, as bright and bewitching as ever won the heart of either knight or squire. Lightly and well she rode her pretty milk-white steed, and with an ease, elegance and dignity perfectly captivating, while the handsome creature moved forward with arched neck and stately motion, as if proud of his fair rider.

She was very beautiful. Her face was of a lovely oval; the complexion of a soft, rich brunette; the features small, and though slightly irregular, so pretty, so piquant and enchanting in their animated and often arch expression, as to be a thousand times more winning than if they had been a model for the most faultless piece of sculpture that ever grew out of Grecian art. The hair, cut short, like that of a boy, was glossy, abundant, and of a rich brown, almost approaching black, and parted on one side, swept above the full brow in a shining curve, curling under, around the right temple, in splendid profusion. The careless and somewhat peculiar style of wearing her hair added much to the soft, sparkling beauty of her face; and with the exquisite vermilion tint on lip and cheek, and the dark brilliancy of her splendid eyes, hers was a countenance of rare fascination. Riding lightly forward, with the sable feather of her heaver floating in the breeze, she looked as lovely and as bright a thing as ever charmed the human gaze.

Her companion, who rode a powerful black horse, was a gentleman of some five-and-twenty years, elegant in person, studiously and fashionably attired, and possessing an air of graceful and courtly ease that marked the thorough-bred man of the world. He was eminently handsome, with fine and regular features, a somewhat dark but clear complexion, and curling hair and beard of a glossy black. An extreme refinement, that consummate discrimination saved him from being either foppish or effeminate, was everywhere visible in his personal appearance; in the white hand, fine, smooth and well-shaped, resting on the jetty neck of his horse, in the costly material and exquisite adjustment of his dress; in the studied yet apparently careless arrangement of the curling and luxuriant hair, so disposed as to set off a fine head and face to the utmost. A gay and gallant gentleman he was, truly, of graceful, plausible and fascinating exterior; a nature bold, daring, unscrupulous; a heart formed for anything but good; and strong passions, subject, in their outward manifestations, to a stronger will, so that they were hidden beneath the calm and glittering surface, seldom even ruffling it—seldom visible to the eyes of others.

Such was the difference between the seeming and the reality of Morley Briancourt, the lover of pretty Eleanor Ashby. For he was her lover—a snitor for her hand. You might have seen his passion in the glance with which he ever and anon regarded her, as they rode along. It was perceptible in the tenderness of the tone, to which, in addressing her, his rich voice was modulated. It showed itself in his manner towards her. No woman could have misunderstood or have been insensible to it, manifested as it was; but for all that Eleanor Ashby saw it plainly, she was not one whit the less gay, or careless, or merry-hearted, as she rode along by his side that afternoon; for her own heart was untouched, yet; though she knew he loved her, and that his father and her uncle and guardian, Sir Edward Ashby (for she had been an orphan since her infancy), had planned, years and years since, a marriage between herself and Morley. Until within these two months back, when he had come to visit at Ashby Place, she had not seen him since she was a mere child; and, in case of her eventually wedding him, she had yet to learn to love, though even now she was not at all averse to him, knowing nothing, as she did, of his real character, and seeing him only as he seemed. As yet, the subject of their marriage had not been touched upon since he came, and he had not yet declared to her ear the story of his love, further than his tender and passion-filled manner conveyed it; but it was not long to be deferred, as she was conscious; and that she would marry him, was not at present improbable, having been accustomed from childhood to the contemplation of the subject, and having formed no other attachment which might have the effect of rendering her opposed to the projected union with him.

Thus, and bearing these relations one to the other, the two rode on together, perhaps an hour, or it might be nearer two, before sunset, along the banks of the silver Wye. As we have said, Eleanor Ashby was chatting in a gay and light-hearted strain; and Morley Briancourt listened with a tender smile, and occasionally some gallant and courteous reply; and so they proceeded.

Suddenly, as they rounded an abrupt pathway, where the stream swept around a small wooded headland, they came upon an open green slope, carpeted with the richest turf, and descending with a very gradual inclination towards the river; and upon this slope they beheld an object so strange as to attract and perplex them both for a moment.

It was a small, strange, uncouth figure, tumbling and rolling about with the oddest and most fantastical movements upon the grass,—a queer, ungainly shape, the nature of which one might have been puzzled no little to determine at a short distance, so rapid and manifold were its evolutions.

"Why, Morley, what in the name of wonder have we here?" said Miss Ashby, with a laughing yet puzzled air, as she half reined in her horse. "What an odd creature! what grotesque motions!" Morley Briancourt smiled.

"An ape, I should say, fair Eleanor," he answered, "if I did not see a human face in the midst of those flying limbs. But it is certainly a frightful little object. See—it startles the horses!"

Both the beasts were eyeing the strange thing with wild eyes and erect ears; both swerved with fright, for it came tumbling along the pathway, under their very hoofs. Eleanor uttered an exclamation of alarm, lest it should be trampled on by them; and with a strong hand, forced Selim aside; while Morley's horse trembled and reared with terror, so suddenly as almost to unseat his rider. Setting his teeth hard, the young man with difficulty brought him down to his feet again, regardless of the safety of the creature still rolling about there below.

"Take care—take care, Morley!" uttered Eleanor, anxiously; "you will hurt it."

But he was slightly angered with the creature for causing the horses this unnecessary fright, and but half heeding her words, bent over, and gave it one or two sharp cuts with his riding-switch that elicited a shrill cry of pain from their object.

"Nay, Morley; do not—do not strike him!" cried Eleanor.

Bringing his lip, the young man stayed his hand. The creature remained cowering down fearfully for a moment, as if half-expecting another blow; then sprang suddenly to its feet, displaying, as it did so, a form that drew from Eleanor an exclamation of surprise and compassion.

It was a queer little dwarf, scarce more than three feet high, with oddly misshapen limbs, its back and shoulders deformed, and its arms immensely long in proportion to its size. A well-formed head, however, was set between those ungainly shoulders,—a head covered with coal-black hair, flung about it in wild disorder, and half concealing the boy's features, but he tossed it back with a rapid movement, discovering to Eleanor's astonished gaze a countenance childish indeed, yet of a wild, dark, singular beauty and rare sweetness of expression; a complexion of a clear olive tint, and eyes that flashed like brilliants, fastened for an instant with a rapid, searching glance, upon Miss Ashby's face.

"Who are you?" she asked, with an expression of kindly interest. "Where do you belong?"

Instantly the dwarf darted forward, and snatching her hand, kissed it eagerly again and again, his bright, large eyes flashing with pleasure.

"Piquet will remember—Piquet will remember!" he uttered, in a sweet, strange voice. And turning, he sprang away, and disappeared among the underbrush that crowned the top of the slope.

Eleanor Ashby looked after him, silently, her usually gay countenance wearing an air of softened interest and perplexity.

"Poor boy!" she said, gently. "I wonder who he is? I never saw him before."

"Doubtless the child of some poor person in this neighborhood," answered Morley Briancourt, lightly. And then he added with a tender and deprecating glance: "I crave your pardon, fair Eleanor, for striking him, but I was really something irritated at the moment at his rashness, and not once dreamed of his being so terribly deformed. Forgive me for the pain I caused you."

"O, as to that," said Eleanor Ashby, "it is more necessary to seek his forgiveness than mine; but I do not think you meant to harm him seriously, and I am sure, as you say, that you would not have struck him for the world if you had known what he was. As regards me, you stand excused." And she frankly extended her hand. Morley Briancourt held it with a tender and passionate pressure in his own, during the single instant she allowed it to remain there; then she withdrew it, saying: "And now, shall we ride on? We have, I think, rather more than an hour to spare before sunset, and I have a strong desire to dispose of it in a visit to Penshurst Common."

"Penshurst Common?" echoed her lover, with a glance of interested inquiry, as if wondering at the nature of her errand thither.

"Yes—to see the gipseys encamped there," returned Miss Ashby. "Did you not know they were there? Lucy Elmore, my maid, tells me they came last night. She has seen them to-day, and tells me wonderful stories of a certain beautiful, stately, dark-eyed woman, the queen, apparently, of the gang, who revealed to her things which Lucy was not aware of having told to a single person, and which she declares are all marvellously true. So," she continued, gaily, "I am dying with curiosity to see these people, and their beautiful and wonderful queen, whom I suspect from Lucy's account, to be something more than one meets with every day among these fortune-telling wanderers. Her name, I believe Lucy said, is Maida. A peculiar one, is it not?"

She had not seen, as she talked thus lightly and carelessly, the rapt and but half-concealed interest with which Morley Briancourt listened to her remarks. She did not see the slight and sudden start he gave as she uttered the last words, nor the quick, darkening shadow that overspread his face. But whatever was the emotion awakened within his breast, its every manifestation was concealed, when her glance was upraised to his, as she concluded.

He did not answer immediately. Thoughts, rapid and anxious, were thronging his mind. Then, however, he returned, carelessly:

"Is it not almost too late for the purpose you speak of? Penshurst is at some distance from here, and we should scarcely have time to return before sunset; should we, Eleanor?"

"O, we have ample time—we have ample time!" said Miss Ashby, in a light tone. "I do not wish to stay long. I think," she added, with a laughing glance, "you must have heard good Mrs. Millett warning me, before I left the hall door, against prolonging my ride till the dew-fall. But, indeed, I am not at all afraid of taking cold, and I know you are not one to fear the ill effects of the evening air for yourself."

"Nay—it is Eleanor's good that I think of," he answered, tenderly, bending upon her the soft light of his fine dark eyes. "And, indeed, I think we had better defer our visit until another time, when we can come earlier. Shall it not be so?" He laid his hand upon hers, as he spoke, with a slight pressure, and clasped it softly in his own, as he still regarded her.

Eleanor Ashby felt the blood rising to her cheek. But spirit of perversity seized her.

"No; let me go now—this moment, Morley," she said, gaily. "I will not wait till to-morrow. Come!" She withdrew her hand from his; gave him a smile, and put Selim to a quick pace.

Morley Briancourt ground his teeth hard.

"If it is Maida's gang!" he muttered, to himself. "What brought her into this neighborhood? The evil one himself on steps this way to-night. O, that I had guarded against this! But it is too late now." And as he muttered the words, he gave the horse the rein, and rode on beside Eleanor.

The wilful girl looked laughingly up in his face.

"Forgive me if I am wicked, Morley, and will have my own way," she said; "for you know a woman is even inclined to abide by her own will, and I am like the rest of my perverse sisters."

In Morley Briancourt's heart, if one could have read deeper than the expression his countenance wore, it would have been seen that all was fear, uneasiness and apprehension. But Eleanor Ashby beheld no sign of this. To her, he wore the same demeanor as ever, and if there were moments when he grew moody and abstracted, she failed to observe it.

Some two miles or more they rode, and then struck into a path lying nearly at right angles with the course of the river, and leading towards a small village some three or four hundred yards distant. Just beyond this village, stretched a wide, bare common, to the very edge of the forest, where were pitched the tents of a gang of gipseys.

Morley Briancourt's face grew paler, as they met his gaze. His teeth were set; a shadow, black and direful, rested on his dark brow. Once he almost checked his horse with an involuntary motion. But the sudden desperation passed. "Pshaw!" he muttered; "what, after all, should I fear? And yet," and his brow grew black again, "what should I not fear if Maida is there and recognizes me? But it is too late—too late!"

They went on past the village and across the common, Eleanor still, ever and anon, making some gay remark, and Morley Briancourt replying with an ease and carelessness the very opposite of what were, probably, his real feelings; and so they neared the gipsy camp.

With a keen and uneasy glance he surveyed the scene that presented itself there. It was one of deep interest to any lover of the picturesque; of far deeper interest to him, though the scene appeared not yet. The tents were pitched just on the confines of the forest. Among them, several of the gipseys were gathered together about a large fire kindled on the ground, and engaged in preparing their evening repast. There was many a daisy, urchin, too, gamolling on the green forest turf beyond the tents, joined here and there by some of the hardy village boys; and others of the gang, again, were scattered about, with many a gay youth and pretty maid, come to have their fortunes told.

"A merry scene—is it not, Morley?" said Eleanor Ashby, regarding it with smiling and curious interest, as they drew momentarily nearer. "A merry scene—is it not? How like a picture I saw but the other day! Let us pause here a moment,—the figures show so finely just at this distance."

Willingly Morley Briancourt reined in his horse. "Tell were it for me if she would ride no nearer!" he murmured. And while Eleanor sat silently regarding the gipseys, he, too, was scanning eagerly and anxiously, group after group, as if in search of some familiar face or form. But one after another was subjected to his scrutiny, and he seemed to miss the one he sought for. He breathed more freely; the shadow that ever and anon had hovered round his brow disappeared.

Suddenly, Eleanor cried:

"See, Morley! I am sure there is the queen, Maida, coming out from that tent. She answers Lucy's description exactly. There—you may see her in that group to the left, which she has just joined. I must have a nearer view of her."

Morley Briancourt started; his brow grew dark and anxious again, blackened into a heavy frown as his quick eye descried the figure of a tall, beautifully-formed gipsy woman, whom Eleanor had just pointed out. "Maida—Maida! yes—'tis she!" he hissed, between his clenched teeth. Then keeping down, with a violent effort, every sign of the agitation he experienced, he said, lightly:

"One moment, and I will join you, Eleanor. While you are taking a sketch of that beautiful gipsy dame for your portfolio, I have a fancy for trying the fortune-telling art of the little ragged, dark-skinned maiden approaching us."

"As you will—as you will," said Eleanor, smilingly. "And now I think of it," she added, with a playful air, "you may stay there, if you please, till I come back, for I cannot tell but that I may have my own fortune told, and you must not fail to listen."

A gay smile sparkled in her fine eyes, and she closed her sweet mouth, as she rode off.

A look of relief flashed over Morley Briancourt's face. "A lucky artifice!" he murmured, looking after her, and throwing a hasty glance beyond to the place where stood the gipsy queen,—"A lucky artifice! It has saved me, if Maida sees me not, and I must take care to move out of sight. For eight years I have evaded her; the fiends are in it, that she should scent me out now. But she shall do no mischief, if I can help it." And concealing himself partly by means of the intervening trunk of a great oak, he beckoned to him the lank-looking gipsy girl who was coming up.

Meanwhile, Miss Ashby proceeded towards the spot where she could just discern the figure of the gipsy queen in the midst of the others. But she had not far to go. Though she knew it not, she had been watched for the last five minutes by the dark woman.

She was a handsome woman, this gipsy queen,—handsome, and dark, and tall, with a full, magnificent figure, and the carriage of royalty itself. As she stood surrounded by several of her people, her splendid eyes were fixed intently, from time to time, upon the approaching figure of Miss Ashby, as they had looked out upon her from the tent before she appeared. Suddenly, she extricated herself from the group that surrounded her, and advanced to meet Eleanor, encountering her about half way.

The young lady checked her horse, and the gipsy woman stood at her side, regarding her steadfastly with those dark, searching eyes.

"Why have you come hither?" she asked, quietly and briefly.

Eleanor was in some sort perplexed by this abrupt questioning.

"Indeed, I scarcely know myself," she answered, smiling, and with a slight blush at what she thought a very awkward confession, "unless it was from—"

"Well, finish it—from curiosity? That was what brought you hither," said the gipsy woman.

Miss Ashby looked at the magnificent woman before her, and thought curiosity an impertinence.

"I am glad you have come, however," continued the gipsy. "I have been looking for you all day."

"For me?" echoed Eleanor, with a countenance of perplexity.

"For you. You wonder how I should know anything concerning you—do you not?"

"Yes, since this is the first time, I think, that I have seen you," said the young lady.

"It is well. I wished to see you, and you have come. If you had not done so, I should have sought you. I would say to you things which may not please you, but which must be said. I would speak to you in regard to yourself—to your own fate—to those things which most deeply concern you."

Eleanor looked at the gipsy woman with a surprised and questioning air.

"How is it that you, a stranger, take an interest in me?" she asked; "and to what end is it?"

"I would serve you; I would gain your good-will, and save you from evil. Let that answer suffice now, for I would spare you, if I may, the direct knowledge of much that would pain and terrify you. But if you had not the warning I shall give you, then, ere long, and, perhaps, when it is too late, you will mourn most bitterly your rashness in braving me."

"A warning! What is it?" asked Eleanor Ashby, impressed by her earnestness, and yet half incredulous in this warmly expressed interest on the part of an utter stranger, and that stranger a gipsy.

The woman looked at her silently for a moment. Then her glance was directed to a spot at some five or six rods distant. It rested on the figure of Morley Briancourt. A burning light shone in her dark eyes one instant, and then was quenched beneath their silken lashes, as the drooping lids veiled them.

For a brief space she stood thus, with her beautifully-cut lips compressed above the firmly-shut teeth, her glance bent fixedly to the earth, her whole countenance wearing an expression of stern and sorrowful thought. Eleanor Ashby was puzzled by it; she could not comprehend what she saw; she waited in silence for her strange companion to speak.

The gipsy woman raised her head, presently, with a half-suppressed sigh, and drew her hand slowly across her brow.

"You are waiting," she said. "Let me say quickly, then, what I have to say. And remember my warning, or you will rue the hour in which you disregarded it. You are an orphan, Eleanor Ashby," she said, speaking more slowly. "Since your infancy, you have known nothing of the care, and protection, and guidance of parents, much as you have needed them all. But your need hitherto has not been so great as now. For I tell you that you are in danger. Within a twelvemonth—ay, and less—far less now—within even the summer that is nearing us, a bridal ring will be waiting for your hand, a wife's vows upon your lips. But touch not the ring, utter not the vow; shun him who would give the one and elude the other. O, Eleanor Ashby, be warned—be warned in time! Weet not, as you have a woman's hopes—a woman's dreams, to come to fruition, or to be dashed aside forever!"

Her earnest appeal, her undisguised knowledge of her listener's position and circumstances, the mystery of her words—all affected Miss Ashby, spite of herself, with uneasiness. Yet she wished for some idea more definite than that which she had gathered from Maida's words.

"Whom do you mean? Why should I not wed? Tell me, and tell me who he is against whom you warn me," she said. And she would not believe yet that it was Morley Briancourt.

"I cannot tell you why you should not wed him, further than because you would accomplish your own misery by so doing. Who is the one against whom you are warned? Look yonder—he stands there by the great oak. Listen to my words, remember, trust the voice of a true friend, and utter not to a living soul that of which I have told you." And without another word, she strode swiftly away in the direction of the tents.

For a single instant, Miss Ashby's impulse was to follow her, but she checked it, and turned her horse's head in the homeward path. She went to rejoin Morley Briancourt at the great oak. Her countenance wore a grave and more thoughtful expression than was its wont; but he did not observe it. He was not looking at her. His glance followed the form of the gipsy queen, as she passed swiftly back to the tents.

"She did not see me," he muttered. "It is well. If she had—" He started. The woman had stopped short in her walk, turned, and stood looking towards him. "The fiend!" he said, to himself, turning pale, "she knows me, after all, I believe."

She did know him. She came back again to the spot where she had been with Miss Ashby; she came nearer yet, and he could not move; he could not turn away, for Eleanor had not reached him. And while she came slowly along, the gipsy woman, beyond her, advanced too. She came near enough for him to see her features plainly, and then stopped. Eleanor did not see her, but he did.

He could not look away. Her dark, bright eyes fascinated him. She raised her arm; she pointed at him; a light, mocking, scornful laugh echoed from her red lips; she shook her finger with a menacing gesture. He was uneasy. He understood that menace. He could almost hear the clear, musical, triumphant voice that said, "I know you—I know you!"

CHAPTER II.

AN INTERVIEW, AND ITS RESULT.

It was evening, and Morley Briancourt paced the floor of the drawing-room at Ashby Hall, with folded arms, his head bent, and his usually smooth and smiling brow darkly contracted. It was two hours since he had returned, with Eleanor, from the visit to the gipsy camp. She had spoken scarcely a word during their ride home, and immediately on reaching there, had gone directly to her own apartment.

This, in part, was the cause of his disturbance to-night. "It is that accursed gipsy who has done it!" he muttered, vengefully. "She knew me; she must have seen and recognized me at once; and what tale of mischief, then, did she pour into Eleanor's ears? Her malice will ruin me! For none but she possesses the knowledge of—" He paused, and set his teeth hard, while his lips were compressed, and his hand tightly clenched.

A slow, measured tread was heard. Through the open doors at the extremity of the apartment, a middle-aged man entered. He was tall and spare, though large in frame. His face was crossed and furrowed with many wrinkles, and wore a stern, reserved look. A cold, forbidding light was in his dark gray eyes. His hair, which had been black, was abundantly sprinkled with gray. He was forty-five. He looked at least ten or twelve years older, even by the soft light from the sconces above his head. This was Sir Edward Ashby.

He came up the apartment, and paused at a table which was covered with books. While searching among them, he said, glancing, for the first time, towards Morley Briancourt:

"Where is Eleanor this evening? Why is she not here?"

"She has retired, sir, with a headache, I believe," answered the young man.

The baronet said nothing more, but finding the book for which he sought, left the room.

The young man laughed—a low, contemptuous laugh. "A headache!" he muttered. "Well, it serves the purpose; there is no need of telling him the real state of the case. It would only make him nervous; and it is not the first lie Morley Briancourt has coined."

He continued to pace the room to and fro. The dark scowl settled upon his brow again. He was thinking once more of Maida, the gipsy. She had not crossed his path before for eight years. They had known each other well in former times, and she had become possessed of the knowledge of certain deeds of his, which he trembled to have reach the ear of his future bride; for were Eleanor Ashby to know of them—and Maida the gipsy was the only one from whom he could fear betrayal,—his hopes and prospects in that direction were dashed aside. And if Maida knew that Eleanor Ashby was about to become his bride, she would tell her all. This was what he feared she had done, that afternoon.

His father and Sir Edward Ashby both knew well what the deeds were that were so carefully concealed, and they had helped to conceal them; for Victor Briancourt had his own motives in wedding his son with the future heiress of Ashby, and securing the title in his family; and Sir Edward Ashby, by some act of former years, had placed himself, his safety—his very life, even, in the power of Victor Briancourt, so that he was a mere tool in the hands of this man, to do whatsoever he willed. And the compact between the two men was this: that on certain considerations—which the reader will become acquainted with in due time—the son of Victor Briancourt should receive the hand of Eleanor, the niece of Sir Edward, and heiress presumptive of Ashby, on her eighteenth birthday.

Was the plan to fail now, almost at the eleventh hour? The long cherished prospects of years—were they to be destroyed now? This was what Morley Briancourt asked himself, with his mind in a state of tormenting anxiety and apprehension. His father had planned this match for him; but he, although averse to it at first, had entered into the project, afterwards, with all the ardor that father could have wished, tempted both by the golden prize held out to him, and by the piquant and charming beauty of Eleanor herself, which, attractive as it made her childhood, even, promised a future of rare fascination; and now, that his ambitious golden dreams had grown so dear, and his passion for his beautiful bride-elect so deep and strong, the contemplation of even the possibility of failure was not to be endured.

He paused in his walk by the great arched window at the end of the apartment, and leaning, with folded arms, against the stone shaft rising in the centre, stood there in deep thought, with the cool night-wind playing free over his flushed and heated brow, from which the heavy masses of dark hair were swept restlessly away; and his dark, troubled glance fixed upon the moonlight sword without, where the broad, smooth, dewy lawn lay bathed in the silver radiance of the night.

Suddenly, some object, small and white, fluttered through the air, and glittering in the moonbeams, fell at his feet. It caught his eye. Stooping, he picked it up. It was a scrap of white paper, upon which some words were written.

"Where did it come from?" was his involuntary thought, unconsciously half uttered aloud.

Carrying it beneath the light within the apartment, he examined the writing. In a moment, a fierce, half-suppressed exclamation burst from his lips. He read the words rapidly. They were as follows:

"MORLEY BRIANCOURT:—Meet me, an hour hence, at the edge of Penshurst Copse, above the river. Do not fail me, or I shall be forced to seek you out when it would scarcely be agreeable to you. I would not willingly expose you, if you are inclined to do what is right; but otherwise, you know my power—a power which I will exercise to its full extent for those whom you have wronged. Maida."

A muttered curse sprang to his lips. He strode towards the great window again, and leaping quickly from the low stone sill, looked hastily about him. But no one was to be seen. And yet the hand from which that message came must have been near—very near.

He lingered a moment, and then went in again, closing the window after him. A single moment he stood motionless; then taking the paper to the light once more, slowly re-read it, lingering particularly on the words "I would not willingly expose you, if you are inclined to do what is right." "Then," he murmured, "she has not yet—" He broke off short, and seating himself at a table, leaned his head upon his hand, remaining for several moments plunged deep in thought. Finally he rose. "Yes—I will be there—by Penshurst Copse—I will be there!" he said. Crumpling the paper in his hand, with a hard grasp, he moved hastily away, and left the room.

It was, perhaps, some three hours before midnight, and the moon, that had risen clear and bright, was obscured ever and anon by heavy clouds that seemed to threaten a storm ere morning. Among the trees bending over the river, the wind swept at times with a fitful, wailing gust that died away in a low, faint moan, mournful enough to listen to.

There was a woman pacing the path above the river, moving to and fro continually, with folded arms, just in the shadow of a small wood that crowned the rocky bank. It was the gipsy woman Maida, and this was the place of rendezvous—Penshurst Copse. Yonder, in the flying moonlight, was Penshurst village, with its wide, bare common stretching away to the forest, where the gipsy camp had been. But the tents were not there now; every one had vanished. The gipsys were gone.

Maida only lingered, but it was because she had work to do here. She had sent her people away, knowing not when she might rejoin them, or where, but devoted to the purpose she had before her, and little caring how far she sacrificed her own convenience to it. And to-night she waited in the shadow of the wood for Morley Briancourt.

Moment after moment, the rapid glance of her large, clear eyes traversed the river-path, awaiting his appearance. The hour was passing; the last moment had almost come. But ere it fled, a dark form was visible in the distance, moving hastily along towards Penshurst, from the direction of Ashby. Scarcely one in a thousand could have recognized a familiar form at that distance in the fitful, cloudy gleaming of the moonlight; but the instant Maida's glance desisted it, she paused in her measured walk, murmuring in a low tone, "Ay—that is he. I was not mistaken in the estimate of my power. He dared not fail me." And a slight triumph and smile curved her lip.

He came nearer and nearer, gradually slackening his pace as her figure became visible to him. She stood motionless, making not a step towards him, but waiting for him to come up. He reached the spot; he stood within a few feet of her.

"Well, Maida," he said, briefly.

"Well, Morley Briancourt," she returned, quietly. "You are punctual; I like that, for I have business with you."

"What is it?" he asked.

"I will tell you in a few moments, though I hardly think you are ignorant of it now. I dare say you are not over-pleased that I should make my appearance in your vicinity, especially at this particular time?"

She regarded him with a glance at once keen and careless, as she spoke the words in a significant tone.

"I do not know why you should entertain the supposition," he answered, with an appearance of unconcern, affecting not to perceive her meaning. "It is a matter of indifference to me."

"It is!" she returned. "And yet one would hardly think so from your anxiety to avoid me this afternoon."

She watched well the effect of her words. He started, and looked visibly annoyed.

"Do not think, Morley Briancourt," she said, with an accent of slight sternness, after a moment's silence,—"do not think that I do not read your actions and their motives. You flattered yourself that you would keep at a distance, when you found whom you were approaching. You hoped to be safe, too, from recognition by remaining so far off. But I watched you from the first moment to the last, and knew the fear that prompted you to slun me. You feared to have me see you, in the first place; and next, you shrunk from appearing before me with so fair a maiden at your side; for you knew that I would at once possess myself of your position and prospects, and remembered a certain warning which I gave you, some five years ago."

His brow grew black and angry. Even by the clouded moonlight, the passionate working of his features could be observed.

"Woman, how dare you?" he cried, fiercely.

"O, I can dare a great many things, Morley Briancourt," she answered, with unruffled calmness,—"I can dare a great many things, when I have right on my side. I say, you were apprehensive of trouble if I should become acquainted with your plans and purposes; but I have been acquainted with them for some time."

"You have—you have?" he uttered, with ill-suppressed rage.

"I have; and that is why I have come hither."

"What do you know of my plans? It is false! You know nothing of them or of me."

"You know better, Morley Briancourt," said the woman, sternly,—"you know better; for you know that if I were ignorant of them, I could not speak as I do. Do not think to frighten me, or deceive me, with your blustering. I have kept you in sight, night and day, for five years. Ay, you may start, and look back, but your frowns come too late. For five years I have watched you; for do not think the warning I gave you so long ago was an idle one. I have been silent, invisible, all this time; for I did not wish to trouble you until you should be ready to transgress my injunction; but now that the time is so near, I come to repeat my warning. It were better for you to die than attempt to wed with Eleanor Ashby!"

He uttered not a word, but stood with his lips compressed, his brow contracted, and his eyes fixed upon the ground.

"You are silent, Morley Briancourt," she continued. "It is well; for you know you cannot dare me with impunity. You shall never, while I live, lead Eleanor Ashby to the altar, to take a wife's vows, and bind herself to everlasting misery and shame. I will prevent the evil you would do. The wrong you have already done is sufficient to brand you with a villain's mark forever, and all that restrains me from exposing it is the prayer of the injured, who would leave you unharmed by exposure, guilty as you are."

Morley Briancourt looked up.

"Is any one at Ryecroft aware—have you betrayed—any of these things which you have discovered?" he stammered.

"No," answered the gipsy woman.

"Will you swear it?" he said, eagerly.

"No—I will not swear it," said Maida, coldly. "My word is not so frail that it requires an oath to bind it. I have told you: let that be sufficient. I would not cause unnecessary pain, unless I am driven to extremities; and if that occur, be assured I shall have no further scruples. I have told you that I would not willingly expose you, if I can help it, for the sake of—" She paused an instant, and then went on: "And, therefore, I have called you hither to warn you in private to desist from this step which you contemplate. Are you prepared to do so?"

He did not speak directly. In a moment, however, he raised his eyes to her face, saying:

"You have not, then, told El—Miss Ashby anything that would—" He paused.

"I have not breathed to her a word," answered the gipsy woman, "that would give her the most remote idea of what your deeds have been heretofore; for I would wish to keep all as silent as may be. I have only put her on her guard."

"How?" He spoke fiercely—in a threatening tone.

But Maida answered quietly:

"I merely warned her not to wed you. That if she did, she would repent it."

"And was that all?"

"That was all."

"You give me your word that you breathed not the faintest hint of the secret of which you are possessed?"

"I have already done so. I repeat it, if you are not satisfied," she returned, coldly.

Morley Briancourt meditated a few moments. He stood with his eyes fixed upon the ground, his head bent, and one hand thrust in his bosom. In the cloudy moonlight, Maida could see that he was strangely agitated. But she could not see the horrible thought lurking in his heart. She believed his agitation to arise from his unhappiness in the prospect of losing Eleanor Ashby. Presently he looked up. His voice was strange and hoarse, as he spoke:

"Maida," he said, "there is, then, not one beside yourself to witness against me?"

She regarded him with an air of perplexity.

"There is not one, Morley Briancourt. Can you not comprehend me? And I tell you that if you choose to relinquish this shameful and wretched scheme of yours, I am silent on the subject; but if you persist in it, there is wanting but a single word from my lips to ruin you."

"And that word shall never be spoken!" uttered Morley Briancourt, hoarsely, as he sprang upon the gipsy, his left hand clenching her throat, his right raised high in the air. A knife glittered and flashed in the moon's dreary light; there was a struggle, a blow, a groan, and the form of the gipsy woman lay silent at the murderer's feet. Her threat was harmless now. One instant he gazed upon the motionless figure, then bent down and examined the stark, cold face, upturned to the night, with the white moon-rays drifting over it. The heart, so lately beating with the fulness of life, was still; the breath had fled from those proud lips—the light from those glazing eyes!

"Safe—safe—safe!" muttered Morley Briancourt, with feverish tremulousness. "She is gone—the only stumbling-block in my way!" He paused not to look again, not even to draw the knife from his victim's breast. Ladeed, with desperate energy, he lifted the corpse in his arms, dragged it down from the pathway to the edge of the rocky, precipitous bank, and released his hold. With a dull, sullen plash, it fell into the dark river. The waters parted to receive it, moaned and gurgled for a moment, and then closed silently over the form of Morley Briancourt's enemy.

CHAPTER III.

INMATES OF ASHBY PLACE.

MORNING found Eleanor Ashby in a great degree recovered from the impressions of the preceding evening. The soothing quiet of the intervening hours of slumber had deprived them of their vividness, and nearly dissipated them entirely; so that, looking back, they seemed as a nightmare, which, as one starts from it in the deep midnight, seems sufficiently horrible, but whose terrors fade away with the dawn.

Her usual gaiety and animation were completely restored, and the careless, light-hearted Eleanor was herself once more; while her handmaiden, pretty Lucy Elmore, whose state of mind, like that of a great many others, was always colored by surrounding circumstances, was cheerful as a bird, in proportion to the cheerfulness of her mistress. Eleanor made a rapid, yet graceful toilet, thinking, as she beheld her own bright face in the dressing-glass, while Lucy was dressing her hair, that it was a very different one from that which the same mirror had reflected last evening when she came up to her chamber after the ride to Penshurst Common; and inwardly convinced that the gipsy woman had been merely trying the extent of her credulity, and that it was really a great piece of nonsense, after all, to believe a word she had said, resolved not to wear such a ridiculously sober countenance again for so trifling a cause.

"Lucy," she said, lightly, to her maid, "I saw your fine gipsy dame, Maida, last evening. She is very handsome. She would do grandly for an empress, Lucy; but I don't think much of her for doing her best to frighten people."

"To frighten people!" echoed the maid, wondering. "I did not know she did that. She told me nothing that was not pleasant—"

"Ay," joined in Eleanor Ashby, smilingly,—"she told you, I'll warrant me, that young Harry Longworth, the butler's son, had been whispering something in your ear down yonder under the hawthorn, and that you were to be wedded before another Christmas should come."

Lucy Elmore blushed scarlet, and her bright eyes fell bashfully. But then she said, modestly:

"It was that, or something very near it, that she told me, dear Miss Eleanor; though I am sure," and she smiled, "I do not know how you guessed it so easily."

Eleanor laughed.

"You forget that I have a woman's eyes, dear Lucy," she said, "and I guessed long ago that Harry liked you better than he dared to say. Well, he is an honest youth, and I know he will make you a good husband. Heigho! I only wish, Lucy, that Maida had given me as happy a fate; though, indeed, I do not credit a word she said."

"She said something to displease you, then?" asked Lucy, gently.

"Something that discomposed and annoyed me very much for a time," replied her mistress. "But I do not mean to let it trouble me, or make me treat other people with distrust. Lucy, have you seen Mr. Briancourt out yet, this morning? I dare say he is already on the lawn. I am something later than usual, I believe."

"No; I do not think he has left his room yet," said Lucy. "But I saw that saucy man of his, some fifteen minutes ago, in the great hall, and he was just going up to his master, he said; so I dare say Mr. Briancourt will be out first, now."

"You do not like Will Humphries, Lucy, I see," said Miss Ashby.

No, indeed, dear Miss Eleanor. He is too impudent for me; and though, perhaps, I ought not to say such things, because he is young Mr. Briancourt's own man, Harry Longworth says he is sure Will Humphries is a great knave, and bade me beware of him. But I would not say this to another than you, miss," she added, in a grave tone.

"No—it is best not—it is best not, Lucy," returned Miss Ashby, musingly. "Think what you will, so that you judge not too hastily; be as cautious as you will, but do not make unnecessary enemies. I would be civil to him, but no more. I do not like the man, I think, any better than you do; but then he is not of much consequence, and besides, he is not one of the family servants."

"And I hope he never will be," said Lucy, somewhat warmly.

Miss Ashby laughed.

"Why, dear Lucy," she responded, "that would be inevitable, if—" She bethought herself, passed and blushed.

"I hope, dear Miss Eleanor," said Lucy Elmore, seriously, catching the thought her mistress would not express,—"I hope you will not think of marrying this great while yet,—at least, not of marrying—"

"Whom, Lucy?" asked Eleanor, with a quiet smile.

"Mr. Briancourt, Miss Eleanor," answered the maid, hesitating at speaking so familiarly on the subject, yet obliged to finish what she had so impulsively began.

"Why, do you dislike the master as well as the man?" laughed Miss Ashby, good-humoredly. "Fie, Lucy! you should not judge hardly of everybody. But I do not think you ever liked Mr. Briancourt over-much, though I am sure I cannot guess why."

"I could not tell why myself, dear Miss Eleanor," answered Lucy, thoughtfully. "And, indeed, I know I have no right to utter a word concerning him or his business here, in the way of opinion, but I have been with you so many years that—" She paused and blushed, afraid to go on, lest she should seem impertinent. Eleanor comprehended her, however.

"Yes—yes; I know what you would say," she returned, kindly, "and you mean well. I do not resent it, dear Lucy, that you take an interest in my happiness, for I know you love me; yet I am better pleased that you do not speak too readily of these matters. But you must not cherish this feeling with regard to my marriage with Mr. Briancourt, which I am not at all certain will ever take place; for although you may not be conscious of it yourself, it may be very wrong to do so. Beware of unfounded prejudices, Lucy."

She tied on her sash, took up her pocket-handkerchief, and carolling a merry air, lightly descended the stairs leading to the great hall. No one but the housekeeper was visible below; and Morley Briancourt had not yet left his chamber, though he usually rose much earlier; and Sir Edward Ashby never made his appearance until the usual breakfast hour.

Throwing a light scarf about her neck, she ran out into the park to court the fresh morning air, that lent a brighter glance to her beautiful dark eyes, and a vivid bloom to her already glowing cheek. Then looking, in her fresh and snowy drapery, and the azure scarf floating over her dress, like the fairest of the graces, she went into the house again.

Breakfast was ready, and Sir Edward waiting in the hall. Morley Briancourt had not made his appearance. His valet reported that he had a slight headache—his excuse for not joining them. The repast was a silent one. Sir Edward Ashby was a dark, stern, reserved man. Eleanor seldom met him except at table, and then he spoke as seldom as possible. He had always been thus, as far as her remembrance went. He was her uncle, and her guardian, but he was, after all, a stranger to her. There was neither affection nor confidence between them.

He sat there, the master of Ashby Place, apart from all others. Eleanor wondered sometimes that this cold, harsh, uncommunicative man, almost a hermit in his own house, should have been the brother of her own father, who, in his lifetime, when he was master here, had been beloved by his equals, and almost adored by his dependents. But, after all, he had only been her father's half-brother. Eleanor had been afraid of him in her childhood. As she grew older, the feeling of awe with which she regarded him had changed into something like indifference. She treated him with respect, but distantly, still; for his presence always cast a restraint over her. The domestics, who were old retainers at Ashby, having served there during her father's time, from his childhood to his death, were not one of them attached to this master. The contrast between him and Sir James Ashby, whom everybody had loved for his noble heart, his beauty, his goodness and cheerful temper, who had a sunny smile, a pleasant word, and a warm greeting for every one, who was honest and open as the day, and of whom none could have spoken a word of evil,—that contrast was most unfavorable to Sir Edward. They would have refused to remain at Ashby, dear as it had grown to them, after his succession, had it not been for the little Eleanor, the only remaining child of their late beloved master and mistress.

Sir Edward Ashby mingled very seldom with his country neighbors, and rarely had visitors. The only one who ever visited him intimately was one who had been known to him from boyhood—Victor Briancourt, the father of Eleanor Ashby's lover. Eleanor often wondered at the intimacy between these two men; for as the one was dark, stern and forbidding, the other was graceful, affable, elegant in person and manners, of polished and courtly address, and of extreme personal beauty. Neither of these men could have been above forty-five years of age; and yet, while Mr. Briancourt looked ten years younger, Sir Edward Ashby seemed as much older than he really was.

But differ as they might, they were very intimate; and Victor Briancourt came to Ashby Place two or three times a year to enliven its gloom with his presence. He was quite at home there, and Eleanor was never sorry to see him, for he was one of those who make themselves agreeable everywhere and to every one.

Despite the seclusion in which Sir Edward kept himself, however, Eleanor was not debared entirely from the pleasure of society abroad. Some five miles from Ashby Place, was Briarfield, a fine old estate, of considerable extent, with a well-wooded park, in the centre of which stood a handsome and substantial mansion, built of red brick, and called Briarfield Hall. It had been the property of an old and esteemed neighbor of Eleanor's late father; but he had died years ago, and his son possessed it now. Young Hugh Latimer and his sister, after their father's death, had been taken to the residence of their guardian in York; while their aunt, a maiden lady, the only sister of the late Mr. Latimer, remained at Briarfield, to take care of the old place during the minority of her nephew. Five years previous to the time of the events which this story details, Mary Latimer had come home to stay with her aunt, while Hugh was travelling with his guardian; and then commenced a friendship between herself and Miss Ashby, which had remained, like their intercourse, uninterrupted ever since.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

The mind of man is formed to desire and to relish variety. The objects with which he is conversant are varied without end, to gratify that desire and to correspond with that relish. The glare of a perpetual sunshine and the fervid heat of a continual summer would speedily oppress and destroy mankind; but relieved by the tranquillity of darkness, the freshness of spring, the sedateness of autumn, and even the gloom of winter, they become no less grateful than they are beneficial.—Manton.

GOLD DIGGERS ON THE MARCH.

AUSTRALIAN SKETCHES.

We present on this page four spirited engravings, illustrating life in Australia, under the aspects it assumes since the discovery of the gold fields which have effected quite a social revolution. The first engraving delineates, in the foreground, a couple of "prospectors," as our Californians call them, on the march. Their rude costumes are adapted for service, not show. In the distance is a covered cart, drawn by two stout horses over the uneven ground, guided by a waggoner and preceded by another gold seeker, with his dog and gun. The second engraving shows also a highly characteristic scene. A couple of horsemen in the foreground have taken refuge from a stampede of wild cattle. In the middle distance the head of the drove is seen pouring furiously along in mad career. Woe to the horseman who finds himself in their path without an opening for escape. In five minutes horse and rider would be a shapeless mass of trampled jelly. The next engraving depicts a group of "prospectors." Their costume is true Californian—one which suits the latitude of Australia as well as it does that of San Francisco. The bearded faces, the slouched hat, the belted waist to wear arms, the huge boots—have become quite familiar to our eyes of late. The lad on the right appears to be inquiring his way, and his dog and that of the miners, are exchanging salutatory growls of rather an ominous character. But nothing unpleasant need be feared, as the diggers, beneath rude exteriors, conceal good hearts. Of a different character is the trio depicted in the last engraving. These are unmitigated rascals. Vice has indelibly stamped itself upon their features. The stooping figure in front, in a half military costume, with pistols, sword and riding boots, may be a London burglar, a voluntary or involuntary exile from the "fast-anchored isle." Low cunning distinguishes the taller rowdy on the left, and depravity and ferocity his companion. The three are specimens of the abandoned characters too frequently to be met with in Australia. The spirited sketches are taken from among the fine illustrations of a little work just published by Messrs. Ticknor & Fields of this city, entitled "A Boy's Adventures in the Wilds of Australia: or, Herbert's Note Book. By William Howitt,"—a very interesting juvenile work, got up in beautiful style. Howitt is thoroughly posted up in Australian matters, having imbibed the gold fever, and engaged in gold mining with a portion of his family. His "Land, Labor and Gold," a work of two volumes, also published by Ticknor & Fields, embodies a large amount of valuable information, to which we have been accustomed to refer as authority with regard to the present condition of Australia. When the discovery of the gold mines took place in this quarter of the globe, there was a rush of immigration thither, similar to the exodus which carried so many thousands to California, and the history of the one under the influence of the gold fever is a counterpart of that of the other. Fortunes made by some—disappointment and sickness incurred by others—industry and vice fostered and developed—prices inflated in the wildest manner—speculation run mad—civilization resulting from the movement of life, and indicating clearly a providential design, these are points which arrest the attention in Australia as in California. During the height of the gold fever, the rage for land speculation in the vicinity of the settlements in Australia, was almost unparalleled. All who bought lands and houses when they were at reasonable rates made their fortunes, for real estate worth in England from five to ten thousand dollars, sometimes brought a hundred and even a hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The increase of Melbourne has been prodigious. Under the stimulus of gold it rapidly increased from 30,000 to 80,000 inhabitants. Howitt, who was not very successful in his search for the root of all evil, speaks, as is natural under such circumstances, rather disparagingly of gold mining. He says, with respect to the gold fields, which are at the bottom of all the rush hither: "It is very important that they should be better understood at home; that the fictitious should be brushed from the real value; and that it should be well understood who are the people to whom they are an object of genuine attraction. It is not to gentlemen, but to the working classes. Fortunes, as gentlemen estimate them, are not to be made there by digging. We have seen the Ovens, and know that it is not to be made there. What we hear of other diggings is similar. Fortunes are not made by any one. There are now so many people come out to the diggings, that, even were they as profitable as they were at first represented, there is such a rush to any one promising point that the whole thing is torn to pieces. What then will it be when all have arrived whom we hear are leaving England? The fever is running its course at home, as the railway fever did, and nothing will check it till it has run its course through. It is in vain to cry out that nobody, with very rare exceptions, is getting more than navvies' wages for real navvies' work at the diggings. The people at home look at the great Ballarat nugget, and every man thinks he can just run over and pick up one like it. They look at the ten tons of gold by the 'Australian,' and at the aggregate amount of gold shipped monthly to England, and they are persuaded that coming hither and enormous riches are synonymous. Nothing will teach them the reality, but the stern reality itself. Digging gold in Australia is no child's play, as many an English gentleman—who, ruined by his turf speculations, has taken to mining to repair his shattered fortunes—has found out to his cost. As the mode of operation differs somewhat from that in California, with which our readers are so familiar, we subjoin a description of the method of conducting business at the "Ovens" diggings, compiled and condensed from "Land, Labor and Gold." The diggers seem to have two especial propensities, those of firing guns and felling trees. No sooner have they completed their day's work, than they commence felling trees, which you hear almost continually falling with a crash, on one side of you or the other. In fact, the stringy-bark tree is the most useful tree conceivable, for the diggers as well as squatters, it being useful for very many purposes. The gold field here consists of two fields, Spring Creek and Reid's Creek. Spring Creek runs into Reid's Creek some three or four miles below here. Altogether there are calculated to be nearly twenty thousand people on these diggings. The greater part of the gold is got out of the wet diggings; that is, out of the bed of the creek. No one, except he sees it, can possibly form any idea of what these wet diggings are. It requires from ten to fourteen men to work a claim, for the water pours in so fast as to require a good number of them constantly bailing it out; this is done both by buckets and pumps. You see long poles placed on posts, like those at old wells in Germany, the outer end of the pole being weighted so as to balance the bucket when full; this machine they call a wee-zee. Others use a Chinese pump, called a belt-pump, which the Chinese took to California, and which Californian diggers are using here. The belt-pump consists simply of a long wooden pipe or tunnel, about six inches square, at the upper end of which is a wheel turning a long band of canvass, the two ends of which are sowed together so that it forms a circle. On this band are fixed upright square pieces of board at regular distances; and, as the wheel is turned, these pieces of board move onward with the band, enter the lower end of the tunnel, and carrying the water with them, discharge it at the mouth. Many of these wet diggings are from ten to twenty feet deep; and not only are they thus flooded with fetid water, but the sides continually tumble in, and require to be cased with slabs or sheets of the stringy-bark. If this be neglected, most likely, at the moment that the diggers reach the gold, an enormous mass of earth falls in and buries it and them too, if they are not very lucky, many feet deep. They must be worked day and night, or they become filled with water to the brim. In these dismal and troublesome holes you see groups of men working under the broiling sun, streaming with perspiration, and yet up to the middle in water. Nothing can be more destructive to the constitution, yet the quantity of gold found in these wet holes being much larger than what is found in the dry ground, there is always a rush there. These deep and unshapely abysses are black with mud, in which lie beams and poles, and masses of stringy-bark; other holes worked out, or whence the people have been driven out by the overpowering force of water; and amidst all this sludge and filth and confusion, swarms of people, many of them gentlemen of birth and education, all laboring as for life! When you have seen this, you begin to have a truer notion of what gold digging is, than from the rose-water romancing of the Australian papers. Next come the dry diggings: these are far enough from the stream to be dug from its drainage. Every yard of ground is there dug up; the whole surface is honey-combed with holes, from ten to forty feet and more deep. These are far more tolerable than the wet holes; but working, even there, is no play. The strata through which they are cut, are often as hard as flint; and a noon sun darting perpendicularly into them, and not a breath of air being able to reach the worker, you may imagine something of the severity of this labor. In some places large square masses have been dug out solidly; and the excavations resemble the foundations of some ancient city, like Nineveh, laid open to the day. The amount of labor has been already enormous. Indeed, if any one at home asks you whether he shall go to the Australian diggings, advise him first to go and dig a coal pit; then work a month at a stone quarry; next sink a well in the wettest place he can find, of at least fifty feet deep; and, finally, clear out a space of sixteen feet square of a bog twenty feet deep; and if, after that, he still has a fancy for the gold fields, let him come; understanding, however, that all the time he lives on heavy, unleavened bread, on tea without milk, and on mutton or beef without vegetables, and as tough as India-rubber. This is not a very flattering picture, but it is certainly a truthful one, and while it costs so much labor to procure gold, there is no danger of its becoming a drug in the market.

A GROUP OF MINERS

A STAMPEDE OF WILD CATTLE.

A SPECIMEN OF THE BUSH RANGERS.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

JUNE.

BY MRS. R. T. ELDERIDGE.

Tall spires of grass are bending,
Bright flowers their sweets are sending,
O'er meadow, hill and dell;
June, with her gorgeous treasures,
Wins my heart to share her pleasures,
And I own her magic spell
Around my heart is stealing,
Kindling every chord of feeling;
Why I weep I cannot tell!
Tender thoughts just tinged with sadness,
Some of joy and some of gladness,
Bringing smiles and tears together—
Would these thoughts might last forever!
One of June's sweet, fragrant blossoms
Is now drooping on my bosom;
How I've watched its fair charms perish,
Like the hopes my heart would cherish;
From my bosom I will tear it,
Gaiest my throbbing heart I'll wear it;
Other flowers not half so tender,
To the rude winds I'll surrender,
One I'll shrine—I'll yield it not—
'Tis the sweet forget-me-not!

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE MUTINY AT SPITHEAD:

—OR,—

JACK TAR AS A GENTLEMAN.

BY FREDERICK W. SAUNDERS.

NOTWITHSTANDING her enormous strength, and that for so long a period of years Great Britain has been able to bid proud defiance to the kings and princes of the world, it happened once upon a time, when England's naval force was at its strongest; when she was engaged in one of her most terrible and sanguinary wars; that the British lion, upon arousing itself one morning from its lair and shaking its mane from its eyes—found to its horrible surprise that it no longer possessed a ship, a gun, or a sailor; no, not so much as a cabin boy or a dingy.

Previous to the year 1797, the British naval service was regulated by laws differing materially from those now in force. Founded at a period when slavery was universally tolerated, and liberty comparatively unknown, there had been but few changes from the time of the seventh Henry up to the period above indicated; the brutal and irrational system of impressment supplied recruits, while the allowances of pay and provisions were of the most meagre and pitiful description.

It seems almost incredible that the British government could have expected men who had been suddenly torn from their homes by a brutal press-gang, for no other crime than poverty or friendlessness—to fight her battles without a murmur. But they did expect it, for they placed before the unfortunate men the alternative—either to behave well, fight the battles of their country, and to drudge unrepiningly through the severe privations which alone the navy had to offer, in which case they became valuable to their tyrants, and thus unwittingly rivetted around their own necks the chain of that servitude which was to gall them through life, or, on the other hand, should the natural feelings of manhood lead them to refuse or rebel, should they shrink from imbruing their hands in the blood of those who had never offended them, in a war which no good principle might perhaps be able to extenuate, they were tried by superiors who had no feelings in common with themselves, but a life of prejudices enlisted against them, and either scourged into madness by the application of personal torture to their backs, or ignominiously strung up at the yard-arms of those ships which they had been forced to enter. It is not to be supposed, however, that all who entered the service were impressed. The same causes that operate to fill our own navy, in our own day, were in force then; some to avoid the evil consequences of misdeeds, some because they were in debt without the means of payment, some because they could obtain a livelihood in no other way, and a few—a very few—because of their own free will they chose so to do.

But having to serve a tyrannical government against their will, was not the only hardship. The food and pay was on a par with the means of enlistment. The water at this time supplied, was, from the ill-constructed build of the ships, the large number of men and the length of the voyage, always doled out to them in limited and most insufficient quantities. Small as was the allowance, the quality was still worse; carried to sea in wooden casks, so that decomposition rapidly took place, and the liquid became revolting in odor and swarming with putrescent life. In evil fellowship with the water was the unwholesome bread which accompanied it. Baked by contractors, whose only virtue was that they cheated a bad government, it went to sea—as now—in the form of biscuits, with the addition of every species of adulteration, and a hardness somewhat less than that of flint. Transported from ship to ship and from station to station until it frequently acquired several years of age, it presented, upon being opened for use, a mass of rotteness and mould. To this was added beef and pork indurated by an excess of salt, supplied by contract, also; salted horse mingled in a large proportion with the beef, and was, perhaps, the only genuine article of provision that could be found on board. But even here rascality and rapacity conspired to make the friendless sailor still a victim.

The pound of meat per man, which the government allowed as a daily ration, rarely exceeded a third, or at most, a half, after being subjected to the conscience of contractors. But after the stores were fairly on board, another and a licensed thief made his appearance, in the shape of a purser, who was sent on board for the express purpose of plundering impartially the government and the sailor. Receiving no salary but that which could be saved, or more properly stolen from the rations, the purser's office was considered to be worth, in a line-of-battle ship, from five to six thousand dollars per annum. It is but justice to the government, however, to mention that in one article, the sailors were bountifully supplied. Rum was doled out to them in ample quantities twice, and sometimes oftener each day.

But a change was coming; human intelligence had advanced while the British navy, or the laws regulating it, had stood still. England, while boasting of her gallant tars, her hearts of oak, was practically denying that her seamen—the prime defence of her shores and her wealth—were human beings. This state of things could not last. There were men at that time in the service who could not be trampled upon—men of education and talent, who were not disposed to brook the wrongs they suffered, and who knew, could a plain statement of their wrongs be placed before the country, a change for the better must inevitably ensue.

Among the foremost of the brave and dauntless spirits, was a young man by the name of Joyce, who had formerly been a tobaccoist at Belfast, where he was shipped on board a tender, with many others, by the orders of Lord Corhampton, under a false accusation of treasonable conduct and seditious harangues.

Having thus unwillingly entered the service, he speedily discovered that there were many other bold and energetic men in a like predicament with himself, who would gladly seize upon any reasonable pretext for compelling the government to better their condition. To these men Joyce joined himself; they were few in number compared with the whole navy, but they were the leaven that was to ferment the entire mass.

It is true there was not a man in the royal navy who had not long groined under his burthen, and who was not more than willing to shake off part of the load. But these men, although excellent sailors, were rough and uneducated; they did not understand the necessity for combination, for secrecy, for prompt and decisive action; in short they were the material for a gigantic and powerful body, but that body lacked a head, and they found a head in Joyce and his companions.

It must be understood that it was not the intention nor wish of these men to violently overthrow the system which they abhorred, on the contrary, their demands were extremely moderate; they simply asked that justice which a felon is not denied on shore.

It was in the Channel fleet of sixteen ships of war, under the command of Lord Bridport, that measures were first taken to compass the wished-for design. The greatest unanimity prevailed among the sailors. Two delegates from each ship were appointed to transact all business, and their decision was to be binding upon the whole. These delegates communicated from ship to ship, and nothing whatever was undertaken without the unanimous consent of the thirty-two representatives, and strange as it may appear, all this was done without the knowledge or suspicion of the officers. The difficulty of maintaining such secrecy may be estimated by those unacquainted with the details of the naval service, when they consider that in a man-of-war, with a crew ranging from three to nine hundred, every seventh man is an officer of some grade, and the greater part of them consequently sympathizing with those in command rather than with the sailors.

This fleet returned to Spithead in March, '97, after a short cruise, and lay there in daily expectation of orders to sail. Now, if ever, was the time to put their long-cherished plans in execution. Valentine Joyce, of the Royal George, William Senator, of the Marlborough, and John Saunders, of the Defiance, were appointed by their brother delegates to draw up a memorial to the Admiralty, setting forth their grievances, and pointing out the means of redress. This was done in the most proper and respectful manner, but no notice whatever was taken of it. Another and another was forwarded to the government, but the Admiralty could not be made to comprehend the extent of the danger. All their lives they had been accustomed to consider a sailor as little better than a dog, and why should they trouble themselves, when business of more importance demanded their attention?

This insulting neglect and indifference exasperated the sailors to such a degree that they settled down into a dogged determination that if nothing could be accomplished by peaceful measures, force must be employed. A hurried consultation was accordingly held, and preparations made with great secrecy, prudence and caution, to demonstrate by a striking exhibition of unanimity in word and action, that nothing would satisfy the fleet short of a prompt admission and removal of their grievances. As I have before stated, they were in daily expectation of orders to sail, for a squadron of the enemy was known to be in readiness to put to sea from the opposite coast of France, at any moment. Now, if ever, was the time to make their power felt. Now, they could make the government sensible of the importance of that body of men who had been so shamefully neglected and abused. The sailors resolved not to lift anchor until their demands had been complied with.

On Saturday, the fifteenth of April, the signal was made to weigh anchor. It was a moment of intense anxiety—the least faltering, the least hesitation, would ruin the whole scheme and consign the leaders to an ignominious death. But there was no cause for apprehension. No sooner did the signal flutter at the mast-head than the crew of the flag-ship, as one man, sprang into the fore rigging and gave three cheers.

This was the signal. Another and another ship followed, until the rigging of every vessel in the fleet was alive with sailors, and a voice went up from ten thousand men, that compelled the noble lords of Admiralty to hearken, whether they would or no. The fleet no longer belonged to the government, but to the sailors.

The officers were politely informed that although they might remain on board their ships, yet their services were for the present dispensed with.

The delegates—two from each ship—immediately assembled on board the Queen Charlotte, to take counsel and to determine upon what steps were most suitable to the emergency and best adapted for securing the object of their movement. The strictest order was preserved throughout the fleet. A captain among themselves was appointed on the fore-castle of each ship, to keep watch and to enforce regularly and subordination to their orders. They carefully abstained from acts of rudeness and violence toward their officers, while, at the same time, the slightest breach of orders among themselves was punished with the most unrelenting severity. By their orders the marines were disarmed and the magazines seized. The boats also were taken possession of by the committee, and made use of to communicate from ship to ship at their pleasure. The officers were not allowed to go on shore, with the exception of some few who had rendered themselves obnoxious to their crews by harsh behaviour—these were sent away. A yard rope was reeved at every fore yard-arm, as a gentle hint of the fate which might be expected by any person who should be so hardy as to break through the regulations. All the men were sworn to be true to the cause, and so strict was the discipline, that if any one became intoxicated he was punished severely. One sailor, for bringing a pint of spirits on board, was tied up and flogged unmercifully with a thick cat. If symptoms of unwillingness to join the confederacy were observed on board any particular ship, she was made to cast anchor between two staunch adherents, with a threat of total destruction upon the least sign of disobedience.

The British flag floated as usual at the mizzen peak, but in addition, there was a sailor's flag, of blood red, duly hoisted at the main. So great was the unanimity and enthusiasm of the whole sailor world, that even the sick and wounded seamen in the Haslar Hospital hoisted a flag composed of handkerchiefs tacked together, and cheered morning and evening with the fleet.

In the mean time, a petition was forwarded to the proper authorities, setting forth that while the military, the marines, and other public bodies had, at various times received marks of the bounty of the government by allowances of bread, money, and other perquisites, the pay of the seamen had not been augmented. They therefore prayed for an increase of allowance, and expressed their firm resolve not to put to sea again until the prayer of their petition should have been answered—"unless, in the mean while, the enemy's fleet might happen to sail out of harbor;" in that case, they promised to "fight the battles of their country, defeat her foes, and then return into port to renew their complaints."

This respectful and moderate petition terminated with the following words:

"It is also unanimously agreed by the fleet, that from this day no grievance shall be received, in order to convince the nation at large that we know where to cease to ask as well as to begin; and that we ask nothing but what is moderate, and may be granted without detriment to the nation, or injury to the service."

Had an earthquake shaken England to its centre, it would not have created greater consternation and dismay than did the tidings of the mutiny at Spithead. The people were justly indignant at the Admiralty for the course they had pursued toward the sailors, in the matter of their first petitions, when a decent, reasonable attention to their remonstrances might have saved the nation from a calamity which no man could contemplate without the most gloomy forebodings.

With the government, all nerve and courage seemed to fail before an earnest desire to repair, at any risk, and at any concession, the disastrous effects of their own foolish and supine policy. A cabinet council was called, and after a long deliberation it was agreed for some half dozen lords and admirals to repair to Portsmouth that very evening, with the expectation of soothing the irritated sailors, and of restoring harmony by a timely conference. Immediately upon the arrival of the lords of the Admiralty at Portsmouth, negotiations were commenced. Difficulties existed in the way of reconciliation on either side; the Admiralty insisted upon the withdrawal of certain points, which they felt ought not to be conceded; on the other hand, the fleet refused to narrow their pretensions—the game, they fairly reasoned, was in their own hands; now was the time to unfold their grievances to the fullest extent, and upon this view of the subject, their proceedings were conducted with firmness, respect and a cool determination to obtain the end desired.

The lords commissioners were in a panic. They had supposed that their august presence so near the scene of disorder would quell all mutinous proceedings at once—but finding themselves mistaken, they determined to pay a visit to the fleet, with the hope of influencing the seamen by personal authority. Upon arriving on board the Royal George, they expostulated with the delegates for placing the country in a situation of extreme danger by the course they were pursuing; they also assured them that their request for an increase of pay should be granted; and, moreover, that the wrongs of which they complained should receive the consideration of the government; but they relied upon every man throughout the fleet instantly resuming his respective station.

One of the commissioners—Admiral Gardner—an impetuous, but zealous officer, expressed his sense of the proceedings to the crew of the Royal George with more sincerity than discretion. He went on the fore-castle, and vehemently accused the sailors of being "skulking fellows, who knew the French were ready for sea, and yet were afraid to meet them; that their reasons for disobedience were mere pretence; that cowardice, and that alone, had given birth to the mutiny."

Such bold and unmeasured language, touching the feelings of the crew in the tenderest point, excited a tumult of rage and violence, in which the gallant admiral was nearly thrown overboard; extricating himself, however, from the crowd, he jumped upon the hammock nettings, and, placing his neck within the noose of the yard rope near him, cried out to the men, and they were advancing with menaces toward him:

"If you will return to your duty, you may hang me at the yard-arm."

This sudden and novel exploit turned the tide in favor of the admiral, and he was cheered by the retreating crew as he once more resumed his situation upon the fore-castle.

Still the lords commissioners found a respectful opposition to every attempt at conciliation, short of full compliance with the demands already set forth; a personal conference had effected nothing more than previous negotiations, except perhaps to render the resistance more obstinate, just in proportion as the embarrassment of the admiralty became more visible.

At this stage of the proceedings, government became most thoroughly and completely alarmed; courier after courier and post after post, hurried to and fro between London and Portsmouth, bearing statements and instructions. Every means which diplomacy could suggest was tried to circumvent the sailor delegates, and under a multiplicity of words to entrap them into agreeing to less than their original demands, but they found them to be equally as good diplomats as themselves.

But this state of things could not last long; one or the other—the king of England of the sailors, must yield. The sailors were in no particular hurry, the king was—therefore the king yielded; orders were received to grant the mutineers what they demanded for themselves, and, of course, for the entire British navy, as all were bound to abide by the decision of the delegates. Immediately upon receipt of the orders, the commissioners repaired on board the Queen Charlotte, and announced to the delegates that their demands had been complied with. The intelligence was received with every demonstration of joy, and the delegates proceeded to deliberate upon the steps now to be taken. After mature deliberation of the whole affair, they signified to the commissioners that, inasmuch as all they had asked had been granted, they were so far satisfied and content, but—

The noble lords were agast. Another difficulty? This was something they had not anticipated, this looked like open rebellion; what was that but?

The delegates coolly informed them that they were placed in a peculiar position; that their lives were not worth a moment's purchase did they resign their power—in short, that they had gone too far to recede, nor were they disposed to do so, unless they could obtain a free and unconditional pardon for all previous offences, under the king's sign manual. In reply, the lords declared their willingness to recommend his majesty to issue a proclamation and amnesty of all offences, but insisted upon the fleet trusting to their honor, and immediately putting to sea. But the delegates refused compliance, and were alike deaf to the voice of entreaty, menace or reason; they firmly and explicitly stated that nothing less than the king's proclamation and the sanction of parliament would justify them in attaching confidence to the fair words of the board; they would neither be entrapped nor intimidated. High words passed between the parties, and the commissioners returned to the shore.

Again the blood red flag went up on board the ships—again the invalid sailors' flag of handkerchiefs waved from the shore, and the fleet assumed a stern and threatening attitude. In all haste a courier was despatched to London with the tidings. At nine at night a cabinet council was hastily called, and at ten, a paper granting full pardon for all past offences, to the Spithead fleet, bearing the great seal of England, and the august "George Rex," at the bottom—was in the hands of a courier riding for life and toward Portsmouth.

The king's pardon was received with delight, and the delegates requested permission to row in procession to St. Helen's, attended by bands of music, and there return Lord Howe—a venerable admiral who had exerted himself greatly in their behalf—public thanks for his services.

Upon arriving on shore, they were met by Lord and Lady Howe, Sir William and Lady Pitt and several of the nobility and officers of the garrison, and the whole party passed on to the governor's house. At the door, Joyce, of whom we have spoken before as one of the principal delegates, approached Lord Howe, and requested to know at what hour the next morning he would be pleased to embark. His lordship replied their time should be his; and seven o'clock was fixed, as the tide would serve at that hour. Joyce, next turning to Lady Howe, begged to know whether she would honor them with her company, assuring her ladyship of perfect safety and freedom of apprehension. She replied, nothing would give her greater pleasure than to accede to their request, which she did with the utmost confidence and satisfaction. Lord Howe invited Joyce and his companions into the governor's house to drink a glass of wine, which invitation was readily accepted with a manly freedom, unaccompanied by the least particle of familiarity or rudeness.

The firm and dignified deportment and cautious politeness of these men made a most favorable impression upon the writers of the day, and from that time, they became veritable sea lions.

The next day the delegates, with flying colors and bands of music, proceeded to the shore, where, after being feasted and toasted by the high mightinesses of the land, and having returned the compliment by a similar jollification on board their ships, they delivered up the fleet to the Admiralty and formally resigned their power into the hands of the proper authorities, having fully accomplished all for which they strove; and thus pleasantly ended the mutiny at Spithead.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

SPEAK KINDLY.

BY BLANCHE D'ARNOISE.

How can I thank thee, gentle boy,
For thy kindness unto me?
Life with thee is a pure, calm joy—
O, art thou happy with me?

Thou hast taught me a lesson, O artless boy,
A lesson deep to me;
That life is no dream—with all its alloy,
It is bliss to be comforting thee.

But how dost thou bear with my wilful pride?
With my wild and fitful ways?
O, where can I find on this earth so wide
Language to speak thy praise?

O keep these for landmarks, gentle boy,
Of my gratitude to thee;
And though life were not gold without alloy,
I am calmly happy with thee.

Keep these for souvenirs, gentle boy,
Of the love I bear to thee;
And if dark clouds shadow our pure, calm joy,
O still speak kindly to me!

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

HINTS IN HOUSEKEEPING.

BY MRS. E. WELLMONT.

Mrs. TIMOTHY BUTLER found herself in just that jaded condition of body and mind that almost any kind of "help" would prove acceptable to her. For more than a year she had struggled on with a mere chore-girl, of whom, to quote her frequent remark, it might be said, "she made as much work as she did." Still this was not strictly applicable to Nellie; for she did tend the door, sweep the sidewalk, do a great deal of drudgery, and withal, she was very good-natured.

But too much remained for Mrs. Butler to do. With her ordinary family she might have accomplished it with considerable ease; but when the rich heiress, Miss Euphemia Jones, came to pass six weeks with her, and was brought up so delicately that she could not think of bringing the water to wash her own hands, and Susan, Mr. Butler's half-sister, came to consult with a doctor in regard to the removal of a cancer, and two little Butlers (brother's children) were sent by their fond parents to make a visit and recall the rare sights in a strange city, our Mrs. Butler became disheartened, and worn out with fatigue, she availed herself of the privileges of an intelligence office, where some fifty girls were waiting in anxious expectation of finding a place.

It would seem a puzzling matter to make a selection among this number, but as our friend was graduated in price to one dollar per week, of course she must select from such as rose to the inquiry—"who is willing to serve as maid of all work in a genteel private family?" Unquestionably the pleasant face and kindly manner of the applicant gave an impulse to many to offer their services; for no less than eight hale, buxom lasses, fresh from the Emerald Isle, responded. A broad-shouldered, sunny-faced, carrotty-haired Bridget was selected—the address and number of her new mistress's residence was furnished her, but as Biddy unfortunately could not read, some ill imposing lad wrongly directed her, and for the space of three full hours was the search continued, when Biddy found herself once more at the office whence she started. At the angry reproval of the superintendent for being "so green," a sister, well versed in the crooks and turns of our city, volunteered to show her the way.

The good-natured expression which Mrs. Butler's face wore in the office disappeared in the kitchen, before a roasting fire, when she assured Biddy that if she hired help she expected them to earn their money. However, the dinner was under way, and as Mrs. Butler remarked, the veriest dunce could finish cooking it. Biddy was left in her strange kitchen to do her strange work. Of course, without basting or turning, the joint of meat did not look very inviting when it was time to remove it. The rice, too, had a firm propensity to stick to the pan, and an unmistakable odor gave proof that it was none the more palatable from being badly burned. On the whole, Biddy's cooking was a failure—all of which was attributed to the fact that she was "cheap help." But perchance, she would learn, thought Mrs. Butler—the girl may prove valuable if she is easily taught; so she set herself about teaching in good earnest.

After many ludicrous mistakes and great efforts, which nearly doubled the labor and almost spoiled the material, Biddy could be left to cook a plain dinner and was really getting to be of some service. Mrs. Butler grew more and more pleased, and relaxed no effort to teach her all the arts of housewifery, and more than once was she heard to repeat that by a little patience and care in teaching as good help could be procured for a dollar a week as for twice that amount.

But her boast was confined to a latitude where silence would have been wiser, for her neighbor's maid having caught the rumor from her mistress, who was paying double the amount which Mrs. Butler did, caused a back-door acquaintance, which so enlightened our green Biddy that she at once made a "strike," and as she contended that she was well worth "tin and sixpence" as prices were going, Mrs. Butler, in disgust, removed her at once, and it afterwards proved that Biddy was received into one of the families where Mrs. Butler had given her own recommendation.

Again, worn and dispirited, Mrs. Butler made her way to an intelligence office—one of a higher grade than the last—where only "professional cooks," "experienced chamber-maids" and "skilful seamstresses" are allowed to be registered as "wanting." Mrs. Butler selected one who was thoroughly recommended as having left her mistress for no fault but that she had gone abroad and closed her house. Maggie, to be sure, had never lived except with a man-servant who lighted the fires, cleaned the silver, aired the ashes, set the table and tended it, and her place was never to labor out of the kitchen. Her compensation had been three dollars per week, besides many presents, and the privilege of going out when her work was finished without asking leave to do so. On both sides, therefore, new relations must subsist, and many meetings more than half way must ensue. Occasionally a domestic jar threatened a vacancy—but Maggie was on a month's trial, and plenty of places filled her eye, and as she began to feel lonely and sigh for companionship, she acquainted "Mike" of the fact, which availed the generous Hilerman to proffer his hand and heart, well knowing as he did, that old Mr. McCarty the millionaire had advertised for a couple "just such as ourselves."

In less than a month, therefore, Mrs. Butler was again left in her lonely independence. She had resolved again, however, to pay less wages and find as good help. There was old Betty Johnson, who had kept house for Mr. Flanders, recently deceased, and she thought within herself, "for once good luck attends me—I will secure her at once, and thus get a woman well experienced, honest, faithful, who is no gossip at the gate, has no company at night, but a thorough housekeeper who will lighten all my cares at once."

The plan worked well, and old Betty was inducted into office. But alas! it was "so unlike Mr. Flanders's house—there she had gas, and somebody to tend the door and wait on table, and do errands, and for her poor old limbs to wander up and down stairs, and attend to all the bells, summoning her first here, then there, and all this to wait upon the Misses Nobody, was quite too hard for one of her age, at any price," and in less than a week she told her mistress so, and obtained a discharge.

Mr. Butler often joked over incurable evils, and he had told his wife that he could select a domestic far better than herself, and now if she was disposed he should try his luck. A most gaily-dressed young Scotch woman was sent by him to try her skill, and Mrs. Butler viewed her with evident dissatisfaction, yet she forthwith conducted her to her room where she laid her make ready as soon as convenient, when she would show her her work for the day.

Mary Lee (for that was her name), in about an hour after appeared dressed in a black silk basque with a flaming bow at her waist, a pair of white cambric undersleeves, and two white skirts, the outside one being heavily wrought and not a little soiled by contact with a muddy pathway. Mrs. Butler made no comment, but inwardly hoped the price of Poland starch would not rise in our market. Mary did but little labor that day, and at night she asked to speak with her mistress, when she gravely informed her that the quality of her food, the size of her room and the want of modern conveniences about the house were such that she should not open her bannocks, but if she would pay her fifty cents for her day's work she would trouble her no longer, and certainly, Mrs. Butler felt as if a great burden was thus discharged; besides, she did not fail to rally her husband upon his rare discrimination of character.

Left alone with a house full of visitors, not one of whom felt any inclination to aid her, with sundry chambers in utter confusion, with drawing-rooms answer and filled with dust, with divers calls at the gate where one rashly repulses the "soap and grease man," "old boots and India rubber, and broken glass men," "any rags to sell," and "please give me a piece of bread," to a stalwart loafer, while another summons to the front door in "dishabille" caused her an involuntary shock of the nerves, as she met an old fashionable friend, who looked with entire disgust upon female drudgery, and "just called to inquire the character of one Mary Lee, whom you recently discharged at a day's service," and added to this, while her cheeks are all aglow, to be inquired of by a saucy little urchin "when Mr. Butler could make it convenient to settle a bill," which had been presented half a dozen times within a month, all such irritating circumstances tended strongly to produce an unamiable frame of mind, which lends one solemnly to inveigh against the trials and vexations of housekeeping. Goaded on by such a state of disquietude, was it any wonder that Mrs. Butler resolutely declared her intention of boarding, as a means of escape?

A searching review of both sides of the question, however, soon prompted Mr. Butler to conclude that by a different course of conduct toward their "help," and a frank statement of the manner in which visitors may be made more agreeable, by showing themselves more helpful, and above all by adhering to a rigid system of keeping everything in place and doing everything at the right time, so lightened all labor and sweetened all toil, that housekeeping was made far easier, even with quite inefficient help, than before.

Mrs. Butler came to the conclusion that fair wages, too, was the most economical expenditure, even in hard times, since we cannot awaken a true interest in our own concerns unless we reciprocate the feeling towards our dependents; and by paying Hitty Clark nine shillings per week, and mutually regarding each other as benefited in turn, the desire for changing help or mistresses has ceased, and housekeeping in a small but independent mode has been established, and such has been the effect of example, that more than a dozen "genteel private families" are considering whether it is really necessary to keep three servants to do the work which one, under systematical labor, may accomplish—for it seems to be a substantiated fact among husbands that a wife gains rather than loses her dignity by superintending the minute details which tend to make a home really comfortable.

VIEW OF COURT AND TREMONT STREETS, BOSTON, WITH THE NEW IRON BUILDING.

COURT AND TREMONT STS., BOSTON.

The station-point from which Mr. Champney sketched the scene exhibited on this page for us, with daguerreotype-like fidelity, is near Scollay's buildings. The view is quite an extensive one, and embraces many fine buildings, and many points of interest. In nearly the centre of the picture is the building which forms the angle at the corner of Court and Tremont Streets. The corner store is the well known grocery of Samuel S. Pierce. The rest of the building is mostly occupied by lawyer's offices—for Court Street is the legal quarter of the city. Next, on the left, is the noble iron building erected on the site of the Brattle Street Church parsonage house, permission to sell which was obtained of the courts after learned arguments pro and con had been patiently listened to. It was certainly too noisy a place for the residence of a clergyman; on the other hand, it is a fine locality for business. The new building is of the Corinthian ornate, five stories in height. The pilasters are fluted, and the heltings and cornices are richly ornamented without being tawdry. The breadth of the windows is nicely proportioned to the height of the stories, and the whole façade strikes the spectator as graceful and harmonious. Further along, down the street, we catch a glimpse of the opening of Court Square and the Court House—that terror of evil-doers. Beyond and to the corner of Washington Street, the buildings, with the exception of the lower stories, are occupied with business and law offices. The view is closed in this direction by the tower of the Old State House—one of the very few venerable relics of antiquity which yet grace our city. There it stands, as it stood when State Street was King Street, and Court Street was Queen Street. All else is changed about it, but it is itself the same. British regiments no longer shake its windows with the roll of their drums; no more officers in scarlet uniforms and gold-laced hats, and powdered wigs, and spurred jack-boots, swagger at the door of the British coffee-house, threatening to “blow the rebel Yankees to perdition.” But British merchants circulate on ‘change among our people without the slightest danger of being seized, tarred and feathered, and carried to the Liberty Tree amidst the jeers of the populace. Still the red cross of St. George sometimes flouts out from its flag-staff, but it is only to announce the arrival of the royal mail steamer, and then it floats peaceably beside the stars and stripes. It is a proud old building—proud in its golden legends of the past. When the storm of the Revolution had rolled away, it had the honor of receiving General Washington as the deliverer and father of his country. There may be some—procul este, profani!—who regard the old building with an evil eye, and ask, “Why cambereth it the ground?” They have very good reasons for its demolition—good, hard, sensible, iron-fisted argument to batter it with. It stands there, dividing the channel of commercial travel with altogether too broad a bulk;—if it were swept away, it would open a noble vista, and afford generous scope for circulation. There is truth in this; but is there not, in such a monument, linking the present with the past, and constantly reminding the living of the glorious deeds and examples of a former generation, a value not to be estimated in dollars and cents? Loth should we be to chronicle the demolition of that venerable old building. We now turn to the other side of the picture, where we have also a long line of perspective. That handsome building, with its basement stores, its graceful galleries, and altogether elegant exterior, is the Boston Museum, a triumph of the enterprise and energy of Moses Kimball, its proprietor and manager. This locality is a favorite one for museums—the soil seems to be particularly adapted to their growth. Not far from where our artist stood in sketching his picture, was the old New England Museum—Greenwood’s—a great place in its day—and the new museum stands nearly on the site of the old Columbian Museum—Doyle’s—at one time almost the only place of public amusement, except the theatre, open in the city, or rather town, of Boston. But the modern museum, and particularly Kimball’s, combines attractions that were unknown to the old establishments. A complete collection of natural history, arms of all nations, and a multitude of pictures and engravings, an extensive wax statuary gallery, a splendid exhibition room, with a noble stage, and admirable dramatic spectacles and performances, render the Boston Museum a favorite resort for citizens and strangers, and ensure its permanent prosperity. Further along we come to the King’s Chapel, with its massive square tower, and walls built to last for ages. Further on, in the line of buildings, we have the solid Romanesque façade of the Tremont Temple, a decided improvement on the neat granite front of the old Tremont Temple, originally the Tremont Theatre, destroyed by fire a few years since. The Tremont Theatre was run up in 90 days, and opened under the management of the late Wm. Pelby. Many a distinguished performer, now no more, like the old manager, trod its classic boards. The perspective is closed by a sketch of our present office, occupying the space between Montgomery Place and Bronfield Street. We shall soon be in the more commodious building in Winter Street, erected and adapted expressly for our business.

THE LAND OF EDOM.

SCENES IN THE HOLY LAND.

The engravings on this page were sketched expressly for our paper from the Diorama of Jerusalem and the Holy Land, painted under the direction of Mr. W. Beverly, from W. H. Bartlett's original drawings made on the spot. The exhibition of this diorama has just closed in this city, after a highly prosperous season of many months. The views we have selected are among the many striking ones with which the diorama abounds. The first scene lies in the land of which the prophet said: "Also Edom shall be a desolation: every one that goeth by it shall be astonished, and shall hiss at all the plagues thereof." The distant range of mountains, so appropriately described in Scripture as a "nest in the rock," stern, craggy and arid, is here delineated stretching away as far as Petra. At its foot lies a broad, sandy plain, now called the "Arabah," which the Israelites crossed and re-crossed during their wanderings. The desolate appearance of the entire region fulfils the terrible prediction pronounced by the prophet. The long procession seen pouring over the sandy Arabah is the Mecca caravan. The contrast presented by this vast moving column to the silence and desolation which surrounds it, is singularly striking. Akabah, to which the caravan is tending, is one of the stations where a supply of water is obtained—deep wells having been sunk for that purpose, securing an adequate supply. In the foreground, armed and mounted, are the Bedouin guides, who, upon the payment of a tribute, are made responsible for the safety of the caravan across the desert. Behind is seen the railroad, or sacred camel, which, after carrying a copy of the Koran to Mecca, is exempted from labor for the remainder of its life. The rest of the caravan stretches away in lengthened perspective towards Akabah. During their forty years' sojourn in the desert, the children of Israel must have been miraculously supplied with water. To those who are acquainted with this region and its resources, this supposition is absolutely indispensable to the understanding of the Bible narrative. The second engraving depicts a spot sacred in the eyes of every Christian. In the beautiful and retired valley that lies before us, passed the childhood and youth of the Saviour. "And he came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, He shall be called a Nazarene."—Matthew 2: 23. There is no more doubt about the locality than in the case of Jerusalem or Bethlehem. The valley of Nazareth is surrounded and sheltered by hills of moderate elevation, on which large flocks of sheep and goats find abundant pasturage. The modern village probably occupies the same site as that which existed in the time of Jesus; and the cliff from which our view is taken, is supposed to be the identical one from which the infuriated populace sought to cast our Saviour headlong. The supposed site of the dwelling of Joseph and Mary is enclosed within the walls of the extensive Catholic convent seen at the entrance of the village. The distant plain of the Esdraelon is remarkable as being the most extensive within the limits of Palestine of which it may almost be termed the granary. Its broad expanse has been the scene of many ancient and modern battles. Here Josiah was defeated by Pharaoh Necho, king of Egypt; and here, General Kleber, afterwards assassinated at Cairo, with a handful of French soldiers, made good his position against a vastly superior Turkish force, inspired with all the fury of hatred and fanaticism, until Bonaparte hastened from Acre to his relief, and converted the desperate defence of the French into a splendid victory. The distant mountains, on the other side of the plain, are in the vicinity of Samaria. The scenes we have delineated are now visited annually by hundreds of European and American travellers. The dangers of the pilgrimage are diminished if not banished, and there is a quarter of the globe which can be explored with greater profit. Within a small compass are crowded together scenes associated with the most momentous occurrences in the history of man. We behold the mount where the Deity communed with his chosen servant, the leader and lawgiver of the race of Israel. We stand upon that mount where the Redeemer addressed his disciples words that will never cease to echo in the human heart. At every step the believer finds confirmation strong of the truth of Scripture history; and he must be hardened, who, after here beholding the grand memorials of the past, still cherishes incredulity.

NAZARETH.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

I'LL COME AGAIN TO THEE

BY J. M. FLETCHER.

I hear the ripples, low and sweet,
Of proud Missouri's waves,
They strike upon the Indian's ear,
And wash old Indian graves;
But mighty waves and mouldering graves
Have little charm for me;
So weary not, and sorrow not,
I'll come again to thee.

The buds have widened into leaves,
On all the forest trees,
And proudly waves the sycamore,
Before the evening breeze;
The clime is gentle as the sigh
Thy bosom heaves for me;
But weary not, and sorrow not,
I'll come again to thee.

The lordly bison crops the grass
Of yonder prairie space—
You know how thrills my northern pulse
To join the stirring chase—
But now unharmed the herd may roam,
The bounding deer go free;
So weary not, and sorrow not,
I'll come again to thee.

I love the prairie, broad and green,
The forests, dark and old,
That lie in broad expanse beneath
The sunset tints of gold—
But O, were they a thousand times
More beautiful to me,
I'd leave them for my chosen one,
And come again to thee.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

LIFE SCENES LONG AGO.

BY MRS. MARY MATNARD.

"London, Dec. 25, 182.—Spent the past night beside the death-bed of Madame de Merveilleux, and listened to her fearful history. Madame de M. died this morning at two o'clock."

THE written record is faded and dim. Thirty years have paled the ink, have discolored the paper, and rendered the manuscript indistinct; yet twice thirty years would fail to blot from memory the recollection of that wretched woman and her sad history.

I met her at a quiet London boarding-house—one of those pleasant, secluded city homes, where the world-sick might spend a lifetime unnoticed and unknown, though surrounded by millions of their fellow-creatures.

"She is a poor heart-broken lady," said my fat and talkative landlady, after informing me that her house contained one person I had not seen. "I know she has had some dreadful sorrow; but dear heart, she would feel a great deal better to tell it, and not keep all her troubles to herself so closely."

I smiled at Mrs. Brown's evident pique; the good woman was dying of curiosity to know the history of her mysterious boarder.

"She never comes to table, and scarcely ever leaves her room at all; but it is not poverty that makes her so shy, for money is plentiful with her, and I never had so liberal a boarder, nor one who was so little trouble to please—though for the matter of that, I would do anything in the world for the poor thing, if I could only bring a smile on her sad face."

Mrs. Brown left the room; and I must confess that I experienced some little curiosity to behold the individual who could cause the tear of sympathy to roll down the fat, crimson cheek of my jolly-looking hostess. Accident very soon granted my wish, and I no longer wondered at the interest she had excited, for Louise de Merveilleux was beautiful, surpassingly beautiful; and that, combined with her seclusion and sorrow, made her an object of the most heartfelt sympathy to myself. I know not what caused her to depart from her usual reserve with me, unless she read my feelings in my countenance. But certain it is, she took pleasure in my society, sought me constantly, and in my presence evidently found relief of her mysterious sorrow, whatever it was.

Our intimacy gradually increased as time passed on, and two months after my first introduction to the beautiful mourner, I loved her with the fondest sisterly affection, despite at times the conviction that would steal over me, that there was no small portion of remorse mingled with her feelings.

She had told me soon after our acquaintance commenced, that her husband, Captain de Merveilleux, had died on the field of Waterloo. I asked no questions, but still the idea would present itself again and again, that the death of this beloved object—and beloved he was, as I never doubted after seeing her gaze with looks of idolizing affection on his portrait—was not the foundation of those moments of agony, in which her mind seemed torn and distracted with some awful remembrance. I was young then, had parted for the first time with him in whom all my fondest hopes had centered, and it was a painful pleasure to converse with my new friend in the, to me, interesting subject of military life—a topic in which she was evidently quite at home; while I absolutely knew nothing of the profession of my husband, save that in my imagination it was fraught with all manner of dangers.

It was in October that I first met Madame de Merveilleux, and as winter drew near, I could perceive that her health and strength were rapidly failing; that she never could, in all probability, behold another spring. And I was also assured that she herself felt it to be so.

"It is a useless wish, my dear," she would answer to my often and warmly expressed hopes of her renewed health. "I am sinking, my child—rapidly sinking into the grave; nor do I regret the near approach of what will relieve me of all sorrow and regret. But you love me, my dear young friend," she added, seeing the tears I could not repress. "Come here; come close to me, and tell me you love me—that no matter what I may have done; how guilty I may have been; how black are my crimes, you love me. You will love me, and stay near me while I live, and not curse my memory when I am gone?"

And leaning over her pillow, I kissed the fair, beautiful brow. I pressed the transparent fingers in my own, and promised to be to her as a sister. From that hour Louise de Merveilleux grew calmer and happier, and I to the utmost of my ability strove to fulfil my pledge.

I will not linger on the incidents of the next two months; suffice it that she sunk rapidly, and day and night I scarcely left her bedside. She seldom thanked me; but I read gratitude in her eyes, and in the motive that prompted her to amuse me with stories connected with that career in which I felt so deep an interest, and all calculated to remove my unpleasant prejudices, and reconcile me to the "soldier's life." Many times in our pleasant conversation did I feel tempted to ask for her own history, but something always seemed to hold me back when about to make the request; and it was not until the night before her death that she herself alluded to it.

"You have never asked me any questions, my best friend; yet well I know you must feel some curiosity to learn the history of one so friendless and alone in the world as myself. Your patient and delicate forbearance shall be rewarded—if reward it is to reveal to you so wretched a history of crime and misery. Few and short are the hours I have to live, strong as I appear to-night; and ere the dawn of another day, I shall have departed from this world of woe and pain. In telling you my history, dear friend, I must not—dare not linger on the happy days of my childhood; for motherless though I was, my father was all and everything to me that both parents could have been. He loved me, idolized me, and never until his last hour did he thwart one wish of my heart. But on his deathbed, and with his dying breath, did my hitherto kind and indulgent parent crush out all my hopes of earthly happiness, and doom me to a fate than which death itself would have been preferable.

"From earliest infancy my favorite companion and playfellow had been the son of one of my father's brother lieutenants—a handsome boy a few years older than myself. Like me he was an only child and motherless, and our fathers, who were on peculiarly intimate terms, had early planned our union. But circumstances altered my destiny. A large fortune was bequeathed to my parent by a relation he had scarcely known in life. A captain's commission was another link broken; and the death of Lieutenant de Merveilleux completed the estrangement of the families.

"I was now sixteen, and very handsome. It needed not the voice of flattery to tell me this truth. I knew it, realized it, gloried in it, and all for the sake of one I loved better than life itself. My father also knew it, and the knowledge brought hopes of realizing his long-cherished ambition. Many sought my hand whose alliance would have been an honor. I turned coldly from their proffered addresses, and lavished fond thanks on my parent for acquiescing in my wishes. Alas! could I have known his thoughts—his intentions, how great would have been my horror and dismay!

"I was but little over sixteen when my father was taken suddenly ill, and his disease setting at defiance the skill of his physicians, they told him he must die. It is useless to try to make you understand what that shock was like, my dearest friend. Suffice it, that I was dead to the sense of any other misery in the awful certainty of that one great loss; that I stood at his bedside unmoved, hopeless, despairing, and with his cold, clammy hand in my own, I made a promise that in one instant doomed me to misery.

"Weeks of unconsciousness followed; but when strength and reason returned, my first impulse was to ask an interview with him whom my father's dying breath had blessed as my future husband. He came, and nerved by despair, I told him the agony, the wretchedness he would doom me to if he compelled to be his wife. I implored, entreated—nay, I flung myself at his feet, and insanely wept and prayed that he would release me; but as well might I have sought mercy from a marble image. He was cold, passionless and determined; and answered my supplications, by cruelly reminding me of the curse my dying parent had invoked on my head should I disobey his wishes. I had exhausted my last resource, and with deadened, hopeless despair awaited the conclusion of my wretchedness.

"We were married, and Colonel Maberly, as if to atone for the cruelty of his previous conduct, lavished on me the fondest attentions and endearments; but I shrank with loathing from his caresses, and spurned his costly gifts with contempt. I knew that each day increased his love for the wife who hated him; but naught could banish the idea of his selfish cruelty in taking advantage of my parent's ambition and my own misery. My husband left the army soon after our marriage. I fancied he was jealous of the admiration bestowed on his young wife, and he hastened to remove me from the society of those he had hitherto been intimate with. We went to a magnificent country house, where all that wealth and taste could procure was combined to render me happy.

"I cannot look back to this period of my life without a shudder, and a bitter feeling of remorse. My husband would have loved me if I would have let him; but I repulsed him with scorn, and returned his kindness with the basest ingratitude. Once only after my marriage did I meet Eugene de Merveilleux. It was agony, and both felt that we dare not repeat the trial. We parted, solemnly pledged to be faithful to each other, and should I ever regain my freedom, to redeem the promise made in our childish years.

"Colonel Maberly, accustomed to gay society and the companionship of his brother officers and friends, suffered much from the loneliness of our magnificently dull home; and I, who might have made it a paradise for him, refused to render it more pleasant. The consequence was he sought to drown his care in wine; and outraged at his conduct when under its influence, I made use of expressions that served to widen the gulf between us. Thus passed six wretched months. My husband gradually grew more and more a slave to the debasing influence of his favorite beverage, and at the end of that time I was in a state bordering on insanity.

"One evening—one fatal evening—he came into my sitting-room more than half intoxicated. It had always been my habit to fly from his presence, but this night I sat still and pretended to be deeply engrossed with my book. Suddenly he ordered me to go to the dining-room and bring him some more wine; and the tone was one he would not have used to the humblest menial in our establishment. I cast one glance at his flushed and distorted countenance, and moved hastily from the room to obey his command. Would to heaven that I had perished in that hour, ere I had stained my soul with crime! I brought him wine; the choicest juice of the southern grape—but it was poisoned! Yes, start not; I say it was poisoned—and by my hand, too!

"He seemed touched at my ready obedience, and made an attempt to apologize for his conduct, thanking me for my kindness, and holding my hand in his own with something of the old tenderness, and I his murderess stood beside him and repented not. But when the glass was lifted to his lips, I covered my face with my hands and rushed from the room; and all that long night I lay on my chamber floor, and moaned and laughed alternately.

"I was free! The physicians came, and with tender tones and compassionate looks informed me that my husband had fallen from his chair in a state of intoxication, and had suffocated on the floor during the night. And I listened calmly, and feigned a sorrow suitable to the occasion; and when they went away, buried my face in the pillow and laughed a maniac laugh.

"I was free! And when at the expiration of a year Eugene came home, I could fling myself into his arms, and exclaim, 'My own! my own!' But the awful crime that I had committed was ever present to my imagination. It embittered all my joys; it turned his caresses into tortures, and his blessings into curses. He seemed surprised that I had become so changeable in my temper, alternately giving way to the wildest mirth, or sinking into fits of the darkest despair; but knowing what I had suffered, he imputed it to my early and cruel disappointment, and ceaselessly strove to banish unpleasant remembrances from my mind.

"Six months after his return we were married. I had hoped that change of scene would drive away the monster that was gnawing at my heart, and we travelled. Restlessly we moved from place to place; vainly I sought to get rid of my tormenting conscience. And at last wearied of change, I begged him to take me home again.

"If I had loved Eugene in my youth and girlhood, I worshipped him now, when the close contact of daily life unfolded the beauties of his character, the thousand endearing qualities of heart and mind, the purity and excellence of his exalted nature. And now a dreadful fear arose in my mind. What would become of me? What should I do, if he at any time should discover my terrible wickedness? The thought haunted me day and night. I knew that he believed me pure and innocent as an angel; that he gloried in the truth, the sincerity, and the spotless character of his wife; and I closed my eyes to shut out the fearful vision of what might be my fate, as imagination pictured the consequences of a discovery. My fears accelerated my doom.

"Sinking under such an accumulation of terrors my strength gave way, a violent fever was the consequence, and for several days I was raving in delirium. My first impression was astonishment at beholding the ghastly countenance of Eugene, as he bent over my pillow; and weak and languid as I was, an effort was made to learn the cause of the fearful change. He gave me a satisfactory explanation, imputing his wearied, haggard looks to anxiety for my safety, and I believed him. I did not dream that through all those weary days of my recovery he bore a secret in his breast that was eating his life away, and that nothing but the danger of giving me a relapse prevented his immediately disclosing it.

"But it came at last. He told me all I had said in my madness, and with wild adjurations implored me to say that my words were meaningless. I could not add another to my many sins; he heard the horrible confession with the calmness of despair, and I knew by the stern brow and unbending gaze that my doom was fixed. Vainly I implored his pity and compassion, vainly besought him to allow me still to dwell with him. He was deaf to my entreaty. My crime was a secret, he said, and a secret it should remain; but never more could he call me 'wife,' never more look on me save with loathing and horror.

"We parted—he to join the army on the continent, I to seek a home in the wilderness city.

"Eugene fell at Waterloo; I have dwelt for ten, long, weary years here in the midst of thousands of my fellow-creatures, unheeded and unknown. My immense fortune I have secretly bestowed on the deserving poor of this city, striving by acts of charity and heartfelt repentance to make some atonement for the crimes of my early days. My hours here are few and short, and I hail with delight the approach of the angel who shall summon me from this scene of my sorrows to a world where I believe my sins have been forgiven.

"To you, and to you alone, have I breathed the wretched story of my life, and if the tale is worth repeating, give it to the world; it will have fulfilled its mission if but one being be warned to shun a fate like mine."

To be singular in anything that is wise, worthy and excellent, is not a disparagement, but praise.—Tillotson.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE HUNTER'S MORNING SERENADE.

BY FRANK FREELOVE.

Waken, lily mine, love,
Diamond glances shine—
I would gaze on thine;
Ere I go away, love,
I would say,
"Happy day to thee, love,
To-day!"

Hear the sounding horn, love,
By the breezes borne,
On this merry morn;
Calling me away, love:
"No delay—
Hunter, on thy way, move
Away!"

Hark the haying bounds, love,
On their merry round,
Beating forest ground,
Calling me away, love:
"No delay—
Hunter, on thy way, move
Away!"

List the echoing notes, love,
From their trumpet throats
Dullest music floats;
Long I cannot stay, love;
Yet I say,
"Happy day to thee, love!
To-day!"

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

BATTLE OF THE BRANDYWINE:

—OR—

THE "BLUE HEN'S CHICKENS."

BY BEN PERLEY POORE.

It was early in the autumn of 1777, yet a golden haze lay basking in peace over the fertile slopes and plains of Delaware. Every natural object was in repose. The rich harvests and the luscious fruits had been garnered, the gay parterres of the garden had been despoiled by rude winds of their variegated honors, and the first falling leaves, as they lay strewn along the pathways, crackled pleasantly beneath the passer's tread. The maples glowed in their gorgeous suits of ermine, the elms were drooping in light golden plumage, the sturdy oaks were stiffly arrayed in orange robes, and the pines shone brightly in their unchangeable green. All nature bore the imprint of that quiet perfection, peculiar to the season.

Yet never—either before or since—have the inhabitants of the State of Delaware been so sorely troubled, as they were in that month of September, 1777. At its commencement, a few of the most patriotic young men, under Caesar Rodney, were with the army of Washington in New Jersey—others did not pretend to conceal their partiality for royalty over republicanism; but the larger portion of the citizens, although wishing well to the cause of independence, had not the courage to aid in obtaining it, so they remained neutral. All at once, couriers, in hot haste, began to traverse the State, and the royalists assumed a defiant position. It was soon known that the continentals, under Washington, were marching southward to Wilmington, and then it was learned that the British, under Howe, had ascended the Chesapeake. They insultingly proclaimed that they intended to march against and capture Philadelphia, and every Delawarean saw at once that his State, small as it was, must serve as a barrier to prevent this invasion. The irresolute no longer hesitated; and although a few maintained allegiance to King George, recruits were no longer wanting. The new companies were all ordered to Wilmington, and that city, usually so quiet, resounded with the beating of drums. Even the boys caught the martial spirit, and a stand of light French fusées was entrusted to a corps of lads from sixteen to eighteen years of age.

Theobald Delancy, the leader of this youthful band, was a tall, slender stripling, evidently not over eighteen years of age; yet his handsome features had that determined cast which usually accompanies great energy of character. Left an orphan in early youth, he had been adopted and reared by 'Squire Claxton, who was his majesty's receiver of customs until that office had a threatened accompaniment of tar and feathers. Just then, under pretext of a lack of employment, the 'squire unceremoniously gave Theobald "leave to withdraw," and the young man found himself cast adrift in the world, without a dollar and without an enemy. Well pleased with an opportunity to labor honestly, he at once apprenticed himself to a carpenter, and when the youthful phalanx was raised, the apprentice was unanimously elected commander by his comrades. This was but just. It was his eloquence that had fired their youthful patriotism, and he soon showed that he was one of the few who are "born to command."

Everybody in Wilmington knew when the young men were to make their first parade—everybody longed to see the young captain—and not a few wondered what 'Squire Claxton would say. Theobald himself only wondered if he would appear to advantage before Miss Anna Claxton, his old employer's only child. Though but seventeen, Anna Claxton had that half bloom beauty which, as in the rose, gives promise of a magnificent development. Her dreamy eyes were deep blue, her chestnut hair hung down her swan-like neck in flowing tresses, and—and she loved Theobald Delancy. How could she help it, when she had for years been certain that he worshipped her, as the patriarchs of old used to worship the angel guests with whom they were privileged to walk on earth. Even her stern father had at last perceived the growing attachment, and it had been the real cause of his sending his ward adrift into the world; for he expected that Anna's charms would win a harrier, if not an earl, with the wealth he could give her.

Meanwhile the hostile armies approached, and on the day appointed for the first parade of the young corps, the entire militia of Delaware was ordered to repair to Wilmington, where General Washington would arrive by noon. Theobald had his command out at an early hour, and marched them to the square before the court house, where they went through several manoeuvres with great precision, to the delight of a crowd of spectators.

"Bravo!" exclaimed a man of lofty stature, who came pushing through the crowd, his gray eyes twinkling with indignation, and his heavy eyebrows frowning in defiance. "Bravo! You are smart little fellows; and if you thrash the king's troops, Georgy Washington should give each of you a horse-cake and a stick of candy! Let me inquire of you, Major-Corporal Delancy, is that ill-favored bluebird on your standard intended to represent a hen?"

A roar of laughter greeted the critic, who was the redoubtable 'Squire Claxton. The standard in question was of white silk, on which an eagle was embroidered in blue—the revolutionary color.

"Ax yer darter! She made the color," said a brawny blacksmith, who appeared quite indignant.

"What! Miss Claxton embroider a banner for rebel boys! Go to your anvil, Friend Macentyre, and beat out truth from its face."

"If truth was in brass, 'Squire Claxton, and I could hammer your tory face, I'd soon have it out. But you musn't talk about rebels here—or deny that your darter worked that flag on one of yer own white Ingy hankerchers! Look at the mark in the upper corner next the staff!"

The wind just then blew out the ribbon folds, and all could see the well-known initials in the corner. The 'squire appeared infuriated at the discovery, and left, exclaiming:

"Follow your blue hen, like a parcel of silly chickens, but you will soon be plucked by the king's troops."

"Never mind, boys," shouted Macentyre, "you'll show the British yet, that the 'blue hen's chickens' are guine, and can pick off redcoats, as a young pullet snaps at grasshoppers."

The sound of trumpets checked further discussion, and the young captain had just time to "present arms," as Washington rode up, escorted by his celebrated Life Guards, in blue and buff.

"Ah," he exclaimed, reining in his charger, and returning the salute with military courtesy, "here are the young recruits, whose roll was sent me yesterday. What is the name of your corps?"

"The 'Blue Hen's Chickens,'" shouted Macentyre the blacksmith. "And your excellency will find them as true as steel."

There was a roar of laughter from the bystanders, and even Washington smiled. "Young gentlemen," said he, "I am gratified by your soldierlike deportment, though I can but regret that those of your years should be forced to take up arms. You will report to General Maxwell, who will attach you to his brigade."

The general then rode off to his quarters, followed by huzzas.

A week passed, and disheartening were its results for the continental cause. The outposts fell back like sheep before the veteran troops of General Howe, and Washington did not dare venture an engagement. He accordingly retreated to Chad's Ford across the Brandywine, leaving General Maxwell to retard the progress of the invaders, and detaching General Sullivan to watch the upper fords. The "Blue Hen's Chickens," as they were called by the whole continental army, were of great assistance at this critical juncture, as each one of them was well acquainted with the cross-roads, and could give reliable information respecting the patriotism of the farmers, some of whom were rank Tories.

The British approached nearer and nearer, until—it was the evening of the 10th of September—all felt certain of an engagement on the morrow. The sun had set in clouds, a veil of darkness suddenly succeeding, without that gradual merging of day into night, which is the charm of an autumnal twilight. Dark and heavy clouds rolled furiously over the face of heaven, as if prophetic of a fierce contest on earth; and soon the red artillery of the skies peeled forth after each rapidly succeeding flash, while the rain poured down in torrents. The tents comparatively sheltered the troops, though few even attempted to sleep. Those who did close their eyes evinced by many a convulsive start that the dangers of the morrow were floating before them, nor did their wakeful companions pay much attention to the warring elements. Theobald was one of the anxious watchers for daylight, his heart-beating wildly with martial ambition; for he felt that he stood at last upon the threshold of the arena of life, ready to win fame in combating for the liberties of his native land.

"Is Captain Delancy here?" inquired an orderly, peeping through the canvass door of the tent.

"That's my name," replied Theobald.

"General Washington orders you to repair at once to headquarters. A man has been taken at the outposts, who says he has important intelligence, but will give it to no one but yourself."

In half an hour Theobald had reached the marquee, where he found General Washington in consultation with his superior officers. If ever painter or sculptor had desired to embody the ideal grandeur of a patriot, there stood his model. Calm, decided, and with more the manner of a successful farmer giving orders for the preservation of his crops than of a revolutionist seeking to save his country from a tyrant's yoke, he was issuing his instructions for the impending attack, when he noticed the young officer.

"Ah," he said, "here is Captain Delancy. Now bring in the prisoner, and let us examine him. Captain, be seated."

The guard soon entered, and in the disguise of a British drummer, securely tied, Theobald recognized his friend Macentyre.

"I don't blame 'em, Tho," he exclaimed. "But now, general, you see the captain of the 'Blue Hen's Chickens' vouches for me. Shall I tell my story—for there's no time to lose!"

It was evident from the man's earnest manner that he had something of importance to communicate, and as Washington nodded assent, all listened with eagerness.

"Ye see," said the blacksmith, "General Howe put up with that old tory, 'Squire Claxton, who's got a bright-eyed darter that this young fellow thinks lots of. Well, to-night, just arter I went to bed, some one knocked, and when I went to the door, who should I see but Miss Anna Claxton! Cutting a long story short, she'd overheard the Britishers have a council, and while some on 'em was a cunnin' this way, under old Koipperhousen, the main balk on 'em, under old 'Cornwallis, is a stealin' in the morn up the Brandywine. They mean to cross up above Birmingham, and come down between you here and Philadelphia. That's all—now jist untie these ropes, and let me have something to wear instead of this red coat, consarn it."

A rapid cross-questioning satisfied all that this important information was correct, and the plans for the morrow were at once changed, Theobald furnishing all necessary topographical information. The sun rose clear and bright, just as the order of battle had been finally arranged, and coffee was brought in by a black servant.

"Gentlemen," said Washington, "let us drink the health of Captain Delancy and his fair friend at Wilmington. May we all live to see these colonies free, and such young patriots happy!"

Theobald's face was covered with blushes; but he was soon relieved from his embarrassment by an order to accompany General Greene, who was to march to the support of General Sullivan. It was a pleasant day, and at noon the reinforcement had reached an eminence about two miles below the spot where the enemy was expected to cross. Sullivan's small force was on the alert, but nothing indicated the presence of a foe; and Theobald began to think that Anna might have been the victim of some deception, when the roar of a six pounder came booming down the Brandywine, and when its smoke had cleared away, the British dragons were seen fording the stream. Forming as they reached the opposite bank, the air sparkled with the flashing steel that rose over their helmets, and they galloped to meet the foe. As they approached, the continentals fired, emptying scores of saddles; but the squadrons kept on, and soon had penetrated the American line. In vain did General Greene urge his reinforcement forward. They were soon met by the flying troops of Sullivan, and in their turn found it impossible to resist the English cavalry. Occasionally they would falter, like a strong ship when smitten by a heavy wave, but then rally, inspired by the calm courage of Greene, or by the impetuous young Lafayette, who nerved all around him with the valor that filled his spirit. All, however, was of no avail. The British won the day, and had it not been for the chivalrous manner in which General Greene's brigade covered the retreat, Washington's army never would have reached Chester. The next morning, the shattered fragments of the continental column arrived at Philadelphia, where it stopped to recruit. And in the first "orders" issued, especial mention was made of Captain Theobald Delancy.

We will not follow our young hero through the campaign of the Revolution. The "Blue Hen's Chickens" became the pride of the army, and shared in its battles, hardships and privations, until the victory of Yorktown elevated their hopes and invigorated their exertions. Soon independence was acknowledged by England's haughty king, and the silver-toned trumpet of peace was again heard in the land.

Theobald had often heard from Anna Claxton during the war; and on its conclusion, her father had not only become a thorough "Son of Liberty," but boasted of his daughter's engagement to Major Delancy. Nay, when the "Blue Hen's Chickens" returned to Wilmington, he presided at a public dinner given them, greatly to the annoyance of honest Macentyre the blacksmith, who had at first flatly refused to attend.

"Never mind, old fellow," said Theobald, "let bygones be bygones. You were the British uniform once yourself; and had not the old 'squire entertained the British generals, you would not have had any news to bring. But we must have our godfather present, or the 'Blue Hen's Chickens' will have a stupid time."

"I'll come, major, on one condition."

"Granted—name it."

"I want to kiss Miss Anna when you marry her."

"You may." And he did!

CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY.

Encouraged by the unprecedented success which this popular monthly has met with, and the rapidity with which it has increased its circulation, the proprietor has resolved to make it still more worthy of the patronage of the public. That this admirable work is a MIRACLE OF CREATION, is admitted by every one, containing, as it does, one hundred pages of reading matter in each number, and six hundred pages a year of six hundred pages each, or twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for ONE DOLLAR!

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY is printed with new type, upon fine white paper, and its matter is carefully compiled and arranged by the hands of the editor and proprietor, who has been known to the public as connected with the Boston press for nearly fifteen years. Its pages contain from the best and most popular writers in the country. It is also spiced with a record of the notable events of the times, of peace and war, of discoveries and improvements occurring in either hemisphere, forming an agreeable companion for a leisure moment or hour, anywhere, at home or abroad, each number being complete in itself.

NEWS, TALES, POEMS, STORIES OF THE SEA, SKETCHES, MISCELLANY, ADVENTURES, BIOGRAPHIES, WIT AND HUMOR,

No sectarian subjects are admitted into its pages: there are enough controversial publications, each devoted to its peculiar sect or clique. This work is intended for THE MILLION, north or south, east or west, and is filled to the brim each month with chaste, popular and graphic miscellany, just such as any father, brother or friend would place in the hands of a family circle. It is in all its departments, fresh and original, and, what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive a copy gratis.

Sample copies sent when desired.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
Corner of Tremont and Bromfield Sts., Boston, Mass.

JAMES T. FIELDS, ESQ.

The accompanying portrait of Mr. Fields, the popular poet and publisher, is from the pencil of Mr. Hill, and drawn and engraved expressly for our paper. In his twofold capacity of author and man of business, the subject of this sketch is extensively known at home and abroad, and a brief biographical notice of him cannot but prove acceptable to our readers. The time has long gone by when the reproach addressed to booksellers, that they were the only men engaged in trade who knew nothing of the wares in which they dealt, was in a measure just; and Mr. Fields is not the only gentleman of the "trade," who graces his profession by the culture of letters, and a familiar and thorough acquaintance with the inside and the true worth of books, as well as with their titles and market value. And if there be any benighted beings who still believe in the grim myth which represents publishers as a sort of ghouls, habitually quaffing blood from the skulls of immolated authors, they need but glance at the handsome and kindly features of our poet-publisher, to be converted from their credulity. James T. Fields is a native of New Hampshire, and was born at Portsmouth. His father, an enterprising shipmaster, died when James, who was his eldest son, was four years of age. Young Fields received his elementary training in the excellent public schools of his native town, and a little later won a proud position in the High School, by his proficiency in the classical languages and his facility in English composition. He was the winner of several prizes at this school, and graduated with distinguished honor. An English poem in blank verse, written when he was only thirteen years of age, drew the attention of Governor Woodbury to his talent, and he strongly advised the young poet to enter Harvard University. This course, which was also recommended by other friends, circumstances induced young Fields to forego; and he came to Boston, and commenced business as a clerk in that establishment in which he is now a partner. It is unnecessary to say that the firm of Ticknor & Fields ranks among the foremost of our American publishing houses. But although Mr. Fields did not enter college, he by no means relinquished study. On the contrary, he was and is a diligent student, and is noted for the extent and variety of his attainments. Well grounded in ancient and modern literature, his first extensive European tour, made a few years since, through England, Scotland, France and Germany, made him acquainted, not only with the most remarkable places of interest in the old world, but some of the most distinguished writers of the age. Of those whom he then met, Rogers, Moore, Talfourd and Mary Mitford are dead. The last named lady, in her "Reminiscences," speaks of him in her kindest tone, and in language unmistakably sincere. She says:—"That short interview (alluding to his first visit) has laid the foundation of a friendship which will, I think, last as long as my frail life, and of which the benefit is all on my side. He sends me charming letters, verses which are fast ripening into true poetry, excellent books, and this autumn he brought back himself, and came to pay me a second visit; and he must come again, for of all the kindnesses with which he loaded me, I liked his company best." The poetry of Mr. Fields is distinguished by ease, grace, simplicity and purity of sentiment. He has not written much, but he has written well; and he is equally felicitous in the pathetic, and in the humorous vein. A very happy specimen of his humor was the poem read by him at the Publishers' Festival, in New York, a little more than a year ago; with plenty of fun, it was just sufficiently dashed with satire to make it palatable. His poetical style is entirely untainted with the verbiage, the turgidity, the extravagant imagery, and the piled-up epithets which disfigure many of the productions of the modern English muse. Willis says of Mr. Fields's poems: "They are scholar-like in their structure, masical, genial-toned in feeling, effortless and pure-thoughted. He has a playful and delicate fancy, which he uses skilfully in his poems of sentiment; and a strongly perceptive observation, which he exercises finely in his hits at the times and didactic poetry." The productions thus alluded to have all been thrown off at intervals of leisure, and without serious effort; but the careful critic cannot fail to find in them evidences of a latent power, which deserves to be fully developed. Mr. Fields must not rest satisfied with developing that of others. And in this connection we may be permitted to remark, that Hawthorne's splendid romance, "The Scarlet Letter," owes its existence to the accuracy of Mr. Fields's literary judgment. It was originally but a brief sketch. Mr. Fields saw the capabilities of the material thus wasted, and it was at his urgent solicitations that the author wrought out the vein, the wealth of which he had not suspected. We have alluded to Mr. Fields's first European tour and its results. His second was undertaken in 1851. On revisiting England he was very warmly received, and the literary coteries and clubs of London gave him a hearty welcome. He was complimented publicly at a corporate dinner, and the speech he made in reply was received with unusual enthusiasm. Among the spectacles he witnessed in Europe were the terrible scenes in the streets of Paris consequent on Louis Napoleon's coup d'état. In the collision between the troops and the people on that occasion, he came very near losing his life—the point from which he witnessed the tragedy being within the range of the cannon. Among the memorabilia of this tour were a winter in Rome, passed in the study of antiquities, and the acquisition of De Quincey's friendship. To have rambled over the most interesting scenes of Scotland with De Quincey is something which any man may well be proud to remember. Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, it may be here remarked, have published the best, and indeed the only complete edition of De Quincey's works extant. The extent of the service they have thus rendered to literature, and the honorable character of their relations with the author, may be gathered from the following passage in a letter of the English opium eater to Mr. Fields, accompanying his autobiographical sketches:—"These papers I am anxious to put into your hands, and, so far as regards the United States, of your house exclusively; not with any view to future emoluments, but as an acknowledgment of the services which you have already rendered me—namely, first, in having brought together so widely scattered a collection—a difficulty which, in my own hands, by too painful an experience, I had found from nervous depression to be absolutely insurmountable; secondly, in having made me a participator in the pecuniary profit of the American edition without solicitation, or the shadow of any expectation on my part; without any legal claim that I could plead, or equitable warrant in established usage—solely and merely upon your own spontaneous motion." Messrs. Ticknor & Fields have recently received a similar and flattering testimonial from the poet Tennyson, who acknowledges with gratitude the remuneration he has received from the proceeds of their sale of his works republished by them. Mr. Fields made his debut as a lecturer some time since with complete success. His poem before the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Harvard University was a brilliant performance; and that upon "Eloquence," one of his longest productions, has been read before numerous societies with unvarying applause. The subject of Mr. Fields's most popular lecture, "Preparations for Foreign Travel," is one on which he was abundantly qualified to write and speak. His views, as expressed in this lecture, are sound and sensible, and his advice exactly of the kind needed. Too many persons are in the habit of rushing abroad without due preparation—ignorant of the history of foreign countries, and not too familiar with their own. Before closing this outline sketch, we cannot forbear quoting an impromptu in verse, addressed to Mr. Fields by one of our most distinguished literary men, whose friendship is indeed an honor. This little complimentary tribute is written in a pleasant vein, and has unusual felicity for an occasional composition:

JAMES T. FIELDS.

"Dear Fields, it is a pleasant thing to find
My name upon a page with yours conjoined.
For us that launch upon a sea of ink
Our fools-cap argosies, to swim or sink,
No better flag than yours, to sail beneath,
Ere felt the subbeam's kiss, the breeze's breath
The ogre publisher, whom poets paint,
That sucks the blood of authors till they faint,
The stern pack of Paternoster Row,
Whose scowl portends 'the everlasting No,
Is a mere myth to us, who see in you
A heart still faithful to the morning dew.
Had I a draught of Hippocrene unstained,
'Tis to your health the goblet should be drained.
Large sales your ventures crown: and may your books Reflect the cordial promise of your looks."

No one who knows Mr. Fields will accuse the writer of the above tribute of having been too unduly biased by friendship in his estimate of his character; and those who enjoy the pleasure of his acquaintance will acknowledge the justice of our own remarks regarding him.

NEW CAPITOL OF KANSAS, AT LECOMPTON CITY.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL.

THE CHEAPEST WEEKLY PAPER IN THE WORLD.

MATHURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

THE CAPITOL OF KANSAS, LEICOMPTON CITY.

The view of this fine building, now nearly completed, on page 12 of this number, was drawn expressly for us, partly on the site itself, and finished from the beautiful drawings of the architect. The building, which stands on a commanding eminence on Capitol Hill, is of stone, with a tin roof, surmounted with a beautiful observatory, and the whole is calculated to be done and finished in the most thorough and substantial manner. The extreme length is 137 feet, extreme width 93 feet. The body of the building is 109 1-2 feet long by 65 1-2 feet wide, and 62 1-2 feet in height to the apex, presenting four fronts, with a colonnade portico on each, 14 feet wide and 65 feet long. All the ornamental portions on the outside are of iron, and the capitals of the columns are of the Corinthian order, with full modillion cornice. The basement is five feet above ground, and eight feet in the clear, and will be occupied for the offices of the district attorney, marshal, etc. On the first floor above basement are the supreme court room, library, offices of the auditor, treasurer, librarian, clerk of the supreme court, and three committee rooms for the legislature. On the second floor are the senate chamber, hall of representatives, and offices of the governor and secretary. The senate chamber is 35 by 45 feet, and is to be finished in the Grecian style of architecture. The hall of representatives is 45 by 60 feet, with a gallery, and is to be of the Roman Corinthian order; the arch cornice over the speaker's seat is to be surmounted with three eagles, the coat of arms of the territory, with the territorial motto inscribed beneath them. The supreme court room is to be finished in the Doric style. The whole plan reflects great credit upon the skill of the designer and architect, Mr. Rumbold, of St. Louis, and the energy with which the work is being pressed forward by the authorities is highly praiseworthy.

LA FELA.—This is the novel title of a new and very elegant cigar store, lately opened at No. 206 Washington Street, Boston. The stock of the establishment has been especially selected in the Havana market by the proprietor personally, and none but the genuine weed is to be had at his counter. The curious will ask what does "La Fela" mean? In the West Indies, the merchant always chooses some pretty fancy title for his store, such as God-speed, Virtue, the Sun, Buena Vista, and the like, never using his own name as a sign, and thus we find "La Fela," which is a soft and beautiful female name. Those who indulge in the weed will find it in its rarest excellence and delicacy here.

ENGLAND.—Lord Palmerston has rendered himself unpopular, by forbidding the military bands playing in the London parks on Sunday.

SPLINTERS.

.... The revised code of North Carolina prohibits duelling under very severe pains and penalties for fighting.

.... At the South they have had some very fine showers lately and the crops look very promising.

.... Ripe cherries are hanging on the trees now and strawberry beds glow with their luscious scarlet fruit.

.... Blackwood's Magazine says there are nearly 11,000 boats engaged in the Scotch fisheries.

.... Thirty-four guns of the line-of-battle ship North Carolina weigh 7300 pounds each.

.... The last words of the Emperor Severus were, "Let us work!" A good motto for the battle of life.

.... A man, for removing a rail from the New Albany and Salem Railroad (Ind.), has been sentenced to two years imprisonment.

.... The Emperor Faustin's subjects have rebelled against his august majesty. It has a dark look.

.... The ammoniacal waters of gas are said to be death to insects which infest fruit trees.

.... An experimental illumination by heat has been successfully tried in Dublin—doubtful the light.

.... Queen Victoria's steam yacht is as large as the Persia. Why don't she come over here?

.... They have been having an earthquake in Arkansas. Was it not the people shaking with chills?

.... The tribunal of Vienna have sentenced Dr. Goldmark to death as a rebel. He is laughing at them in New York.

.... The London Times is now printed on an American press—one of Hoe's lightning arrangements.

.... People are beginning to crowd down to Nahant. The sail per steamer is highly refreshing.

.... Everybody persists in calling the Swedish nightingale Jenny Lind, in spite of Otto Goldschmidt.

.... Marshall P. Wilder, an "ancient and honorable" citizen, commands the "Ancient and Honorables," this year.

.... Soon after Mr. Thomas Barry's marriage to Miss Clara Biddles, he was serenaded by a band, T. Comer leading.

.... There was a splendid exhibition of horses at Vergennes lately—mostly Black Hawks and Morgans.

.... The men who set fire to ship George Washington at Tal-euhano, have to serve thirty years in the chain-gang.

.... During the present summer, many of our wholesale merchants will close their stores Saturday afternoons.

.... Great times these for Ike Partington! Squibs, pin wheels and crackers are prevalent.

.... Everybody is going to Europe this summer, and everybody else to Saratoga and Newport.

THE GLORIOUS FOURTH.

As our journal goes to press a little in anticipation of its date, we are writing on the eve of the celebration of our great national jubilee. We are yet to hear the pealing of the bells, the roaring of the cannon, the reports of the fire-arms, the hiss of the soaring rockets, and the din of other popular demonstrations; we are yet to see floating from every staff and pinnacle, that glorious flag with its constellated stars and alternate rays of red and white, never seeming brighter and prouder than on the Fourth of July, hailed as emblematic of the union of the States.

We have some friends on the other side of the Atlantic, well-wishers among the liberals in Europe, who, with all their yearnings for free institutions, yet doubt their practicability,—timid men, who fear that this republic, as a confederacy of sovereign and independent States, will never see its centennial anniversary. Domestic broils and jangles, the threats of demagogues, political quarrels here and there, industriously circulated abroad by the janissaries of despotism to discourage the friends of freedom, have certainly inspired doubt of our political stability. But we only wish our good friends of the other hemisphere, or a representative of them—Lamartine, for instance, who, drawing near the close of his career, despondingly exclaims, "God help humanity, for man cannot!"—could be with us on this our national festival.

Here they would see the people in their strength, in their joyousness and their gratitude, going up to their altars to revive memories of the past, to hear again the lessons bequeathed to them by the immortal fathers of the republic, and to renew their vows of loyalty to the Union and the constitution. On this day of days, the spirits of Washington and his compeers are in our midst. Their words, repeated by the tongues of thousands of orators, are caught up by millions, whose responsive thunders of acclamation tell us that the fire of American patriotism burns as bright and pure as ever.

We wish that, on this day, every man in the republic, in addition to the Declaration of Independence, could read Washington's Farewell Address, a priceless legacy to his countrymen. Every sentence, every word in that address, was carefully weighed, and there is scarcely a line or letter in the document that any patriot would desire to see changed. Written on the eve of a presidential election, it is untainted by a shade of partisanship. Solemn and calm, it is undisturbed by a single appeal to passion, or a single effort at display. As an eulogy on the blessings of the Union, and an argument in behalf of its preservation, it has never been equalled.

The great principle of self-government, applied on a vast scale, which Washington pronounced "well worth a full and fair experiment," has stood the test of time. It has carried this country through many a momentous crisis,—through the fierce struggles of party, through the bloody test of foreign wars, and we are still a united people. Expansion of territory has not weakened the force of union. The young heart of California beats as warmly for the common weal as that of the "Old Thirteen," comrades in arms through the storm and strife of the Revolution. And if any still doubt the fraternal spirit of our people, let them wait till a foreign foe once more threaten us; then it will be seen that a family of thirty millions can be banded as closely in upholding the honor of their flag as a nation of three millions, and that the spirit of independence alone can fuse a vast diversity of local interests in one common mould. With all her energies concentrated for the holiest and highest purposes, America can stand against the world.

VOLUME ELEVEN.

With the number of Ballou's Pictorial in the hands of the reader, we come before the public with number one of our eleventh volume. It will be observed that we appear in a new dress throughout—new type, fresh heading, and bright in all departments. We cannot let this opportunity pass, without briefly thanking the hundred thousand regular patrons of this journal for their continued and unchanging support. Our paper has assumed a position that it will continue to maintain; fortunate from the outset, being the pioneer of all illustrated papers on this side the Atlantic, we have never circulated so largely as at the present writing, which shows that the public taste has increased for good, pleasing and instructive illustrations, coupled with refined and entertaining miscellany. Were it not for the egotism of the thing, we should be pleased to publish some of the friendly letters which we are constantly receiving from parents, acknowledging the excellent, moral and educational effect of our weekly visits to their home-circles, inculcating a taste for reading, a knowledge of men and manners all over the world, of localities, of natural history, and, in short, of a vast mine of intellectual wealth that young and old would else know not of. We shall still continue to exert ourselves to the utmost to make Ballou's Pictorial a welcome visitor to all classes, and to all ages that gather about the hearthstone.

THE GREEK ADVENTURER: or, The Soldier and the Spy.—This admirable noveltie, now publishing in The Flag of our Union, has met with a demand which has rendered it necessary for us to keep our presses running night and day. Lieutenant Murray, the author, is one of the most fascinating writers of the times.

EARNED HIS MONEY.—The British East India Company have granted a pension of £5000 sterling to the Marquis Dalhousie, during whose administration four kingdoms were annexed to their territory. John Bull don't like annexation when we practise it.

THE POISONER.—The most eminent English counsel are engaged on both sides in the trial of the notorious Palmer, whose doings we chronicled at length in the Flag some weeks since.

ITALY.—Things in Italy look squally. The European powers, in obedience to the spirit of the age, are determined to do something for the down-trodden Italians.

SCENES IN THE RING.

SPALDING A ROBERTS RAILROAD CIRCUS.

The admirable performances exhibited at this splendid establishment were so brilliantly successful, recently, at the Public Garden in this city, and have given so much pleasure all over the country, that we devote, without hesitation, the whole of our last page to a representation of some of the most striking feats, delineated by our talented artist, Mr. Barry. On the upper part of the page, at the left and right, are grouped together the "American Brothers," in the centre is the "Levater Lee Troupe," and below, the daring equestrian, James Robinson, in his unparalleled feats. The "American Brothers" are a band of six gymnasts from different portions of the United States,—Hercules Libby, Henry Omar, Charles Noyes, John Davenport, Frank Bentz and Joe Hazlit, surpassing all of their kind in physical excellence, and have originated a series of gymnastic feats peculiarly novel, interesting and astonishing. The evolutions and combinations of corporeal pictures by Libby, Davenport, Omar and Bentz, on two tall, unsupported ladders, in which the eye scarcely keeps pace with the celerity of their movements, are beautiful and surprising. Libby, Davenport and Bentz—the two latter suspended in a variety of positions upon a pole thirty feet long raised in mid air by the former, transfix the spectator with wonder, not unmingled with fear for their safety; while the antipodean exercises of Omar, with a heavy globe, on the top of a slender perch, reaching almost to the apex of the pavilion, supported by Noyes, brought down the house with the enthusiastic applause they deserved. The "Levater Lee Troupe" consists of Levater Lee, and his children—Augusta, John and Steve. John is a young Abeniz in beauty and grace, and Augusta a Terpsichorean paragon; but Steve, the pantomime clown of the troupe, is par excellence the star, though only eight years of age. He has the fun and nonchalance of a Grimaldi. John and Augusta were born in Paris, while Steve, who first saw light in London, presents many of the characteristics of John Bull. The Levater Lee Troupe have been especial court favorites in London and Paris; have several times contributed to the royal fetes by command of their majesties at St. James and St. Cloud; and Steve is especially proud of an episode in his young life, in which Queen Victoria, at the Drury Lane Theatre, in her enthusiasm, sent for him to the royal box, and kissed the little jester in the presence and to the delight of her subjects. This troupe is engaged for the new amphitheatre in New Orleans, the coming winter. James Robinson, the equestrian, differs from all other stars that have yet appeared in the equestrian firmament, in turning backward somersaults over canvass obstacles and through small hoops, on a barrel-horse, at full speed,—a feat never accomplished by any other rider, and very rarely, even, by any equestrian on the broad surface of a two by eight foot pad. This, however, constitutes but a small portion of his superiority. The most startling effect is produced by his lightning quickness, the great speed of his horse, the certainty and apparent ease with which he retains difficult positions on his flying courser, defying the laws of gravity, and to sum up—the symmetry of his person, engaging features, and remarkable grace. All the most difficult feats which other riders are proud in executing on a pad, Robinson makes child's play of on his nude horse, while his chef d'œuvre have never been dreamed of, much less attempted, by the most celebrated equestrians. Robinson is about twenty-two years old, was born in Charleston (his real name is Fitzgerald), is engaged by Messrs. Spalding & Rogers for their new amphitheatre in New Orleans, next winter, and at an enormous salary for an European tour, next summer.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. Mr. Goddard, Mr. David Ayer to Miss Martha E. Hackett, by Rev. Mr. King, Mr. S. H. Simons to Miss Almira N. Mason, by Rev. Mr. Burlingame, Mr. B. F. Welch to Miss Sarah M. Snow, by Rev. Dr. Kirk, Mr. Henry Flanders to Miss Delia P. Kingsley, of Jamaica Plain, by Rev. Mr. Richards, Mr. Charles W. Badger to Miss Mary C. Fowler, by Rev. Mr. Miner, Mr. George F. Alvord to Miss Margaret J. Murphy, at Roxbury, by Rev. Mr. Thompson, Mr. Alexander Stuart to Miss Fannie A. Learned, at Cambridgeport, by Rev. Dr. Tracy, Mr. William H. Perry to Miss Susan L. Russell, at Somerville, by Rev. Mr. Hall, Mr. James M. Sweetser to Miss Sarah S. Wilding, both of South Reading, at Newtonville, by Rev. Mr. Pettie, Mr. Horace W. Barry to Miss Helen Carter, at Salem, by Rev. Mr. Leeds, Mr. Noah Brooks, of Dixon, Ill., to Miss Caroline A. Fellows, at Marblehead, by Rev. Mr. Dutton, Mr. Edward Snow to Miss Melittia Wright, at Lowell, by Rev. Mr. Eddy, Mr. George F. Raymond to Miss Jane R. Bradbury, of Livermore, Mr. Asa Newell, by Rev. Mr. Burr, Mr. Henry H. Hall to Miss Helen H. Wing, of North Fairhaven, to Miss Mary M. Martin, at Springfield, by Rev. Dr. Ide, Mr. John Damon, of Chesterfield, to Miss Elizabeth A. Loomis, of Williamsburg.

DEATHS.

In this city, Mr. John Perkins, 60; Mrs. Sarah Cushing, 73; Mrs. Nancy, wife of Mr. Isaiah Knowles, 43; Wintrop Blanchard, 17—At Charlestown, Hon. Timothy Thompson, 79; Mrs. Mary L. Waitt, 38; Widow Sarah G. Pillsbury, 78—At West Roxbury, Mrs. Jane H. Sampson, 35—At Auburndale, Miss Caroline E. Ware, 15—At Medford, Miss Mary Smith, 22—At Dedham, Mrs. Nancy D. Brayton, at Lynn, Mr. Joseph Blackford, 39; Widow Lydia Brown, 66; Mr. Nathaniel B. Osborn, 42; Mr. Benjamin B. Oliver, 74—At Salem, Mr. Charles M. Mahan, 72—At Marblehead, Mr. Nehemiah Preble, 84; Widow Sarah Mulford, 72; Widow Eliza Winslow, 84—At Wrentham, Capt. Robert P. Holmes, 34—At Lowell, Mr. Thomas Dodge, 67—At Abington, Mrs. Abigail W. Paul, 42—At Fairhaven, Capt. Silas Allen, 78—At North Fairhaven, Mr. Alfred Morse, 72—At Dartmouth, Mr. Peleg Sheum, 92—At New Bedford, Miss Sarah E. Bennett, 35—At Hamilton, Mr. John Tuttle, 77—At Spencer, Mr. Charles E. Denny, 40—At Barre, Mrs. Rosina White, 46—At Petersham, Mr. Jotham Peckham, at Pelham, Widow Sarah Kingman, 78—At Williamsburg, Widow Lucretia W. Bodman, 78.

Ballou's Pictorial Drawing-Room Companion.

TERMS:—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year, $3 00
4 subscribers, " " 10 00
10 " " " 20 00
Any person sending us sixteen subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the sixteen copy gratis.

* One copy of Ballou's Pictorial and one copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, when taken together by one person, one year, for $4.

Published over SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU, Boston.
Wholesale Agents, S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Winch, 116 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; A. C. Bagley, 162 Vine St., between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Ross, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Woodward, corner 4th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Ringgold, Louisville, Ky.; Wallace, Austin & Buell, 25 Clark Street, Chicago, Illinois.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

LOST

BY IRENE MONTAGUE.

Gems of faith and truth!
The dew of life's morn has flown;
Vanished, the visions of youth,
Innocent childhood's gone!
Vanished, the hopes of life!
Vanished, the visions of time!
Heaviness, woe and strife
Pay for a sounding name.

Dreadfully over the wide world roaming,
Tremblingly peering through the gloaming—
Horrid shadows flitting by;
Visions of past wasted moments—
Life's bright gems in scattered fragments—
All around me lie;
Listening to the storm-king's thunder,
I, all weary-hearted, wonder
Why I may not die:
Die, and sleeping on forever—
Dream: the soul awakes—never!

"Lost!"

A seat near the blood of the feast,
A station near the throne;
"In the kingdom of heaven—the least"—
So much of life is gone!

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

ASMODEUS IN SAN FRANCISCO:

—OR—

A NIGHT IN A GAMBLING HOUSE!

BY FREDERICK STANHOPE.

IN the hard winter of '50, I was in San Francisco, nearly penniless and with no immediate prospect of obtaining a situation. My board bill was rapidly lengthening, while my exchequer was becoming beautifully less. These facts had been brought home to mind one evening with particular force, by a gentle hint from my worthy landlady at our evening meal; and as I sat over my small fire and flogged my last doubloon, I had almost resolved to rush to a monte table and either increase or lose it.

While rousing the fire burned down, the light became dim, and I had lost all note of time, when a light tap came at the door. Supposing my landlady, who often dropped in on her way to bed to take a slight drop of whiskey punch, was speculating on the probability of my being awake, I at once responded, "Come in!" Straightway the latch was noiselessly turned, the hinges without the customary creak revolved, and slowly entered—not my bustling landlady—but a tall, pale, elderly man, dressed in black, with hat in hand, and that self-possession and tact of manner, that bespeak a man of the world, and can cloak the most thorough impudence of act with the semblance of polite and friendly attention. Drawing near the table at which I sat, the stranger bowed gracefully, and in a musical and insinuating voice observed:

"I have the pleasure of seeing Mr. Stanhope?"

"You have, sir," I replied, wondering where he got his information. "May I have the honor of knowing whom I address?"

"O, I am a very obscure individual," said he, with an odd sort of emphasis on the word "obscure,"—"my name is of little consequence."

"In the church, I presume?"

"Ahem! why—no, not exactly—though I have a warm interest in some of its affairs."

"Ah, in the law, perhaps?"

Thoughts of some unpaid bill made me fidget my doubloon.

"No—I never take, though I have been accused of giving a retaining fee."

"Will you permit me to ask what is your profession?" I inquired tartly, nettled at his manner of avoiding my leading queries.

"I'm surveyor-general," said he, with a quiet smile.

"Well, please despatch what you may have with me, sir, as speedily as possible."

"Humph!—few people deal with me in haste, with their own will. You'll not be in so great a hurry when you know me."

"I say, stranger," I exclaimed, "I suppose you think it a good joke to walk into a gentleman's private room at this time of night, without saying who or what you are."

He leaned over the table and whispered in my ear—no matter what—it was sufficient.

Marine reader, you probably know what is expressed by the term "taken aback." I was in this position, on receiving this whispered communication; for some moments I sat—every nerve and sinew paralyzed, every artery beating like the hammer of a fulling mill, and "each particular hair" twisting like a young black snake with horror. The bland tones of the stranger's voice, however, soon reassured me, and I ventured to steal a look at his extremities, to see if his feet had any little peculiarities about them. The stranger laughed as he observed me, and tapping his boot with a long, flexible black cane, exclaimed:

"Pshaw! you'll see nothing of that. The boots are Farr's own, and sans reproche."

"That's a neat cane you have," said I, trying if my tongue could perform its office.

"Yes," he replied; "guess what it's made of," handing it to me.

"Whalebone?"

"No."

"Hippopotamus?"

"No."

"India rubber?"

"No."

"What is it then?"

"My tail!"

"Your t-t-tail?" I stammered, hastily dropping the caudality.

"Yes," said he, gravely. "I found it inconvenient in society, but unwilling to part with an old friend, I had it mounted with gold, and you see it makes a stylish rattan—but come, you were just thinking of trying your luck at a gaming table. Should you like to accept my arm as a eiccone?"

"I should like it of all things—but—that—is—are there any?"

"O, make yourself easy; there are no conditions, I assure you. I have no mercenary motives, but will show you what you might not otherwise see."

After a short walk, during which I observed my friend recognize many of our first men, as though they were "old acquaintance," we reached the doors of the P— saloon, one of the palatial gaming houses of San Francisco. Eschewing the lower and more public room, we passed directly up the stairs and knocking in a peculiar manner, were admitted to a room brilliantly lighted and fitted up with luxurious splendor, displaying tables loaded with fruit, wines, and other refreshments. Mirrors at either end reflected an apparently endless vista. The guests here were few, and seemed, by their jaded, haggard appearance, more like escaped maniacs than sane men; these were evidently the unfortunate wooers of the fickle dame, fortune; for otherwise they would not have lingered on the entrance to their elysium.

Declining all refreshment, we walked to the end of the apartment, and opening the door (a large mirror), which skilfully concealed the entrance to the adjoining room, we entered a smaller and less gaudy hall, containing one large centre table and two or three side tables. The crowd was at the long, oval, green-covered board, where was dealt rouge et noir; each end was divided into compartments, marked respectively red and black. In the centre of the table sat two men on raised seats, the groom porter and the croupier, before whom were the cards and the glittering pile of gold—the bait for fools. Lights overhead with shades threw all their power on the bank, while all beyond was in gloom.

A confusion of noises broke on my ear, together with the cry of the croupier: "Make your game!" "Game is made!" etc.

"A coup has just been dealt," said my companion, "and as this next is the last of the deal, we will observe; sit down."

"Game is made, gentlemen;" and the croupier began dealing.

"Twenty-five black," said he, as he laid down five or six cards.

Those whose money was on the red, where the largest stake lay, brightened, while their opponents became heavy; and one man, who had piled up his ounces to a large amount on the black, groaned and covered his eyes with his hands as if not to see the anticipated loss.

"Thirty! black wins!" said the dealer, as he laid out a second line of cards.

"Hurrah!" shouted the man of the ounces, laughing hysterically.

"Fury! it's not possible!" said a pale, anxious man, whose little all was on the red.

"Shall I count the cards again?" questioned the dealer.

"Lend me five hundred on that," said a showily dressed individual, as he passed a diamond ring to the hanker.

"With pleasure, sir—here it is," was the soft reply.

"Can you let me have ten dollars?" asked a gentlemanly looking, but meekly clad, young man. "I have lost my last dollar!"

"What have you as security?" returned the harpy.

"Nothing but my word of honor that I will repay you; but you may trust me."

"That's not negotiable; game is made, gentlemen."

"O, do not trifle with me," said the applicant, his voice choking with emotion. "It is—it is to buy my wife and children bread! I have lost my whole quarter's salary to-night, and who will assist me—who will aid a gambler?"

"Can't help it," replied the first speaker; "you should have more prudence—we don't force gentlemen to play. There's a man has won a thousand of me to-night, and I don't ask him for a loan—all can't win."

"God help me!" said the unfortunate, as, dashing his hat over his eyes, he prepared to leave the room.

"Tell the porters not to admit that gentleman again, till further orders," said the banker to a servant; "which will be when he receives his next quarter's salary," he added, in a whisper.

"Now look behind you and see a more private peculation," said my friend.

At a small table, with many anxious lookers-on, was a person dealing the game of faro, while a single man seemed to be playing. I at once recognized him as Sam B—, a well-known millionaire, who had accumulated his fortune during the early excitement by land speculations, some of which were rather questionable.

"B— has already lost five thousand dollars to-night; he is now about to bet ten thousand on a single card, having become excited; go and whisper in the ear of the dealer that he is a friend of yours, that you have observed his tricks, and will expose him."

Seemingly to feel some mysterious impulse over my power: of volition, I obeyed. The dealer nodded, gave me a wink and slipped a dozen eagles into my hand, smiling meanwhile as if doing a meritorious action. The cards were pulled, and B— lost.

"I cannot keep this money," said I.

"Why not? The dealer robbed his victim."

"To him then it belongs."

"Not at all—he cheated the Mormons, whose treasurer he was."

"Well, then it is their property."

"Why, yes—but as there are some hundred thousand to divide it among, you had better keep it, more especially as B— will not pay his losses."

"Not pay! why has he not staked the amount?"

"O, no; he is well known, and his word is deemed good for any sum; however, you will hear to-morrow that he repudiates all gambling debts; thus you can test, if desired, the mooted question whether gambling is protected by law in the 'Gold State' or not."

"Make your game, gentlemen—last deal to-night—only cards for three coups more," vociferated the banker.

Two successful ones for the bank followed.

"Last turn, gentlemen."

Hoping to recover, or at least mitigate their losses, many of the players staked their remaining funds on the coming event, and every eye was bent with deep anxiety on the dealer.

"Thirty-one," said he; and the stakes were raked into a marked space where they were to remain for the decision of another coup.

"Thirty-two black—thirty-three—red loses," said the croupier, dragging in with his long rake the heaps of money, and returning the trifling bets on black, since in a "tente un apres" the winning bets are not paid.

As play was announced to be concluded, all left the apartment save the two dealers of a monte table and ourselves; and, just as we were on the point of going out, voices in apparent altercation were heard in the next room, and the door being thrown open, two athletic young men, apparently intoxicated, rushed in.

"Hillo, old boy!" exclaimed one of them, addressing one of the monte dealers, "not going to shut up yet, are you?"

"Finished for this evening, sir," he replied.

"O, you have already turned three hours of morning into evening; I don't think it will make odds if you add an extra one to the account. Come, wake up and look here;" and he pulled a long bag of gold dust from his pocket—"I mean to lose this or break your bank, before morning."

The sight of the money, and the apparent drunken state of the young man, was too much for the cupidity of the dealer; glancing knowingly at his partner, he seated himself at the table, and commenced his game.

"Well, gentlemen, I will accommodate you, though I assure you I have no desire to keep open longer."

"These young men," said my mentor, "are brothers, lately from the mines. They have been fleeced of large sums, and have feigned drunkenness to put these fellows off their guard, and have determined to have full revenge should they discover foul play. Keep your eye on the dealer—you will see sport anon."

Resolved to assist these men, if necessary, I sat silently watching the denouement of the affair. For sometime all went on well—the stakes were not large, and all seemed fair. The brothers generally bet on the same card, and I noticed that the ace and queen seemed favorites with them both; at last they increased the stakes and the dealer became anxious—glancing at his partner with peculiar significance, he gave him the cards, and arising, passed out of the room, saying he should return immediately.

"He is going to prepare a pack expressly for these men; in technical terms, he will 'wax the queens and aces;' in fact, make a perfectly sure thing for himself."

The fellow soon came in, and, as he seated himself, slipped a pack of cards in the drawer where the spare ones were deposited.

"Now, sir," said he, "I will try you."

And taking this very pack, he threw out an ace and a knave. The brothers both placed a large sum on the ace, and the dealer began to draw; for a long time neither appeared, but at last the knave came up. In an instant a grasp like a vice was on the dealer's throat.

"Villain!" shouted the young man, shaking him as a dog would a rat. "I've caught you at last!"

The confederate who sat opposite, was seized by the other brother at the same moment, and thus stopped resistance or cry for succor.

"Secound!" resumed the former speaker, "you thought us drunk, but here is an ace," and turning back the dealt cards he showed an ace stuck to the back of another card—"come, refund the money you robbed us of, or it will go ill with you! You will find the amount here." And he handed a piece of paper with his left hand, still keeping his hold of his throat.

"My—dear—sir," gasped the wretch, unwilling to part with his spoils, though shaking with terror, "my good sir—we have—lost so—much—immensely lately—"

"Pay it," said his antagonist, sternly, "or—"

The ominous click of a pistol filled up the pause.

"Allow me to go—and fetch it—from my—my bureau down stairs," stammered the rascal.

"What! and alarm your friends? No, no, my fine fellow; fork up, or take the contents of this."

And he pressed the cold muzzle of a pistol to his cheek. The argument was too cogent—the sum demanded was counted out, and quietly pocketed by the brothers, who, giving the swindlers a brace of hearty shakes, walked off in great glee.

"I will now bid you good night," said I to my companion as we stood again in the open air.

"Ha, ha, ha!" roared he, in a tone that petrified me with horror, "do you think I part company with my acquaintances so easily?"

And seizing me by the arms, he dragged me forward with such rapidity that I could not even tell the direction we were taking. Suddenly he stopped. I turned to remonstrate with him. As I looked at him his countenance changed: it broadened—reddened—smiled!

"Eh! ah! what! Brown, is that you? Why, where is—O, I see;" opening my eyes to the full extent. "I've been dreaming!"

This fact was evident, for there stood Brown, who roomed beneath, and the bright light of day was streaming in at the window. That pitcher of punch, now empty, and the "Der Freischutz" of the night previous at the Adelphi, had caused strange dreams.

EDITORIAL MELANGE.

Miss Charlotte Cushman is engaged to appear in New Orleans next winter. — One of the men of the celebrated frolicsoter Lafayette, named James Campbell, died at Virginia Point, Texas, lately, in the 70th year of his age. The Galveston Civilian says that Campbell was in the navy in 1812, attached to the frigate Constitution, and participated in her brilliant engagement with the Guerriere. He afterwards joined Lafayette, and was his favorite lieutenant. — The hostile Indians in Florida are variously estimated at from two to five hundred warriors. — Hon. John M. Niles, formerly senator in Congress from Connecticut, and Postmaster General under Van Buren, died at Hartford, lately, in the 69th year of his age. His disease was cancer in the stomach. — The best fire annihilator that has yet been invented is a cord of green hemlock bark. — The New York Times, in alluding to the fact that the late gale blew off the roof of Burton's Theatre, remarks: "It is not the first time that a theatrical manager has suffered from an injudicious puff." — Duncan Gray, a respectable farmer of Jasper county, Iowa, was accidentally shot dead by his son. — Mr. George Benkert, an American composer of music, has been spending several years in the prosecution of his art in study under the best composers of Germany. His works have received flattering encomiums from the musical periodicals of Germany. — The clipper ship Snow Squall, Capt. Gerard, ran from New York to Rio Janeiro in thirty days—the quickest trip on record. — The Medical Specialist says that one great error that we commit is, that we drink too much at our meals. — In the address published by the Spanish minister Alcedia, to the people, in October, 1794, was the passage:—"I have given directions for a general fast throughout the kingdom, in order to implore the assistance of Almighty God. But, notwithstanding this, do not despair, or think your affairs irretrievable." — The corner stone of the Maine State Seminary, a Free Will Baptist institution, was laid in Lewiston, lately, with appropriate ceremonies. — A man in Orange county, New York, was found one night climbing an overshoot wheel in a fulling mill. He was asked what he was doing. He said he was "trying to go up to bed, but somehow or other these stairs won't hold still." — A line of powerful screw propellers is shortly to commence running between New York and Cork. A wag says that it is to be called the Cork-Screw Line. — Santa Anna, the ex-dictator of Mexico, is living in great style at Tabasco, four miles from Carthagena, in New Grenada, South America. He is said to be worth the sum of $4,000,000. — If you will look at the shape of France on the map, you will see that she looks like an old sea-dog, without legs or head, "squirring off" at England in a bob-tailed pea jacket. England looks as if she had a "poor show." — A letter from Washington says the proposition to change the navy yard from Charlestown to Newport, has died a natural death, nobody having moved in the matter. — M. Montigny, French consul in China, says that the Chinese mix arsenic freely with the tobacco which they smoke, and those who do so are described as "stout fellows, with lungs like a blacksmith's bellows, and rosy as cherubs." — In Cincinnati, Ohio, J. P. Kalapza, who was Kosuth's aid-de-camp in the Hungarian army, obtained a divorce from his wife Kara, on the ground of wilful absence for three years. — The secretary of war has, by actual experiment, proved the entire success of artesian wells on the plains of the Mesilla Valley. One well, seven hundred feet deep, supplies an abundance of good water. — The Home Journal tells of a lady who has worn, at one time, as many as thirty skirts! We do not know what is the usual number, but the above seems to us like a few too many. — At Funchal, Madeira, it is the fashion to wear white boots instead of black ones. A lump of chalk serves in the place of the blacking-box and brush. — A terrific hurricane recently passed over a portion of Dallas county, Texas. Its course was from north to south, a distance of sixteen miles, extending from east to west two or three hundred yards. The tract over which it swept was completely devastated. Nine persons were killed, and a great many wounded.

STRAW BONNETS.—The manufacture of these articles in Foxboro', Mass., is a great branch of industry. The Messrs. Carpenter manufacture straw bonnets to the amount of $2,000,000 a year. Their main building covers several acres; in it are employed 500 persons, and in private houses in the adjoining towns some 3000 more are employed. Some of the ladies of Foxboro' earn $500 a year in this occupation.

BINDING.—We are now binding up in our neat, substantial and uniform style, the past volume of the Pictorial, in full gilt, at a charge of one dollar each. Our agents at New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Cincinnati, Detroit, Chicago, and St. Louis, will bind in similar style at one dollar and a quarter, thus putting the work into a form for lasting preservation, and greatly increasing its value.

NOIST CARRIER'S BOOK AND STATISTICAL CO. No. 71 LONG WARE, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—Incorporated according to an act of the Legislature of California, January 1, 1855. CHARLES P. KIMBALL, President.—TREASURER—Charles P. Kimball, Thomas N. Hibben, G. B. Haywood.—CLERKS—GALACAS, Agent, New York.

THE MARKETS.—Butter goes off very freely in the hot weather; pigs hang heavily on hand, especially those taken by the leg; and eggs suffer in consequence of the pressure.

JUG PERFUMERY.—J. Russell Spalding, at No. 27 Tremont Row, sells a delicious rival to Lubin called Jug Perfumery, and at one quarter the cost.

ROUND THE RING.—At New Bedford, lately, there were no fewer than five circus companies in full blast—and plenty of "perm in port."

Wayside Gatherings.

The fare from St. Louis to Boston is only $28, or a little over two cents a mile.

The National Congress of Bogota has passed a decree declaring Cartagena a free port.

A petite comedy, called "Tit for Tat," has been written for Mrs. Bowers by Col. J. S. Wallace of the Philadelphia press.

A few days since, a negro, working on a farm a few miles from Lynchburg, Va., found a lump of pure gold worth $113.

The canals brought out by the ship supply, for the United States government, were safely landed in Texas.

The gipsies issued from India "a long time ago," and settled in Hungary and Wallachia, spreading from thence into other countries.

Henry Hopkins, the lawyer and postmaster who robbed the mail at Island Pond, Vt., has been found guilty, and sentenced to ten years imprisonment.

The population of the United States is now over 25,000,000, making nearly 6,000,000 families; of these, it is believed, more than 1,000,000 are without the Bible.

The legislature of Wisconsin has again refused to re-establish capital punishment—the bill to repeal the anti-hanging act having been rejected in the assembly by a majority of one.

The "New York Teacher," conducted by a board of twelve editors, under the supervision of Alexander Wilder, claims to have the widest circulation of any educational journal in the world.

We see it stated that travelling on the Lord's day, in the Sandwich Islands, except in the direction of a church, is strictly forbidden by law. Wonder what they do with people who travel home from church!

At a meeting in Philadelphia, a few days since, it was resolved to endeavor to raise $5000 in that city towards the establishment of an American chapel in Paris. A committee was appointed to collect the money.

In an article in the Medical Reformer, the editor remarks that as, in the spring of the year, the sensibilities of the digestive organs are increased, the full diet of winter will, if persisted in, tend to induce fever.

Two brutes lately raced their steeds from Auburn, Cal., to Sacramento and back, 77 miles. One, a mule, was dragged and beaten by several men during the last 15 miles. The horse either died or was abandoned on the road.

The Highland Society of Newcastle have resolved to present Sir Colin Campbell with a large and elegantly chased silver snuff-box, inlaid with gold, as a mark of their high estimation for his distinguished services in the Crimea.

The late Dr. Warren, of Boston, left particular directions in his will for the injection of his body with an arsenical solution, for a minute post-mortem examination, for the preparation of his skeleton, and for its preservation in the cabinet of the Medical College.

Mr. Blackstone, who figured in the early history of Boston, had the following grant made to him, which, at this day, is worth a pretty penny—"It is agreed that Mr. William Blackstone shall have 50 acres of ground set out for him near to his house in Boston, to enjoy for ever."

French soldiers at Constantinople are said to be dying off in a most frightful manner, with a disease intermediate between scurvy and the typhus fever. A number of doctors have also died, and recently one committed suicide because he had failed to discover a remedy for the complaint.

One of the oldest papers in Northern Europe is the official gazette of Sweden, the Postoch Inrikes Tigning. It was founded in 1664, during the reign of Queen Christina, the daughter of Gustavus Adolphus the Great; and the present year is, without interruption, its two hundred and eleventh anniversary.

Mrs. Sarah A. Bullock, of Granville, N. C., has transported the editor of the Clarksville (Va.) Tobacco Plant to the seventh heaven of delight by sending to him a bunch of asparagus, some of the spikes of which measured twelve and a half inches in length and three and one-eighth in circumference!

In India, according to the Rev. Mr. Walpole, any man of the place who may be inclined to matrimony, if he happen to be pleased with any of the girls whom he sees in passing, throws an embroidered handkerchief on her head and neck; the girl is then obliged to return home, regards herself as betrothed, and appears no more in public!

A physician of extensive practice says, in reference to the vast number of experiments witnessed by him in the use of chloroform, that it is not by any means necessary to carry the absorption of the chloroform to the extent of destroying all power of movement—in fact, that there is danger in crossing the line which separates motion and its abolition.

Turkish fire engines are laughable contrivances for putting out fires. They are nothing but little force pumps, standing in a copper basin capable of holding, perhaps, four pails of water. The reservoir is supplied from a fountain by a row of Turks, who pass the water in buckets. The hose for these "machines" is carried around the neck of some Turk, and the firemen move at a dog trot.

Mr. and Mrs. Crisp took a benefit at the Gaiety, New Orleans, lately. He was called out at the end of the performance and made some appropriate remarks, when suddenly, from one of the side boxes, he was presented, in the name of the citizens of New Orleans, with a beautiful service of silver. In returning thanks, he remarked that "although devoted to the scotch, he did not expect to win the plate."

The curability of insanity, if placed under suitable treatment within the first year of its duration, is stated by commissioners appointed to investigate the subject in Massachusetts, to be as high as 75 to 90 per cent.; but if a second year is allowed to elapse before restorative measures are resorted to, the cures would be less than one-half that proportion. After the fifth year has passed, almost all hope of recovery may be abandoned.

The annual commencements of the various medical schools in Philadelphia have just been held, and from the returns made of the number of graduates, the following summary is derived:—Jefferson Medical College, 215; Medical College of the University of Pennsylvania, 142; Medical Department of the Pennsylvania College, 38; Philadelphia College of Medicine, 21; Homoeopathic College of Pennsylvania, 37; Philadelphia College of Pharmacy, 28. Total, 480.

A berth for steamships and sailing vessels has been invented, with a view to prevent, by its use, sea-sickness. At the bottom of the berth are two wide convex pieces, or battens, from the centre of the under side of which converge heavy steel springs, which are hooked to the sides of the berth. These springs are made to possess considerable elasticity, so that the person who occupies the berth will always preserve his balance, no matter how much the vessel may be tossed.

Foreign Items.

M. Ponsard's last comedy, "L'Honneur et l'Argent," has produced the author the sum of £4000!

The King of Naples is said to look with intense suspicion upon the Anglo-Italian legion, now at Malta.

M. Kosuth has addressed several very sympathizing audiences in Scotland lately. The Austrian concordat is the great subject of his oratory at present.

It is expected that but small supplies of grain will be obtained by merchants who seek it at Odessa; but in the Sea of Azof it is probable that large quantities can be had.

A letter from Bucharest says, that not content with plundering everybody about them, the Austrian troops have taken to plundering the churches also. No less than forty-five have been robbed lately, including some Protestant chapels.

Aldershot camp has its theatre, a building of the Noah's ark style of architecture, where the officers get up amateur performances. More fortunate, however, than their brethren in the Crimea, they enjoy the assistance of lady professionals for female characters.

The Sub-marine Telegraph Company is about to resume and complete its line from the island of Sardinia to Cape Bon, so that Paris will soon be placed in telegraphic communication with the colony of Algiers. The marine cord has been reduced from seven to three coils.

The Count de Montemore, the son of Count Niepburg and Marie-Louise, the widow of Napoleon, is now a lieutenant field marshal in the service of Austria. He has still in his possession the famous collar of rose-colored pearls which the first emperor gave to Marie-Louise when they were married; and his wife, the Hungarian duchess Bathiany, now wears it in the drawing-rooms of Vienna.

Sands of Gold.

.... An idle reason lessens the weight of the good ones you gave before.—Swift.

.... Pictures drawn in our minds are laid in fading colors, and, unless sometimes refreshed, vanish and disappear.—Locke.

.... False shame and fear of blame cause more bad actions than good, but virtue never blushes but for evil.—J. J. Rousseau.

.... It is hard to personate and act a part long. Therefore, if a man thinks it convenient to seem good, let him be so, indeed.—Tillotson.

.... A man should never be ashamed to own he has been in the wrong, which is but saying, in other words, that he is wiser to-day than he was yesterday.—Pope.

.... Truth, like the juice of the poppy, in small quantities, calms men; in larger, heats and irritates them, and is attended by fatal consequences in its excess.—Landor.

.... The water that flows from a spring doesn't congeal in winter. So those sentiments of friendship which flow from the heart cannot be frozen in adversity.—Addison.

.... Vanity in women is not invariably, though it is too often, the sign of a cold and selfish heart; in men it always is; therefore we ridicule it in society, and in private hate it.—Landor.

.... There is a great difference between an act of prudence and an act of justice. In one case we consider what we shall gain or lose in the present world; while in the other case, we consider also what we shall gain or lose in the world to come.—Stewart.

Joker's Budget.

If a spoonful of yeast will raise fifty cents' worth of flour, how much will it take to raise funds enough to buy another Flag?

Some people turn up their noses at this world as if they were in the habit of keeping company with a better. Whom that cap fits let him put it on.

A young American woman being asked by a boring politician which party she was most in favor of, replied that she preferred a wedding party.

A gentleman once observing that a person, famous in the musical profession led a very abandoned life, "Ay," replied a wag, "the whole tenor of his life has been base."

Jacobs, in one of his advertisements, declares that his drums, among other articles which he has for sale, "can't be beat." Will he be kind enough to tell us what they are good for, then?

A lady asked her gardener why the weeds always outgrew and covered up the flowers. "Madame," answered he, "the soil is mother of the weeds, but only step-mother of the flowers."

Dean Swift, hearing of a carpenter falling through the scaffolding of a house which he was engaged in repairing, dryly remarked that he liked to see a mechanic go through his work promptly.

"No man," said a wealthy, but weak-headed barrister, "should be admitted to the bar who had an independent landed property." "May I ask, sir," said Mr. Curran, "how many acres make a wisacre?"

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

An elegant, moral and refined Miscellaneous Family Journal, devoted to polite literature, wit and humor, prose and poetic gems, and original tales, written expressly for the paper. In politics, and on all sectarian questions, it is strictly neutral; therefore making it emphatically a PAPER FOR THE MILLION, and a welcome visitor to the home circle.

It contains the foreign and domestic news of the day, so condensed as to present the greatest possible amount of intelligence. No advertisements are admitted in the paper, thus offering the entire sheet, which is of a medium size, for the instruction and amusement of the general reader. An unrivalled corps of contributors are regularly engaged, and every department is under the most finished and perfect system that experience can suggest, forming an original paper, the present circulation of which far exceeds that of any other weekly paper in the Union, with the exception of "BALLOU'S PICTORIAL."

Sample copies sent when desired.

TERMS:—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year..... $2 00
4 subscribers, " "..... 7 00
10 " " "..... 15 00

Any person sending us sixteen subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the seventeenth copy gratis.

One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, $4 per annum. Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU, Corner of Tremont and Bromfield Sts., Boston, Mass.

WHOLESALE AGENTS:—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Winch, 116 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; A. C. Bagley, 162 Vine Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Rovee, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Woodward, corner 4th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Ringgold, Louisville, Ky.

THE AMERICAN BROTHERS.

LEVATER LEE FAMILY.

THE AMERICAN BROTHERS.

JAMES ROBINSON, OF SPALDING & ROGERS'S CIRCUS, IN HIS DARING BAREBACK EQUESTRIAN FEATS.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { CORNER OF TREMONT
AND BROMFIELD STS.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 12, 1856.

$3.00 PER ANNUM. { VOL. XI., No. 2.—WHOLE No. 262.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

SHOT TOWER, ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

The engraving on this page is from a drawing made expressly for us on the spot, recently, by Mr. Kilburn, and is one of a large number of local views by the same artist, now in the course of preparation, and illustrating American cities. The St. Louis Shot Tower is situated in the northern part of the city, and forms quite a prominent object in its appearance. The tower is of brick, seventy-six feet in height, with a diameter at the base of thirty-three feet, and at the summit of eighteen feet. It was built in 1846. An idea of the vast amount of business done may be accurately formed from the fact that three hundred and eighty-three pigs of lead are here manufactured into shot daily, and nearly the whole of the valley of the Mississippi is supplied from this establishment. The location of the shot tower is very picturesque, being surrounded by low buildings, which add much to the artistic appearance of the place. The large building to the left of the tower is the St. Louis Steam Sugar Refinery, an exceedingly commodious building, which does a very large business. Its architectural appearance is by no means discreditable. In the foreground the mule dray is a specimen of the teams much used. As, in No. 12, of our last volume, we described the process of making shot, and alluded to the various shot towers in this country, we refer our readers back to that article—a description of the shot tower at Baltimore—for these details. St. Louis is a very interesting city. It is a port of entry, and the seat of justice for St. Louis county, Missouri, and is situated on the right bank of the Mississippi River, twenty miles below the entrance of the Missouri, and 1124 miles above New Orleans. The extent of the city is seven miles by the curve of the Mississippi, and about three miles back. It is well laid out with broad streets, generally intersecting each other at right angles. Their width varies from sixty to one hundred feet. No city in the Union has improved more rapidly in its public buildings. The new court-house, when completed, will have cost about half a million of dollars. It is constructed of Genevieve limestone, occupies an entire square, and somewhat resembles the Capitol at Washington. The new city hall and the new custom house will be noble buildings. The cathedral, built of polished freestone, has been much commended for the elegance of its design and the elaborateness of its finish. In the tower is a chime of bells, one of which weighs 2000 pounds. It is impossible to do justice to a city like St. Louis, in the brief space to which we are necessarily limited, but a brief historical notice of the place will not prove uninteresting to our readers. The site on which it stands was selected by Laclède, with particular reference to the wants of the fur trade, as early as Feb. 15, 1764. For fifteen years, closing 1804, the average annual value of furs collected here, was $203,700. The population, up to this time, was somewhere near 2000, and fully one half of the inhabitants were trappers and voyageurs, who only made it their residence for a small portion of the year, the remainder being occupied by them in travelling and in trapping. Up to 1820, the population had only increased to 4598. In 1822, St. Louis was chartered as a city, the name being that selected originally by Laclède in honor of Louis XV. of France. Soon after this settlers began to flow in from the State of Illinois, and the basis of a most flourishing commerce was thus established. In the year 1829, the last keelboat disappeared, and steamboats took the place of the former slow and unwieldy river craft. In 1840, the population was 16,469. In 1850, the total population was 77,850, to which large additions have been subsequently made, until the present population, if we include the suburbs, is over 100,000. We have in preparation a series of views illustrating buildings and streets in this thriving city, from the same pencil which executed that upon this page, and which, before long, we shall lay before our readers. The "Pictorial," as well as all our other publications, may be obtained of our agent, Mr. E. K. Woodward, whose place of business may be found at the corner of 4th and Chesnut Streets. We are indebted to our friends of St. Louis for a liberal patronage.

SHOT TOWER AT ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE GIPSEY'S SECRET:

—ON—

THE LEAGUE OF GUILT.

A STORY OF HIGH AND HUMBLE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE CONTRADICTORY."

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER IV.

VISIT TO BRIARFIELD HALL.

On the morning with which this chapter opens, Eleanor suddenly conceived the idea of riding over to Briarfield; and as soon as breakfast was concluded, ordered her horse to be brought round. In five minutes she was dressed and mounted for her ride. As she moved across the park, she caught sight of Morley Briancourt, standing at the window of his apartment, as she turned her head. She waved her handkerchief for an adieu, and saw his own waving in answer. "Poor Morley!" she said, mentally. "I am sorry I was so reserved last night. I am afraid I wounded him. And then riding off alone, this morning. But, at least, he knows now that I am not offended with him for anything."

And she kept on her way. Lightly Selim swept along over the mossy swells of the great park, and beyond, in the direction of Briarfield. The morning air was delicious. It filled Eleanor with happy animation, and imparted to her sparkling countenance a more charming brilliancy than ever; and when she reached Briarfield, her bright eyes beamed brighter than twin stars, half veiled by thin curling lashes. She cantered lightly across the park, and meeting a groom, dismounted and gave him her horse. Then she approached the house, and entered the great stone porch. The hall door was wide open, but no one was visible. On a seat just within, lay a silver-mounted riding-switch and a gentleman's glove, but she did not observe them. A great, shaggy, black dog, lying on the hall mat, in the morning sunshine, attracted her attention. He raised his massive head as she approached, regarded her steadily for a moment, and then lay down again and closed his sleepy brown eyes.

Eleanor laughed. "A courteous salutation, sir!" she said, merrily; "but I think you are a stranger here. Where did you come from, I wonder?"

"O, is that you, Eleanor?" said a pleasant voice from some little distance—"is that you, Eleanor? I am glad you have come."

And there entered the hall, from a door at the lower end, a young lady, carrying a basket of freshly cut flowers, which she placed upon a table, as she came to meet her guest. It was Mary Latimer, a fair, gentle, thoughtful-looking girl, of some twenty years, with brown hair, simply braided beneath the straw garden-hat she wore, and kindly brown eyes, filled with quiet smiles, as she greeted Eleanor Ashby. But there was the faintest shadow in the world, of seriousness, in those pleasant brown eyes, and she was somewhat pale, as could be more plainly perceived, from the white morning dress she wore.

"My dear Eleanor, I am glad to see you," she said, coming forward and holding out her hand. "I was wishing you would come over, this morning. So you are making acquaintance with Leo?"

"Leo—is that his name? What a noble fellow! But to whom in the world does he belong? And what makes you so white, my dear Mary?" and her merry accent quickly became one of surprise and concern, as she noticed Miss Latimer's paleness.

"O, you must ask but one question at a time," said Mary Latimer, stooping down to stroke the dog's head, and speaking gaily, to conceal a momentary embarrassment. "I am not ill, Eleanor, and nothing serious has befallen me, unless it is a serious happiness;" and she smiled. "For Hugh has got home, and this is his dog."

"Hugh has got home? How glad you must be!" said Miss Ashby, smiling in her turn, and with the warm beams of sympathizing pleasure sparkling in her bright eyes.

"Indeed—indeed I am glad," replied Mary Latimer, earnestly. "He came home last night. But come in and lay aside your hat. I want to talk with you." And she led Eleanor into the little breakfast-room, opening from a door at the further extremity of the hall. "Aunt Dorothea is up stairs, and quite busy, I believe," she continued. "Sit down on this lounge, Eleanor. Let me untie your hat."

Eleanor, laughingly, seated herself, and lifted her pretty dimpled chin while her friend untied the hat ribbons. Mary Latimer's slight fingers loosed the knot mechanically; for her eyes were fixed thoughtfully upon the bright countenance before her, with a glance which, at first smiling, grew into gravity as she gazed.

"Mary—why, Mary Latimer, what are you thinking about?" cried Eleanor, earnestly, almost alarmed at the unusual expression of her friend's features this morning.

Mary Latimer answered by taking Miss Ashby's sparkling face between her hands, and pressing a kiss upon her lips.

"I was thinking how beautiful you are, Eleanor," she said, simply, and with touching earnestness. "How beautiful you are," she repeated, "and how dear!"

She ended by kissing Eleanor again; then laid the hat aside, and went to the door in the hall. "Hugh!" she called, softly; and then came back and stood by Eleanor, lightly and tenderly smoothing Eleanor's clustering dark hair.

"Hugh is coming in to see you," she said. "We have been talking about you."

Hugh Latimer came up the steps from the garden. He was little more than six-and-twenty; his slender figure combining at once grace, power and dignity; his countenance handsome, earnest, and full of intellect; his deep, full, hazel eyes beautiful with the soul that beamed from their shadowy depths. A cloud of dark hair surrounded his fine brow, that, naturally pale, stood out in yet fuller relief from its shadow masses with a classic beauty of outline.

Eleanor Ashby saw him through the great glass doors ere he entered, and marked all this with a single brief glance.

Mr. Latimer had heard his sister welcoming her guest, and had caught the name. He came in through the hall, stopping to hang up his straw hat, and then came to the door of the breakfast-parlor. He paused a single instant ere he entered, his eyes resting on the countenance of Miss Ashby, who sat opposite the door. Directly, however, he came in, and Mary Latimer presented her guest. The introduction was a merely mechanical process, for she was observing the countenance of her brother. She had seen there what Eleanor had not—an indefinable expression—something like surprise, and agitation, though she could not construe it plainly,—as he paused before entering. And when he entered, there was a faint tinge of sudden red fading gradually away from his handsome brow.

Eleanor was pleased with the combined beauty and dignity of the face she met now for the first time; and though, at first, she was conscious of a slight restraint in his manner, a reserve which perplexed Mary Latimer herself, he seemed gradually, with an effort, to throw it off. Then he was himself. He forgot everything but courtesy to his sister's guest, and resolutely cast every foreign thought aside; for troublesome thoughts there were in his breast—a pain to which the first sight of Eleanor Ashby's face had given rise.

The presence of Hugh Latimer somewhat subdued Eleanor's arch and sparkling disposition this morning; but the just perceptible restraint which she exhibited, diffusing its softening influence throughout her whole demeanor, compensated for the absent charms of her natural vivacity, in the slight deepening of color in her fair cheek, the softer light in her sparkling eyes, and the unconscious diffidence of her manner.

Mary Latimer's glance rested with pleasure and admiration on the face of her beautiful friend. Eleanor looked charmingly after her ride, and Miss Latimer turned from her to her brother, to note the impression he received, for she was anxious that he should like her. She beheld in his countenance an expression which could not be mistaken—an expression which assured her that the praises she had bestowed on her friend while in conversation with him had been by no means too warm. Yes—he certainly admired Miss Ashby, and not only admired her, but was pleased and won by her beauty and girlish grace; and yet, at times, there was visible in his face that incomprehensible, perplexing look which had crossed it so mysteriously the moment when, on entering the apartment, he beheld Eleanor. What did it mean? She asked herself more than once while she sat there, and every time diverged only further from the correct explanation of the matter. Her first impression—that Hugh had seen her before—seemed, after all, nearest to the truth.

Eleanor, as Miss Latimer was not alone, stayed but a brief half hour, and then went away. Hugh Latimer and his sister accompanied her to the hall door, while the groom brought round her horse. Hugh placed her in the saddle, and then, after watching her for a moment, as she rode away, went into the house again. Miss Latimer lingered awhile at the door, till Eleanor was out of sight, and then followed him.

He was standing, with folded arms, by the bay window of the breakfast-parlor, looking out upon the lawn. His face was turned from her. He seemed to be wrapt in a profound reverie. She hesitated a moment before she spoke. Becoming aware of her presence, he turned around.

"Well, Hugh," she said, "did I do Eleanor justice?"

"No more than justice, warm as you were in her praises," he answered, seriously.

"She is very beautiful, then?"

"Beautiful!—she is charming, Mary!" and he sighed.

Mary's countenance brightened with pleasure.

"What was it that so agitated you when you were coming in here, after I called you from the garden? You seemed astonished—startled. I have come to the conclusion that you have met her before."

"No—I never met Miss Ashby before," said Hugh.

His sister regarded him inquiringly for an instant. He seemed to feel the glance, though he did not look at her, and once more that faint flush passed over his brow. Moving away, he took one or two irresolute turns up and down the apartment, in silence, and with his eyes cast down. Then he came to her side again.

"You think, Mary," he said, "that, notwithstanding, my agitation was in some connected with her. And you are right. I will tell you how. You may think me foolishly romantic—indeed, I have often thought myself so, with regard to this matter; but I do not think of that to-day. My romance has turned out too painfully for me to think now of its foolishness."

He paused a moment, with his eyes fixed sadly upon the floor. Mary Latimer gently pressed the hand that held hers, in kindly and affectionate sympathy, but refrained from speaking.

"Mary," he said, presently, lifting his head, "did I not write to you, during the fourth year of my stay abroad, of a visit I made to an artist's studio in France?"

"Levoisier's?"

"Yes. The first time I went there, I found him engaged on what he declared to be the most perfect piece of work he had ever undertaken; and, smiling at his raptures, entreated him to let me see it; for he had refused to exhibit it until it was completed. He allowed himself to be persuaded, and I saw the picture. It was a female head merely, but, though still imperfect, yet the face was such an one as one meets but once in a lifetime. The arch loveliness of its features and expression was blended with such purity and innocence, such sweet and charming animation, that I could but admire it in silence. I confess that it was with much earnestness that I entreated him to tell me whether it was a fancy sketch; for I desired, if it was a portrait, to behold the original. He assured me that it was copied from a likeness of the original; but he could not tell me who she was, or where she resided. It was probable, however, that she was an English lady, since the miniature was in the possession of an English gentleman, who had mentioned her as a relative, and who had allowed him to transcribe the picture. I was to leave Paris that day. There was no time to discover more than he could tell me, and I had conceived a strong desire to learn something further concerning the beautiful original of the picture. I thought I would, at least, possess the portrait, if it were possible. Levoisier utterly refused this for a long time. At length, however, my entreaties prevailed. By the time of my departure it was completed, and delivered to me at his own price. I carried it with me. It has been my companion ever since. Here is a copy of it." And he drew from his breast a small golden locket, within which Miss Latimer beheld the countenance of Eleanor Ashby. She had guessed this at the commencement of his story, and this sudden denouement was not so surprising as delightful.

"I do not wonder that it charmed you, Hugh," she said, smilingly, regarding with earnest pleasure the sweet pictured face that seemed, so life-like was it, to smile upon her in return.

"Nor will you wonder, I think," he returned, "that, looking upon it day after day, as I did, and each day with increased pleasure, I found my desire of beholding the one whom it represented growing deeper and stronger. That I came to regard those beautiful features, so sweet, so arch, so winning, with a feeling of tenderness. And finally, Mary, to meet with her under such circumstances, do you marvel that it gives me pain?"

"No, indeed, Hugh," said Miss Latimer, sadly. "O, Hugh, if she were only free!"

She threw her arms about his neck, and pressed her lips to his cheek. He held her tenderly to his breast, returning the caress with a brother's fondness. There was a happy vision in the mind of each—a vision that it was too late to bring to reality.

"Hugh," said Mary, after a brief pause, "who could it have been that possessed Eleanor's likeness?—the person, I mean, who allowed Levoisier to copy it? Must it not have been Mr. Briancourt? He was in Paris last year."

"Then he was the man."

Miss Latimer was silent and grave for a few moments. Then raising her head, she said:

"You would not have shown Eleanor Ashby's miniature to be copied by another, Hugh?"

"No delicate or honorable man would have done so, Mary."

"O, if you had only met Eleanor before, Hugh, or that she were free now!" said Mary, again, with gathering tears.

Her brother bent and kissed her.

"It is no time to think of that now; it is too late—too late, Mary!"

CHAPTER V.

A TROUBLED MIND.

No slumber visited the eyes of Morley Briancourt that night after the murder of the gipsy, Maida. The first flush of excitement and exultation passed, a feeling of horror seized him. How he reached home, he scarcely knew; but he found himself in his chamber, at Ashby, pacing the floor from side to side, with a nervous shudder shaking every limb. Unscrupulous, daring, bad—all this was Morley Briancourt. There was little evil that he had not committed; but he had never deliberately taken the life of a human being before, and now he experienced the sensations of a murderer—an assassin. Yet, desperate as had been the deed, it was his only way to escape destruction; for he could not—he would not give up Eleanor Ashby, and to wed her, with Maida at hand, ready to blazon forth his crimes to the world, was ruin.

He endeavored to turn away from the contemplation of the deed, to picture to himself how much he had saved, how much he had gained by it; for he was secure that Eleanor knew nothing definite against him, and he persuaded himself that her strong mind and clear sense would rise superior to the temporary influence of a mere suspicion, grounded only upon the words of a wandering gipsy woman, with no deeper foundation, and incapable of confirmation.

Thus the night passed, and the morning dawned. As we have seen, he did not join Eleanor and her uncle at breakfast; for his mirror showed him, after the night's harassing vigils, a countenance so pale and haggard that he shrank from subjecting himself to their notice and their inquiries.

An hour after, as he was still pacing his apartment to and fro, he paused before a window, whence he beheld Eleanor herself, at a little distance in the park, riding her white horse, Selim. And even as he gazed, she turned her head, discerned her lover, and waved her snowy handkerchief. Morley Briancourt's heart leaped with exultation at this signal, so simple in itself, so important—so all-important in its signification. She was his own again. The bar of suspicion had been overleaped. His first impulse was to order his own bay and join her, but even while he hesitated, she was at such a distance that he relinquished the idea.

Sir Edward Ashby, as was not unusual, remained secluded in the library during the entire morning; and Morley Briancourt wandered, solitary and restless, from one spot to another, about the mansion and the park, till Eleanor's return; turning, with a shudder, from the contemplation of the bloody deed of the night before, and endeavoring to confine himself to the thought of the security which he yet enjoyed with Eleanor, despite Maida's efforts to the contrary. But in vain. The memory of that white, dead face would come back—would intrude upon him in the midst of his happiest reflections. He saw it, in fancy, staring up at him from the bottom of the river, in that little dark cove where he had sunk it, when the water was so black, and deep, and still. He could see it just as it lay there—a drowned and bloody corpse, its dull, dead eyes wide open, looking up from the black depths, and its long hair floating hither and thither with the dark tide. He could not drive the horrible sight away. He turned, with a heaving shudder, from the gleam of the river shining up in the distance through the trees. It sickened him.

Finally, Eleanor Ashby returned. They met in the park; and while she gave him her usual merry greeting, he welcomed her with a strange and passionate tenderness that touched her with kindly regret, as she remembered her reserve of the preceding evening, and thought how it must have hurt and perplexed him.

She proceeded to her apartment to divest herself of her riding habit and re-arrange her hair; and while the affairs of the toilet proceeded, Lucy told how young Mr. Briancourt had been walking about in such a restless way all the morning, and how dark and gloomy he looked, wondering what could be the matter. Not that Lucy felt anxious at all, or sympathized with him in his disturbance of mind, whatever it might be; for, though she herself was unable to tell why, she had never liked him much. Perhaps, if one had considered the matter well, it would have been found that it was because he was less careful to conceal, in the presence of the servant, the thousand little traits of his true character, which he kept so jealously from the observation of the mistress; and Lucy divined his true disposition better than Miss Ashby. And if she liked the master little, she liked his man less.

Will Humphries, Mr. Briancourt's valet, was a smart, foppish, daubified fellow, a very great personage in his own conceit, which, to many of the servants, and to Lucy in particular, was almost insufferable. She had a most unbounded contempt for him, which she took little pains to conceal, and a vast dislike which she could not well help showing; for, be it known, that the smart valet had taken into his wise head the idea of getting up a slight flirtation with pretty Lucy, which she no sooner became aware of than she very decidedly showed him his mistake.

Now Will Humphries discovered that Harry Longworth, the butler's son, and Lucy, had an affection for each other, and being quite as vindictive as he was vain, resolved to annoy the lover of the disdainful fair one as much as possible by his attentions to her, and thereby revenge himself on both of them for the slight he had received. So he took every opportunity to pay his court to Lucy, whether she liked it or not, much enjoying her annoyance, and making himself merry over Harry Longworth's indignation, yet taking care never to go so far as to give him an excuse for visiting it on his head.

Eleanor knew that Lucy had a most unmitigated dislike and contempt for Will Humphries, and to that attributed, partly, her evident aversion to his master; for Lucy, though never disrespectful or impolite in her mention of Mr. Briancourt, never could conceal her feelings towards him. So Miss Ashby, while she had no reason to reproach her, gently warned her not to give way too far to her prejudices.

When Lucy told her mistress how Mr. Briancourt had been wandering about, evidently in such a gloomy mood, all the morning, it was, as we have said before, from little interest and less sympathy, but merely in the course of conversation; but it caused Miss Ashby to look back with still greater regret to her mode of conduct the previous evening; for she looked now upon the feelings that had then possessed her as very unworthy indeed, since they had so slight a foundation, and had been the cause of the reserve which she believed to have occasioned his dejection.

She rejoined him in the drawing-room, much refreshed after her ride, and looking, in her simple and charming indoor dress, a thousand times more beautiful than ever. Morley Briancourt welcomed her coming with emotions of inexpressible relief. It drove away the gloomy and disagreeable feelings that had tormented him. He prepared himself to forget every unwelcome thought in her bright presence. And while Eleanor seated herself at her embroidery, he sat by her side, and talked with or read to her, giving himself up to the fascination of her presence, watching the graceful motions of her fine hands, or the charming play of her beautiful features, and listening to the sweet tones that had power to make him forget all the harassing, tormenting thoughts that had so lately disturbed him.

After lunch, they strolled out into the park, and here, sitting beneath a wide-spreading oak, she read with him, for an hour or two, from a favorite volume of poetry. And he was at rest. Her manner, graceful, amiable and winning as ever, gave him the utmost assurance of all absence of prejudice, while her studied kindness effectually prevented the recurrence of his former gloom. She spoke of her morning's visit to Briarfield, but made no mention of Hugh Latimer's return. She thought of him, however, more than once, when, in the intervals of conversation, her thoughts wandered back to that visit. Mary Latimer had talked so much about him—she had told Eleanor so often, stories of his childhood and youth, she had shown her so many letters of his—warm, glowing, affectionate letters, full of a brother's tenderness, and replete with such interest as a refined, well-cultivated, high-toned and richly-stored mind alone can throw into such communications, that Eleanor had been won to like him even before they met. She was struck with a feeling of indisputable admiration for him now that she had seen him. In her woman's heart, she acknowledged the influence of the charm which Mary Latimer had so often said could be felt, but not described, in her brother's character.

"Come, Morley," she said, at sunset, "shall we ride? Let us go down by the river."

"No; I do not wish—" He turned hastily away, with a slight shudder; then rejoined her, saying, more gently, "That is—I beg your pardon, Eleanor. Yes—let us ride by all means; but shall we not go, instead, over to Grassmere? We have never been there more than once, in company, I believe."

"Just as you please, Morley," she answered, lightly; "but first I must gather up these rills which you have been so good as to overturn from my basket. See what confusion!"

Willingly he obeyed the laughing mandate, and then Eleanor prepared herself to accompany him.

"Morley, your letters." It was at the breakfast table that Sir Edward Ashby, opening the letter-bag, which had just been brought in, gave to his guest several epistles, one of which seemed to attract his attention particularly by the superscription. "It is from your father, I think," he added.

Morley Briancourt opened it, and glanced over its contents.

"You are right, sir," he answered. "It is from my father. He desires me to wait on him in London as soon as may be, and would esteem it as an especial favor if you also would go up, as he wishes to transact some business which can only be attended to there. Will you read the letter, sir?"

The baronet received and commenced perusing it, while Morley Briancourt seemed, for a moment, to be wrapt in thought. At first, his brow contracted slightly, and he appeared to be considering some unpleasant subject. Then his countenance gradually cleared, and he sighed—a sigh that sounded as if it rose from a heart from which some unpleasant weight had been lifted. For, at first, in considering the proposed exodus from Ashby, he was impatient with the thought of leaving the place where Eleanor was. Afterwards, however, had come the thought that, if it took him away from her, it would also remove him from the neighborhood of the scene of blood which had so lately taken place, and which was a haunted spot to him. Yes—he would go for a time, till the disagreeable feelings which he had experienced, ever since he had inured his hands in Maida's blood, should have worn away.

"When do you think of going?" asked Miss Ashby, as, awaking from his reverie, he began to speak of the departure.

"As soon, I suppose, as Sir Edward can make it convenient," answered Morley, glancing at his host, who had laid the letter down.

"Perhaps we had better say to-morrow," said Sir Edward, "if you choose."

And on the morrow they left Ashby.

CHAPTER VI.

EMBASSIES OF MERT.

"Lucy," said Miss Ashby, to her maid, "will you go to Mrs. Millar's room, and ask her to put up those things for the widow Davis? I should like them to be ready as soon as possible, for I am going over directly. Then you may run and tell John to harness Alex. in the chaise. I shall drive this morning. Come back as soon as you can."

Lucy ran away to execute her commission, and after as brief an absence as possible, returned to the dressing-room, where her mistress was already preparing for her customary round of visits to certain of the poorer people living in the neighborhood. In this practice, Eleanor was accustomed to devote a stated portion of time each week; and in the performance of her self-imposed duties, she took a pleasure as sincere and heartfelt as was that afforded by it to those in whom she thus interested herself. Dearly Lucy, on her part, liked to help her mistress prepare for these occasions. Very proud and happy indeed was she of her many deeds of kindness among the sick and needy, and it was her delight to hear Miss Ashby's praises from the recipients of her bounty. She looked forward, often and often, to a time when Miss Ashby should marry, and, with more ample means, become indeed the Lady Bountiful of the neighborhood. At this point, however, Lucy grew serious. For whom would her mistress marry but Morley Briancourt? And Lucy could see very well (though Miss Ashby herself did not guess it) that he had no sympathy with her mistress in these deeds of kindness and charity. The spirit which prompted them was directly foreign to his own. He could neither comprehend nor appreciate it. Nothing was so delectably irksome to him as to visit those in poverty and distress. He would have sneered at Eleanor's own zeal in their behalf had it not been for his passion for her. As it was, he concealed from her his real feelings in this respect, and took care never to utter a word in her hearing that would seem to oppose her inclination for such pursuits. But he never went with her on these charitable errands, if he could avoid it, although she not unfrequently had expressed a desire that he should accompany her. Once or twice he did so, but that was all. Afterwards, she went alone, but always believing him engaged when she went, nor even dreaming of his detestation of the employment in which her generous heart took so much pleasure.

It was not to be supposed, then, that, in case of Miss Ashby's marriage with him, Lucy's dreams of the future would ever be likely to be realized. This thought, then, increased, the dislike she had always felt for her mistress's lover. Lucy's antipathy was strong and decided, and she said little; only once in a while, talking with Harry Longworth, the butler's son, and her lover, she declared her belief that young Mr. Briancourt was not fit to be Miss Eleanor's husband. The faithful girl little knew how unworthy he was.

This morning, her uncle and Morley both gone, Eleanor commenced her preparations somewhat earlier than usual, and set off a little before nine. The principal object of her care to-day was a certain aged widow woman, living at a distance of some three miles from Ashby. The good old dame, who was troubled with severe lameness, was unable to move without the assistance of crutches, and might have been seen seated near a casement in her cottage, knitting, sewing, or reading, from morning till night, though this last occupation was a rather slow and painful one, since her eyes were growing dim. For this reason, Eleanor came quite often to read to her, or to spend an hour in conversing with her, thereby lightening a thousand times the old lady's infirmities, and learning for herself many a lesson of patience and fortitude.

Old Dame Wilton lived at a greater distance from Ashby than any of the rest whom Eleanor was in the habit of visiting, and the day promising to be a warm one, Miss Ashby determined to make this visit first, so as to return early, and have only those in the village near home to attend to when the sun should be high. Accordingly, taking with her in the chaise a small basket, packed with various articles from the housekeeper's stores, she set off for the cottage of the old dame.

Steadily and rapidly along the road went Alex., and very pleasant the way seemed to Eleanor, as the chaise rolled along past meadow, wood and upland, bright with the morning sunshine, or beneath the gloomy shadow of great rocks that rose perpendicularly on either side of the way, or, again, when the road lay level with the blooming fields, and the fine trees that here and there lined its borders, right and left, reached across to each other far above, and with interlacing branches formed an emerald screen, their thick foliage just pierced, here and there, by a clear sunbeam.

Admiring the beauty of the morning landscape, or occupied with her own meditations, the time passed, until, at length, the cottage of the aged dame was visible among the trees, a little in advance. A moment more, and she had reached the garden gate, where she alighted from the chaise. Fastening the horse just by the gate, in the shadow of an over-arching elm, she went quietly up the long grass garden-path, with her basket on her arm, to the cottage door, which stood open, affording a full view of the cleanly, nicely-sanded passage, and showing another door, also open, leading into an apartment on the right. Through the rose-trilled casements, which were thrown back to admit the sweet morning air, and nearly hidden from the road by the bowing shrubs in the garden, Eleanor saw, as she drew nearer, the old dame, seated, as usual, beside her little round table, whereon lay her work-basket and her books. But she was not alone. A gentleman stood beside her, but in hand, and a voice which fell not unfamiliar on Eleanor's ear was saying, in clear, sweet, musical tones, "Thank you, dame; I will come. My sister shall have your message. Good day." And directly, Hugh Latimer came out.

He half paused on seeing Eleanor approaching; then his handsome countenance lighted up, his fine eyes kindled with involuntary pleasure.

"Miss Ashby!" he uttered, gently, yet with earnestness and warmth, as he advanced to meet her.

She gave him her hand with an air of simple and graceful courtesy, slightly blushing as she did so.

"This is unexpected, Mr. Latimer," she said, with a smile. "I had not thought of meeting any one from Briarfield this morning, unless, perhaps, Mary should have preceded me here. She has not come with you, I suppose?"

"Not this morning. My aunt required her services in another direction, so I became her representative for the time being, and introduced myself to Dame Wilton and one or two others in the neighborhood."

"Do you find the office an agreeable one?" asked Eleanor.

"It is very pleasant. I believe your pensioners are worthy objects, Miss Ashby. I like Dame Wilton especially. She is a sturdy."

Eleanor's face grew bright.

"Yes, indeed; you will find her so," she said. "I am glad you like her. But I forget—you are not a stranger in the neighborhood."

"Almost. I have been absent so many years that those whom I knew during my boyhood here were not readily recognized; but they had not, I believe, quite forgotten me. That gave me the sincerest pleasure. It was a happiness to find, after so long an absence from home, that in even a single heart there yet lingered the memory of the boy who went away almost twenty years ago."

"Twenty years!—is it so long?" said Eleanor, thoughtfully.

"Very nearly. Twenty years is a long time, Miss Ashby. You cannot look back so far."

She shook her head, with a half-absorbed smile; then slowly lifted her eyes from the ground, saying, with gentle earnestness:

"But though you were gone so many years, you did not forget Briarfield! You were such a child when you went away you might well have forgotten the countenances of the villagers, but the first scenes that ever your eyes beheld must have remained indelible in your memory."

"You are right. Briarfield was my home—a home such as Wales never could have given me, pleasant as it was, and beautiful as were its associations. It was like a dream—the memory of Briarfield, in that I saw it so far back in the past, but unlike a dream, it never faded from my mind. It was always there—a clear and perfect picture, and I held it sacred. Nothing could ever take its place. Miss Ashby, can you think how I would seem, after so many years of absence, and such extended wanderings, to set your foot upon the threshold pressed in childhood, and say, 'I am at home!'"

"And at rest," uttered Eleanor, simply.

"And at rest," he echoed, with impressive earnestness. "Yes—that is it." He paused, and then went on: "I was at rest."

Perfect tranquillity and contentment were mine, at last, beneath my own roof-tree. I found the English sunshine and the English faces there inexpressibly sweet. I found Mary and Annet Dorothea awaiting me. I found home love and home endearments. And I found, too," he continued, with involuntary gentleness of tone, while his glance remained fixed on the ground, "something which I had vainly sought for years in lands far away from England."

Eleanor's eyes were raised to his, and rested there. His own glance sought her face for an instant, then bent to the earth again. "It was a wee English flower, Miss Ashby," he said, quietly. "In France, and Italy, and Spain, I looked for it for five years. I came home, and found it growing just by my own door-sill."

"Well, you gathered it?" said Eleanor, simply. "It is hidden here, Miss Ashby." He touched his breast. "I am learning to fold it there more closely and tenderly every day. And yet," he grew grave, and turned away almost abruptly, "I cannot call it mine."

Both his words and his manner perplexed Eleanor. She stood silent and motionless. He turned toward her directly.

"Miss Ashby, Dame Wilton will hardly thank me for detaining you here so long. She is, I know, desirous of seeing you. She talked to me about you a great deal, this morning. Have you any message for my sister?"

Before Eleanor could answer, there came riding past the gate a young farmer, whom she recognized as one of the villagers at Ashby. Seeing her, he reined up his rough-coated pony, and dismounting, approached, touching his hat to her respectfully.

"Good morning, Thomas," said Eleanor, pleasantly. "Did you wish to speak to me?"

"Yes, miss," answered the man. "I saw Bessie Gray just now, as I passed her cottage, and she bade me say, if I met you on the road, that her boy is ill, and she begs you to see her as you go by."

"O, I will go in, Thomas," said Eleanor, kindly,—"I will go in. Is Johnny very ill, do you know?"

"Well, miss, I think from his look, it's like he's a fever, or summat of the kind. He's a deal of trouble with his head, like; it don't seem to be just right with the heat in it."

An expression of anxiety and concern settled upon Eleanor's countenance. She promised the man she would go directly, and as he rode away, turned and went back to where Hugh Latimer stood, saying:

"Bessie Gray has sent for me to see her little boy, who is ill. I must just spend five minutes with Dame Wilton, and then drive back to see him, and make her a longer visit next time. I am glad you have been in to see her, this morning, for she is so pleased to have company, and your call will be a happy substitute for mine, to-day."

"A very poor one, I fear, Miss Ashby, though, I trust, better than none at all, since you cannot spend your usual time with her. The claims on your charity, I find, are numerous in the neighborhood. You must be fully occupied."

"They are many—yes," she answered, simply; "but they need me, and I cannot do too much."

"Not wearied in well-doing," he said.

She smiled, and held out her hand.

"Not while there is so much to do. And my sphere is limited: the greater should be my exertions."

He took the hand she offered, with a sweet and serious warmth of expression in his fine dark eyes.

"It is a beautiful spirit that utters those words. Keep it fresh, pure, uncontaminated. Princes might envy you its possession. Keep it, Miss Ashby. Good-by."

The glance that rested on her for an instant was grave, earnest, reverential. And Hugh Latimer walked hastily away, with involuntary tenderness and admiration filling his heart, drawing him nearer to Eleanor Ashby. The charm of the countenance which at first had attracted him, was only surpassed by the genuine goodness, the charity, the generosity of her disposition, which was now opening to him. The heartfelt praises with which Dame Wilton had, that morning, dwelt upon Eleanor's name, and her many deeds of mercy and charity, had touched the best and deepest feelings of his soul. Her arch and innocent beauty had caught and fascinated him first. How much more beautiful did she seem when he found her thus moving among the dwellings of the poor, at the bedside of the sick, carrying blessings with her wherever she went, and bearing blessings away! When he beheld the soft sparkle of those sweet laughing eyes, lost in the tenderer, softer beams of pity—when he heard the gentle emotions of her woman's heart, filled with the love of suffering humanity, thrilling through all her tones, how beautiful—how dear she seemed then!

He revered, he admired, he honored her. And with these sentiments there was gradually, but surely, blending a regard of which he could not be unconscious. Calmly and quietly as ever throbbed Hugh Latimer's heart; but there was a beautiful influence pervading it which could never now be lost, which, pure as the source from whence it flowed, shed an atmosphere of holiness around it. For the innate goodness and nobleness of Eleanor's character had aided, even more than her outward charms, in inspiring him with the sentiment which he had learned to experience for her, and strong and earnest though it was, the very purity of its origin had chastened, and refined, and elevated it. And he had not yet thought of realizing in what unhappiness all this might end; for was not Eleanor the betrothed of another? This was forgotten.

Hugh Latimer was gone; and beside Dame Wilton, in the little cottage, sat Eleanor Ashby. The good dame, full of pleasure in the visit of her last guest, was warm in his praise to Eleanor. Her wrinkled face lighted up as she spoke of him.

"So you like Mr. Latimer very much, dame?" said Miss Ashby, gently, and with a thoughtful smile.

"Yes, indeed, miss. He reads beautifully. I think I never heard a sweeter voice than his in all my life. He read for me a great while here, and never seemed a bit fatigued. And he talked with me in such a way as I couldn't help admiring him. He talks pleasant—doesn't he, Miss Eleanor?"

And Eleanor, in a pleased and serious voice, answered:

"Indeed he does, Dame Wilton."

"And then," pursued the dame, "he came all this way to see me; there aren't many as would do it, Miss Eleanor. But I think I've never seen one just like him—so gentle and kind, and civil-like, to an old body like me, as if I were born and bred a lady,—unless it be our rector. Ah, it's from such things as these, Miss Eleanor, that you may offendest tell a good man."

"And he is, doubtless, one, dame," said Eleanor.

"Yes, indeed, Miss Eleanor. Well, so your uncle, Sir Edward, has gone to town, I hear."

"Yes, dame, and Mr. Briancourt. They will remain some three or four weeks, I think, and then they return together. When Mr. Briancourt comes, Dame Wilton, I will ask him to come over to see you, some day, and tell you of all the gay doings they have had in town since he has been there."

The old dame shook her head dubiously.

"Ah, Miss Eleanor, I am afraid—" She paused, as if hesitating to finish what she was about to say.

Eleanor regarded her inquiringly for a moment.

"Of what?" she asked, presently.

"Well, Miss Eleanor, I hardly think Mr. Briancourt cares to trouble himself about an old woman like me."

"Why not? What causes you to think so?" inquired Miss Ashby, in some perplexity.

Again Dame Wilton hesitated, until Eleanor repeated her question, and then she answered:

"O, you know, miss, some care for one thing and some for another; and where one gentleman would spend a good bit of his time in looking after the poor and distressed, another would find it a trouble to think of them at all."

Eleanor sat silent and in thought for at least a moment. At length she said:

"You mean Mr. Briancourt, Dame Wilton, when you speak of the last, and the first was Mr. Latimer. Is it not so?"

It was so. Dame Wilton had been drawing mental comparisons.

"You said," said Miss Ashby, "a while since, that kindness and charity for those poor or infirm was a token of goodness of heart?"

"Yes, miss, I did say so," assented Dame Wilton.

"Then you do not think Mr. Briancourt has a good heart, dame? Nay, you should be more charitable."

"Ah, Miss Eleanor," said the old woman, shaking her head, "you push me too hard—too hard. I should not have been so impertinent as to say what I have said, if you had not made me; and it is not for me to judge hardly of any one because he differs from another, and especially of Mr. Briancourt, whom they say Sir Edward has chosen for—"

She paused again, but Miss Ashby comprehended her meaning.

"Nay, Dame Wilton," she said, gently, while a faint blush dawned on her cheek, "I do not think you are quite right. Why should it be especially of Mr. Briancourt? If you hold an unfavorable opinion of him, and that opinion were unjust, it would not be less so if he were a beggar in the streets of London. And if it were just, he would deserve it quite as much if he were one of the highest in the land."

"Ah, miss, that is so like you, to say that!" said the old dame, looking up. "I like to hear you speak so. But, indeed," and she shook her head, "it is not for me to speak so free as you might do about people, or even think as you might. For those who are your equals, Miss Eleanor, are very far above me in this world."

HUG-SEU-TSENE, INSURGENT CHIEF OF CHINA.

"Well, you know what is best, doubtless, dame," said Miss Ashby, kindly. "But still, the impression of Mr. Briancourt's disposition, which you seem to have received, you still retain, of course, whether you avow it or not. I know," she continued, "that he does not make a practice of visiting among the villagers; and he has been here but once; and for that very reason I do not well see how you could form the opinion which I am sure you entertain. You saw him but for a little while—not more than an hour, I think."

Dame Wilton only shook her head. She could not make any rejoinder to this, for she would have been obliged to speak too plainly, and she feared to hurt or offend Miss Ashby, who had never beheld the mingled impatience and sarcasm marking Morley Briancourt's air, during the visit to which she alluded—a visit where he had been forced to listen to the reading of the Scriptures for Dame Wilton, who loved dearly to have Eleanor read to her; and to the conversation following, which, though cheerful and pleasant, yet being on serious subjects, was to him cant and hypocrisy. Not that he believed Eleanor guilty of either; on the contrary, he saw her as she was—earnest and truthful in all her works; but, scoffing at the labors of religion, of charity and mercy, he believed her led away by enthusiasm, and resolved, when she became his wife, that such things with her should be done away.

Dame Wilton had read his disposition, but she could say no more to Miss Ashby concerning it. She feared to. She was already unhappy at what she had said thus far, lest she had uttered what might seem to Miss Ashby impertinent; but Eleanor, knowing her destitute of intention to offend, had listened kindly and in a friendly mood to all she said.

A few minutes passed in conversation on various other subjects, and then bidding Dame Wilton a pleasant "good-day," Eleanor took her departure, to visit Bessie Gray's boy. The way was occupied in thinking of what the old woman had said. Eleanor was thoughtful and reflective on this subject.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

HUG-SEU-TSENE,

CHIEF OF THE CHINESE INSURRECTION.

The accompanying engraving presents a likeness of the celebrated rebel chief who has, for three or four years past, been able to make head against the imperialists, and who is destined, perhaps, to revolutionize the government of the "Central Flowery Land." It will be seen that his countenance possesses a great deal of intelligence and resolution, while being, at the same time, strongly stamped with the peculiarities of the Eastern type. He wears his hair in the European fashion, while the imperial party have their heads shaved, with the exception of the long queues, which have so odd an appearance in European eyes. In fact, as soon as a partisan joins the insurgents, they cut off his queue, so that they ensure his fidelity till it grows out again of the canonical length. Notwithstanding that certain death awaits every rebel who falls in the hands of the imperialists, large accessions are constantly made to their ranks. The insurrection has spread like wild-fire, sweeping over whole provinces, and causing the legitimate emperor, the Son of Heaven and Brother of the Moon, to tremble on his throne. Not only do the insurgents menace the overthrow of the civil government of China, but a radical change in its religion; for many of the leading chiefs are converts to Christianity. To the intrepid missionary, Gutzlaff, who spoke the various dialects of China so perfectly as to be taken for a native of each province that he traversed, and who devoted his life to disseminating a knowledge of the true religion among the benighted peoples of the east, are we indebted for the religious and political movement now going on in the heart of China. The whole history of this insurrection is a romance. As a literary curiosity, and also as a proof of the extent to which American enterprise is pushed in the dissemination of useful discoveries, we copy a bona fide letter, duly authenticated, dictated and sent by the rebel chief to Dr. J. C. Ayer, of Lowell, Mass., in acknowledgment of a present of some of his celebrated "Cherry Pectoral" and "Cathartic Pills."

"TO DOCTOR AYER, in America:—The great curing Barbarian of the outside country.

"Your present of sweet curing seeds (Pills) and fragrant curing drops (Pectoral) of the Cherry smell, has been brought to Hug-seu-Tsene—the mighty Emperor (Kwangto) of the terrible, stout Ming dynasty, by grace of Heaven revived after an interval of ages. Prince of peace (Ta-Ping-Wang) of China—the central flowery land. He directed his powerful Mandarins to give them to the sick according to what the Interpreters read from your printed papers (directions). Be profoundly happy, O wise Barbarian! for I, Yang-seu-Tsing, say it. Your curing seeds and sweet curing drops were given to the sick in His army of the Winged-Sword, and have made them well. Be profoundly happy while you live, for this is known to the Mighty-Emperor of China, who approves your skill and permits you to send more of your curing Medicines for his fierce armies of myriads of men. They may be given to Chiang-Lin, chief Mandarin of the Red Buttop at Shanghai, who will repay you with Tea, or Silk, or Gold. The high Mandarins of China have heard of your great knowledge, surpassing all other foreigners, even aspiring to equal the divine wisdom of our own healing teachers, who make remedies that cure instantly. We are pleased to know you how in trembling terror before our Mighty Emperor.

Written by YANG-SEU-TSING, Minister-in-chief of the restored Imperial Ming dynasty destined by the heavenly wisdom to rule in China."

(Translated by the American Consulate at Hong Kong, China, 3d May, 1855.)

In a few years, should this revolution prove successful, American commerce, unshackled by any restriction, will find its way to the heart of that empire, which has been sealed to the nations of the west for so many centuries. We shall yet live to hear of railroads constructed by Americans in China, and of Yankee stage-coaches, driven by Yankee coachmen, making regular trips between their cities and towns.

HUNT & WEBSTER'S SEWING MACHINE MANUFACTORY.

There is no application of machinery to useful purposes that we have watched with more interest than that destined to lighten the manual labor of females in sewing. The manufacture of garments for domestic wear is a never-ending task. The brain is bewildered in attempting to estimate the many million of stitches which must be made daily in these United States alone. Who can forget the pathos of Hood's "Song of the Shirt," a song that has found an echo in the hearts of thousands of poor wretches doomed to "stitch, stitch, stitch," from the rising of the sun far beyond the going down thereof? Who shall say how many a bright thought has been lost to the world—how many a bright spirit extinguished, for the want of labor-saving machinery to perform the work of those busy fingers which have moved for many a lifetime in the service of humanity? At one time, even inventors gave up in despair the hope of making the needle operate in fingers of iron and steel instead of the delicate instruments of nature's handiwork. But the problem was at last solved—and the solution was the emancipation of hundreds of thousands. The amount of domestic happiness thus secured baffles calculation. A sewing machine in a family works morally as well as mechanically—it benefits the mind and heart as well as the purse.

FINISHING ROOM.

thread is drawn, and we will show you the machine to do it. Folders and binders are attached for binding, whenever it is necessary in the manufacture of any article. For all kinds of family use, these machines are really invaluable. Simple and beautiful in their construction, making no more noise in running than a set of knitting-needles in the hands of a smart old lady, they are free from a serious objection which has been alleged against the use of machinery for sewing. Mr. Hunt, the principal in the manufacture of these machines, is likewise at the head of the house of N. Hunt & Co., manufacturers of leather belting. He is a Boston merchant as well as a Boston mechanic; a modest, unassuming man, of indomitable perseverance and energy. He has labored for years to bring his sewing machine to the position it now occupies, and it has been no easy matter to accomplish this. It has required a vast amount of labor as well as a large outlay of money; but he has succeeded, and we doubt not that he will reap a rich reward from his investment of capital, labor, time and thought. Mr. Webster, who is now associated with Mr. Hunt in the manufacture and sale of these sewing machines, is a young man of industry and business capacity, and we venture to predict that Messrs. Hunt & Webster will occupy a front rank in the phalanx of the sewing machine fraternity, in the sale of machines

FORGING AND LATHE ROOM.

POLISHING AND TURNING ROOM.

The intimate connection between morals and happiness and machinery affords one of the most interesting subjects for speculation and comment that can well be conceived. One can hardly realize the change that has taken place in many branches of business in consequence of the introduction of sewing machines. A few years ago and all the labor in the shoe manufacturing business was performed by hand; while now but a small portion is achieved by manual labor, nearly all, in fact, being done by the little labor-saving machines. A few years ago even, when sewing machines were first introduced, our southern and western merchants used to write "Don't send me any boots, shoes or clothing made on machines." Now they order the machine-made articles. Why? Simply because the stitch is more perfect, handsome and durable, and is, in every way, better when made on machines like those we have illustrated on the present page, and which we have delineated because they mark an important point in the progress of useful invention. The shoe trade of Massachusetts last year amounted to fifty-five millions of dollars, and the reason why our State has done so much more than any other in this necessary branch of business, is, that next to their notoring industry and perseverance, the shoe manufacturers of Massachusetts have always heartily and readily seconded the efforts of inventors and mechanics to perfect this so much needed improvement in their business. One establishment, the "North American Shoe Company," at Ballard Vale, have over fifty of the latest improved machines, represented in our drawings, now running, and are increasing the number every week. This is a single establishment; but they are running in every town in the commonwealth. This machine is not confined to the shoe business in its various branches. Tailors, hatters, upholsterers, mattress makers, bag makers, glove makers, coach trimmers, dress makers, corset makers and shirt makers employ it. In short, show us wherever a as they now do in the manufacture of them. The engravings on this page represent different departments in the establishment of Messrs. Hunt & Webster, Nos. 26 and 30 Devonshire Street, viz.: the "Forging and Lathe Room," where the work is begun, the "Polishing and Turning Room," and the "Finishing Room," whence the completed machines pass into the "Sales Room."

EXHIBITION AND SALES ROOM.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

LOVE FORSAKEN.

BY FRANK FLEMING.

I'm loth to give thee up!
The heart is sad and lone—
And there is friendship in thy smile,
And comfort in thy tone.

They say the heart grows old
When love's young dream is flown;
But what strange thrills awake in mine,
At thy low voice's tone!

They say time damps the brow,
And chills the warmest heart;
They say my bark is wrecked—and now
I'm waiting to depart.

They tell me I am cold,
And haughty, and severe;
They tell me that my heart is old,
That I love nothing here.

They tell me 'tis my boon
To win a lasting name;
They tell me that my thoughts might soon
Be writ on leaves of fame!

But thou hast crossed my path,
With thy fond, beaming eye—
Thou, with a fresh and generous soul,
And checked all dreams so high.

Thy love hath made me sigh!
Ne'er shall ambition's breath
Break in fierce, mad strains o'er my lyre—
Strung not for fame, but death.

Thy love still makes me sigh!
For thou hast kept for me
The richest jewels of thy heart,
And I have naught for thee!

For worlds I would not wring
Thy tender heart with pain—
For love's young dream, when broken,
Ne'er seems so sweet again.

Yet I must give thee up!
My heart is sad and lone;
I've dreamed of Lethé in thy smile,
Of friendship in thy tone.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE CHILD OF THE CASCADE.

BY MRS. L. S. GOODWIN.

CHAPTER I.

THE HUNTER'S PRIZE.

"GAME's mighty scarce this morning," was the ejaculation of a youthful sportsman, emerging solitary upon a small savanna in the middle of a woody section of upper New York. "Very well," he continued, "I shall save my buckshot." And as though the reflection furnished a ready anodyne to chagrin arising from his bootless ramble, he chose the summit of the depressed knoll, and threw himself down for rest.

The spot was enclosed by dense, towering forests, and covered with an abundant harvest of wild grass, now lying prone from its own weight. A semi-transparent vapor overcast the sky, so that the sun's rays, though it was the beginning of September, were guiltless of offence to the unshadowed head; a sighing breeze, the avant-courier of a storm, came, as it were, down a long, spiral staircase to make Legh Rosseau the confidant of his message.

The youth liked, evidently, the fresh fanning upon his fair, girl-like brow and well developed chest; he lay motionless awhile, the jaunty cap perched back, and the belt of his handsome hunting frock unbuckled. At length, turning his cheek up from the pale green mattress, and spreading wide his arms on either side till the right formed a cross with his elegant fowling-piece as its standard, he essayed amusement in imitating the cry of a hare when caught. Immediately there was a response from among the trees beyond his feet. He ceased—it ceased. With a spring he assumed a sitting posture; put instinctively the right hand to his gun, the left to his empty game-bag. Then he smiled self-derisively—he had heard nothing except the utterance of his own lips. But he had, though. For the test, then. He re-commenced, it was heard the same. An echo? But the maiden must have hearing wondrously acute, to take sounds so feeble. And how they are prolonged, like the blast of King James's bugle in the "hollow throat" of the Trossach wilds.

Once more all was silent. Rosseau had risen to his feet, and remained in agreeable perplexity. Stooping to extricate his piece from the grass which had tangled about its length as it lay, he again resorted to poet Sir Walter and the "envious ivy" clinging around the neglected "harp of the north."

"That is to tell me I shall have no use for the weapon," he said—yet he cocked it. "I am not sorry; my present mood is decidedly more romantic than bloodthirsty."

Moving forward a pace or two in the direction whence his answers had seemed to issue, he repeated the weak, piteous wail, but this time none was returned.

"Ha! Echo is a coy nymph, and has fled at my rising—or she is haughty, and will deign to lend an ear only while I prostrate myself at her feet. So be it," he added, addressing the imaginary being, "for know that I am Narcissus, and would cry 'hands off!' should you now appear in all your fascinating beauty to embrace me; yes, would refuse the most urgent leap-year proposals, and leave you to hide your blushes and to pine away till you were less than a shadow."

Nevertheless, the youth's manner contradicted his language; for he still lingered, still tempted the mysterious responses. But in vain. It was only when he elevated his voice greatly above its former key that genuine echoes rang through the woodland. All else was silent. He looked up and around. The trees seemed nodding to him significantly; the wind repeated to him in a lengthened whistle, "Search!" But how could he interpret the gestures? and for what should he seek?

A last time he listened attentively; he certainly was not indifferent. Nothing could be in more extreme contrast than his present intent attitude and look, with the listlessness which had characterized him as he lay stretched on the ground a few moments before.

Still no result, and stifling curiosity he was about to strike into the wood, when the plaintive wail fell on his ear as at first. With quick eye and pulse, but a tread light as a cat's, he advanced within the deep shadow of the trees. The sounds, always low, were intermittent; and after every few seconds came an interval of waiting for their recurrence. More than once, so protracted were these, that Legh Rosseau, who was no model of patience, felt irritated against himself on account of the singular fascination which held him bound till he should discover the origin of the noise. Sometimes he inclined to believe himself subject to a prank of some fellow-sportsman who, concealed in a hollow tree-trunk or behind an angle of rock, was secretly merry-making over his incertitude, and would end by springing out before him with whoops of derisive and exultant laughter—an event he would have shunned more than to meet a panther single-handed.

At last, when he had wandered undirected for a little, and was peering alternately among the branches and between the holes, the cry arose almost at his feet; and he saw, beneath a low arcade of evergreen, an infant lying wrapped in a blanket upon the leaf-covered ground. In his first bewilderment, he expected to see the tiny thing approached and claimed; but recollecting what length of time he had heard it meaning haplessly, and ascertaining by a touch that its wrappings were damp and chill with night air and exhalations from its comfortless bed, he could but conclude that it was uncared for, having been left to its fate. He raised the little sufferer in his arms—its instinctive cries for help were hushed; it smiled in his face, then nestled quietly in his bosom.

Rosseau was not long in conveying his prize through the woodland to his father's house. It was not a little curious, by the way, with what suddenness game had multiplied on that manor. Every sportsman who has ever on an excursion chanced to have broken a lock, or emptied his flask of powder, or by any other mishap rendered himself hors du combat, must have noticed similar results, and would be able to compare an experience with that of our hero returning by the route he came. There, where an hour before, not so much as the furl of a squirrel's tail could by any means be ferreted out, rabbits blinked up at him with their queer, red eyes; broods of plump partridges grown to the size of the hen, nothing startled by the crashing of underbrush attendant on his bold tread, ran on before like tame pigeons, taking wing only when he was actually in their midst. These creatures, and even the half-farthing sparrows, seem to know by a marvellous instinct, their times of security. But without staying to feel bitterly tantalized, he hurried forward and reached the home door.

Acting as he had from an impulse as simple and natural as it was humane and generous, until that moment he had viewed his position only the same as if he was representing the good Samaritan to an unfortunate individual of his own, or thrice his own years. Now, however, the novelty of his adventure suddenly appeared, occasioning him excitement and embarrassment; which emotions were made specially manifest on entering the parlor, to find sitting with his mother one of the most noted of the neighborhood's gossips. In telling his story he blushed and stammered, and was in the end barely intelligible.

Mrs. Rosseau, waiting to hear few particulars, took the perishing babe to her maternally bosom, and hastened to supply its necessities; meanwhile her pitying eyes were moistened by tears, and her lips murmured with tender expressions in that dialect supposed to be perfectly understood by even the infant of days.

Mrs. Blabman, the visitor, was struck, astounded, electrified by the incident. For a quarter of an hour she never ceased to pour herself out in exclamations; at the end of that period she rose up hastily, declaring "she had other calls to make" (our hero anticipated as much), and so posted away in the direction of Miss Scandalton's.

What a feast of fat things they and their elique enjoyed on and after that morning, can be thoroughly comprehended only through explanations immediately to follow.

CHAPTER II.

BEAUTY BELL.

ONE morning, as Legh Rosseau, eight years the junior of his present self, was crossing the hall from breakfast to school room, a fairy tripped in at the open street door, and in a gay, bird-voice said, at the same time offering a small, covered tin pail:

"Please, will you ask your ma to sell aunty a pint of milk? I've got the cents in my pocket—hear me rattle them! Why, what a fine house you live in; but I like the flower-garden still better."

Master Legh, rather tall for his twelfth year, looked decidedly down in considering the child, whose application struck him as especially amusing. Now had the heir of Judge Rosseau beheld, instead of the brightest and sweetest of cherub forms and faces in the neatest of pink gingham frocks and white muslin cape-bonnets, an ordinary child, in garments homely and soiled, and, maychance, with hands and face somewhat begrimed, I dare by no means assure you that he—albeit no born or bred aristocrat in the ultra sense of the term—would not have replied in his blunt, good-humored fashion, that he was not accustomed to do servant's work, and that, moreover, an errand such as hers would be properly introduced to the house by the back entrance. Some idea, then, of the impression he received may be had from the fact of his flinging on the stairs the Latin grammar he had been studying as he went, accepting the shining pail, and, while continuing his gaze of admiration, inquiring most pleasantly:

"Who is your aunty, missy?"

"She's Mrs. Crainlee. We moved here only yesterday, and live in the yellow cottage down by the little Niagara—don't you walk there towards night sometimes?"

"And what is your name?"

"Bell."

"Bell Crainlee?"

"No, only Bell. Mrs. Crainlee is not my aunt, only I have her for one because I haven't got any other. My father's name was Bradington, but he and my mother died before I can remember; I've only seen their name on their gravestones, and so I don't like to speak it often. You won't tell anybody I'm anything but Bell, will you?"

Legh led the way to the dairy-room, and with his own hands filled the pail—"turned the whole of the cream off of a pan of milk," the housekeeper complained, "just when it was well rising; and what was worse, bedazzled the shelves and floor." He only laughed a little provokingly; and when she answered the child that the price was "two cents, and ought to be six times that, considering the trouble," he interposed and made Bell keep her coppers.

Then telling the little girl he would show her a nearer way home than by the road, he took her through the garden; filled her empty hand with flowers, selecting the rarest, and afterwards ascended for her a narrow rear gate.

"This path," informed he, "goes straight to the cascade. You see, the little Niagara, as you call it, is a famous resort for all the people hereabouts, and we and our town visitors keep this by-way well trodden. You'll come after more milk to-morrow, and if Mrs. Dray scolds again—"

"O, no, there'll be no need of my coming—Io is going to be here by to-night."

"Who is Io?"

Bell laughed.

"She's not any who; Io is our heifer—aunty's and mine; and you never saw anything half so handsome."

"Perhaps I never saw an animal so handsome," returned Legh, looking a good deal anxious lest her babyship should fail to discover the intended compliment. "I see," he pursued, "I might have known you were speaking of a heifer. Io was Jupiter's heifer."

"I don't know," replied Bell, thoughtfully, "but I guess not. It was not Mr. Jupiter aunty bought her of; I'm sure his name was Mr. Smith."

Legh's darling point was lost, he had entirely missed astonishing Bell by a classical display; yet he somehow did not feel disgusted as he always had when any other little girl showed ignorance of what he happened to know. With the grace of a princess she thanked him in passing out; and hastened her steps in order to redeem the time. Re-latching the gate, he watched till the white bonnet had disappeared down the slope.

"What bright little girl was that?" inquired his mother, as, returning to the house, he passed a window at which she was sitting.

"That's Beauty Bell, mother; I'm going to have her for my wife, when she gets older."

"No occasion to get older yourself, silly boy, is there?" said his mother, smiling indulgently.

Mr. Doct that morning dismissed his Latin pupil with an order to review, and a lecture of which this was the close and specimen.

"Were I obliged to judge of your capacity by this morning's exercises, Master Legh, tui nihil sperarem—that is, I should despair of you. You do not distinguish subject from predicate, nor any second root from its first. Multum temporis amisisti—you may study out the meaning of the phrase."

Such were the circumstances attending the first meeting of Legh Rosseau and Beauty Bell. During the next three years and more he haunted the cascade like some water god. He was no lone spirit either; but if ever he had failed to meet there a certain one, he had felt himself solitary, though in the midst of twenty score. Ere departing for college he won an acknowledgment of love from Bell, and vowed constancy to her till the waters should flow up the rock instead of down.

The fact of a correspondence being established between the youthful lovers was seized upon by the gossips, who hitherto had tried to regard their attachment as simply ridiculous—a piece of childish folly, which one, at least, would seasonably outgrow. Such a pestilence as then swept over and around! Legh's more distant relatives became infected, and lastly his parents took the disease in a milder sort of inoculated form. It little suited them that their only child should have in prospect, though never so remote and with a thousand lucky possibilities intervening, a match with a nameless, penniless girl. They did nothing rashly, but on Legh's coming home at his first vacation, expressed to him their views. The answer was so sensible and decided, that thenceforward the dotting parents had no will in the matter at variance with their son's.

Their deranged balances were put in order, and personal worth found to weigh heavier than empty air. The young girl was invited to the judge's house, and made happy as often as she came. This state of things but irritated the opposing faction the more.

Beauty Bell was much to be despised! It was shameful in her to grow older without growing plainer! It was too provoking that she never seemed to fear, or even know their maliciousness—any more than an oriole singing on a tree-top is troubled by the wicked thought of an archer below, that if he had a gun, and knew how to use it, he would shoot the bird—sure as life. They were angry with themselves for having established by usage her appellation of Beauty Bell, first bestowed on her by Legh; but no one now was able to recognize her name without its prefix. Her family name was scarcely known at all; Mrs. Crainlee choosing to live quite a hermitess, and gratify no idle curiosity.

The student's eyes, long ago become accustomed to the light which so suddenly burst upon them, were not now dazzled, but rather guided steadily to their aim. He was graduated with distinction. Then a few months' relaxation were allowed him, to be followed by a course of study for the bar. It was during this interval that Mrs. Crainlee, after a brief illness, died. She had never been like a mother to Bell, nor even like the relative whose title was all she had ever claimed of the child; this person had few plants of affection in her nature; whether they never sprang there, or whether the life of root and branch had been worn out by the meretricious tramp of the world, I do not know. But she was one highly intelligent and nobly conscientious; she faithfully instructed, if she did not care.

Her sickness was not, by herself or others, feared to be unto death, till almost at the last, when she was incapacitated from making any provision for her orphan charge. Of money there could have been no bequest—their living had been her pension from government as the widow of a brave military officer.

But now what was going to become of Beauty Bell? At the funeral, immediately before the service, Mrs. Blabman pushed her envious and discommoding way across the thronged room to put the question to her friend, Miss Scandalton; and again, while the concourse were passing round to look upon the corpse, the two kept up a whispered conversation on the point.

There were those who considered her situation more sympathetically. While she was devoting herself to the sick room, Legh's services were constantly at her command, and neither by Mrs. Rosseau was she neglected. The latter now extended to her the kindest offer of a home. Bell thanked her with flowing tears, yet neither accepting nor declining it. Hardly anything could be more desirable, except that secretly her delicacy revolted against taking up her abode under the same roof with her lover. He on his part did nothing but regret a pledge voluntarily given his parents, that he would not enter the marriage relation before having secured his profession.

Some weeks elapsed and Bell lingered at the cottage, retaining for a companion a simple, antiquated female, called there to exercise her one talent as nurse to the sick. Afterwards she disappeared—whither, none knew, nor could with all their powers divine. The old nurse, being questioned relative to the mystery, could only say that very early one morning, a stranger came in a carriage accompanied by young Mr. Rosseau, and Bell rode away with the man.

It was just three months later that the foundling was brought to Rosseau Hall. Was here a coincidence? Was there not? And, as though Providence, whose fiat cannot be escaped, decreed the unequivocal exposure of such iniquity, little Echo grew day by day into the image of Beauty Bell. She had the same pearly complexion, soft curls, fine eyes, dimpled cheeks and laughing mouth. What need had the Mrs. Blabman party of further witness?

"Well, they never anticipated anything better!" Everything, save the present locality of "the victim," was now fully understood. Those occasional absences of the young man—who had posted away, and returned only after two or three days—were now explained. Want of resources, he being still a minor, had compelled Legh to fall back upon his father for the support of his unseemly offspring. But Beauty Bell would never show herself in that place again—indeed not! Of course, the judge and his wife knew all about it.

CHAPTER III.

THE ENIGMA.

This was partly true. Mrs. Rosseau knew what was said in the case. The singular likeness Echo bore to the affianced bride of her son, together with the secret which was observed respecting the young girl's departure and after residence, and other circumstances, combined to excite in her mind, if not actual fears that rumor spoke truth, at least most unpleasant sensations at being unable to refute falsehood.

At length, when the burden of her thoughts was no longer to be borne, she took the opportunity—finding herself one morning alone with her son—of repeating to him what was so current in the neighborhood. He listened with knitting brows till the tale was ended, smote his clenched hands together, coupled Mrs. Blabman's name with an epithet the severest that anybody could search out of Webster's Quarto, and springing from his seat strode the apartment in a perfect frenzy of rage. This did nothing toward exonerating himself or Bell from the execrable charges; he began to reflect that it would not, and his passion gradually cooled.

"Legh."
"Well, mother."
"Look at that child as she is playing there in her cradle."
"You see me obedient."
"Do you find in her a resemblance to any person you have known?"
"One most astonishing."
"To whom?"
"Beauty Bell!"
There was an interval of silence; Mrs. Rosseau, she scarcely knew why, had not expected this frank avowal. Legh was the first to speak.

"The child had hardly been a day with us when I discovered the likeness. That such likeness should exist, cannot be more unaccountable to you than it was and is to me. At first I thought it mere fancy; but soon saw that you and others had made the same discovery. It has perplexed and troubled me—if I was a woman I would say it has made me nervous. I have never forgotten how the sight of that old serpent in this room when I entered it with the perishing babe in my arms made me quail; but it was from instinctive terror of her nature, not from any evil desert, not because of any deception I was practising. I might have committed all the sin ascribed to me, but I would have suffered beheading, having seen Bell undergo the same, before I would stoop to so despicable a cheat. She is pure as an angel, and you know all that I know concerning the infant. I call Heaven to witness that I have uttered only the truth. Do you believe me, mother?"

"Most implicitly, my son. You have never told me but the truth, though you have not always told the whole truth."

"Have I in more than a single instance purposely kept back what you wished to know?"

"I refer to no more."

"And then it was because the secret was not mine to reveal."

"You acknowledged that you knew whither Bell had gone when she left us."

"I did. I have heard from her since, but not seen her. She had her reasons for requiring a promise of me, which you, mother, would be the last to wish me to violate. Let the serpents hiss; she will come back, and they will be confounded."

Mrs. Rosseau was satisfied and vexed herself no more, though public gossip continued unabated. Once, when Legh made his periodical excursion "to visit his victim," of course, the foul tide rose higher than ever. Mrs. Blabman "wished she was a man;" Miss Scandalton spoke significantly of tar and feathers. The morning following his return the former person, being summoned to the parlor, was dismayed at meeting there young Rosseau himself. She made an impulsive movement to fly, but his polite salutation reassured her; she stayed, lavishing on him her blindest looks and sweetest words. He delivered a request from his mother that Mrs. Blabman would call; the babe was not so well as usual, and she might be able to prescribe for its benefit.

Mrs. Blabman, much flattered, hastened in compliance. She had hardly entered the house, when her conjugal, Miss Scandalton, arrived, by request also. The two looked one another in the face, as much as to ask, "What means it?" Echo appeared to have a slight cold, it was true; but was not hindered from playing animatedly. They were seized with vague, but mortal apprehension, and resolved on hastening away. Before, however, their design could be executed, a carriage such as had never been rivalled in the district—with its dashing bays in costly caparisoning and its footman in livery—rolled up to the gate. From the mien of Judge Rosseau, his lady and their son, it was sufficiently evident that the circumstance was not altogether unexpected.

The latter rising, threw open the door and ushered in three persons. One of these was Beauty Bell, even more brilliant than they had known her. The next, a queenly looking lady of twenty-five, entered with scarce restrained eagerness, and fixing her searching eyes upon the infant in Mrs. Rosseau's arms, rushed forward, caught it to her heart and in a transport of maternal affection exclaimed: "My darling!" at length yielding it to the less demonstrative, though not less tender embraces of her husband, who accompanied them.

"You are not going so soon?" said the hostess, with mock concern, addressing the two neighbors who were endeavoring to creep from the room unperceived.

The judge approached them with all his official dignity.

"You, Mrs. Blabman," said he, "were present when the foundling was brought to us, and"—looking from one to the other—"both of you have taken an active interest in her; we thought, therefore, this invitation was due you; we hope you feel measurably recompensed."

Legh, with extraordinary obsequiousness bowed them out, dumb and almost annihilated.

CHAPTER IV.

ANSWER TO THE ENIGMA.

THOUGH the mystery was in reality only deepened, Mrs. Blabman and her corps were nowise impatient for further developments. With our readers, if we have succeeded in interesting them, it is different; and they shall be gratified.

The mother of Beauty Bell was of a noble English family. She reciprocated the affections of a young American artist visiting the Old World; her father opposed the union on account of the suitor's want of fortune, and finally threatened her with disinheritance if she married him. Choosing between love and gold, Isabella consented to a secret marriage, and without the knowledge of her friends, embarked with her husband for his native land.

They established a residence at Buffalo; the succeeding year Mr. Bradington died of cholera, which that season prevailed in many cities of the North as well as South. The young widow, overwhelmed with grief for his loss, never recovered from her acquaintance, which occurred soon after. In dying, she confided her infant to Mrs. Crainlee, whose friendship she had enjoyed since her arrival in a land of strangers, and who already knew her history.

Lord Eldon, Bell's grandfather, lamenting the result of his severity, made diligent efforts to discover his daughter, but in vain. He did not long survive her. A rumor finally reached the family, of Isabella's and her husband's death in America, and that they had left a daughter. At this, a sister, who was but a child when Isabella quitted her home, determined to come to this country and search till she should find whatever traces remained of one so fondly remembered. Her husband, to whom she was newly wedded, approved the project, and they made the voyage.

Mr. Bradington having been a native of a southern State, they naturally turned first in that direction. More than eighteen months elapsed while they passed from city to city of the South and West, and still no success. Arrived at Buffalo, letters awaited them, from which they received the happy surprise that Isabella's child not only had been found, but was even then with them in England. They were indebted to an elderly English gentleman residing at Buffalo and acquainted with the circumstances, who, reading upon tombstones the names of Richard and Isabella Bradington, instituted inquiries after their daughter which proved successful. Being on the eve of departure for Europe with his wife and child, he kindly took charge of Bell, and gave her in safety to her rejoicing relatives.

The young lady, timid regarding the reception she might meet with from her mother's aristocratic family, and there being an uncertainty regarding the property—of right hers, but long in the possession of another, chose that all should remain secret till her return. To aid this, her letters to Legh were by arrangement addressed to Buffalo, where he regularly went to receive them and remit his to her.

Mrs. Clyde, Bell's aunt in America, on learning that her object had been accomplished by another, wished immediately to recross the waters, but her situation for a time prevented. In the city of Bell's birth, she also gave birth to a daughter. Her anxiety to proceed home overcame her prudence, and, having only once left her chamber and that to render a tearful tribute over the grave of her ill-fated sister, they set out for New York; their passage being engaged on a boat to sail immediately. The overtaking of her strength induced an attack of illness when they had travelled but a few miles, obliging them to delay. Having only very restricted accommodations at the obscure inn where they were, the nurse was sent forward with the child to await them in New York.

The vessel sailed before it was possible for Mrs. Clyde to proceed. By reference to the list of passengers it was found that "Mrs. Riley and child," the name was that of the nurse, had been among them. The parents went by the next steamer; but what was their dismay on arriving in England, to find that the nurse and child had not been heard from! The name on the list was ascertained to have denoted a different person.

It was thought Mrs. Riley, the nurse, possibly might still be staying with her charge in New York, whither letters were instantly despatched. While the bereaved parents waited in an agony of grief and suspense, earnestly concerting what further measures to adopt, a letter from Bell's lover recounted to her his singular adventure as a sportsman. Half jocosely, he described minutely the few garments the infant wore when found, being all of exquisite fabric. This enabled Mrs. Clyde at once to identify the babe.

Mr. and Mrs. Clyde hastened preparations for returning to the child so unwittingly left behind; and Bell, who had come into the possession of her splendid estate without difficulty, disappointed her admiring friends of a longer visit, that she might come home in their company. It had been conjectured that the infant's nurse—though she had seemed faithful in her office and strongly attached to the babe—abandoned it where it was found, through the temptation to obtain possession of its rich clothing, and more especially of a casket of jewels which the proud father had lavished upon his first-born; this last as well as much of the appalling having been abstracted from the mother's trunks without her knowledge. The parents were somewhat surprised, therefore, on reaching New York to be met by Mrs. Riley. With sobs and groans she threw herself at their feet, exclaiming, that "she didn't think her letter could have brought them so soon, or indeed, would bring them at all, except it was to punish her—and yet she could not help looking."

It appeared that the woman, as soon as she recovered from the consternation into which she was at first thrown by the loss of her charge, wrote the parents a full confession, as far as she was herself cognizant. The letter had not time to reach its destination when they left England. Mrs. Riley's tale was this:

The jewels and fine clothing were taken along solely from a foolish vanity of decorating the babe, whose remarkable beauty, even at that early age, attracted every eye. No sooner were they beyond the vigilance of the more sensible mother, than the infant of a few weeks, travelling in the railroad cars, was made to display as much elaborateness as would become any fine lady at court. The object was soon gained. As the tiny arms were tossed up in glee, a costly diamond bracelet fixed the gaze of a couple of gentlemen—apparently—who occupied a seat together at the opposite extremity of the car. Presently, an opportunity offering, they removed to the seat fronting, and during the remainder of the afternoon's ride, were assiduous in attentions to both child and nurse.

It was dark when the train stopped. One of the new acquaintances offered to carry the little one to the hotel, which he said was so near as to render a carriage unnecessary; while the other gallantly offered an arm to Mrs. Riley. The first instantly disappeared with his booty. His accomplice conducted the woman to a restaurant, assuring her that as the hotel was kept on the European plan, this was her only opportunity of procuring refreshments for the night. She drank wine which she now believed to have been drugged; and recovered consciousness only to find that child and gentlemen would be sought in vain. The poor creature was overjoyed at being told the babe was safe.

The shortest paragraph is all that need be added. Bell spent at a celebrated boarding school the term of Legh's study of his chosen profession; on his being admitted to the bar, they were married and, accompanied by the bridegroom's parents, started immediately on a tour of a year in Europe.

OAKLAND FEMALE INSTITUTE, NORRISTOWN, PA.

The engraving which occupies the lower part of this page is from a drawing made for us on the spot, and represents the Oakland Female Institute, located on the eastern border of the borough of Norristown, Pa. The building, as will be seen by our illustration, is an elegant structure, while its position is an admirable one, on an eminence which commands, on the one hand, a full view of the town and its environs, and on the other, a beautiful expanse of rural country. The landscape in front is surpassingly rich and varied, embracing a wide extent of cultivated fields, interspersed with numerous villages, and watered by the Schuylkill. We have here a turnpike, a canal and three railroads, which impart a constant life and activity to the scene. The situation combines the advantages of town and country. It is also easy of access from all points, and has communication with Philadelphia, which is but

A MOORISH TOWER.

MOORISH ARCHITECTURE.

We present on this page some very fine illustrations of Moorish or Mohammedan architecture, which has ever been renowned for its gracefulness, richness, and elegance and imaginative character. The first is a Moorish tower, richly wrought, and approached through an avenue of palms and other oriental trees, beneath which a military procession is seen advancing. The second is a small Mohammedan mosque, which is remarkable for its exquisite symmetry. The sculptured doorway and the graceful dome are models in style. The third engraving exhibits the interior of a Moorish apartment. In front, a sparkling fountain throws its diamond drops on the tessellated pavement; beyond and above springs a lofty Moorish arch with scalloped edges, and within are seen other arches, and walls adorned by arabesques, while in a recess is seen a couch. In the centre appear a group of figures in oriental dresses. In general, the interior of Moorish edifices was all light, air, color and luxury, contrasting with the grim and gloomy exterior, like a spar enclosed in a rough pebble. The door, once opened, ushered the Moor into a houri-peopled palace, which realized those gorgeous descriptions that seem to our good old folks who live in brick and mortar to be the fictions of oriental poetry, or the fabric of Aladdin's genii. Yet such were the palatial fortresses, the Alcazars, the Alhambras of the Spanish Moors, and such, on a minor scale, were their private dwellings, many of which still exist at Seville, although dimmed by ages of neglect. The generic features are a court hidden from the public gaze, but open to the blue sky, and surrounded with horse-shoe arched corridors, which rest on palm-like pillars of marble, whose spandrels are pierced in gossamer lace-work. In the centre plays a fountain, gladdening the air with freshness, the ear with music, the eye with dropping diamonds. The walls were painted with variegated tints, and richer than shawls of Cashmere. The ceilings were miracles of carpentry, while the open windows and door admitted a view of delightful gardens filled with luscious fruits, with fragrant flowers and with emerald foliage.

A SMALL MOHAMEDAN MOSQUE.

sixteen miles distant, almost every hour of the day, by means of the Norristown and Reading Railroads. The progress of this Institute has been rapid. It was opened on the 29th of October, 1845, and its pupils gradually increased, until it was necessary, before the close of the first session, to provide more room. The institution continued to grow, and five extensive additions were successively made, and the room thus furnished was immediately filled. About a year since, the centre building, which completed the original plan, was finished. And in connection with this, every other part of the establishment was renovated, and thus to the whole, the uniformity and freshness of a new building was imparted. Since that time, the demand for room has been much beyond the capacity of the building to supply. As now arranged, the edifice is 183 feet long, 41 feet wide, and four stories high; and contains 130 apartments. The chambers, of which there are over 70, are mainly calculated to receive but two pupils each, while a few are fitted up for the accommodation of four, which is the highest number that will, under any circumstances, be admitted to a room. The care of the chambers is in part, entrusted to their respective occupants, and all are required to be kept neatly, being subject to the daily inspection of the officers of the institution. The building is warmed by a hot air apparatus, and is lighted with gas. There is a primary department, into which pupils not under twelve years of age are admitted; a collegiate course of studies, which embraces the whole range of studies usually pursued in our universities, with some modifications, and an optional course, embracing such studies as may be specially selected for pupils by their parents and guardians. Provision is made for teaching various accomplishments—drawing and painting, instrumental and vocal music, the modern languages, etc. The officers and instructors of the Institute are as follows:—Rev. J. Grier Ralston, A. M., principal and teacher of chemistry, moral science, Latin and Greek; Mrs. Mary A. Ralston, vice-principal and superintendent of music department and of social duties; David Larimore, Esq., general business superintendent; Misses Elizabeth J. Grier, Elizabeth L. Long, Agnes C. Ralston, Catherine J. Casselberry, and Elizabeth J. Briggs, assistants in the collegiate and primary departments; Miss Maria R. Leonard, teacher of drawing, painting and embroidery; Monsieur Reinhold F. Hunt, piano, guitar and musical composition; Miss A. Louisa Williams, piano and singing; Mrs. P. McLaurin, piano; Miss Elizabeth C. Smead, piano and singing; Mr. John Bower, singing in classes; Monsieur L. M. Schneider, French, Spanish, Italian and German; and Mrs. Anne E. Brown, matron. The object of this institution is to fit young ladies for the adequate discharge of the duties of life, to render them not merely scholars and accomplished ornaments of society, but right-minded women, physically and morally trained for the great battle of life. The pupils are taught to be self-reliant, to cherish that love of pure morality and just appreciation of responsibility which their relation to time and eternity involves. In the mental discipline of the institution, no attempt is made to cover a wide field of study at the expense of accuracy. The standard by which the pupils are judged is quality, not quantity. No student is allowed to pass to a second exercise until the first has been thoroughly mastered, and a system of frequent and rigid reviewing ensures the fixity of what has been studied in the minds of the pupils. An accurate record of each individual's recitation is made at the time of reciting, and quarterly reports are made to parents and guardians, stating precisely the health, industry, deportment and proficiency of the pupils. Health is justly regarded as of primary importance, and the extent of the grounds surrounding the Institute (eight acres) affords ample opportunity for that exercise in the open air by which alone health can be attained or secured. The government of this school is firm, but rendered as nearly like that of a well-conducted home as possible. Attendance at church on the Sabbath is required of all the pupils, and a portion of each Sabbath is spent in the study of the Scriptures. Where no particular preference is expressed, the pupils accompany the family of the principal to the Presbyterian Church. Under the auspices of the "Young Ladies' Literary and Library Association," a reading-room has been fitted up and furnished with many of the best religious and literary periodicals of the day. A library has also been commenced, which already numbers about 700 volumes of standard works. The united libraries of the institution contain nearly 2000 volumes. There are also an ample provision of chemical, philosophical and astronomical apparatus, as well as a complete set of maps, globes, etc., a cabinet of natural history, and a collection of minerals. Of the high character of this Institute, we have abundant testimony. The pupils have been frequently examined by impartial committees, the questions taken at random from the text-books used, or framed without reference to the books, and the result was completely satisfactory. The pupils on more than one occasion have passed with honor examinations "far more searching than those to which students are commonly subjected in our colleges." It gives us great pleasure to record the success of such an institution as this. It is unquestionably based on sound principles, and those principles are evidently fully embodied in practice. The whole plan of the "Oakland Female Institute" is admirable, and fully meets our approbation.

A MOORISH APARTMENT.

OAKLAND FEMALE INSTITUTE, NORRISTOWN, PA.

THE GRAND DUCAL PALACE, AT SCHWERIN, GERMANY.

GRANDFATHER'S VISIT.

There is excitement enough in the domestic scene depicted in our second engraving on this page, but it is excitement of a healthy character. The room is a humble one, with its battened door, its uncarpeted floor, its heavy wooden arm-chair and plain deal table, but yet it is the abode of happiness. Grandfather, a venerable old gentleman, looking all the more respectable for his adherence to the good old costume, the breeches and all that, has come to pay a visit to his daughter and her trio of children. The oldest, a boy, is boisterously seizing on the old gentleman and twining his sturdy limbs about his leg. But the first notice is for the gentle little girl who is advancing with both hands extended to welcome grandpapa. Even the baby on its mother's knee has caught the infection of hospitality, and is preparing to tumble down on the floor and toddle up to the old gentleman. The mother, with a look of fondness at the old man, is holding up her finger in silent warning to the youngster, her eldest born, who is so furiously demonstrative in his proceedings. Ah! it is beneath such humble roofs as this that true happiness takes up its abode. A splendid residence and sumptuous surroundings do not necessarily crush the affections—for possession soon produces indifference to splendor, and as loving hearts beat beneath the king's ermine as beneath the peasant's coat of frieze, but the titled and the wealthy are surrounded by checks and restraints that forbid the full expansion of the heart, the free indulgence of domestic joys. It would be undignified in a royal or imperial grandfather to play at romps with his little grandchildren. Few monarchs venture to unbend as did that ancient king of Sparta who astonished a foreign ambassador by riding on a stick for the amusement of his children, and when criticized for so doing, replied to his Mentor: "You must wait until you have children of your own, before you can understand those who have." Those lofty circles where the intercourse of members of families is as unrestrained as in the abodes of humble life are extremely few and far between. One of the exceptions was that of Louis Philippe, king of France, to whom exile and sorrow had taught the value of domestic ties. But we like our good old grandfather in the picture for the very honest rusticity of his dress and bearing. We wouldn't improve on him if we could. If we were a story-teller, and he our hero, we should not venture to improve his circumstances. It would be the height of cruelty to award him a fortune in a lottery, or to make him discover a forgotten oven in a kitchen wall, containing seventy-five thousand dollars in gold and silver. For then he would forthwith dye his hair and raise a pair of moustachios, and go into French boots, and set up a carriage, and go to the opera, buy a lot of ancestors at a picture auction, and talk about his family. He wouldn't be approachable to children. He might give them a finger to shake, but he certainly would not allow them to walk over his pantaloons or ride on his knee, nor would tell them stories about the battle of Bunker Hill and the "times that tried men's souls." So we won't conjure up any "brilliant prospect" or "splendid opening" for grandfather, but leave him contented with his humble lot, just as the artist has depicted him—a gentle, genial, whole-souled old man, surrounded by those he loves and who love him, unranked by care, by jealousy, by envy or by ambition.

GRAND DUCAL PALACE OF SCHWERIN, GERMANY.

The imposing pile of building occupied by the grand duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, accurately delineated in our engraving, is a bizarre mixture of different styles, and though far from harmonious regarded as a whole, abounds in the elements of the picturesque. Directly in front of us are two wings, evidently copied from some French chateau. Further to the right we have two ruined towers with exterior pilasters, connected by a rich curtain of mason work, in an arched recess of which is an equestrian statue. But the dome in the centre and the numerous spires again remind us of Byzantium and Russia. The palace is of vast extent and stands upon a peninsula in the lake seen in the foreground. The borders of this lake are tastefully planted with trees. On the right is seen the commencement of a graceful bridge, which leads to the principal entrance of the palace. The Lake of Schwerin is fourteen miles in length by three miles in average breadth. It receives the Elbe on the south, and from its northern extremity flows the Stör, which enters the Baltic at Wismar. The town of Schwerin, the capital of the grand duchy of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, is in Northern Germany, on the railroad from Hamburg to Wismar. It contains about 18,000 inhabitants. It is enclosed by walls. It has a cathedral, Lutheran and Roman Catholic churches, a Jewish synagogue, the government buildings and also various manufactures of woollen cloth, tobacco, etc.

GRANDFATHER'S VISIT.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

FORGIVE ME.

BY BLANCHE D'ARTOISE.

On a fearful, wintry night,
 'Neath the forest trees,
 Musing in the pale moonlight,
 Thought I then of thee;
 I sighed, yet all around was still,
 Naught echoed, e'en a trickling rill.

Straying 'moong the ghostly trees,
 On that fearful night,
 Wandering through the rustling leaves,
 'Neath the pale moonlight,
 There my spirit waited thine—
 It came not then to comfort mine.

On the morning, flashing bright,
 Came with golden beam,
 While the dazzling diamond light
 Gilt the icy sheen—
 In the hoar wood lone and still,
 Yet I wandered, sad and chill.

Leanlog on a hoary rock,
 In that mocking hour—
 Torn my heart like earthquake shock's
 Overwhelming power;
 Sighed not then to whisper thee—
 I gloried thou wast far from me.

In the holy twilight calm
 On my couch I lay,
 Breathing round a soothing balm,
 Faded fast the day;
 The sunlight gleaming on the wall,
 Gave way to evening's sombre pall.

In the fading, dying light,
 My spirit, worn and weak,
 Wandered on a moonlight night,
 Sitting at thy feet;
 Thy hand in mine—was it not so?
 But years—O long, long, years ago.

The hot tears trickled down my cheek—
 O, can it be that thou,
 Who words of comfort then didst speak,
 Canst frown upon me now?
 And my heart, bursting wild with grief,
 In that one question found relief.

On my couch in sweet repose,
 All the night I dreamed
 Angel forms around me rose,
 Angel faces gleamed—
 And one like thine did whisper, "Live!
 For thy unkindness—I forgive!"

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

EARLY LIFE OF MICHAEL ANGELO.

BY E. S. SMITH.

In the year 1474, on Monday the 6th of March, at four o'clock in the morning, was born at the castle of Carprese, in the territory of Arezzo, Michael Angelo, son of Ladriceo de Lionardo de Buonarroti, Governor of Chiusi and of Carprese, and descended from one of the most ancient families of Tuscany.

Although at this period of Florentine history, commerce and trade were considered as most honorable pursuits, and indeed to these were ascribed the great power and riches of the state, the father of the little Michael Angelo destined him for his own profession, and already foresaw him a future governor, nay ambassador; far from thinking that he was destined to become what he contemptuously termed a mason!

But there is a destiny attached to the lives of celebrated men, and fate selected for Michael, as his nurse, the wife of a stone mason, and whilst the child, thus thrown under her care, grew strong and robust in the sun and air, his infant hands, hardened by exposure, grasped the chisel and hammer, and his first cries mingled with the harsh grating of the saw. In vain the proud parents sought to curb the only inclination the boy manifested; even at school he continued to escape the vigilance of the master, and obtained the notice of the artist Ghirlandajo, who said of him, "He is a rising star that will live to eclipse the brightest planet now shining." He was even induced to seek Michael's father, and beseeching him not to oppose the manifest vocation of his son, offered to take him as an apprentice to his art.

At this proposal, the podesta started from his seat in a paroxysm of rage; but after a while he went calmly to his work, wrote an engagement on the behalf of his son for three years, and with an expression of countenance little less affecting than that with which Brutus signed the death warrant of his son, handed him over to Ghirlandajo. With one bound Michael cleared the staircase, throwing up his cap for joy. He burnt his grammar: true, he was not much more than a servant at Ghirlandajo's; but what did that matter? He was free to pursue his own tastes, he was happier than a Medicis! He could now bedaub the walls as he chose, he could grind his colors, sketch, or, if a morsel of plaster fell in his way, he could mould it to his will, without fearing to have his ears pulled. Before he had attained the age of thirteen, he was already a great artist, and his success had naturally created both jealousy and enmity. A blow from Torregiano, when they as boys worked together, broke the cartilage of his nose, and disfigured that feature for life.

On the other hand, Michael Angelo could not fail to find as many friends, and amongst the most celebrated men of the age. Benvenuto Cellini, whose great genius and talents ranked with those of Buonarroti, was his most ardent admirer, and never designated him but as the "divine Buonarroti."

During the boy-artist's wanderings in the gardens of the Medici palace, he met some of the stone cutters who had formerly rocked his cradle; they were ever delighted to see him, and frequently obtained him a view of the treasures of the gallery, then in its infancy. Michael Angelo contemplated with veneration the mutilated specimens of art. The workmen one day offered him a bit of marble, requesting that he would employ it as he liked, and come thither as often as he chose.

His only answer was to grasp a chisel, throw off his jacket, and begin to hammer out the outline of a faun's head. Often then was the workshop deserted, to the great displeasure of the master. One day, whilst putting the finishing strokes to his old faun, a man about forty years of age, plain in person and shabbily attired, stopped, and silently watched him as he worked. Michael Angelo continued to work on, heeding him no more than the dust which fell from his chisel. When he had given the last touch he drew back, as artists are wont, to look on the effect of the head. For this, probably the silent observer had waited, for he slowly approached, and, putting his hand on the young artist's shoulder, "My friend," said he, smilingly, "with your leave I would make an observation."

Michael Angelo turned quickly, and with a somewhat impatient and caustic air, replied, "An observation!—you!"

"A criticism, if you prefer it."

"Upon my faun's head?"

"Upon your faun's head."

"And who are you, sir, who fancy you have a right to criticize my work?"

"It matters not to you who I am, provided my criticism is just."

"And who will decide, sir, which of us two is in the right?"

"I will leave the decision to yourself."

"Well, sir, speak," said Michael Angelo, crossing his arms in a defiant manner.

"Was it not your object to make an old faun laughing immoderately?"

"Undoubtedly; it is easy to be discovered."

"Well then," said the other, "where did you ever see old men with all their teeth perfect?"

The boy blushed to his eyes, and bit his lip. The observation was correct. He only waited till the individual had turned his back, when with one stroke of his chisel he knocked out two of the faun's teeth, and even decided on hollowing out the gum on returning next day. The gardens accordingly were no sooner opened than Michael Angelo entered; but the faun had disappeared, and in its place stood the person he had seen the preceding day.

"Where is my head?" asked the young sculptor, angrily.

"It has been removed by my command," replied the stranger, with his accustomed apathy.

"And who are you, sir, who dare to give orders in the gardens of the great Medicis?"

"Follow me, and you shall learn!"

"I will follow, to force you to restore me my faun."

"Perhaps you will be better satisfied to leave it where it is."

"We shall see."

"We shall see," echoed the stranger, and then took the path to the palace, with the same calm demeanor; but on his beginning to ascend the staircase, the boy, seemingly terrified as well as angry, caught his arm, saying, "Where are you going, sir? You are approaching the apartments of the prince, and although he may overlook an intrusion in the royal gardens, we here run great risk."

On proceeded the stranger, the servants rising as he approached, the guards saluting.

Michael was lost in wonder. "Even supposing him one of the household (he thought to himself), my faun belongs to me, and he ought to restore it; my labor is my own, and I can pay him for the marble." The galleries, the saloons were passed through without interruption. "Good heavens! it must be at least the secretary, whom I have thus cavalierly treated," thought the boy.

The stranger threw open the door of a room magnificently furnished, and enriched with all that was most valuable in art, and the trembling child considered himself as lost, when he remembered his treatment of one powerful enough to be able to approach Lorenzo de Medicis without being announced. Whilst he was stammering out an apology, he raised his eyes, and saw his old faun placed on a superb bracket.

"You see, my friend," said the stranger, with the same mild and kind manner, "that if I had your faun removed from the garden, it was to place it in a more suitable position."

"But," cried the youthful artist, "what will the prince say, when he discovers this poor attempt among so many precious works?"

The prince held out his hand: "Take it, my friend."

Any other than Michael Angelo would have thrown himself at his feet; but he burst into tears, and, bowing his head, convulsively pressed the hand offered him by Lorenzo the Magnificent. "Henceforward thou art here at home, my friend; thou wilt work here, dine at my table, and I shall treat you as one of my children. Go to my wardrobe, and desire that they give thee a rich cloak of velvet; velvet, exactly like that worn by Peter and John de Medicis, on days of ceremony."

"My lord," replied the boy, deeply affected, "suffer me first to go to my father, that he may share my happiness. He turned me from his roof as a disobedient and worthless child, and I would return thither a submissive and devoted man. I know my father to be as just as he is inflexible, and he will admit that I have a right to be proud of my disobedience. From this day I may carry my head high; for Lorenzo de Medicis, the first man of the age, has consecrated me an artist."

"Right, my child; and you may also tell your father, that my patronage will extend to all your family. This very day I will receive him at the palace, and I will bestow on him any appointment in Florence that may be suited to him."

Old Buonarroti was quietly breakfasting in his room, which he had scarcely left since he had lost his son, when loud and repeated knocking at the door nearly drove it from its hinges. The governor hastened to open it himself, but drew back at the sight of Michael Angelo, whom he did not immediately recognize. Pale, breathless, his head bare, his dress in disorder, covered with dust and plaster, the boy made a spring from the door to throw himself into his father's arms.

"Begone!" cried the governor, trembling with passion.

"Father, hear me, I implore, before you thus drive me from you. Listen to me but for one moment."

"You would thus force me to curse you."

"I come from the palace."

"I neither wish to know whence you come, nor what you do. I had once a son called Michael Angelo. He was to have been (at least I hoped so) the glory, the support of my family, the joy, the comfort of my old age, but I have lost this ungrateful and disobedient son, thank God,—he is no longer here, I sold him to the sculptor Ghirlandajo for eighteen florins."

"For my mother's sake, hear me! behold me at your feet."

"Back to your mason's, that is your place."

"My place!" said Michael Angelo, rising proudly from his knees, "my place is in the apartment of princes; my place is among the first artists of Florence; my place is at the table of Lorenzo the Magnificent."

"My God, my God, he is mad!" exclaimed the poor father, passing from rage to terror.

"But follow me, father, follow me, and you will see that the great Lorenzo has taken me by the hand, that he has placed me in his palace, that he expects you, that he offers you an employment, according to your choice."

The old Buonarroti was completely upset; he held his head between his hands, and asked of himself which had lost his reason, his son or himself. Michael Angelo not allowing him further time for reflection, dragged him by force, to the palace of the great Medicis. The governor believed himself to be in a dream. No guard forbade their approach, and the courtiers drew back respectfully to give them passage. At the door of the prince's closet, a page raised the hanging curtain, and the old Buonarroti stood with his son in the presence of the Medicis.

"Sir," said the prince, coming forward and courteously addressing him, "I have been the cause of disturbing you, in order to ask your leave that I may retain about me a son of whom you may be justly proud, and who bids fair to become the first artist of his time. My house shall be his home, and his salary you will yourself name. In return, I make you only one request; your son has probably already told you what. It is that you ask of me any appointment most suitable to your taste and habits. It is granted beforehand."

"My son," replied the agitated father, endeavoring to master his emotion, "will, I think, be paid beyond his deserts, if he receives five ducats monthly."

"And for yourself, sir?"

"For myself, prince, I ask a trifling situation now vacant in the customs; it can only be given to a citizen of the state; I ask it, because it is a post I feel I can fill with honor."

"You will never be rich, my dear Buonarroti," laughingly replied the Medicis, "for, offered any situation you please, you content yourself with a little place in the customs."

"Enough too—for the father of a mason!"

And thus was Michael Angelo de Buonarroti introduced to the patronage of the illustrious Medicis.

NOTICES OF NEW PUBLICATIONS.

LECTURES READ TO THE JUNIORS IN HARVARD COLLEGE. By EDWARD T. CHANNING, late Boylston Professor of Rhetoric and Oratory. Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1856. 12mo. pp. 298.

These lectures on oratory and rhetoric form an admirable text-book. The lectures are preceded by an ample biographical notice, from the pen of Richard H. Dana, Jr.

THE AMERICAN COLLECTION OF INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC. Vol. I. By JOHN W. MOORE. Geo. P. Reed & Co.

A very admirable collection of marches, quicksteps, dancing tunes and other popular music, arranged for wind and stringed instruments, with pianoforte accompaniments. It is beautifully printed, and contains a great quantity of music. Every amateur of music should procure it.

SUNBEAM STORIES. With Illustrations. Boston and Cambridge: James Munroe & Co. 1856. 18mo. pp. 395.

The "Trap to catch a Sunbeam," and the tales which followed, have enjoyed a universal reputation both in Europe and this country. Their collection in the present volume will be hailed with delight by the young, to whom it will be as welcome as the sunshine to the flowers in May.

SIN AND REDEMPTION. By D. N. SHERIDON, D. D. Boston: Crosby, Nichols & Co. 1856. 12mo. pp. 322.

A series of sermons on subjects of vital spiritual importance, written with all the vigor and logical power of the learned and eloquent author.

NEW MUSIC. Oliver Ditson has just published "The Irish Washerwoman," "The Dearest Spot of Earth," and "The Lass wi' the bonnie blue ee," "Is Love a Crime?" a duet for the piano, "Distant Bells are softly pealing," a ballad by O. R. Barrows, and "Now the Swallows are returning," with French and English words.

LENA; or, The Young Pilot of the Brigs Crole. By MRS. CAROLINE LEE HENTZ. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson. 12mo. pp. 276.

This story of southern life is thought by many to be the best novel from the pen of the lamented writer. It is a story of thrilling interest, and the character of Lena is developed with remarkable ability. For sale by Phillips, Sampson & Co.

GABRIEL VANE: His Fortunes and his Friends. By JEREMY LODGE, author of "Dovecot." New York: Derby & Jackson. 1856. 12mo. pp. 423.

Quite a clever novel, full of adventures, ups and downs, startling incidents, and above all, characters well drawn and colored. For sale by Phillips, Sampson & Co., Boston.

ADVENTURES OF GERARD THE LION-KILLER. Translated from the French by CHARLES E. WHITEHEAD. New York: Derby & Jackson. 1856. 12mo. pp. 432.

Gerard is the modern Nimrod of North Africa, and Gordon Cummings of South. He spent ten years in hunting the lions, and thus became a lion himself. His book has all the excitement of the wildest romance, and the publishers have, with great judgment, liberally illustrated it. For sale by Phillips, Sampson & Co.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF ALFRED TENNYSON. Complete in one volume, with a Portrait of the Author. Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1856. 18mo. pp. 513.

Though all of Tennyson's writings are embraced in this elegant little volume, the type is large and clear. It contains much exquisite poetry, and some unmitigated trash, among which we reckon "Maud," and that weakest of battle lyrics, "The Charge of the Light Brigade." Yet even these have their admirers.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

LOVE LIES BLEEDING.

BY NELLIE.

Bright clouds that float above my head,
And o'er the ocean a rippling bed;
And o'er the palm and linden trees,
And in the soothing, summer breeze;
Soft clouds of night, white and blue,
O, who loves me as I love you?

Fair flowers that bloom around my feet,
And bless me in my lone retreat;
That gem the brooklet's silver gloss;
Ye lilies white and pure as snow,
Ye roses bright with crimson glow,
Ye violets wet with tears of dew,
O, who loves me as I love you?

Entrancing earth in queenly pride
Serene and lovely as a bride,
Thou hast rare stores of hidden worth,
Pearls for the questioning soul of truth;
Thou offer'st hope to quell gay fears,
Thou hast a breath to dry my tears,
And wake affection fond and true,
But who loves me as I love you?

Dark eyes that light a moonless eve,
And diamond rays around me weave,
Proud lips that wear a kingly smile,
And might a monarch's soul beguile,
Thou form of nature's nobleness,
Who could behold and deem thee less,
Less than a seraph kind and true,
O, who loves me as I love you?

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

BLUCHER THE FAITHFUL.

BY WILLIAM D. OLIVER.

"LET the dog alone, Edward," said a very pretty young lady, in the care, to a little fellow of about four years old. The dog was mine—a pet, too, for he had saved my life twice—and it was quite irritating to hear the tone in which my good Blucher was spoken of. He had gone up to the little boy, laid his head affectionately in his lap, and his large paw was on the cushioned seat. The boy was evidently delighted, and not a particle of fear was visible in his countenance. I looked at the lady again. She looked scarce old enough to be the child's mother, and yet it was not altogether unlikely. The expression of her face was pleasant enough in its repose; but when she looked at my poor Blucher, there was a frown, and a vinegar aspect that repelled me.

I made myself acquainted with the boy, enticed him over to my own seat, and let him play with the dog as much as I dared; for I could see that my neighbor in the opposite seat was annoyed. I made up my mind, however, that it was only annoyance, not fright. She was evidently fearful only that the boy's beautiful garments would get soiled by contact with Blucher's paws. I took out my handkerchief and gently wiped them, although they were perfectly clean before; and then I let Blucher get up to the seat, and placed the boy upon him. How joyful the child looked!—little Eddy, for he had told me his name; and how he took off his cap and laid down his little curly head, radiant with golden ringlets, on Blucher's neck. Then I told him, in a voice loud enough, too, for the young lady to hear, of the dog's wonderful exploits in twice saving me. He looked up with a pretty, wondering look in his large eyes, and asked me a great many questions.

The lady pretended not to hear it, but I knew well enough that she was listening; but she still wore the same hard look, and her eyes, whenever she deigned to turn them towards my seat, were invariably fastened on the boy's snowy trousers and stockings, where Blucher's paw was lying. Once the dog got up and went over to her seat, but she gathered up her dainty garments and looked daggers at the unoffending and affectionate brute, that only wanted to caress and be caressed.

We arrived at our journey's end at night. The poor child was asleep in my arms, and as I had really taken a strange liking to him, I kissed his soft, rosy cheek, and put him very tenderly into the coach with the lady. I did not dare offer her my hand, for she still looked askance at Blucher, who followed me to the coach door, and showed by various waggings and shakings, that he expected me to follow them to the inside, and further, that he was going inside also, as had been his usual custom. I turned away, and after a brief look, which I gave back to the sleeping boy, I lost sight of the group, as I then thought, forever.

The next morning was a glorious one—a fit day to embark for California—and I was on my way back to that region of gold; that paradise of sunny skies and serene airs—except when the rainy season sets in; that land where the fastest men, the most beautiful women, and the largest sunflowers are found; where waste and extravagance jostle side by side with poverty and distress; where the poor hod-carrier may amass a fortune in a month, and where lawyers, doctors, and perhaps ministers, may frequently be seen trundling wheelbarrows.

I had got tired of New England—it was too prosy for me, now that I had had a taste of Californian frankness and freedom; and having no one to leave behind, nor, in fact, any one to take with me, except Blucher, I was bound on this very morning to take passage in the fine clipper ship Golden Arrow, and try to reach once more the shore which possessed greater attractions for me than any other on earth.

Detained by a friend, I had gone on board quite late; and after the other passengers were gone to their state rooms, except two or three young men, now going out for the first time, and eager for information and advice. We went down to dinner and to tea, but the passengers were reported generally seasick, and those of us who were not, returned to the decks. This passed a week, and the voyage already began to be monotonous and tiresome to me. Blucher was always interesting to me, and I spent part of my time in teaching him new tricks and new feats of agility. But after all, he loved best to lie on the deck, beneath the awning, and sleep away the time; and making a pillow of his capacious side, I would stretch myself beside him with a book, until I shared his slumbers.

I had brought with me Shakspeare, Milton, Byron, Wordsworth, Rogers and Campbell; nor had I forgotten Tennyson and Bailey. So I was well stocked in poetry; but besides these, I had few other books. One of my companions had the entire set of Walter Scott's life and writings, and I read them over with a zest that I had not experienced since their treasures were unfolded to my boyish eyes.

There was something lacking still. One cannot read forever, nor gaze always at the sea, nor play chess interminably; and at sea, barring the delights of the table—which, by the way, are not always very much like delights either—there is nothing else to interest you in a tame, fair weather voyage, unless you can pick up some agreeable fellow-passenger; strike up some sort of romantic friendship, and make yourself believe that you were made expressly for each other. This was the case after awhile with me. But I waited for it somewhat too long; for it was nearly three weeks after we sailed before a single lady had been seen at table.

How the poor souls existed in those close state rooms is more than I can tell; they must have been horribly dull. I passed along one day, looking wistfully at the enamelled and silver-handled doors, which I knew were barring from my sight some interesting specimens of the sex, when Blucher leaped furiously at one of the doors, and set up a great cry when he found that he could not set in. I whistled him away, but he stretched himself down before the door, and laid there during the entire afternoon.

He did this every day for a week; and curious to know why, I took up my station at some distance, and yet where I could watch that particular door, reading, or pretending to read, all the time. At the end of a week the door opened a few inches one afternoon, when the ship had been so quiet for two hours that the silence was oppressive to me. The passengers were apparently all asleep, only that some one must have opened this door; or perhaps the wind had pressed it open. But it was worth while to see Blucher. He had been lying at the door of that state room three mortal hours, never raising his head for a moment. But now he sprang up, pushed his nose into the small aperture, cried, wagged his tail, and stood up on his hind feet, turning round to me, as if to ask my assistance. I did not dare go to him, for I suspected that a lady was the occupant of the room at that very time.

Presently a little pale hand—a child's hand—was thrust out, and Blucher covered it with kisses. Then came a face; and pale and thin as it had grown, I knew at once that it was my little companion in the railway car! The child knew me, too, and ran towards me, followed by Blucher. The door was left ajar, and (I must be forgiven) I cast my eyes that way, and saw a lady asleep! Not all Blucher's demonstrations had waked her from that heavy sleep which follows long sea-sickness, and that she and the child had both suffered intensely, I could not doubt; for it was really the same lady, and her face was very quiet in its repose—not a drop of vinegar in its whole length and breadth. I shut the door softly, rightly thinking she would come out if she missed her child.

Half an hour elapsed, and the child and Blucher had had a glorious play together, when the door opened and she appeared—pale, indeed, but still very pretty. She shrank a little from the dog, but as little Eddy was sitting on my knee, she approached to take him. She recognized me, I knew, but she did not choose to appear like doing so; and I was rather indignant at her on Blucher's account. We had twenty just such scenes as this, and I resolved not to "give in" until she did.

One Sunday afternoon, when the sun was burning hot, I had made my usual pillow of Blucher, and was lying under the awning, reading "In Memoriam," for the tenth time since I came to sea. Eddy's little curly head was resting not far from me, for he now went up and down as he listed, and was sound asleep, with Blucher's paw resting on his little linen blouse, as if to pin him to the deck. A shadow passed over my book, and looking up, I saw Miss Hetherstone. I had learned her name from Eddy; he called her Aunt Catherine. She looked as if suffering from weariness and ennui; and as if the companionship of any living thing would be a godsend to her. But I was too proud to do more than bow, and point to Eddy, signifying that he was safe. Blucher roused up, and again that unpleasant look passed over her features. She came over to my side then, and after waiting a few minutes, she said, quite courteously:

"I suppose we may introduce ourselves, as Eddy has brought us acquainted. I am Miss Hetherstone."

"And I am Mr. Oliver," I said, "and happy to continue an acquaintance commenced some weeks ago."

"You will wonder why I am here alone, Mr. Oliver," she proceeded to say; "and I have several times been awfully tempted to choose you for my knight-errant on this voyage; but the fact is, I do not like your dog."

"Sorry, Miss Hetherstone. I am under great obligations to Blucher; he has twice saved my life, and I do not think I can estimate his services too high. Eddy, you see, is fond of him, too."

"I know it; and it makes me tremble every time he comes near him. I do not have any peace night nor day about him. Eddy's mother is dead; she was my sister, and I am carrying the child out to his father at Shasta, as he could not come for him. But I dread lest something happen to the little fellow before I get him out there. If he should be bitten by that dog, I should not dare to meet his father, for he is all that he has left now." And she turned away to hide a tear to the memory of her sister. I, of course, said everything the occasion demanded; and, notwithstanding her unaccountable dislike to my poor Blucher, I really began to be interested in the pretty Miss Hetherstone.

After this we had many interviews upon deck, and frequently walked together in the moonlight evenings, admiring the effects of the moonlight on the waves. Those long, foamy tracks which our ship was always leaving behind her—how beautiful they looked at evening! I shall never forget the foam-crested billows, with the silver light resting upon their edges! And sunrise and sunset—how glorious they are at sea! I used to call to Miss Hetherstone constantly to come and behold these scenes, for she enjoyed them with the true zest of a finely cultivated mind and an ardent imagination. She was so different from what I thought her! I found her so truly womanly, and yet so free from any feminine affectations.

"She will go out to this brave brother-in-law," I found myself sometimes thinking, "and will marry him out of pity for his forlorn situation, and become the mother of this little Eddy." It sometimes troubled me a little—this thought. Not that I had any interest, of course, in having it otherwise; but then I did not like the brother-in-law aspect of the case. I did not know why then.

We were reading one day on deck, and Eddy was unusually frolicsome and unmanageable. He climbed to Catherine's seat, took the comb from her hair, letting the long, glittering spirals fall down like a shower over her face, neck and shoulders. She resisted him long, but at length succeeded in making her look almost like a crazy woman. He was in full glee, and she was terribly embarrassed at the confusion of her dress and hair. She seized him in her arms, and playfully held him over the side of the ship. "What if I let you fall, naughty child!" she said. At that moment the breeze blew her long hair directly across her eyes. Eddy struggled and screamed, and before I could get to her side, the boy was in the water!

Miss Hetherstone fainted—a merciful fate, I thought, that she was spared the feelings which I endured, and which of course must be more agonizing to her. I did not touch her, but my eye fell on Blucher asleep. I called him, and pointed to little Eddy's blouse as it floated on the wave. It was but the work of a moment for the two men who witnessed the fall to get out the boat; but Blucher was over the side before them, and the oarsmen had scarcely struck out, before he rose to the surface with the child's frock securely in his mouth! To the boat, rather than the ship, his instinct seemed to lead him; and before Miss Hetherstone's swoon was over, the two laid beside her on the deck—Eddy and the noble dog; the former pale and motionless, the latter panting with exertion. The child was easily recovered, and the sailors made a warm, dry bed for Blucher.

Catherine opened her eyes languidly, while the captain poured some wine into her lips, and I was wrapping the child in a warm blanket, and chafing his little drenched limbs. She could not speak yet, but her gaze took in the meaning of all before her—Blucher's dripping coat, the child's purple lips, the absence of all wet upon any of the humans round her—she knew all. We laid her on her own bed, and Eddy beside her; and I watched by them through the night.

The next morning Blucher was whining at the door. I did not dare to let him in at first, but he motioned with her weak hand that I should do so. It was beautiful to see her white arms thrown around the great shaggy creature, and the kisses and caresses she bestowed upon him. Blucher stood it like a hero. He did not return her caresses, but seemed to be proudly enduring them; and then he turned to the child with such a bound!

"Don't, Blucher!" I said. "If Eddy should be bitten by you, we should never dare to meet his father!"

Catherine—what do you think she did? She laid one hand on the dog, and putting the other arm around my neck, as I sat by the bedside, she whispered, "Forgive me!"

You can see the end of all this, reader. You know just as well as I can tell you, that Catherine is now my wife; that when we arrived, the brother-in-law had just been married again; and that we all make one family; that Blucher is petted and fed by his kind mistress, until his master is almost jealous of him; and that no vinegar aspect ever comes over the face that is now sweetest to me of all the faces in the world beside.

CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY.

Encouraged by the unprecedented success which this popular monthly has met with, and the rapidly with which it has increased its circulation, the proprietor has resolved to make it still more worthy of the patronage of the public. That this admirable work is a SIKAKA of our times, is admitted by every one containing, as it does, not only hundreds of pages of reading matter in each number, and forming two volumes a year of six hundred pages each, or twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for ONE DOLLAR!

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY is printed with new type, upon fine white paper, and its matter is carefully compiled and arranged by the hands of the editor and proprietor, who has been known to the public as connected with the Boston press for nearly fifteen years. Its pages contain

NEWS, TALES, POEMS, STORIES OF THE SEA, SKETCHES, MISCELLANY, ADVENTURES, BIOGRAPHIES, WIT AND HUMOR, from the best and most popular writers in the country. It is also supplied with a record of the notable events of the times, of peace and war, of discoveries and improvements occurring in either hemisphere, forming an agreeable companion for a leisure moment or hour, anywhere, at home or abroad, each number being complete in itself.

No sectarian subjects are admitted into its pages, there are enough controversial publications, each devoted to its peculiar sect or clique. This work is intended for THE MILLION, north or south, east or west, and is filled to the brim each month with choice, popular and gay miscellany, just such as any father, brother or friend would place in the hands of a family circle. It is in all its departments, fresh and original, and, what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive a copy gratis.

Sample copies sent when desired.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor.
Corner of Tremont and Bromfield Sts., Boston, Mass.

STATE NORMAL SCHOOL AT TRENTON, N. J.

The accompanying engraving exhibits a correct representation of the capacious and elegant building occupied by the Normal School of the State of New Jersey. The style of the building reflects great credit on the architect, Mr. Chauncey Graham. The building is regarded as being one of the most convenient and commodious of any similar State institution in this country. It stands on a lot 200 feet square, and, including land, furniture and fixtures, has cost about twenty-five thousand dollars. It is of brick, and covered with "rough casting." The main building is 50 by 78 feet, with a front wing or projection 30 by 40 feet, and a rear wing or projection 18 by 30 feet. The interior is well-arranged and appropriately furnished throughout. The first story contains a hall for visitors, a hall for male pupils, one for female pupils, separate cloak and wash rooms for the Normal School and the Model School, recitation rooms for the former and the Model School rooms. On the second story are a reception room, library, wash room, halls for each sex, assembly rooms with seats for 240 pupils, recitation rooms, etc. In the third story are recitation rooms, janitor's room, the lecture room, etc. The New Jersey State Normal School was established by an act of the legislature, passed and approved February 9, 1855. Its sole object is that of training teachers for the common schools in the science of education and the art of instructing youth. The annual appropriation for its support is ten thousand dollars. Each county in the State is entitled to send three times as many pupils to the school as it has representatives in both houses of the legislature. These pupils are entitled to free tuition, and are supplied with all necessary books, stationery, and the use of apparatus without charge. They are, in return, required to teach in the common schools of the State for at least two years, and sign a declaration and agreement to that effect. The institution opened on the 1st of October, 1855, with 15 pupils, and has steadily increased to the present time, now numbering 66, besides a Model School of 125 pupils. The pupils of the Normal School are required to pass a most thorough and critical review of all the branches usually taught in the common schools, together with a mastery of such advanced studies as are collateral to those branches. They are otherwise trained to the principles and method of teaching them, and also of organizing and governing schools; and they are further required to spend a portion of their time in the Model School, where the theories inculcated in the Normal School are by them put to the test of practice and experiment. The Normal School is under the general direction of a board of trustees appointed for two years by the governor and senate, one half retiring each year. The board of instruction is at present composed of a principal and nine professors and teachers, including the permanent assistants of the Model School. The first annual report of William F. Phelps, Esq., the principal, presented and read to the legislature, January 23, 1856, is a document written with remarkable ability, clear and systematic in its arrangements, and containing, in addition to a detailed history of the school from its inception, a lucid sketch of the Normal School system. We need no better evidence than this report, which shows a thorough acquaintance with the history and philosophy of education, to be convinced that Mr. Phelps is admirably fitted for the important position he occupies. We subjoin a few facts gleaned from this document, and only regret that our space will not permit us to make ampler use of the material. It appears that, from the outset, the citizens of New Jersey exhibited the greatest interest in the establishment of the school; and that different localities were so liberal in their offers of land and money, that the trustees were embarrassed by the generous rivalry of towns competing for the honor of the location of the school. The liberal offers of land and money by the citizens of Trenton, the circumstance of the school being a State institution and the offspring of legislative bounty, together with a consideration of the central situation of the capital, and its accessibility from all parts of the State, finally induced the trustees to decide upon Trenton as the most suitable locality for the institution. The selection of a principal was the next step, and Mr. William F. Phelps was unanimously elected. Of this gentleman the trustees remark in their own report to the legislature, that he "had been for some years connected with the State Normal School of New York, and brought with him the strongest recommendations from those who were thought most competent judges of his qualifications. It is but an act of justice to say, that thus far he has fulfilled the very highest expectations that were formed of him." The trustees also secured the services of Professor Arnold Gnyot, so well known both in Europe and in this country, and so highly appreciated in our own State. Among the teachers appointed by the board of trustees to assist the principal, we find the following: Sumner C. Webb, M. D., late of the Normal School at Albany, professor of physiology and elocution; Miss Irene B. Colby, of New Brunswick, teacher of geography; Ferdinand I. Isley, professor of vocal music; and John K. Wolfe, instructor of drawing. Mr. Samuel A. Farrand, of Boonton, has also been appointed a teacher. The candidates for admission into this school are required to pass a satisfactory examination in the following branches of a common school education: orthography, reading, penmanship, arithmetic, geography and English grammar. The course of study proposed by the principal is arranged into departments as follows: I. ENGLISH LANGUAGE. The elementary sounds—spelling—definition and analysis of words—reading and elocution—English grammar, including the analysis of the sentence and sentential structure—composition, including rhetoric and criticism—the art of debate, including parliamentary law. II. GRAPHICS. Penmanship and book-keeping—object, map and mechanical drawing. III. MATHEMATICS. Oral and mental arithmetic—written arithmetic—practical mathematics—elements of algebra—elements of geometry—mathematical geography and the use of globes, including the elements of astronomy. IV. NATURAL SCIENCE. Descriptive and physical geography—human and comparative physiology—elements of natural philosophy—elements of chemistry. V. ETHICS, ETC. Moral philosophy—natural theology—constitution of the United States and of New Jersey—history of the United States. VI. THEORY AND PRACTICE OF TEACHING. Intellectual philosophy—the study of school systems—lectures on education and the details of teaching, and practice in the model school. Vocal music throughout the course. In this arrangement, Mr. Phelps says that he "has endeavored to avoid the objection, on the one hand, of making it (the course of study) too limited for the proper discipline and expansion of the teacher's mind, and, on the other, of its being too extended for the time allowed him for its acquisition, keeping constantly in view the wise maxim that 'a good schoolmaster must know much more than he is called upon to teach.'" We cannot but congratulate the citizens of New Jersey on the establishment of their school under such happy auspices as those which have attended its inauguration. Let us hope that through the influence of this school it shall annually send forth trained and accomplished teachers to perform their honorable tasks in the common schools in the best manner.

DANIEL J. COBURN, CHIEF OF POLICE, BOSTON.

DANIEL J. COBURN,

CHIEF OF POLICE, CITY OF BOSTON.

The office of chief of police in a large city, and particularly a large seaboard city, is not only far from being a sinecure, but demands in the incumbent a union of many qualifications. It is not sufficient that he be versed in the municipal law and regulations, faithful, energetic and not afraid of work; he must have tact, firmness and discretion, must be prompt in thought and action, and possess a thorough knowledge of human nature; for such an officer has all sorts of characters to deal with. He must be a man on whom the citizens can rely in any crisis, the right-hand man of the chief municipal officer in his executive functions. The office here in Boston has been filled by very worthy and competent men, and certainly the manner in which the police system of Boston has been managed will compare favorably with that of any city in the Union. The gentleman whose name heads this article, and whose portrait, drawn expressly for us by Barry from a photograph by Masury, Silsbee & Case, illustrates this page, though he has held office but a short period, has already secured the confidence of the government of the city, and will, unquestionably, make a first rate chief. Daniel J. Coburn was born in Grafton county, New Hampshire, and is about fifty years of age. He has been a citizen of this State for many years, residing, at first, in Middlesex county, where he was appointed deputy-sheriff in 1831. He held this office until 1840, when he was commissioned to the same office in Suffolk county, and continued to hold it until April, 1855, through all political changes, a proof of the estimation in which his official and personal worth was held by the appointing powers. Mr. Coburn was appointed chief of police in April of this year, at which time he was serving as a member of the city council. It will thus be seen that his previous career well fitted him for his present position, which he never could have attained without having given proof of the possession of those qualities requisite to fill the office with credit and success. His service as deputy sheriff during a period of nearly twenty-four years, necessarily made him very familiar with the practical operation of the law and with various legal forms. As chief of police he will have occasion for the exercise of all his faculties. Boston is no longer a village, although the citizens of some of our bulkier municipalities are rather fond of regarding it in that light. When it was a village, a few constables could perform all the police duties required. Everybody knew everybody else's business, and a suspicious character was "spotted" as soon as he entered the precincts. Now, however, with our growth and expansion, we must provide against the inevitable evils of metropolitan life, and therefore require a well managed police force to foil evil doers.

NEW JERSEY STATE NORMAL SCHOOL, AT TRENTON.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL.

THE CHEAPEST WEEKLY PAPER IN THE WORLD.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
FRANCIS A. DUBVAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

ORTHOGRAPHY.

We are sometimes sadly puzzled by the spelling of letters we receive, and have come to the conclusion that "readin', ritin' and spellin'" does not "come by nature." Illiterate people who spell phonographically make themselves understood tolerably well. The servant girl spoken of by Franklin, had no hesitation in deciding that "yf" stood for wife, and a postmaster who sees a letter directed to "Y's, Esq.," knows instantly that it must be meant for a Mr. Wiso. The phonographic people are therefore right in their principles, though we do not think that phonography can be ever substituted for the old method of spelling, since, as the great bulk of English literature cannot be reprinted, it would be necessary for every pupil to learn both systems—the old and the new—we fear that would make "confusion worse confounded."

Some orthographical blunders are exceedingly amusing. We happen to remember one at this moment. There was a certain self-sufficient ignoramus in one of our sea-port towns, whom his fellow-citizens were in the habit of duly elevating by their votes to the important office of hog-reeve and pound-master, either from a realizing sense of his peculiar fitness for the tasks assigned him, or the laudable desire to elicit fun from his proceedings when wrapped in the garb of a little "brief authority." On one occasion our worthy pound-master found two four-footed animals astray and forthwith, with an immense display of baste and authority, incarcerated them in the enclosure provided for that purpose. From the two sheep in the pound he flew to his pen to indite an official bulletin, and after much severe labor, after using up several sheets of paper, and whittling up several goose-quills with his jack-knife, he achieved the following "Publik Nottis," viz.: "2 ships in the Pond." The whole town was in a roar thereat, but the worthy official might have consoled himself with the reflection that many literary men—among them Sheridan—have been bad spellers.

QUITE ACCEPTABLE.—The United States Senate has passed a bill giving Mr. Marsh, our late minister at Constantinople, the sum of $20,000, extra compensation. Mr. Marsh, by the way, is one of the most accomplished of living linguists, speaking and writing at least fifteen tongues.

A MANTINET.—A certain severe drill sergeant invented a manual to be used by his men at feeding time. Some of the orders were: "Draw coffee!" "Present milk!" "Carry sugar!" "Recover cup!"

A GOOD ONE.—An auctioneer's clerk being directed by his employer to insert in an advertisement a "copy of a fresco by Raffaele," wrote "A Fresh Cow by Raffie!"

SPLINTERS.

.... James Buchanan, the democratic nominee for the presidency, was born in 1791, and is a native of Pennsylvania.

.... A dandelion plant in West Bridgewater weighed 27 ounces. It had 240 leaves, and 107 buds and blossoms.

.... "Immense breadth of light and shade!" said Beaumont of a picture. "An inch and a half," said Sydney Smith.

.... Mr. Loring Cushman, an esteemed citizen of Hingham, 77 years old, lately died in his pew at church.

.... New Orleans is getting dull; all the places of amusement have been closed, and the weather is "rather" warm.

.... There are often from three to five hundred sail of vessels loading guano at the same time at the Chincha islands.

.... The population of Texas has quadrupled in number during the last ten years—a remarkable increase.

.... Some Franciscan monks are about to erect a monastery in Allegany, Cattaraugus county, New York.

.... An English laborer, who was in the habit of eating everything he met, died lately from eating lime.

.... Only last month there was a snowbank near Niagara Falls forty feet deep. Balmv Juno!

.... The total number of commitments to the four prisons in New York city last year was 36,624.

.... The late John M. Niles, of Connecticut, left $20,000 in his will for the use of the poor of Hartford.

.... The Russian government have authorized the re-opening of the English Protestant church at Warsaw.

.... Lieut. Bonaparte, formerly of the United States army, has become a Chasseur d'Afrique, and has been ordered to Kabylie.

.... Two men and a woman lately died in France from drinking coffee, into which lucifer matches had been dropped.

.... A railroad is to be built along the north shore of Lake Erie from Windsor to the Suspension Bridge.

.... Dion Bourciault and Agnes Robertson have taken Wallack's Theatre for the summer season.

.... The indications are that the crops in Texas this year will be tremendously large.

.... There are twelve cities in Massachusetts which contain more than 10,000 people each.

.... The government troops are after the Indians in Florida with sharp sticks.

.... Five persons were lately arrested at St. Joseph, Missouri, for the murder and burning of a family of seven persons.

.... A new park has recently been laid out at the South End, in Boston, near Northampton Street.

KEEPING COOL.

We are drawing near to that extreme of heat to which, in the course of the year, the human pendulum oscillates from the opposite extreme of cold in this delicious climate; the dog days will soon be upon us, and consequently we cannot too earnestly enjoin upon our readers the necessity of keeping cool. "Keep cool, with the thermometer at 90!" Certainly, sir, or madam, you must do so, on your life.

Moderation in diet, moderation in exercise, moderation in all things, is now essential to existence. This fiery old Sol comes to us like a teacher of moral philosophy, and enforces his instructions by striking examples. It is wonderful to see what an effect the weather has on even some pretty rebellious subjects. There is old Gripec—one of the most peppery, irascible old fellows that ever walked the street—his blood is a compound of Cayenne and liquid lava, ready to fly off at a spark like a barrel of gunpowder. Observe him now as he slowly steals along in the cool shadows of that block of buildings, attired in white like a vestal virgin, with a broad Panama upon his head, and the lightest and neatest of pumps upon his feet. A careless boy treads upon that tender foot. He avoids the urchin, but moves on with undiminished serenity. The spectacle is sublime. In September that man would have indulged in an eruption of invective. Now he is sun-tanned. He knows perfectly well, that if he gave way to passion, he would either explode like a powder-mill, or melt in his own internal fire and disappear from the earth.

Keep cool—physically, morally. If your home be in the great city, embrace the opportunities that surround you of bath—fresh and salt, hot and cold; but remember that a very hot salt water shower bath is the most delightful refrigerator invented. Of a hot day, it will keep you cool for many hours thereafter. Then lie you to the Common, sit under those drooping elms, watch the play of the cloud-shadows over the broad expanse of emerald grass, and fancy that pond a vast sheet of water. Yet small as it is, it is as grateful at this season as a well in the sands to the nomadic Arab—a diamond in the desert. But it becomes a source of enchantment when the fountain is permitted to show itself, and mounts into the air gradually foot by foot, till it glitters in the blue air like a tower built of diamonds. Its liberation and ascent always remind us of that of the geni in prison in the casket in the Arabian Nights.

Keep cool! It's too hot now for horseback rides or infuriated polkas, unless you are by the seaside; and that word is the key to a treasury of cool delights. Who will deny that the sea is a great institution? Rather turbulent at times, perhaps—rather inimical to marine insurance companies—very capricious in its swallow, like the dragon of Wantley—panther-like and treacherous, and so on, but after all, essential to navigation, and a friend to humanity in the summer.

If you would keep perfectly cool—and this is the burden of our refrain—go down to the sea. Ah, isn't it delicious to sit in the shadow of a white sail, while the yacht rises and plunges under you like a mettled charger, and the cool salt air lifts your locks, and you ride triumphant, like a Viking sweeping in his ocean war-path? Or, isn't a stroll along the beach by moonlight with one who appreciates the poetical, the romantic, the tender, and the sublime, an event to be remembered to the end of time? Perhaps a "life on the ocean wave" is too toilsome, but a reasonable time passed on the edge of it is quite charming. Let us seek Nahant, or Newport, or Nantasket, or Rockaway, or Cape May, and then we are sure of "keeping cool."

BEAUTIFUL WORK OF ART.

We have examined, at Frederick Parker's, Cornhill, the proofs of a series of lithographic drawings by William Heine, the accomplished artist of the Japan exploring expedition. There are several of these views, embracing the prominent points of interest in the empire of Japan, and accompanied by explanatory letter-press. Apart from the interest of the scenes depicted, they have all a high artistic value. They are from the press of Sarony & Co., New York, and will stand the test of comparison with the productions of the most noted European presses—even those of Dresden and Paris. The pictures are of large size, and will form a beautiful portfolio. They are to be published in two styles—one plain and the other colored, at very moderate prices considering the excellence of the work. Mr. Frederick Parker is the sole agent in this city, and he has already secured a large list of subscribers to the "Graphic Scenes of the Japan Expedition," including some of our most distinguished connoisseurs.

PHOTOGRAPHY.—We have seen some beautiful specimens of a new style of photographic pictures, invented and patented by Messrs. Southworth & Hawes, of this city. They have a delicacy and softness surpassing that of the finest mezzotint engravings or crayon drawings, and resemble, in some respects, monochromatic pictures in oil. The effect is remarkably fine.

NEW YORK MERCANTILE LIBRARY ASSOCIATION.—There are nearly 50,000 volumes in the library of this society, and over six thousand persons make use of them. The receipts of the Association for the past sixteen months were $17,000.

A GOOD REASON.—A paper which had been mailed to a fair subscriber, was lately returned to the publisher, with the endorsement: "Not taken out; she's run away and got married."

DIGNITY.—The Duke of St. Albans is grand falconer of England. The title sounds very grand, but it seems the duke is only a "hawk."

THE NAVY.

At the various navy yards along our coast, the greatest activity prevails. "The 'clink of hammers closing rivets up,'" the ringing of axes, the hiss of planes, and the tramp and bustle of hundreds of smart and busy mechanics, show that government has waked up from its Van Winkle sleep, and that the maxim, "In peace prepare for war," is once more recognized as a sound one. All our sloops of war which have been laid up have been rebuilt, refitted and equipped for instant service. The Romanko and Colorado are nearly ready for the wave, and the Powhatan is arming. Everywhere the same activity prevails, and at the arsenals they are wide awake. Mr. Elihu Hurst's plan of dismantling our fortresses and turning our line-of-battles into bread-ships is a very pretty idea theoretically, but a very unsafe one, except in the case of its universal adoption. Just now, when England and France have magnificent navies afloat, and are not supposed to be particularly friendly to us, we rather think it would be something very like the height of folly to throw away our arms. We are afraid that the time has hardly arrived for the lying down of the lion and the lamb in peaceful proximity. We are afraid the lion still regards the lamb with an eye to its mutton rather than its innocence. And we have yet seen no positive proof that the wolf, the bear and the hyena have abandoned their carnivorous and destructive propensities. With this state of things in the great menagerie of the world, it behooves the eagle to keep his beak and talons whetted, his shield burnished bright, and his thunderbolts greased and ready for launching. The eagle that could sit drowsily in his perch, when wild beasts and birds were menacing his eyrie, would be little better than a goose. We are no advocates for building and maintaining a tremendously large navy, any more than we are of having an unwieldy army force; but afloat and ashore we should have establishments so respectable as to serve as a nucleus for any force that sudden necessity might require. We are safe from aggression only when well prepared to repel and punish it. The idea of disarming hostility by disarming ourselves is worthy of the simplicity of an Arcadian rustic, but not of a wide-awake nation that sees the world as it is, and realizes that it is no better than it should be, though certainly progressing. It is well to put faith in the ultimate regeneration of humanity, but it is also well to "keep our powder dry." The government is carrying out this practical philosophy in fitting up and arming our national vessels.

ESSEX COUNTY CATTLE FAIR.—Ben: Perley Poore has been invited to deliver the address before the Essex County Agricultural Society, at its cattle show, to be held at Newburyport this fall.

CLEARED OUT.—All the prisoners at Fort Madison, Iowa, lately escaped. They were recaptured, after several shots had been fired into them.

REVOLTING.—The Greeks and Armenians lately had a fight at the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and Turkish troops were compelled to quell the riot.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. Mr. Streeter, Mr. Nathan W. Whittemore to Miss Mary F. Fernier, of Charleston; by Rev. Dr. Stow, Mr. Joseph M. Thompson to Miss Lucy K. P. Holbrook; by Rev. Mr. Miner, Mr. James M. Sprague to Miss Emily J. DeForest; by Rev. Dr. Huntington, assisted by Rev. Dr. Newell, Joaquin Barbosa Cordero, M. D., of Brazil, to Miss Mary Katherine Hoffman; at Charleston, by Rev. Mr. Everett, Mr. Augustus Archer Silva, of Salem, to Miss Isabella D. Archer; at Chelsea, by Rev. Mr. Langworthy, Mr. Samuel R. Heywood, of Worcester, to Miss Harriet B. Milliken; at Jamaica Plain, by Rev. Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Hollis K. Pope, of Hingham, to Miss Josephine L. Hyde; at Dedham, by Rev. Dr. Burgess, Mr. John T. Lawrence, of New York, to Miss Ertilla C. Benjamin; at Salem, by Rev. Dr. Briggs, Mr. Cyrus C. Crocker to Miss Hannah C. Ross, both of Haverhill; at Lowell, by Rev. Mr. Blanchard, Mr. Henry W. Tibbets to Miss Augusta M. Piper; at Newburyport, by Rev. Dr. Dana, Mr. Frederick B. Stickney to Miss Mary A. Farnham; at Taunton, by Rev. Mr. Brigham, Mr. Charles Foster to Miss Jane Porter.

DEATHS.

In this city, Fitzhenry Homer, Esq., 57; Mr. Josiah Willard, 77; Mrs. Emily Haven, 30; Mrs. Elizabeth L. Beal, 44; Mr. Francis Daunt, 27; Mrs. Mary Brown, 72; Mr. Abel Kendall, 56; Mrs. Sarah S. Moore, 72; Mrs. Angeline O. Plummer, 20; at Charleston, Mr. Charles Lincoln Shedd, 21; at Chelsea, Mrs. Harriet A. Dearborn, 30; at Jamaica Plain, Widow Eliza Hallett, 70; at Melrose, Mr. Elijah Estee, 60; at Sonarville, Mr. William F. Ryan, 42; at Newton Corner, Mrs. Lucy C. wife of Alfred B. Ely, Esq., 25; at Cambridge, Miss Stella Dorr, 35; at Dorchester, William Richardson, Esq., 42; at Hingham, Mr. Loring Cushing, 77; at Salem, Mrs. Hannah W. Bowdoin, 34; Miss Rebecca Bowditch, 55; Miss Mary Elizabeth Sheldon, 24; at Lowell, Miss Ann Grace Livermore, 42; at South Abington, Mr. James C. Harding, 26; at Worcester, Mrs. Mary Thomas, wife of Hon. Calvin Willard; Mrs. Mary Woodard, 67; at New Bedford, Mrs. Caroline A. Nash, 27; Mr. Marcus M. Holbrook, of Franklin, 20; at Athol, Eliphalet Thorpe, Esq., 78; at Roxford, Phileas Barnes, Esq., 75.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION.

A Record of the beautiful and useful in Art.

This paper presents in the most elegant and available form, a weekly literary mélange of notable events of the day. Its columns are devoted to original tales, sketches and poems, by the best AMERICAN AUTHORS, and the cream of the domestic and foreign news; the whole well spiced with wit and humor. Each paper is beautifully illustrated with numerous accurate engravings, by eminent artists, of notable objects, current events in all parts of the world, and of men and manners, altogether making a paper entirely original in this country. Its pages contain views of every populous city in the known world, of all buildings of note in the eastern or western hemisphere, of all the principal ships and steamers of the navy and merchant service, with fine and accurate portraits of every noted character in the world, both male and female.

TERMS.—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year $3 00
4 subscribers, " " 10 00
10 " " " " 20 00

Any person sending us sixteen subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the second copy gratis.

* * * One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, when taken together by one person, one year, for $4.

Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU,

CORNER OF TREMONT AND BRIMFIELD STS., BOSTON.

WHOLESALE AGENTS.—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Winch, 116 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; A. T. Bagley, 102 Vine Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Roy, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Woodward, corner of 4th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel L. Ingold, Louisville, Kentucky; Trubner & Co., 12 Paternoster Row, London, general agents for Europe.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE BELL-TOLLER.

BY WILLIS E. PARON.

[The arapongo, or bell-toller, is a Brazilian bird of rare beauty; its notes are at once singular and solemn, like the tolling of a church bell, and they fall on the ear of the traveller through the forest wilds of Brazil with an almost supernatural sound. The effect is heightened by the seclusion in which the bird utters its solitary notes, it frequenting the highest trees and rarely making itself visible to the eye of man.]

There came a wanderer to Brazilian skies,
From far off shores where pilgrim steps once trod, he came;
His cheeks were pale, and lustreless his eyes,
And weak his trembling frame.

In the deep solitude of woods profound,
He lay and dreamed of distant homes and absent loves;
Familiar faces, and the pleasant sound
That waits on them that rove.

He seemed to hear the merry bridal chime,
And then—he heard the sound New England's children hear,
That said some soul had passed the bounds of time,
Some soul, beloved and dear.

The years of life's sad pilgrimage are told,
As one by one in solemn strokes they fall;
While they who listen, think of shroud and fold,
Of mourners, and a pall.

Slowly the strokes fell on the wanderer's ear;
No other voice or sound the solemn stillness breaks,
His heart is silent with a sudden fear,
And no pulsation makes.

Now the sad number of his life is told;
And now—a pause!—the wanderer folds his care-worn eyes—
The last earth-whisper from his lips has rolled,
And cold in death he lies.

The rich, warm sunlight glances through the trees,
And on the dead in streams of crimson glory falls;
Yet still is borne upon the perfumed breeze
The arapongo's calls.

So like the solemn tolling of a bell,
Seemed to the dying wanderer the sounds he heard,
That none need wonder they became a knell,
These sad notes of a bird.

And it was well that life should thus depart,
Recalling as it went, the memories most dear;
Whose gentle influence should cheer the heart,
And dry the falling tear.

The hands of strangers laid him in the tomb,
The hands of strangers scattered there memorial flowers,
And still the arapongo breaks the forest gloom,
Tolling the passing hours.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE REFORMATION.

BY MELVILLE BELMORB.

CHARLOTTE STANLEY was the acknowledged belle of the village of C—. Numerous were her beaux and admirers; and envious of her charms was many a pretty girl, who found her attractions insufficient to rival the dazzling wealth of beauty which nature had so bountifully showered upon Charlotte. But, if there was envy among the women, the men were stark mad with love for her, and jealousy of each other. Strange to say, she received their homage without manifesting a decided preference for any one; on all the sighing swains who surrounded her, she smiled with equal sweetness, and dispensed her favors with wonderful impartiality.

To be sure, it was said by some that her eyes lingered the most lovingly on Dick Leslie's intelligent face; but others again asserted that she never appeared so deeply interested as when conversing with young Walter Gray. Whether or no she did not really own, in the mysterious recesses of her little heart, some secret preference, it was quite apparent to all who looked into the matter, that there was at least one of her lovers who far surpassed all his rivals in the ardor of his devotion and gallant attention.

Harry Hunter was a gay, wild young fellow—of good family, and possessed of many excellent qualities; but unfortunately he had the reputation of being dissipated and frolicsome. Although not the less agreeable to the fair girls of C— on that account, who all admired his dashing character and fascinating address, yet the cautious matrons of the village used ominously to shake their heads at mention of his name, and positively forbade their daughters having anything to do with him.

But Harry Hunter had a fine form, and a bright, handsome face lit up by a pair of sparkling black eyes; and from those eyes there glanced, when he chose, a sly, roguish twinkle, which stole into many a little maiden's palpitating heart, and made sad havoc there ere she was aware of it. Besides, he had a splendid turnout—a span of beautiful bays; and as he drove alone through the Main Street, many a longing eye was cast upon the vacant seat by his side. He, however, saw no one but Charlotte Stanley. When in her society, his eyes were ever bent upon her face; when away from her, his pensive and abstracted air betokened her presence in his mind.

Charlotte's parents were dead; and she lived with her uncle, a rich old bachelor, whose chief delight consisted in ministering to her pleasure, and indulging all her fancies. And yet she was not spoiled by so much kindness, for she was a sensible, good girl, and beautiful and flattered as she was, had not one grain of vanity or folly in her character. Her uncle George, who united to a warm heart and an easy disposition, a great deal of good sense and knowledge of the world, appreciated her charming qualities, and trusted his lovely niece as implicitly as if she had been an angel in reality as well as in appearance. In his house she reigned in sweet supremacy, and the old gentleman made it the business of his life to contribute to her happiness. He knew Harry, and rather liked the rogue, he said, better than any of Charlotte's numerous admirers. Were it not for his wild and unsteady habits, there was no one whom he would have sooner chosen for her husband. Charlotte, too, was not insensible to the influence of the young fellow's pleasing manners and sparkling conversation; and after a while it was easy to perceive that she had undoubtedly made a decided impression. Morning walks, evening drives, and moonlight strolls were of frequent recurrence; and jealousy and suspicion were rampant amongst the host of unfortunate suitors. Dick Leslie was reported to be daily growing insane, and Walter Gray was evidently pining away with grief.

One morning at the breakfast table, Charlotte, who had remained a long time silent, said, in a tone of voice in which modesty and fortitude struggled for the mastery:

"Uncle George—I'm engaged!"

Uncle George almost dropped the cup which he was raising to his mouth, and stared with surprise at the blushing girl who sat opposite to him.

"Why, no!" said he. "Lotty, you don't say so!"

"O, yes, uncle," said Charlotte. "I am engaged to be married to—you know!"

This was said half-doubtfully, half-inquiringly, and brought a good-humored smile to Uncle George's face.

"I know, do I? Indeed, miss, you are very much mistaken. How should I know anything about it?"

"O, well," she replied, whilst she hung down her head, and suffered the flowing curls to fall over her face, "I thought you might have—it's—it's Harry, you know, uncle!"

And somewhat relieved by the confession which she had made, she looked up smiling in his face. The old gentleman certainly enjoyed the charming confusion of his niece; for, instead of making any immediate observation upon the fact just disclosed to him, he remained several minutes gazing upon her with affectionate admiration and interest, silently and thoughtfully, as if linking the present with the future. Suddenly he said:

"So it's Harry, is it? And who's Harry, my dear?"

This question perfectly overwhelmed poor Charlotte with embarrassment, and suffused her face with a host of crimson blushes. She tried to smile, then looked very much as if she was going to cry; but boldly conquering the inclination, with downcast eyes, and trembling voice, she faltered out the name of her lover:

"Harry Hunter!"

"Humph!" ejaculated the uncle. "Hunter!—Harry Hunter! Ah, he's a great rogue!"

"O, no, uncle!" said Charlotte, eagerly. "Indeed he is not; he is so good, so noble, so agreeable. O, if you only knew him as I do!"

"Humph!" was again the ejaculation. "I presume I never shall. However, you know what is right, my girl; and if you approve, I shall not object. But they say, you know, my dear child, that he gambles and drinks."

"O, but he has promised me faithfully never, never to do such wicked things any more; and I am sure he never will. He says he will always do everything that I ask him to do; and that he loves me better than any one on earth; and that he never did love any one but me."

And Charlotte's tender eyes glistened with tears of love and gratitude at the recollection of her lover's protestation of devotion.

Uncle George arose from his seat, and embracing his niece, said, in a voice tremulous with emotion:

"God grant, my beloved child, that you may be happy!"

"Thank you, uncle," she replied, smiling through her tears. "I know I shall be happy with Harry."

Well, the important day that was to usher in so much joy and happiness arrived at last. For weeks before, everything had been in a state of preparation, and Uncle George was determined that the wedding should prove a brilliant affair. The guests were already streaming into the house, carriages were coming from every direction around, and in an hour the ceremony would take place. But where was the bridegroom? No one had seen him; and it was beginning to be a matter of wonder to all that he had not made his appearance. Anxiety was depicted on Uncle George's countenance. Charlotte was up stairs, with her bridesmaids, thinking of Harry—down stairs! But now the clergyman has come—it lacks but a minute of the appointed time; the bride descends with her attendants, and at the same instant the bridegroom enters, apparently much excited, and supported on either side by two of his friends. The company throng around the couple during the ceremony, and when it is over, the congratulations pour in upon them from every one present. But what ails the bride? Why has the color forsaken her cheeks?—and those tears—what have they to do with such a scene? All eyes are turned towards her in wonderment; and Uncle George, hastening to her side, whilst she broke forth with almost heart-broken sobs, half led, half supported her into an unoccupied room adjoining.

"My child," said he, seating her on a sofa, "what means this distress?—this untimely emotion?"

Charlotte replied not. Her gentle bosom heaved tumultuously with some terrible distress, and her whole frame seemed to vibrate convulsively to this first touch of grief. She lay there motionless and insensible. Harry Hunter, her husband, had followed them into the room; but Uncle George insisted upon being left alone with her, and prevailed upon him to retire. After a little while Charlotte began to give signs of returning consciousness, and her uncle caught the faintly murmured name of her husband. Slowly and painfully she recovered from the swoon into which she had fallen; and as her beautiful eyes opened wildly upon her uncle's anxious countenance, the remembrance of all that had happened seemed to rush at once across her mind, and she exclaimed:

"O, uncle, uncle! After all that he promised;—after all he told me, to think he should so soon break his word, and at such a time, too!"

The poor girl burst into a flood of tears at the bitter reflection, and covered her face with her hands.

Now Harry had dined that day with some of his jovial companions, and had partaken, as was his wont, somewhat too freely of the wine. Habits of indulgence were so deeply engrafted upon his nature, that he never for a moment thought of the promise which he had made to his betrothed, to abandon all excesses of the kind. Although he had not drunk enough to make him guilty of any marked improprieties in behaviour, or to excite the general attention of the guests at the wedding, yet the tender, loving gaze of the fair girl whose heart he had won, beclouded, as she gave him her hand, the tokens of inconstancy in his flushed face and bloodshot eyes. Scarce conscious of the passing ceremony, she with difficulty retained sufficient composure to play her part in it; and but a few moments before the happiest of the happy, all rosy and radiant, became a bride bowed down with sadness and bathed in tears.

Her uncle George easily divined the cause of her agitation and grief. As she lay before him on the sofa, the recollection of those hopeful dreams of happiness in which she had so fondly indulged, and from which she had just so sadly awakened, brought the tears into his eyes; and as he knelt by his niece's side, he endeavored to frame some excuses for Harry. But her pure and faithful heart had been hurt and wounded by him into whose keeping she had confided it. She could see in his conduct naught but neglect and disrespect for the promise which he had given her, and upon which she had built her fairest hopes of future happiness.

The wedding guests had departed. It had been announced that the bride was taken suddenly ill, and all had left the house, when Uncle George, leaving Charlotte in care of her maid, went to seek Harry Hunter. He found him walking hastily, and in great excitement, up and down the piazza, and at his approach, he rushed eagerly towards him, and almost shrieked:

"How is she, sir? O, God, what a wretch I am! How is my darling Charlotte?"

"Mr. Hunter," said Uncle George, calmly, "I believe, sir, that you are fond of my niece—your wife—"

"Heaven knows," Harry exclaimed, "she is everything in this world to me!"

"No, sir; you have shown this day that she is not everything to you. Drink, sir, and dissipation dispute with her the possession of your affections. You have insulted the woman whom you love, and who adores you, by appearing, at the solemn moment of your union with her, in a state of intoxication. She beheld in that moment the infidelity of the man who was to call her wife."

"No more!" cried Harry. "Spare me, sir; spare me!"

"Mr. Hunter," continued Uncle George, "if you really entertain that affection for Charlotte which you profess, you will henceforth and forever abandon these evil habits, and give up all debasing dissipation; for if you do not—mark me well!—you will break her heart. She will not cease to love you, but she will cease to be happy. Reflect, then, upon the course which you will pursue, and choose one of the two alternatives—your wife's happiness or misery."

Harry Hunter was deeply affected by these words, and would have gone and thrown himself at once at the feet of his young wife, to implore her forgiveness, and to promise all that she desired. But Uncle George restrained him.

"Hold!" he exclaimed; "not now. To-morrow you shall see her, and prove yourself worthy of her love, by truthfully renouncing those vile habits so shocking to her pure and truthful mind. At present she is quite unwell; besides," added he, hesitatingly, "you, Mr. Hunter, are hardly in a condition to make serious promises."

Harry Hunter bit his lip with mortification at this last remark, but owned secretly the justice of the insinuation. Uncle George bade him farewell for the night, and Harry returned to his home, silent and alone. What his feelings were may be more easily imagined than described. He was filled with remorse for the inconsiderate manner in which he had behaved towards one whom he really loved with all the ardor of his passionate soul; and upbraided the thoughtlessness and folly which had led him to wound the heart of her for whom he would gladly sacrifice his life. All night long did he dwell upon the tormenting idea of her distress, and he vowed to atone by a life of devotion and tenderness for the grief which he had caused her.

In the morning he took his way hastily towards her house—that paradise from which he had been banished the night before—and found Uncle George waiting to receive him. The good old gentleman had told Charlotte of Harry's sorrow and repentance, and of his resolution in regard to the future, and had found her trusting heart but too eager to forgive and believe.

"Come, sir," said he, "and behold an angel of love and mercy!"

And as Harry Hunter entered the parlor he was met on the threshold by a lovely being, who well might have been deemed a celestial visitant. She met him with extended arms, and happy smiles forcing themselves through tears of joy. Harry Hunter's lips quivered—his heart was full; and clasping her to his breast, he imprinted on her virgin brow a kiss—the first token of their union. Uncle George standing by, and deeply moved by the scene, lifted up his hands to bless them, saying:

"God grant, my children, that you may be happy."

"O, yes, uncle," exclaimed Charlotte, leaning her head on Harry's shoulder, and looking up trustfully in his face, "I am sure we shall always be happy together!"

And she was correct in the prophecy.

The great mistake in many of the plans for reorganizing society consists in supposing that systems can supply the want of sense.—Wingsworth.

EDITORIAL MEXANGE.

Barton has purchased the theatre in New York known as Laura Keane's Varieties, and will take possession on September 1st. He has only purchased the building, and has twenty-one years lease of the ground, with privilege of renewal at an annual rent of ten thousand dollars. — The population of Alexandria, Va., has fallen off from 13,000 to 12,000 during the past year. — General Jackson once said, "that over the doors of each house of Congress, in letters of gold, should be inscribed in words: 'The slanderer is worse than the murderer.'" — The New York Commissioners of Emigration report that during the month of May, the emigrants who arrived brought with them in cash the sum of $1,962,890, or nearly two millions of dollars. A large portion of this will be spent in the eastern cities in the purchase of land warrants, and the remainder carried out West. — An Indiana paper announcing the death of a gentleman "out West," says that "the deceased, though a bank director, is generally believed to have died a Christian, and was much respected while living." — To show the absurdity and folly of the course pursued by men of one idea generally, take the case of an extensive soap manufacturer in New York, who looks with complacency on the burning of the world—because it would reduce the price of ashes! — Count Luigi de Cennola, a Sardinian nobleman, has been sent to prison for stealing an Englishman's handkerchief. — An exchange tells us that "by an act of parliament, passed May 21, 1640, England was declared a republic, and that the act remains unrepented upon the statute book to this day." — Quite an excitement was lately felt on the New York 'change, growing out of the adulteration of lard by the use of farina dissolved in water. This has been practised for a long time in England, and other parts of Europe, but it is not long since some English and German exporters commenced the same business here. — In Philadelphia, in the last seven weeks, about three hundred and twenty lost children have been picked up in the streets and restored to their parents. — Twenty car loads of large and very fine-looking cattle, which came from the extreme western portion of Iowa, passed over the Central Railroad one day, lately, destined for the New York market. This, we are told, is the first time cattle have been brought to the east from the western side of the Mississippi River. — A horse at a brisk trot can hardly keep up with "those camels" at Indianapolis when walking. — The church of St. Xavier, in New York city, though one of the largest in that metropolis, is said to be crowded on all occasions. No one sits in it free, fifteen cents being paid for a seat by rich and poor, and the gain is large. The church is gaudy in the extreme, and profusely ornamented with gilt. — We see a favorable notice of the Nantux Hotel in the New Orleans Picayune. They know it "way down there." — Henry Davis, Jr., a respectable man of Bullock county, Georgia, was bitten on the leg by a large rattlesnake. He tied his suspenders around his wounded limb, killed the snake, and endeavored to walk home; but was compelled to lie down by the way, and in a few hours died of the horrible poison. — The St. John Observer states that another attempt to lay a chain cable for a telegraph across the Atlantic will soon be made. The length of the cable will be 2400 miles, and two steamers, each with 1200 miles of cable, will meet midway between Ireland and Newfoundland, unite the cables, and proceed in opposite directions to land. — Mr. Cavalcanti D'Albuquerque, formerly representative of Brazil to the United States, has returned to Washington in the capacity of envoy extraordinary of his emperor to our government. — The sale of the first cargo from Japan, brought in the schooner Gen. Pierce, under the new treaty, took place in New York recently. The sale of this unique and elegant cargo attracted a large crowd of purchasers, and the items brought very fair prices. — The United States military asylum at Harrodsburg, Ky., was burned down recently. This is one of the asylums the site of which was selected by Gen. Scott in 1852, under a special commission of the government.

MUSIO BY STEAM.—Mr. Stoddard, of Worcester, Mass., has invented a musical instrument which is played by steam. This ends the dissonant screeching of the steam whistle, and our ears are to run melodiously henceforth. It is said a joint stock company has been formed for the manufacture of the instruments, and is called the "Steam Music Company."

SHARPE'S RIFLES FOR ENGLAND.—The British government, it is said, lately made large contracts for Sharpe's rifles with some of our manufacturers, and the manufacture of them by American mechanics at Edgefield, England, is now being carried on under a tremendous press of steam, to supply the army as soon as possible.

FEARFUL LEAP.—A pickpocket who was locked up in the saloon on the cars of the New York Central Railroad, sprang out of the window of the saloon, head first, while the cars were running at the rate of thirty miles an hour, and ran for the woods. He was overtaken and found to be badly injured.

CAVALRY.—A body of 30,000 horse was lately reviewed by the Emperor of Russia, and it was noticed that "every horse in marching kept perfect time with his feet to the music." When they wheeled by companies, they described a circle with perfection.

LARGE ARRIVAL OF IMMIGRANTS.—At New York, one day, lately, six emigrant vessels arrived, bringing nearly two thousand passengers, and coming from almost as many different quarters of Europe.

MAMMOTH COD.—A monster cod, whose weight, undressed, amounted to 72 pounds and 11 ounces, was caught near Black Rock, Colasset, recently.

Wayside Gatherings.

A man in Philadelphia has been sentenced to six months imprisonment for stealing an umbrella worth three dollars.

The Methodists of Huntsville, Ala., have a lottery scheme under way for the benefit of the Andrew Female College.

Texas is said to have increased in population during the last ten years at the rate of about four hundred per cent., a thing unprecedented in the South.

From Hayti we learn that a formidable insurrection broke out in Hayti, near Aux Cayes, very recently, against the Emperor Sonloque.

It is stated that coffee can be successfully cultivated in the south part of California, and that it will eventually become an article of export from that State.

Jinkits is a man who takes matters humorously. When his best friend was blown into the air by a "bustin' biler," Jinkits cried after him, "There you go, my ex-asted friend!"

Mr. Chambers, the postmaster of Jersey City, has repudiated the foreign currency in vogue, and adopted the decimal currency of our own country in transacting the business of his office.

In Orange county, Ohio, recently, a savage dog rushed into a school house among the children, biting them right and left. One little girl was dragged all around the room by the brute, and six children were bitten.

A very audacious robbery was committed recently in Spain. A picture of the Assumption, generally ascribed to Murillo, or at least to one of his best pupils, was taken from the high altar of the church of Mendigueren, near Vittoria.

Three men, who were arrested in Taleahuanu, for setting fire to the ship George Washington, of New Bedford (before reported burned), received one hundred lashes each, and were sentenced to the chain gang for thirty years.

We learn from Bermuda that the cholera prevails extensively among the seamen at St. Thomas, and it is believed that the present summer is to be an unhealthy one among the West Indies, as other diseases also prevail.

The Halifax Chronicle says: "It is stated that the Cunard Company, yielding to solicitations from the people of Boston, will soon despatch their magnificent new steamship Persia from Liverpool to Halifax and that port."

The mammoth man-of-war steamship Himalaya arrived at Halifax recently with 1400 troops, having made the trip from Malta in the unparalleled time of sixteen days, and from the Old Rock in eleven and one-half days.

The Cleveland (Ohio) Herald states that great havoc has been committed by dogs, among flocks of sheep in various parts of the State. One farmer had ninety killed in one night, another lost an entire flock of thirty, and so on.

Apprehensions are felt for the health of Washington and Georgetown. One of the line of Georgetown sloops, just from the West Indies, lost a man a few days since with the black vomit. The vessel was put under fourteen days quarantine.

Mr. E. Merriam, the meteorologist, says that his record for the last fourteen years gives an aggregate of seven hundred and fifty deaths by lightning on the land, only one person being killed in a building furnished with lightning conductors.

Car-building in France is making rapid strides toward perfection. On the Orleans railway people can now go to bed—fairly undressed, and have as good a night's rest as they could under a four-poster. For this the traveller pays the price of two seats.

The cholera appears to be showing itself again in St. Petersburg. The daily mortality has risen of late from two or three to as many as twenty-one. The number of deaths that have already taken place in the present outbreak is three hundred and four.

Lately a piece of copper ore weighing twenty-four pounds, was found at the Belgian settlement, at Green Bay, Wisconsin, which was nearly pure. Several other pieces have been found in the same neighborhood, some of which were too heavy to be removed without mechanical power.

An arrangement has been entered into between Mr. Campbell, the American postmaster general, and the postmaster general of Great Britain, providing for the registration of valuable letters to and from each country. The fee will be five cents, making the rate on a single letter, when registered, twenty-nine cents.

The Penn Medical University of Philadelphia, has conferred the degree of doctor of medicine upon the following named ladies: Esther C. Williams of Ohio, Sarah H. Young of Massachusetts, Ellen J. Miller of Philadelphia, Mary M. Holloway of Indiana, and Elizabeth Calvin of Pennsylvania.

At the last regular meeting of the managers of the American Bible Society, in New York, ten new auxiliary societies were recognized, of which five were in Arkansas, and one in each of the States of Connecticut, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi and Michigan. Various grants of books were also made.

At the sale of the pictures of the late Mr. Rogers, in London, the "Strawberry Girl" of Sir Joshua Reynolds was sold under intense excitement for an auction room. Cheers greeted its appearance, and every large rise in the bidding was received by like ovations, till it was finally sold for two thousand one hundred guineas.

In taking the census at St. Etienne, France, lately, it was discovered that an old woman named Pichen, living in the Rue Nevron, is 106 years of age—she having been born in 1750, at Marceuil, in the same department. When she was born, Louis XV. was reigning, and since then she cannot remember, she says, how many governments have existed.

The oldest paintings in the world are the seven frescoes that were recently discovered in the Via Graciosa in Rome. They were immediately transported to the Vatican, where they were visited during the holy week by large numbers of persons. It is supposed that these paintings are due to a Greek pencil, for each of the persons represented has his name written beside him in the characters of that language.

The flute with which John Bunyan, the famous thinker, beguiled the tediousness of his captive hours, is now in the possession of Mr. Howells, tailor, Spring Gardens, Gainsborough, England, who purchased it about seventeen years ago, from the late Mr. Thirlwall, ironmonger and antiquary, of Domesday. In appearance it does not look unlike the leg of a stool—out of which it is said that Bunyan, while in prison, manufactured it.

The beautiful falls of Schaffhausen, on the Rhine, will soon be arched over by a stone bridge for the passing of the railway trains; and the cellars of the castle of Lanfaw have been evacuated for a tunnel, through which the trains will pass after having crossed the river. How this upsets one's theories of the "castled Rhine." A locomotive whizzing through the dungeons of a venerable castle, and leaping above the spray of a classic cataract.

Foreign Items.

The horses deemed unfit for service in the French Crimean camp are slaughtered, and the flesh of the healthy animals is eaten.

The Museum of the Louvre has just bought a manuscript volume written by Leonardo de Vinci, and illustrated with pen-and-ink drawings by the same author. The price paid for it was 35,000 zwanzigers.

The President of the Police has intimated to the editors of the Berlin journals, that it would be desirable not in any way to allude to Prince Frederick William's approaching betrothal to the princess royal.

Thousands of applications are said to have been made by Russians to the government for passports to visit foreign countries, especially France; while, on the other hand, numbers of foreigners—merchants, traders and artisans—are pouring into St. Petersburg.

A scientific commission has been appointed by the Russian minister of naval affairs for the purpose of laying down a correct map of the Caspian Sea, which, since the close of the war, and the neutralization of the Black Sea, has assumed a new importance.

A blast was fired at the new harbor of Holyhead, North Wales, recently, which required the labor of six men in its formation for ten months, and a charge of six tons and a half of powder to explode it. The quantity of stone loosened by the blast was calculated at 60,000 tons.

It is said at Warsaw that Count Walewski wishes to purchase the estates that formerly belonged to his family in Russian Poland. If he should buy them, says the London Times correspondent, of course the wicked world would say he had received them as a present from the Emperor Alexander for his services in the conference.

Sands of Gold.

.... The evils of the world will continue until philosophers become kings, or kings become philosophers.—Plato.

.... The mind has more room in it than most people imagine, if you would furnish the apartments.—Gray.

Guests should be neither loquacious nor silent; because, eloquence is for the forum, and silence for the bedchamber.—Vulso.

.... True virtue is like precious odor—sweeter the more incensed and crushed.—Bacon.

.... Complaint is the largest tribute heaven receives, and the sincerest part of our devotion.—Swift.

.... When a man has once forfeited the reputation of his integrity, he is set fast, and nothing will then serve his turn, neither truth nor falsehood.—Tillotson.

The harsh, hard word neither sees, nor tries to see, men's hearts; but where there is the opportunity of evil, supposes that evil exists.—G. P. R. James.

.... No men are so factious as those whose minds are somewhat perverted. Truth enjoys good air and clear light, but no playground.—Lander.

.... If good people would but make goodness agreeable, and smile instead of frowning in their virtue, how many would they win to the good cause!—Archbishop Usher.

.... Talkative men seldom read. This is among the few truths which appear the more strange the more we reflect upon them. For what is reading but silent conversation?—Lander.

.... There are persons who speak a moment before they have thought; there are others with whom you have to undergo in conversation all the labor of their minds—they talk correctly and wearisomely.—La Bruyere.

Joker's Budget.

What kind of a ship has two mates and no captain? A courtship.

Why is Bishop Berkeley's treatise against Materialism like Fry's great Oratorio? Ans.—'Cos it's a stab at matter.

Little boy—Stand on my head for a ha'penny, marm. Old lady—No, little boy; here is a penny for keeping right end upwards.

An editor out West says:—"If we have offended any man in the short but brilliant course of our career, let him send us a new hat, and say nothing about it."

The Boston Post, speaking of the proposed ocean telegraph, wonders whether the news transmitted through salt water will be fresh.

Punch says that a Yankee baby will crawl out of his cradle, take a survey of it, invent an improvement, and apply for a patent before he is six months old.

"Delaware will never yield an inch to New Jersey," said a patriotic Delawarean, when the pea case was being tried. "If she did," replied a Jersey Blue, "she would lose half her territory."

A carpenter took a holiday and went to Rockaway. When he returned home, his friends asked him what he saw. "Why," he replied, "I saw the sea, and now I see the saw."

"Humble as I am," said a bullying spouter, to a mass meeting of the untitled, "I still remember that I'm a fraction of this magnificent republic." "You are indeed," said a bystander, "and a vulgar one at that."

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

An elegant, moral and refined Miscellaneous Family Journal, devoted to polite literature, wit and humor, prose and poetry, and original tales, written expressly for the paper. In politics, and on all sectarian questions, it is strictly neutral; therefore making it emphatically a PAPER FOR THE MILLION, and a welcome visitor to the home circle.

It contains the foreign and domestic news of the day, so condensed as to present the greatest possible amount of intelligence. No advertisements are admitted to the paper, thus offering the entire sheet, which is of the mammoth size, for the instruction and amusement of the general reader. An unrivalled corps of contributors are regularly engaged, and every department is under the most finished and perfect system that experience can suggest, forming an original paper, the present circulation of which far exceeds that of any other weekly paper in the Union, with the exception of "BALLOU'S PICTORIAL."

Sample copies sent when desired.

TERMS—INvariably IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year, $2 00
4 subscribers, " " 7 00
10 " " " 15 00

Any person sending us sixteen subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the seventeenth copy gratis.

One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, $4 per annum. Published every Saturday, by

Corner of Tremont and Bromfield Sts., Boston, Mass.

Wholesale Agents—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Welch, 115 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; A. C. Bagley, 102 Vine Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Ross, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Woodward, corner 4th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Ringgold, Louisville, Ky.; Wallace, Austin & Buch, 25 Clark Street, Chicago, Illinois.

ALPHONSE DE LAMARTINE.

The veneration felt for the name of this illustrious French author in this country, and the circumstance of a recent appeal to our countrymen for subscriptions to his "Familiar Course of Literature," made through a noble friend of Lamartine, M. Desplace, who volunteered to visit the United States for this purpose, having revived (if it ever flagged) the interest attached to him, have induced us to present our readers on this page with two illustrations, the first representing Lamartine's house, in the Rue de la Ville L'Evêque, at Paris, and the other, the interior of his study. The former shows us the little garden and the rear of a very unpretending residence, the latter a neatly-furnished apartment, with a glimpse of the author buried in his deep arm-chair, and pursuing his never-ending task. The greyhound and the spaniel near him indicate that his tastes, in one respect, are not unlike those of Sir Walter Scott. It was only a short time ago that the friends of Lamartine in this country were startled with the announcement that this man, whose life has been spent in doing good and in enlightening mankind, was now, at the age of sixty-five, reduced to a state bordering on poverty. Although no living author has received more money from his productions than Lamartine, his liberality, his hospitality, and above all, his royal charity, coupled with certain unfortunate business speculations, have swept away from him nearly everything. If privations fell upon himself alone, he would bear them with the unrepining heroism of a Christian; but on his estate at Macon, which he purchased some years ago, there are several families of vine-dressers, whom the failure of the vine, for several successive seasons, has reduced to distress, for whose sake he is compelled to continue his labors and to make an appeal to the world for patronage. He has now started a monthly periodical, entitled "A Familiar Course of Universal Literature," designed to be completed in two years, and embracing a general review of the works of authors past and present. This periodical is published both in French and English, and we need not say that, like everything which falls from the pen of its author, it is certain to be pure, brilliant and instructive. Lamartine is among the few French authors who never, in the course of a long literary life, has written a single sentence that, "dying, he would wish to blot," on the score of immorality or impurity. He has too vivid an imagination, perhaps, to be a perfectly reliable writer of history, but, even when compelled to question his correctness, we are forced to admire, at the same time, the nobility of his sentiments and his genuine sympathy for the grand, the holy and the beautiful. To the respect of the religious world, his "Pilgrimage to the Holy Land," a work by which he is best known in this country, especially commends him, and we are certain that all who love literature and virtue will respond to his present appeal, and afford him, by subscribing to his new work, that aid which he solicits less for himself than for others, and for which he accords an ample equivalent. The Messrs. Appletons, of New York, and Ticknor & Fields, of this city, are the authorized agents of M. Desplace in this country, while such men as Bancroft, Washington Irving, Bryant, Felton, Prescott and Longfellow are lending their aid to accomplish the wishes of Lamartine. We are confident that this country will gloriously respond to the appeal. The friends of M. Lamartine in France wished to open a national subscription in his favor, but he refused it, saying, "I doubt not the good will of my country; I am certain that your appeal would be listened to, but every gift of this nature offered to a man dwarfs him in his own eyes, and I wish to die in the consciousness of my dignity. I would owe nothing, except to my own labor. It is that alone which will save me, if I am to be saved." Of his present position he says elsewhere: "Beneath deceitful appearances, my life is not calculated to inspire envy; I will say more, it is ended; I do not live, I survive. Of all those multiple men who lived in me to a certain degree, the man of sentiment, the man of poetry, the man of the tribune, and the man of action, nothing remains in me but the man of letters. The man of letters himself is not happy. Years do not yet weigh on me, but are reckoned. I sustain more painfully the weight of my heart than that of years. These years, like the phantoms of Macbeth, passing their hands over my shoulder, point out to me, not crowns, but a sepulchre, and would to God I were now laid in it!" Lamartine was born at Macon, October 21, 1790. His father was a major of cavalry in the service of Louis XVI., and his mother the daughter of Madame des Rois, under-governess to the Princess of Orleans. His family was struck down and scattered by the revolution. He was educated at the college of the "Fathers of the Faith," where the religious views implanted by his mother were fully developed. After completing his education, he made the tour of Italy, and came to Paris in the early days of the empire. On the restoration of the old dynasty, he entered the royal body-guard, and remained in the military service until after the Hundred Days. He now gave himself up to poetry, and, in 1820, his "Poetical Meditations" at once established his literary fame. Of this work, 45,000 copies were sold, and as, in France, a literary reputation is the passport to official preferment, he was attached, in a honorable capacity, to the embassies to Naples, London and Tuscany, successively. He married an English lady of fortune, and also inherited a fortune from an uncle who died about this time. In 1830, on the fall of Charles X., Lamartine went to the East, with his family, and travelled extensively in the Holy Land. While abroad, he had the misfortune to lose his eldest daughter, Julie, a child of exquisite beauty and promising qualities. On his return, he was elected deputy from the department of the north, and, in 1845, proclaimed his adhesion to the liberal cause, which he has ever since supported, in the tribune, in the desk, and in action. In the revolution of 1848, for which his speeches at the reform banquets had paved the way, he was chosen chief of the provisional government. To the support of the French republic, he devoted his entire energies, and fell from power with that republic, the purest of the men connected with its brief existence. In his "History of the Revolution of 1848," he has described his connection with the republic with a frankness that has laid him open to the charge of vanity, but that history, like his "History of the Girondists," and his "History of the Restoration," is a brilliant and eloquent production, full of striking tableaux and of vividly-painted portraits. He is now drawing near to the extreme term of life, but with an intellect unimpaired, and we sincerely trust that the clouds that have gathered round him will pass away, and that the sunshine of prosperity will gild the last days of his checkered and eventful existence.

RESIDENCE OF LAMARTINE, IN PARIS, FRANCE.

INTERIOR VIEW OF LAMARTINE'S PRIVATE STUDY

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, (CORNER OF TREMONT
AND BROMFIELD STS.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 19, 1856.

$3.00 PER ANNUM. 6 CENTS SINGLE. Vol. XI., No. 3.—Whole No. 263.

THE EARL OF CARDIGAN.

COMMANDER OF THE LIGHT BRIGADE IN THE CRIMEA.

The portrait on this page must needs be an accurate one, for it was engraved after an English photograph. It has, moreover, that sort of individuality which assures us of accuracy, even when we are not familiar with the original. With strongly marked features, heavy mustaches and whiskers, a muscular form, belted, spurred gold-laced and sabred, the earl looks the beau ideal of a fierce, dashing hussar. The subject of the sketch is a major general and knight commander of the Bath. He is the sixth earl of Cardigan, the first being Lord Brudenel, a partizan of the Stuarts, who received the coronet as a reward for his tried loyalty, from the hands of Charles II. James Thomas Brudenel was born at Hambledon, Oct. 11, 1797, and was first known to the world as Lord Brudenel. He graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, and first appeared in public as a member of the House of Commons from Marlborough and Forvey, and afterwards as knight of the shire for Northampton. In 1824, he commenced his military career as cornet in the 8th Hussars. In 1830, so rapid had been his rise, that he was already a lieutenant-colonel. In 1832, he had command, in that capacity, of the 15th Hussars, and with whom he contrived to render himself quite unpopular and threw up his commission. In 1836, he obtained the command of the 11th Hussars, and succeeding to the earldom shortly after, he expended about fifty thousand dollars per annum in increasing the efficiency of his corps. One example of his munificence may be given. A remnant of his men was, on one occasion, ordered by the Horse Guards; he added as much as £2500 to the regulation price; and the horses of the 11th Hussars became celebrated as the best in the service. At the same time he spared no expense to make the accoutrements of the men correspond with his idea of what an English regiment should be; and Lord Cardigan was getting into favor with the public as a cavalry officer, eager to do his duty, when the "Black Bottle quarrel" opened up a new scene, and was followed by events which exposed him to years of obloquy. Somewhere in the year 1840, while the 11th Hussars were at Canterbury, Lord Cardigan upbraided one of his officers, Captain Reynolds, with degrading the mess to the level of a pot-house, because he had caused Moselle to be placed on the table in "a black bottle!" This led to something like offensive expressions; and Captain Reynolds, having been put under arrest, demanded a court-martial, and was, as the public thought, somewhat harshly refused. While the "black bottle affair" was still exciting a good deal of interest, Lord Cardigan got into a still more serious scrape. It appears that the noble and gallant earl was reported to have talked insultingly before company of another of his officers; and the latter, whose name was also Reynolds, wrote a polite note, begging his lordship's authority to contradict the rumor. To this request no answer was vouchsafed, and a second note, couched in the language of exasperation, was treated as a challenge. The two epistles were, with due formality, laid before a court-martial, and found to be so "insubordinate, ungentlemanly and insolent," that Captain Reynolds was cashiered. Meanwhile, clouds gathered in another direction. One morning, a letter containing severe strictures, on Lord Cardigan's conduct appeared in the "Chronicle." The letter was anonymous, but the writer proving to be Captain Harvey Tuckett, a hostile meeting was agreed upon. Wimbledon Common was the scene, and the 15th of September, 1840, the date, of this memorable duel. The first shot was ineffectual; at the second, Lord Cardigan wounded his antagonist. He soon fell into the hands of a constable, and was, of course, committed. He demanded to be tried by his peers; and on the 16th of February, 1841, the House of Lords sat as a criminal court for that purpose. Many of our readers doubtless remember the extraordinary interest which this trial, from its novelty and other circumstances, created throughout all England. Lord Denman, in the absence of the chancellor, enacted the part of lord high steward, and presided with that stately courtesy which characterized him. Everything, however, angrier well for the accused. Captain Harvey Tuckett had fortunately recovered from his wound, and the prosecution was conducted by Sir John, now Lord Campbell, in the tenderest spirit. Besides, the evidence somehow or other, broke down, from the absence of proof that the person engaged in the duel bore the name of Captain Harvey Tuckett, as alleged in the indictment, or even that such a person had been on Wimbledon Common on the day in question. Thus it happened that Lord Cardigan was not required to make any defence; and the House of Lords, after due deliberation, gave a verdict of "not guilty." The lord high steward then asked every peer by his name, beginning with the junior baron: "How says your lordship—is James Thomas, Earl of Cardigan, guilty of the felony whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty?" Whereupon, each standing in his place uncovered, and laying his right hand upon his breast, answered, "Not guilty, upon my honor," except the Duke of Cleveland, who answered, "Not guilty legally, upon my honor." Very little was heard of him, except in military circles, for some time after this; though the manner in which his name was mentioned in private showed that he had not regained the public favor. The condition of his regiment, however, was fine, and elicited the commendation of the Duke of Wellington. When the war with Russia broke out, he was sent to the East in command of the "Light Brigade," holding at that time the rank of major-general in the army. While the English army was at Varna, Lord Cardigan was sent, with the light cavalry, to find out the position of the enemy. Of this service he reported: "You can easily imagine that this was rather an anxious undertaking, and one that required the exercise of considerable caution on my part. We might have come at any time upon the Russian army. My orders were to proceed 130 miles as far as Trajan's Wall, upon the confines of the Dobrudzha. We did so, and marched 120 miles without ever seeing a human being. There was not a house in a state of repair, or that was inhabited, along this route, nor was there an animal to be seen except those that exist in the wildest regions. Having ascertained that the Russian army had returned by Balaklava, and given information to the commander-in-chief upon that subject, I then proceeded on a very interesting march, patrolling along the banks of the Danube to Rustchuk and Silistria, and returned thence by that great and strong fortress of Schumla." At the battle of the Alma, the "Light Brigade" was not engaged; their turn, however, came at Balaklava, October 25, 1855. The brigade, numbering only 600, charged through the "valley of death" upon the Russian army, drawn up in three lines, supporting parks of the heaviest artillery. After he received the fatal order "which some one had blundered," he cast a glance at his scanty ranks, drew his sabre, and with the exclamation: "Here goes the last of the Cardigans!" thundered forth the word of command. At full speed and with a noise like thunder, that "hurricane of horse burst upon the foe," but provoked a storm of fire so deadly that twenty-six officers and two hundred and seventy-six non-commissioned officers hit the dust. The reports of this affair insured Lord Cardigan the wildest enthusiasm when he returned home, but the investigations of the Crimean commissioners again rendered him unpopular, although there is no doubt that he is brave as steel. As a chief actor in one of the most thrilling episodes of modern history, we have given him now a place in our portrait gallery.

THE EARL OF CARDIGAN, OF THE LIGHT BRIGADE.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE GIPSEY'S SECRET:

—OR—

THE LEAGUE OF GUILT.

A STORY OF HIGH AND HUMBLE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE CONTRABANDIST."

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER VII.

A STARTLING ANNOUNCEMENT.

As we have said, many reflections forced themselves upon the mind of Eleanor, after her conversation with Dame Wilton. Some of them were of a peculiar character, and she began to study the exhibitions of Morley Briancourt's mind with a somewhat new light. This view presented itself in many questionings.

"It is true," she said, mentally, "Morley never seemed to be interested in those employments of mine; but is it because he dislikes them? Is it because he has a disposition at variance with those pursuits which are the most worthy of an upright heart? I cannot bring myself to believe that he is so soulless." And yet she was concerned regarding this point; but not so deeply as would have been the case if she had felt for him that interest which the contemplation of their prospective relations warranted. Then her anxiety would have been a thousand fold.

She drove on to Bessie Gray's cottage, which was a mile distant from Woodthorpe, the village near Ashby. She found Bessie all alone with her child, her husband being absent at the place where he worked, which was some miles away, and from which he could only return home on Saturday nights. The poor young woman was in sad distress; her child had been ill three days now; but she had not felt alarmed about him until that morning, when he seemed to become worse every moment. She had not dared to leave him to obtain assistance, and Eleanor was the first who passed the solitary cottage that day; but she was too far away, when Bessie first saw her, to hear her call, and it was not until one of the men from Woodthorpe came along the road that Bessie could send after her.

Eleanor found the child—a boy of some six or seven years—in a high fever. He was somewhat delirious, also, and his illness seemed rapidly increasing. The poor mother was half-distracted. So distressed was she that all presence of mind seemed to have left her, and she seemed hardly to know what she was about. Eleanor herself felt seriously alarmed for the child, for already his state appeared one fraught with the utmost danger. Throwing off her bonnet and mantle, she sent Bessie directly to Woodthorpe for a physician, and proceeded herself to do all that she could for the temporary benefit of the little patient. But there was little that seemed to relieve him. Moment succeeded moment, and his fever became higher, his ravings wilder, and each instant of Bessie's absence and the delay of the surgeon's arrival seemed an age.

Hugh Latimer and his sister and their aunt were seated about the breakfast-table, one fine morning, nearly a week after the incidents just recorded, when Miss Latimer, who had been silent for some time, evidently meditating on some serious matter, said, thoughtfully:

"I wonder where Eleanor is, all this time? It is rather perplexing to me that, after seeing you that day, Hugh, and promising to come or send over to us this week, she should fail to do either."

"Yes, indeed, it is strange, I am sure," said her aunt, earnestly. "What can be the reason of her long absence, I wonder? It seems to me she might ride over, if it were only to see that we are alive and well."

Hugh Latimer had listened in silence, but with an air of deep interest. He looked serious and reflective.

"May it not be possible," he said, at length, as his aunt finished,—"may it not be possible that Miss Ashby herself is ill?"

"Ill? O, I hope not!" said Mary Latimer, quickly, and turning almost pale—"I hope not, Hugh."

"And, indeed, so do I," echoed her aunt, warmly, "especially now, in her uncle's absence. Dear child! Mary, my love, you should really go and see her."

"I will, aunt. Hugh, will you go over with me, after breakfast?"

"With pleasure, Mary."

"Thank you. We will take the chaise and go directly. I can get ready, then. For, indeed, I feel perplexed, and not a little troubled by her failing to communicate with me—she is always so prompt and punctual."

At that moment, a domestic entered quickly, with a countenance startlingly significant of trouble and alarm.

"What has happened, Madge?" asked Hugh Latimer, kindly.

"What makes you look so pale?"

"O, Mr. Hugh, they say there's a terrible fever broken out over at Woodthorpe!"

Hugh Latimer sprang from his seat, his face colorless as marble, while Aunt Dorothea uttered an exclamation of consternation, and a low cry broke from Mary's lips.

"O, Hugh—Woodthorpe—Ashby—if Eleanor is ill!" she said, in a tone of distress. "Woodthorpe is on the very edge of the park."

"Madge, do you know whether any one is ill at Ashby?" spoke Hugh.

"No, sir; I didn't ask. The man only told me, as he was going by, that they had the fever at Woodthorpe, and that they were dying there."

"O, Hugh, Hugh," uttered Mary, "let us go!"

But before his name had well left her lips, he had gone from the apartment.

In five minutes the chaise was at the hall door, and Miss Latimer was seated in it, beside her brother. Rapidly they drove over to Ashby, to learn something of Eleanor; Mary, meanwhile, trembling in every limb, and Hugh pale as death, and utterly silent. "If Eleanor should be ill!" this was the thought of each. The sudden announcement of the startling news, connected as it was with the conversation which had passed between them relative to Miss Ashby, had sent a shock—a lightning thrill of apprehension to the very heart of Hugh Latimer. Now, as he drove hastily along the way, the deathlike suspense and agitation he experienced told him how deep had become his interest in Eleanor. Once, during the drive, he turned to his sister, who, pale, trembling and silent, occupied the seat beside him.

"Mary, what am I thinking of? You should not have thought of exposing yourself in this fever-haunted district," he said.

"Hugh, you forget that I also am going to seek for Eleanor," she answered, "and even if I were not, I should be seeking the couches of the sufferers at Woodthorpe with you; for you would go, and it is my place, also. You would not shrink yourself, and why should I? I am no coward."

Silently, tenderly he pressed her hand, and drove on. They neared a little cottage standing alone near the roadside. Within the open doorway sat a rough, sun-burned man, his face bowed upon his hands, weeping. Mary touched her brother's arm.

"O, Hugh," she said, "there is Timothy Gray, Bessie Gray's husband. What ails him? You said Bessie's boy was ill; can he be dying, or dead? Let us get out and see, Hugh. We cannot pass Bessie's cottage."

Instantly Hugh Latimer reined in the horse, and assisted Mary to alight. Together they entered the doorway, but Timothy Gray never moved at the sound of their footsteps. He did not hear them; he was engrossed by his own sorrow. Mary and Hugh half paused; then, forbearing to speak to him, passed on in silence, revering his grief.

There was a low murmur within the room on the right—a whisper of women's voices, that was heard for an instant, and then ceased. Then there was a faint moan, a sob of distress, a sound of weeping. The tears fell from Mary's eyes as she clasped her brother's hand. The door of the room was open; together they went in.

It was a death-scene they found there. At the foot of a bed at the opposite side of the room, knelt a woman, with her face buried in the clothes, weeping heart-breaking tears. It was Bessie Gray. Beside her stood two of the women from Woodthorpe, with sad faces and tearful eyes, gazing upon the marble face of the child who lay there, sinking into the stupor of death. It was Bessie Gray's Johnny. Nine days and nights had he lain there, burning with fever and raving in delirium. Now the fever was gone—the delirium was over, but poor little Johnny, who had suffered so long, was dying.

They saw all this at a glance as they entered—all this, and more. There was another person present—one who bent over the pillow of the dying child, softly fanning him, to give what little air there might be to those pale lips, and tenderly wiping the death-damps away from the high, marble brow. Her head was bowed—her face hidden from the new-comers who stood within the doorway; but Hugh pressed his sister's hand, and both paused involuntarily. At that moment, as they regarded her, she raised her head and looked up at them, showing the beautiful, but pale and worn countenance of Eleanor Ashby. The startled feeling with which they first beheld her was succeeded by a thrill of silent and reverential awe. They had looked to find her in her own home; they found her here by the couch of the dying.

Her eyes were filled with tears as she looked up. Beholding Hugh and Mary, from their sad depths there beamed an eloquent, though sorrowful and mute welcome, succeeded by an expression of sudden anxiety, as she earnestly regarded them. She evidently hesitated to have them enter the infected place.

But instantly her attention was recalled to the child. He moved—opened his eyes, and looked up at her, his pale lips moving. She bent down, and softly raised him. His head rested on her bosom. A faint smile illumined his dying face, as he looked around upon those about him. His glance rested on the faces of Hugh and Mary, who stood by the bed, now; then upon that of Eleanor, whose loving arm supported him, and then the quiet lids closed.

Johnny's was the first death from the fever. Several persons were ill at Woodthorpe, but he had contracted it earlier than the rest, and it terminated sooner in his case. From the first, Eleanor had taken her place beside the couches of the sick. Seven days and nights she had dwelt in the midst of the fever, unwearied and self-forgetful, devoting herself wholly to the sufferers about her. She had not once returned to the hall since the day when she first came to see Bessie Gray's boy. Then finding, by the physician, that the fever was a contagious one, and of a malignant type, she had prepared herself to remain where she was, and do all that lay in her power for the benefit of the sick child, without going back, and possibly carrying the contagion with her. Then, as one and another was smitten with the disease in the village, she went thither, also; and into the infected places, which few others dared enter, she went alone—a ministering angel. Whatever she needed from the hall, was sent down by her orders, but she refrained from going thither herself, only keeping informed that no one there had taken the fever, and sending directions for every precaution against it. Leaving one sick chamber only to hasten to another, she spent every moment beside the sufferers, taking no thought for herself, absorbed in the offices she had undertaken, neglecting rest and nourishment almost entirely, in her utter self-abnegation.

It was no marvel that, in these seven days, she had become pale, and worn, and grave. The only wonder was that she herself had not been stricken down. The change in her appearance was startlingly perceptible, when, an hour after the death of little Johnny Gray, she joined Hugh Latimer and his sister, with the physician, in another apartment. Her slight form had become already thin; her sweet face had lost the fullness of its soft oval outline; the blue veins could be clearly traced over her brow and temples, from which the heavy dark hair had been pushed hastily away; and her large, soft eyes had a troubled, care-worn expression that touched Hugh Latimer's heart.

A smile, faint, sweet and sad, dawned in those clear eyes as she met him, but a strange contrast it presented to that which he had seen there, happy, beaming and warm as sunshine itself, but a little time since. The physician had been telling him of the part she had taken in the troubles of the villagers since the fever broke out, and Hugh was inexpressibly affected.

"Eleanor, angel of mercy!" he murmured, as he clasped her hand in his own.

She shook her head slowly and sorrowfully; the tears came into her eyes for an instant. Miss Latimer's lips were silently pressed to her cheek.

"O, Mary," she said, looking up, "this is wrong. You should not be here. This fever is a terrible one."

"And you take no thought for yourself, Eleanor! I have no fear. Do not think me selfish—heartless. Let me share your labors, Eleanor."

The physician shook his head.

"Nay, Miss Latimer,—you have not the constitution for such exposure as she has undergone, and I hardly dare to permit her to continue her exertions at present. She needs rest, and must have it. You would sink in three days in this infected atmosphere. You could serve my patients far more effectually by persuading Miss Ashby to take the repose which she requires for a day or two, and become sufficiently recruited to re-assume her station."

"O, how can I leave the people who are sick in the village, doctor?" asked Eleanor, earnestly. "No, no! It is impossible; I cannot do it. They need care; there are so few who will help, and, indeed, I am quite strong still."

Doctor Gregg sat down by her side, saying, seriously:

"My dear young lady, I dare not trust you. A little more, and you would go beyond your strength. I felt it my duty, this morning, to tell you this. I know you are needed here, but you must leave your post for the present, or you, in your turn, will be ill. No new cases have occurred to-day in the village. There are only five up to to-night, and, thanks to your unremitting cares, I have no apprehensions of a fatal termination in either of them. Miss Ashby, you have done already more than they or I can ever thank you for. I believe, sincerely and honestly, that if Johnny Gray had received your care three days earlier, he would have been at this moment recovering; but both you and I were called too late. As it is, you have done everything a mortal could do, in this case, and in every other in the village, and in those I have the most sanguine hopes. It is, then, absolutely requisite that you should embrace this favorable opportunity to recruit your almost exhausted strength."

"Yes, yes, dearest Eleanor!" urged Mary Latimer, tenderly pressing her hand, "you must rest now."

Eleanor was silent, and her eyes were fixed on the floor as she listened to these persuasions; but there was a shadow of trouble, anxiety and indecision upon her pale brow that told of her reluctance to yield to them. And Hugh, meanwhile, standing beside her, regarded her with a glance of earnest solicitude, though he spoke no word.

"Come," repeated Mary Latimer, persuasively, "dear Eleanor, say you will go, and I will take you directly up in the chaise to Briarfield, where Aunt Dorothea and I will take care of you."

"No, no—not to Briarfield," uttered Eleanor, quickly; "no, Mary. I should carry the contagion with me wherever I might go. I must stay where I am until the fever has spent its violence, and there is no more danger of infection."

"Nay—you forget, Eleanor, that Hugh and I have already come into the infected neighborhood, so that your going over to Briarfield would make no difference; and Aunt Dorothea, when my mother had this very fever, was with her through all her illness, and she is not afraid of any such thing."

"Indeed, my dear young lady, you had better go," said Doctor Gregg, "for you need care and nursing yourself, and Miss Dorothea and Miss Mary here will be only too glad to watch over you, I am sure. And you must leave this immediate neighborhood for a time. At Ashby, you would have no care but that of servants, therefore, you had better be persuaded."

Still Eleanor hesitated. Raising her eyes, she encountered those of Hugh Latimer resting with an expression of the deepest interest and concern upon his countenance.

"I trust," he said, with gentle earnestness,—"I trust that Miss Ashby does not need to be twice assured of the welcome she would receive at Briarfield."

Eleanor offered no further opposition. She only stayed to see the remains of the little Johnny prepared for their last resting-place, and to receive from Ashby a package of fresh clothing, which she might substitute for that which she had worn in the sick-room before setting off for Briarfield; and then, leaving the two women from the village to attend to whatever remained to be done, left poor Bessie and her husband alone with a grief which shrunk from all consolation.

Hugh put his sister and Miss Ashby into the chaise, while the physician waited for him.

"You are going to Woodthorpe—are you not, Hugh?" asked Mary Latimer, as she took her seat.

"Directly, Mary, with Doctor Gregg," he answered. "I shall probably remain there to-night. And I trust," he added, as he assisted Eleanor into the vehicle, "to bring you favorable accounts of your patients there, Miss Ashby. I cannot do the good that you have done, but I will do what I may for those whom you must leave."

She had not thought of his offering to stay at Woodthorpe himself, in the very heart of the infected region. It had been too much to expect. An expression of relief, of gratitude, came into her eyes as she thanked him. That gleaming look from those languid, weary eyes gave him a thrill of pleasure inexpressible. Then, with an affectionate "good-morning," and one or two sisterly charges of caution, Mary slowly drove away. And in company with Doctor Gregg, Hugh Latimer repaired to the village of Woodthorpe.

CHAPTER VIII.

A HEART'S UNREST.

With the cessation of her exertions, came to Eleanor a full knowledge of her own weakness. She felt now only too painfully the effects of her labors in her own case. If she had continued to maintain her place among the sick at Woodthorpe, she might, indeed, have borne up for some days longer, her excitement and anxiety rendering her insensible to fatigue, but she must have sunk at last. As it was, the almost utter physical prostration succeeding her withdrawal from the scene of her toils, warned her plainly of what must have been the consequence of a continuance of them at present.

Arrived at Briarfield, she found herself so weak and languid as scarcely to be able to walk. Miss Dorothea hastened to welcome her; but no words could express her surprise and concern on beholding her altered appearance, and learning from Mary Latimer its cause. Shocked and affected, she led her tenderly up into the hall and into the drawing-room, where she made her lie down upon a couch, and removed her bonnet and mantle with her own hands. Mary, meanwhile, hastened away, and shortly returned, bringing in herself some coffee for Eleanor, which she persuaded her to drink directly, sitting by her side the while. Then Miss Latimer took her to her own apartment, where she made her lie down. Wearied, yet excited, it was long before Eleanor could compose herself to rest, but after a long time, she sank into a profound slumber, from which she did not awake for several hours.

When, finally, she opened her eyes once more, it was night. A shaded lamp burned on the table beside her bed, diffusing a mellow moonlight radiance through the apartment, and beside it sat Miss Latimer, reading. She looked directly up as Eleanor moved, and laying down her book, came to her, affectionately inquiring how she had slept. Eleanor assured her she was much refreshed, though so weak and languid as to render it an effort almost beyond her strength to rise.

She learned that Hugh Latimer had come over from Woodthorpe half an hour before, to obtain some articles which he required, and to bring some strengthening draught for her from Doctor Gregg, who had sent orders for her to remain perfectly quiet, for the present. He had gone back to the village just before her awakening, where he was to pass the night. He had inquired for her, Mary said.

Eleanor listened while drinking the cup of tea which Aunt Dorothea brought to her bedside. It gave her less anxiety to leave Woodthorpe, knowing how much good Hugh could do there. Aunt Dorothea smiled to see her face brighten.

"Come, now, my dear child, you will eat something," she said.

But Eleanor had no inclination to touch any food. She needed rest the more, at present. Soon taking the draught which Mary prepared according to Doctor Gregg's directions, she fell asleep again, and slept quietly through the night.

The next day she was considerably revived, but remained nearly all day in her apartment, where Miss Latimer and her aunt were with her the greater part of the time. Hugh, who had returned from the village at morning, had remained only to breakfast with his sister and aunt, and gone immediately back. In the middle of the afternoon, he came home once more, and retired, Mary said, to his apartment to rest. He reported, she also said, that no new cases of fever had occurred, and that none of the patients were apprehended to be in serious danger. It was with inexpressible pleasure that this news was welcomed by all.

At twilight, Miss Ashby was sufficiently strong to descend to the drawing-room with Mary Latimer, and there reclining in the luxurious depths of a large fauteuil, talked with Mary quietly and earnestly, while the evening drew on. The thoughts of both lingered with the sufferers at Woodthorpe. Eleanor spoke of the prompt, unhesitating good-will of Hugh in placing himself among them, and expressed the pleasure that she felt in seeing him do so.

"Aunt Dorothea goes down to the village to-night with him," said Miss Latimer. "She is to stay with Farmer Brown's wife, whose case is decidedly more serious than any of the others. Hugh will watch with Hurdage, the blacksmith."

Eleanor was silent a little while. Then she said, earnestly and impulsively:

"O, Mary, suppose they should themselves take the—"

She paused suddenly, fearing to finish what she was about to say. But Mary comprehended her meaning. A look of momentary care rested upon her thoughtful countenance. Directly, however, she returned:

"I pray most earnestly that they may not, Eleanor. But it is all that can be done; for none of us can shrink from such duties as those which call upon us for performance now. I know that Hugh and my aunt are going into the midst of danger. I feel anxious for them; but, Eleanor, I could not say to them 'do not go.' It is their duty to go. It is mine as well; and to-morrow I, in my turn, shall go over."

The sound of Aunt Dorothea's voice was heard calling to Mary. Miss Latimer went to answer the summons, and Eleanor was left for a few moments alone. Sitting before the window, with her head resting against the cushioned back of the easy-chair, she watched the silent stars come out, one by one, in the blue evening sky, and thought of what Miss Latimer had said.

A step descended the hall stairs, and some one entered the apartment while she was thus reflecting, but she did not hear it at first. She looked up, however, as Hugh Latimer crossed the room, and stood beside her, seeing her for the first time since she had left him on the road to Woodthorpe.

"Mr. Latimer!" she spoke his name in a subdued tone, that had an accent of earnest pleasure in it as she recognized him through the dim twilight.

He took the hand that was half-extended to him in his own, holding it there for a single moment.

"You are better to-night!" he said, gently, seating himself by her side.

"Very much better, and stronger, I thank you. And you?"

"I am well. I am extremely gratified," he continued, "to find you down here to-night. I was seriously afraid that you would not be able to leave your room for a week, at least, when you first came up to Briarfield. Doctor Gregg himself was somewhat alarmed, though, I believe, he concealed the fact from you. He spoke of coming up to see you to-night, when I left him this morning."

"He is very kind, indeed. I shall be happy to see him. But I think he was more alarmed about me than the occasion warranted. My constitution is a vigorous one."

"And yet it will not bear everything. Doctor Gregg blamed himself severely for allowing you to exert yourself so long. The fatigue and exposure were too much for you. You must consent to leave to others now the burden which has borne you down."

Eleanor sighed. She felt that she could not gainsay his words.

"I believe I must do so for the present," she said, "but it is with the deepest reluctance. I cannot be quite patient sitting here thus in idleness, when the assistance that I could give is so much needed. There are so few to help in the village, even your aid and that of your aunt and Mary is not, I think, quite sufficient; for those who watched from the first with the patients must have become, I should think, as much exhausted as myself, and you will find it difficult to obtain substitutes, there is such an inexpressible dread of the fever among the most of the villagers."

"I know it, but we must do the best we can for the present. Do not think of this more than you can help, Miss Ashby; you will only agitate yourself uselessly."

"I can think of little else," she said, with a half-sigh. "I have been thinking of poor Bessie and her boy to-day. He is not buried yet?"

"No; the funeral will take place to-morrow morning."

"How do they seem—Bessie and her husband—now?"

"Much more resigned, I think. I talked with Bessie for a long time to-day. She spoke of you in terms of the most touching gratitude, as they all do."

The last words he seemed rather to speak to himself than to her. They were uttered in a tone of the deepest, tenderest feeling, overflowing with the unspoken emotions of his heart. His musing glance, downcast, was filled with a shadowy softness; for a moment a glow of almost irrepressible joy pervaded his breast; then a sigh, fainter than the breath of the light twilight breeze that bore it away, succeeded. He rose hastily and paced the room from side to side, with folded arms and his head bent.

And Eleanor sat by the window, silent; but her glance rested thoughtfully on him, and a gentle emotion of sympathy filled her heart. She forgot what he had said, she only saw that he paused and sighed, as if in weariness.

And he was heart-weary; but she might never know it. He could come into her presence; he could speak with her, and listen to the voice that charmed him; he might read in her clear, kind eyes every thought and emotion of hers; but not a glance or tone of his must betray to her the tenderness that pervaded his every thought of her. Was she not the betrothed of another? He realized now the gulf that separated him from her.

Slowly he paced to and fro with such reflections as these, while Eleanor still sat silent by the window. At length a step was heard, and Miss Latimer entered.

"Hugh," she said, "Doctor Gregg has just sent up to say that he cannot come over this evening, as he intended. There are three new cases of fever. Aunt Dorothea desires to know if you are ready to go?"

"Quite. She has not come down yet?"

"No; she will join you directly here."

"Who are the new patients, Mary?" he asked.

She told him. There was a little while of unbroken silence, each one being busy with thoughts connected with this new intelligence. It rendered each one of them anxious—unquiet, for no one could tell what devastation the disease might make before its progress should be finally arrested. Hugh Latimer's thoughts were partially diverted from himself once more, from the sad theme on which, a little time since, they had been suffered to dwell for a season. Perhaps it was best that he should dismiss them, since they were thus useless and selfish. There was not the shadow of a hope for him. The possibility of its being accomplished had been blotted out before ever it was formed. Should he not turn away, then, from the vain contemplation of a happiness that could never be his, at a time when the sufferings of others demanded his attention? Bidding Eleanor and his sister, then, a kind and serious "good-night," he met his aunt at the door, and departed with her for the village of Woodthorpe.

It was late in the afternoon of the day following, when Eleanor left Briarfield, with Mary Latimer and Hugh, on her way to Ashby Place. Mary was to stop at Woodthorpe, whither Hugh, after escorting Miss Ashby home, was to return. Miss Latimer, then, leaving them on the main road, turned off in the direction of the village to join her aunt, and Hugh kept on with Eleanor.

Miss Ashby had not been home once since the fever first broke out in the village. Now, it was necessary that she should do so, that she might attend to affairs there, which had been all this time left in the hands of the housekeeper.

"Miss Ashby," said Hugh, as they rode along, "have you received any communication from your uncle, since his departure?" Eleanor answered in the negative.

"Do you think he knows of the state of matters down here at Woodthorpe?"

"I do not well know what to think, Mr. Latimer. I have been undecided about writing to inform him. I do not know the nature of his business there—whether it is important or otherwise. Perhaps I should write, however it may be, since the trouble here appears to be increasing. Hitherto, I have endeavored to do all that could be done, that his presence might not be absolutely necessary."

Hugh Latimer made no immediate rejoinder. He seemed to be indulging in a reverie. Finally, however, he said:

"Did he intend to return soon when he went?"

"Not for some three or four weeks, I believe," replied Miss Ashby. "His business was with Mr. Briancourt, who wrote to him from London. He went down in company with Mr. Briancourt's son."

Again Hugh was silent; but in a few moments he asked:

"Does Mr. Morley Briancourt return with him to Ashby?"

"I think it probable that he will," answered Eleanor.

Hugh had listened for a different answer; and yet what difference could it make to him whether Morley Briancourt returned or not? Absent or present as Eleanor's lover might be, it gave him no better hope. But he had waited for her to say "no." At least, he felt happier when his rival was away from her side.

He felt chilled and disappointed now. In silence he rode on beside her, with his eyes downcast. Once he turned his glance towards her. She also was looking down, and he fancied he could detect an expression of sadness overshadowing that sweet face; but she was not thinking of him, and he sighed as he said it to himself. How beautiful she was—how warm-hearted—how noble, and high-souled, and self-sacrificing! And she was to become the bride of another. Last night he had turned away from such thoughts as these in despair, to seek employment of mind elsewhere. Now, despite his firmest resolutions, they returned upon his mind with tenfold power. He could not dissipate them.

"Mr. Latimer," said Eleanor, gently, as she looked up and met his saddened glance, "you are very grave this afternoon. You are troubled about something?"

"Yes. Pardon me if I make but an indifferent companion, but I find it a vain attempt to be otherwise; and give me your sympathy, Miss Ashby, at least."

The last words were uttered involuntarily—sadly.

"You have it already. I am very, very sorry that you should be unhappy," she said, in a voice of the sweetest feeling.

"Ten thousand thanks. Your compassion is a balm in itself," he uttered, impulsively.

At that moment, two horsemen appeared on the road at a little distance. Eleanor descried them, and a surprised expression was visible in her countenance. Hugh Latimer also saw them, and turned pale.

"It is my uncle and Morley," said Eleanor. "They have, then, returned."

Hugh Latimer did not speak. The two gentlemen advanced towards them. The two parties met midway of the distance intervening. Sir Edward Ashby was a little before his companion. He coldly acknowledged the silent bow of Hugh Latimer, and the greeting of his niece.

"Eleanor," he said, "I was just going to seek you. Sir," and he addressed Hugh with distant courtesy, "I will not trouble you to escort my niece further."

Hugh drew back with a countenance as pale as death, and lifting his hat, with a murmured word of farewell to Eleanor, turned and rode slowly away.

CHAPTER IX.

UNPLEASANT CONTRASTS.

As Sir Edward wheeled his horse, and took the place of Hugh Latimer by Eleanor's side, Morley Briancourt came up. Eleanor had hardly had time to recover from the surprise occasioned by her uncle's chilling dismissal of Hugh, unceremonious and indeed almost mortifying as it was, and her countenance wore still a grave and astonished expression, that had in it also some perceptible sign of humiliated feeling; for it was at least to have been expected that Sir Edward would have been willing to exchange neighborly courtesies with Mr. Latimer. But the slight could not be helped now, and only hoping that Hugh would think nothing serious of it, since he could not be unacquainted with her uncle's almost misanthropic disposition, she bannished the matter with a sigh, and returned the greeting of Morley, who now took his place on her other hand.

He had observed the scene that had occurred. His brow had slightly darkened as he said to himself, "Who is this riding with Eleanor in my absence?" And he had remarked, too, the apparent disturbance of Miss Ashby at the proceeding of Sir Edward, which he had comprehended, though not quite near enough to hear his words. This disturbance had struck him still more disagreeably; but with his usual self-command, he repressed the evidence of his feelings, as he received in his own, with a lingering pressure, the hand that Eleanor extended in welcome towards him, and expressed his happiness in seeing her again.

Eleanor's greeting was kind and quiet, sincerely cordial, yet subdued, her whole manner being marked with the softening influences of the anxieties through which she had passed since their departure from home. Still, it did not please her lover. There was no blush, no tremulousness, no happy, timid agitation, no eloquent, unuttered language beaming in her beautiful eyes to tell of such happiness—such gladness as he would have wished to behold in her manner at meeting him. She never had evinced, it was true, such emotions as would have been betrayed by these signs, when she met him; but he had never noticed the want of them before. Now, her manner appeared to him too quiet—too inexpressive, and he was dissatisfied.

"You are returned sooner than I expected to see you," she said, addressing both him and her uncle, but glancing last at Sir Edward. "You heard, then, I suppose, of the fever which is prevailing in this neighborhood?"

"We heard of it three days ago," answered the baronet, in his usual cold and unmoved tone. "I find that you have been stationed in the village and about it, even since the commencement of this epidemic."

Eleanor confirmed the truth of what had been told him, probably by the domestics at Ashby. She spoke of the difficulty of obtaining efficient assistance for the sick, in consequence of the general dread of the disease among the villagers, and of the actual need there had been of her help. What was her surprise to hear him express his disapprobation of this proceeding, and term it an imprudent one! She looked up at Morley; he was regarding her with an unquiet yet impassioned glance, as she raised her eyes to his face, to read his opinion there.

"Imprudent!—it was rash, Eleanor," he murmured, "to endanger your life for the sake of these people."

She looked down again, and half sighed. She thought of Hugh Latimer; she remembered his look and tone when he first met and spoke to her in Bessie Gray's cottage, when she had been tending little Johnny through the fever. He had not shrunk and shuddered thus. His first thought had been, not of the risk she was encountering, but of the noble purpose for which she was there. He had, without a thought of hesitation, himself gone into the midst of the danger, unmindful of it, in his desire to do good to "these people," of whom Morley had spoken so almost heartlessly.

It was Sir Edward's desire that she would go no more into the village while the fever prevailed there, as he informed her on their way homeward across the park. She dared not remonstrate; but she mentioned Miss Latimer, her aunt and brother, who had also gone into the houses of the sick, without fear.

"And surely, sir," she added, "I am in no greater danger than they."

"You are in no less," was his significant reply. "And let it be understood, Miss Ashby, that I desire you will not go to the village again for the present."

Eleanor had spoken of Miss Latimer's brother. Morley Briancourt, hearing it, was convinced that Eleanor's late companion had been no other. He was soon satisfied. Sir Edward, who was silent for some moments after the command so decisively given, at length said:

"I presume it was Mr. Latimer with whom you were riding when I encountered you?"

And Eleanor answered that it was. Neither Sir Edward nor Morley had known of his return home before their departure from Ashby. The first intelligence they had received of it was that day when, on their arrival at Ashby, the housekeeper had informed them of Eleanor's late employments and her present whereabouts. The baronet and his nephew-elect were neither of them pleased to find Eleanor and Hugh Latimer in company. She, in her unconsciousness, never dreamed of the fact, much less its reason; for not the shadow of a thought had ever crossed her mind of Hugh Latimer's feeling for her a sentiment deeper than friendship, though she felt that he regarded her with one that had all the truth and earnestness that friendship might have. It was in this light that she saw the gentleness, the serious warmth, the often unconsciously betrayed tenderness that marked his manner towards her. She could not recognize them as they were, yet; her own heart was unawakened, and thus incapable of comprehending their true nature.

Thus the party reached home; and Eleanor, after a short interview with the housekeeper, who, with all the rest at Ashby Place, were more pleased than they could tell to see her safe at home again, she retired to her own apartment. Here she was joined by Lucy Elmore, and Lucy was inexpressibly delighted to talk with her young mistress once more, and tell her what she knew already, and what the rest had told her repeatedly, how dull, and quiet, and lifeless Ashby had been, ever since she had been away. Eleanor was glad to find that not one of the people at Ashby had had the slightest symptom of illness; everybody there was in good health.

"But ah, Miss Eleanor," said Lucy, "it is a sad thing to think of the sick people at Woodthorpe!" And she sighed.

And Miss Ashby echoed the sigh. The fever was on the increase there. Three or four of Doctor Gregg's patients had passed the crisis favorably, and were in a fair way to recover. Other cases were yet undecided, and, meanwhile, several persons had been taken down since the previous day. Eleanor was troubled for them now more than ever.

Dwelling on this, Lucy mentioned the return of Sir Edward and young Mr. Briancourt.

"I did not suspect he was coming back now, Miss Eleanor," she said.

"I was not certain that he would do so myself, Lucy," answered

Miss Ashby. Then, smiling, she said: "I dare say he has brought Will Humphries with him?"

"Yes indeed, Miss Eleanor," returned Lucy,—"yes indeed. I wish he had not. I can't—"

"Cannot what, Lucy?" asked Miss Ashby, as Lucy paused and continued in silence to arrange the folds of her mistress's robe.

"I cannot like him, Miss Eleanor. I don't like to say it, because I suppose I've no more right than I should have to say it of his master, seeing they are both guests here at Ashby, even if one is in the servant's hall. But he is the sauciest fellow! There's not one of the servants, except it may be Hawkins, master's valet, that can bear him."

Lucy had expressed such sentiments as these more than once before, and Eleanor knew that Morley's valet, with his vain, boastful ways, had made himself disagreeable to all the servants at Ashby, and especially so to Lucy, of whom he tried his best to make honest Harry Longworth jealous. She could not blame the poor girl for disliking him; the little she had seen of him herself had given her a bad impression of him, though he was very well-behaved, very civil and smooth; for, beneath all, he was indescribably deceitful, and Eleanor guessed it.

"But I would not notice him more than is necessary, Lucy," she said, seriously, "and keep out of his way as much as possible. I hope, too, that Harry will do the same; for you know that it will not do at all to quarrel with any one, no matter who he may be, who is visiting here."

"O, I would not have it come to that, for the world, Miss Eleanor," answered Lucy, earnestly, "much as I dislike him. But I wish he did not come here. The servants wonder that Mr. Morley Briancourt should keep such a fellow about him, and, indeed, I wonder any gentleman should; but I don't think this case may be strange, after all."

She spoke the last words in a tone much lower, as if talking to herself; yet Eleanor heard them. She could say nothing; she perceived the channel of Lucy's thoughts, but made no sign of having heard their expression; for Lucy was not the only one who thought more than she dared to say of Morley Briancourt, and no good, either. Eleanor was seriously conscious of this, and it made her grave and reflective. She remembered the conversation she had had with old Dame Wilton about him, and could not help wishing that he had produced a more favorable impression on the minds of the people about; for a single word of true, heartfelt commendation from the humblest person on her uncle's estates, spoken of Morley Briancourt, would have been pleasing to her. But it was true; she acknowledged it to herself, now no one had even uttered such a word there. The most they had ever said of him was, "He is a very fine gentleman, indeed,—a very fine gentleman!" And that was all. But such thoughts as these she had no time to indulge in now. With a sigh she rose, and prepared to go down to join her uncle and Morley Briancourt.

"See, Miss Eleanor," cried Lucy, suddenly, as she stood by a window, looking down into the park,—"see, Miss Eleanor, that strange thing down among the trees yonder! What can it be? I wish it were not growing dark, that we might see more distinctly."

Miss Ashby approached the window and looked down.

"Where, Lucy?" she said. "I see nothing."

"There—there, Miss Eleanor, gliding away under the chestnuts yonder; now you may see him."

Now, in the gathering twilight, Eleanor beheld some dark object moving through the trees in the direction pointed out.

"It is nothing more than the gardener's dog, I should say," she observed, as it passed from sight. "What, pray, did you think it was, my good Lucy?"

"O, indeed, I scarcely know myself," answered Lucy; "but I could not make it out, and it puzzled me. I dare say, now, it was only James Williams's dog."

But if it was James Williams's dog, it would have exhibited to any one who would have taken the trouble to watch it unseen, very uncanine propensities indeed. For, with noiseless stealth, it glided beneath the trees, around the side of the main building, to the great arched window at the upper end of the library in the west wing, and there crouched down, just outside the low sill, lay concealed in the shadows of the clustering ivy, with its bright eyes peering into the interior of the apartment where Morley Briancourt and Sir Edward Ashby sat talking together.

It was Pequin the dwarf, whom the reader may remember as having appeared in the first chapter of this story. He had not forgotten the blow Morley Briancourt had given him, unprovoked, that day. He had not forgotten, either, the kindness of Eleanor Ashby, and Pequin was one never to fail in testifying either his gratitude for a favor, or his resentment of an injury.

He had been away from the neighborhood of Ashby since then, but now he had come back to perform here the work both of gratitude and revenge. He had learned how to do it. He had been studying for it during his absence. Now, nothing was more easy than to proceed with its performance. He had come to take up his quarters where Morley Briancourt was, to watch him day and night, to dog his footsteps wherever he went.

He had been at Ashby three or four days now—even in the very house. It suited his plans to be here. There was little danger of his discovery—he was too cunning to permit it, and, nevertheless, there was a bold and fearless freedom in his manoeuvres that, in any other than this crafty little creature, would fully have ensured it. Penetrating wherever he pleased, lying curled up in nooks and corners here and there, concealing himself almost under the very eyes of those whom he was watching, following them, with silent stealth, from one place to another, he heard, saw and discovered anything and everything that he pleased. And not one, in the house or out of it, dreamed of the presence of such a creature as Pequin the dwarf.

It was on the fourth day after the return of Sir Edward and Morley Briancourt, that Miss Ashby, having received no tidings from Briarfield since she left there, ordered Selim to be brought round, and prepared for a morning call there.

Sir Edward appeared in the hall, as she had taken her seat in the saddle, and stopping at the door, asked:

"Are you going to Woodthorpe, Eleanor?"

She replied in the negative, remembering, with a sigh, his injunction; then immediately added:

"Unless, sir, you are willing that I should."

"You are, I believe, acquainted with my wishes on that subject," he returned, coldly; then turned and went in.

There was no more to be said. She dared not disobey him. She had wished most sincerely to go thither, for she felt deeply anxious concerning the fate of those who were in so much danger there; but without the consent of Sir Edward, she could not go. He himself had been there once since his return, and only once; then it was to visit one of his principal tenants, who lay ill of the fever.

The number of Doctor Gregg's patients had somewhat increased since her last day at Briarfield. Mary and her aunt and Hugh were at liberty to visit them, and she must not; but it was not to be helped. Morley Briancourt had never visited Briarfield with Eleanor, and was not personally acquainted with any of its inmates, except Miss Latimer, whom he had seen at Ashby once or twice, when she rode over to call on Eleanor. He had never seemed desirous of making further acquaintance with the family; and when Miss Ashby went thither, it was always alone.

This morning, as Eleanor was just moving away from the door, Lucy Elmore came out and stood in the doorway. It happened that Morley Briancourt's valet saw her from the lower end of the great hall, and approached the door as Eleanor rode off.

"Does your fair mistress ride alone this morning, pretty Lucy?" he said, with a familiar smile and air that made the girl angry.

"Alone?—yes. What is that to you, Will Humphries?" she answered, coloring.

"O, nothing—nothing, sweet Lucy! only if I were so fair a lady, I would never ride forth without my cavalier. My master does not know of her going out, I think."

"And what of that, pray? My mistress, I hope, is at liberty to ride away without attendance, if it please her," was Lucy's short reply.

"To be sure," returned the man,—"to be sure. I did not say she was not—did I? But where may she be going, may I ask, fair Lucy?"

"You may ask what you please, but I shall not answer, unless I choose, and I do not choose to tell you of that which does not concern you." And Lucy, turning short around, went off and left the valet just where he stood.

He looked after her with a sneer. "O, you won't tell, my dear, will you? Well, no need—no need. I know as well as you, pretty Lucy, that your fair mistress is going to Briarfield; and Briarfield has an inmate now whom my good master does not particularly fancy, therefore, I am to let him know, if he does not find out for himself, whenever there is any communication between Briarfield and Ashby, which I will take the opportunity to do this moment." And the worthy gentleman went straightway and did it.

Morley Briancourt received the tidings with a quick though almost imperceptible frown. He had the deepest passion for Eleanor; his nature, under the smooth and graceful exterior which he wore, was a jealous, imperious one. Already that jealousy had taken alarm by only once seeing by Eleanor's side one who might possibly one day become a rival. Without a word, he sought Sir Edward in the library.

Meanwhile, Eleanor rode rapidly on to Briarfield. A cold rain which had fallen for the last three days had passed off, leaving the atmosphere clear and bracing. Refreshed and invigorated by her ride, the first which she had taken since the commencement of the bad weather, she reached Briarfield. But no one came to meet her at the door. The place was unusually quiet. And now, as she went up the drive, she saw Doctor Gregg's vehicle at a little distance, and one of the servants leading the horse towards the stable. A sudden fear seized her. The man, turning and seeing her, left the chaise standing, and came to take her horse. He looked grave as he came up.

"Is anybody ill, James?" was her anxious question.

"My young master, ma'am; he has the fever."

It was true. All the house was still; the servants glided about like spirits, and spoke in whispers. Mary, her aunt and Doctor Gregg were assembled in the chamber of Hugh, where he lay, burning with fever, and muttering in restless delirium. The fever had laid its hand on him, too, at last.

"When was he taken?" asked Eleanor, of Mary.

"The day before yesterday. He had not been well the day before, I think. He was restless, gloomy, sad. He had an errand to L—, and set out before the rain; it overtook him; he rode there and back in it. When he came home, he was chilled and fatigued, and before night the fever set in."

"Poor Hugh! O, Mary, Aunt Dorothea, I am sorry for you!" Mary kissed her silently, and wept. But Aunt Dorothea said, gently and hopefully:

"We will try to be patient in this affliction, dear child; for we have not had many troubles, and it must be expected they will come to us sometime, as well as to others; and, after all, Doctor Gregg says Hugh is not nearly so ill as his patients generally have been with this fever."

This was indeed a consolation. Nevertheless, Eleanor was sad as she rode homeward. She met Morley Briancourt on the lawn. He came to her with a smile, and lifted her from the saddle.

"Where have you been, fair Eleanor?"
 "To Briarfield, Morley; and Hugh Latimer is very ill with the fever," said Eleanor, sorrowfully.

"Briarfield—Hugh Latimer!" Morley Briancourt's brow, unseen by her, grew dark. And while she went to her room to change her dress, he went to the baronet in the library. Whatever demand he had to make there, was acceded to with obedient readiness by Sir Edward. When Eleanor returned below, she was met by her uncle, who said to her:

"Eleanor, you have been to Briarfield, I hear, where—" He paused; then he added: "I do not wish to hear of your going there again, for the present, or to Woodthorpe, either, until I give you permission."

"Not go there again!"
 "You hear me." And he returned to the library.

"He is apprehensive concerning you," said Morley Briancourt, in a low tone. "You will yourself, he fears, be in danger of taking the fever."

And Eleanor thought that was the true reason.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

IRON BUILDING, WASHINGTON ST.

The accompanying engraving, drawn for our paper, represents accurately the exterior facade of the new and magnificent iron building, 164 Washington Street, recently erected for the occupancy of Messrs. Parker Fowle & Sons, carpet importers, and which is such a brilliant addition to the architecture of the great thoroughfare on which it stands. This superb structure was built from the designs and under the supervision of Mr. Shepherd S. Woodcock, the architect, and is a fine specimen of his taste and ability. The front, as will be seen, is exceedingly ornate, the pilasters being of the Corinthian order, with richly moulded capitals. It has been painted in imitation of marble, with such skill as to deceive the eye of even a practised connoisseur. The balconies and balustrades are bronzed, and have a very rich effect. The skill and taste of the architect have not been exhausted on the exterior; on the contrary, the interior is worthy in every respect of the outside, and its arrangement shows the architect to be a thoroughly practical man. The entire building is occupied by Messrs. Parker Fowle & Sons. The basement floor is 120 feet by 30 feet, and is appropriated to the painted carpet business. The first floor, of the same dimensions, is used for ingrain carpets. The second, third, fourth and fifth floors are each 85 feet by 30 feet, and are appropriated as follows: The second is used for displaying tapestries and Brussels carpets, rugs, etc.; of these, there is a fine assortment of rich and varied patterns and admirable workmanship. The third floor is appropriated to the exhibition of yet more costly fabrics, such as the French moquettes, Wiltons, medallions and velvets. The fourth floor is used for cutting out and making up carpets; while the fifth and sixth are devoted to general storage, for which purpose they are specially adapted. The firm have been engaged in business in the same location for upwards of a quarter of a century, and the establishment is the oldest carpet stand in the city. They keep a general assortment of everything appertaining to the carpet business, and enjoy a well-merited reputation. They employ gentlemanly salesmen who have had large experience, and upholders who are unequalled in putting down carpets. A very large capital is embarked in the business, which is completely up to the mark in every respect. The interior arrangement of the store is unsurpassed by that of any in the country. The shelving is arranged in racks, supported in front by iron pilasters, and can be raised or lowered to accommodate any width of carpeting. This is something entirely new—the invention of the architect, and, with the heavy cornice, has a splendid effect. We have been thus particular in describing this store, because we consider it a model establishment. The building is certainly a great ornament to the city. It will doubtless be followed by other structures in a similar style, as the material used combines lightness with strength and durability.

FOWLE'S NEW IRON BUILDING, NO. 164, WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

SHAKER VILLAGE, CANTERBURY, N.H.

The engraving below delineates the neat and plain settlement of the Shakers at Canterbury, New Hampshire, about ten miles east of Concord. Everything about it wears an air of peace and seclusion. This settlement was commenced in 1782, and has prospered till they number about 400. There are here three distinct families in temporal matters, though they are one in spiritual union. The houses are perfect models of neatness and simplicity. The land is tilled in the best manner; the animals are well provided for, and the barns, mills, everything, in short, connected with the establishment, are kept in apple-pie order. Among the articles manufactured by the Shakers, and for sale here to visitors, are wooden ware, feather brushes and pens, whips, baskets of various kinds, scises, bags, boxes formed of orange rind, cakes of wax and maple sugar, bottles of perfumes, essences and medicines, and coarser articles, together with Shaker publications. The school interests visitors very much, and the pupils appear to advantage when examined in any of their studies. The sect of Shaking Quakers originated at Manchester, England, about 1747, and has twice been transferred to America, where it now embraces a number of driving "families," as they are termed. The founders were obscure members of the Society of Friends, with whom they still agree in their rejection of ecclesiastical authority, in their refusal to do military duty and to take oaths, their rejection of the sacraments, and their belief in the immediate revelations of the Holy Ghost, which they term "gifts." They derive their popular name from the motions they observe as a part of their religious ceremonies; these were formerly excessively violent in their character—leaping, shouting and clapping of hands being freely indulged in. Their exercises are now more subdued; they move in a regular uniform dance, singing a hymn, marching round the hall of worship, and clapping their hands in regular time. We believe now some of the worshippers indulge in a rapid whirling motion, like that of the dancing derwishes of the East. Some of the hymns sung are utterly unintelligible to the "world's" people, as we outsiders are termed. In the Shaker communities, property is held in common, and the members enjoy a high character from their neighbors for industry, frugality, honesty and good morals. Celibacy is a cardinal law of the sect, and their numbers are increased by converts. Secessions are quite rare. When a convert relapses from a state of grace and goes out into the world again, the property he brought with him is refunded. Once in a while a young couple will leave the fold, and renouncing their old associations, unite themselves in holy wedlock. But such incidents, we believe are very infrequent. This sect was introduced into this country by Anne Lee, who was born at Manchester, Eng., in 1736, and was the daughter of an English blacksmith. She also married a blacksmith at an early age. In 1770, she had, as she asserted, a revelation enjoining celibacy as the perfection of human nature, and designating herself as a divine person. From this time she was called "Mother Anna," but styled herself "Anne the World." She and her followers being insulted and persecuted in England, came to this country in 1774, and formed the first community at Watervliet, near Albany. Here she died in 1784. Different "families" were soon after organized.

SHAKER VILLAGE, CANTERBURY, NEW HAMPSHIRE.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

TO A FRIEND.

BY THOMAS FATTON, JR.

I've often sat beneath some sylvan shade,
And watched the pearly moonbeams as they fell
In radiant beauty over stream and glade,
Disclosing hidden flowerets in each dell.

A little forest stream rolled smoothly on,
Its waters mirrored back the moon's pale ray
In beauteous splendor, as it onward run
To swell the music of its lulling lay.

It coursed its way through beds of perfumed flowers,
'Mong mimic valleys clothed in mossy green,
Inhaling from each scene the richest dowers,
Till soon it mingled with its mother stream.

O may thy future life as smoothly flow,
As placid as that fairy streamlet's tide;
O may thy path be lit with friendship's glow,
And through the ills of earth triumphant ride.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

A SMUGGLER IN SPITE OF HIMSELF.

BY FREDERICK W. SAUNDERS.

"WHEN I was a youngster like yourself," said Grummet, laying aside his pipe, and settling back into a comfortable position for a yarn, "when I was a youngster like yourself, I was troubled with a chronic and irrepressible desire to see the world. Not that you young chaps of now-a-days call seeing the world, which means being up to all the expensive wickedness that's adrift in a big city. My desire was to travel, to visit foreign lands, and see with my own eyes the notable places of which I had read. My circumstances not being such as would admit of my assuming the character of a tourist, I was forced to east about for some other means of gratifying my propensity, and, as a matter of course, chose the life of a sailor. A very few voyages served to convince me that, by stopping by a ship from the time she left home till she returned, very little of interest was to be seen; sea-port towns and ports of entry being much the same all the world over. To obviate this difficulty, I made it a point to ship only in vessels from which I could be discharged on arriving at their destination, when, with the pay for the trip, and whatever profitable articles for the trip I had brought, I turned my back upon tar buckets and marlin-spikes, and wandered economically through the interior, seeing the sights and enjoying myself generally, until a pocket colic drove me once more to the seaside to recruit.

"A vagabond tramp of this kind through Wales had reduced my finances to so low an ebb, that, upon arriving at Liverpool I was in some doubt whether to enjoy a day or two's pleasuring in London, with what money I had remaining, or at once to take a ship where I was.

"Revolving this subject in my mind, I sauntered leisurely up Waterloo Road, looking at the flags of the shipping, and amusing myself by picking out the vessels of various nations by their rig, when, as I came abreast of Waterloo dock gate, a hand was laid upon my shoulder, and a cheery voice called out:

"Hallo, Jack! where you off to, now?"

"Slewing on my heel, I found myself face to face with Harry Williams, a former shipmate whom I had not met for several years. "Tip us your daddle, will ye—the sight of you is good for sore eyes, or well ones either, for that matter. Where have you kept yourself this thousand years, my hold pup? I thought the sharks had you years ago."

"Returning the cordial gripe of his hand, for I am always glad to run afoul an old shipmate, I favored him with my opinion that the shark was not yet spawned that would make a supper of me.

"I hope not," he continued, hooking his arm in mine, as together we walked up the street. "But what are you doing now? walking out for your health?"

"I acquainted him with the particulars of my late tramp, and also that I was on the lookout for a ship.

"O, don't be in a hurry to ship just yet," he replied. "Wages will be higher in a day or two, and it will pay you well to wait ashore for a while. You have nothing particular to do this afternoon?"

"I replied in the negative.

"What do you say to a little sail down the harbor? I've a boat waiting for me at the stairs by the old church; there are several little matters that I want to attend to down below; and besides, there is a fine barque outside, waiting for a crew. I've some notion of going in her myself, and there'll be a chance for you, too, if you like. We will have a squint at her as we come along back."

"Is there any one going besides yourself?" I asked, without any particular interest, but merely to carry on the conversation.

"Yes, there are a couple of chaps waiting in the boat now."

"Do I know them?"

"No—I reckon not," he replied, "but that needn't make any difference—they are bricks, both of them."

"Having nothing else to occupy my time, I consented to make one of the party, and we walked rapidly toward the stairs. Harry Williams, who had, as I before remarked, been a former shipmate of mine—was a tall, finely-built fellow, over whose handsome face a good-natured smile constantly flitted, and which required only the least little bit of provocation to increase to a merry and very catching laugh. He was an excellent seaman, and his imperious good humor, his willingness to oblige, and his contempt of danger, won him hosts of friends wherever he went; yet, notwithstanding all these good qualities—indeed, I may say in consequence of them—he was not the man to whose guidance a very cautious man would yield himself implicitly. He was too fond of danger for the mere sake of the excitement it afforded, and so careless of consequences that, without intending any evil, he would be likely to draw a person into a scrape from which he might find it much more difficult to extricate himself, than would Harry with his genius for such things. His propensity for having a hand in every new thing that offered either profit or excitement, and his aptitude in everything he undertook, was so great, that I should not have been in the least surprised had I, instead of meeting him that day, been informed that he had become a parson and gone as a missionary to the heathen, or transformed himself into a notorious but not very blood-thirsty pirate. In either case, I should have said, 'just what I expected of him,' and meant it, too. Indeed, such was the versatility of his genius, that I have no doubt he might have accommodated himself to both professions, practising each on alternate days, and have given perfect satisfaction to his parishioners in the one case, and made a most exemplary pirate in the other.

"Upon arriving at the stairs we found the boat waiting, and jumping on board, we hoisted sail and were soon running swiftly down by the city. The two 'bricks' who Harry had informed me were to be our companions, I found to be a couple of very ordinary sailor chaps, with nothing very remarkable about them, either for good or evil; there appeared, however, to be a pretty good understanding between them and Harry, for a good deal of blind talk passed between them, which to me was perfectly unintelligible, and to which, indeed, I paid but little attention, thinking it none of my business, and being otherwise engaged in looking at the shipping.

"The sail was a very pleasant one, for the afternoon was remarkably fine and clear, while a brisk breeze from the northward drove us swiftly down the Mersey, giving us a fine view of Liverpool on the one side and Birkenhead on the opposite shore. Down through the fleet of vessels lying at anchor in the stream, our little craft danced merrily on. Down the broad river we sped with flowing sheet, until, reaching the mouth of the Mersey, the gentle swell of the Irish Sea broke in foamy wreaths beneath our prow, and by sunset, the blue mountain peaks of Wales were well on our larboard beam, as we headed for Anglesea Island. I had been too much absorbed by the beauty of the scenery to give much heed to the distance we were running, but as it began to grow dark it struck me as being rather singular that no preparations were made for putting back, and I said as much to Harry.

"Didn't I tell you I had some business to attend to down below?" he asked, exchanging significant glances with the other two men.

"Yes, but what the deuce do you call down below? At the rate we are going now, we shall be on the coast of Ireland before morning; if that is your destination, say so at once."

"No, not quite so had as that; we haven't to go that far," he replied, with his merry laugh, which was echoed by the other men, who winked knowingly at each other.

"And the barque that was laying in the stream waiting for her crew, that we were to get a squint at, how about that?" I asked, rather sharply, for I began to see that I had been deceived.

"O, we'll have a look at her as we go back?"

"But it will be dark when we return."

"True—I had forgotten that," he replied, laughing as though it was the funniest thing in the world. "We'll go and look at the barque to-morrow, next week, when she comes back from her next voyage, or most any time."

"As he spoke, he put the tiller down, heading the boat away from Anglesea, and toward the coast of Ireland.

"Look here, Williams," said I, getting my temper up to concert pitch, "I don't like this style of doing business. I want to understand what all this means, before I go any further."

"There, there, Jack, don't get into a pet, my pup," he said; giving the tiller to one of the other men and seating himself by my side in the waist. "It was rather hard to kidnap you, that's a fact; but you see I was afraid to mention what I wanted of you, on shore, for fear you wouldn't come, and being in too much of a hurry to hunt up another good man, I was in a manner compelled to do as I have done."

"Well, what the deuce do you want of me?" I asked, not at all mollified, for it isn't pleasant to any one to be entrapped and made a fool of.

"Simply this, Jack. I want you, when you go into Liverpool to-morrow morning, to have just one hundred and fifty dollars more in your pocket than you have now—that's all."

"Nonsense," I growled, "do you suppose you can make me believe you can raise such a sum, or what is still less likely, that you will let me have it?"

"It's as true as preaching, nevertheless, only I don't intend to give it to you—I mean you shall earn it, and we all expect to earn a like sum, a hundred and twenty sovereigns for the job is the tune we dance to: to be divided equally among us four chaps. You needn't think I should have taken you into partnership, to make the shares smaller, if we hadn't been obliged to; we shall be obliged to pull four oars going back, and that's the way you are to earn the money, my lion's cub, so you may thank me for getting you on to a good lay."

"And what is this wonderful job?" I asked.

"Why—a very ordinary kind of job indeed. There is a sharp old gentleman with a hooked nose and of the Hebrew persuasion who does a little in the fancy goods line, up in Liverpool, and happening to have several packages of lace and jewelry knocking about somewhere between here and the coast of Ireland, he is naturally anxious to get them into his shop to-night, for fear they may get damaged by salt water or something, and as they are rather valuable, he is willing to pay the sum I have mentioned."

"To make a long story short, you intend to smuggle them, and expect me to assist you?"

"Well, if you like to call things by such wicked names, you've hit the nail on the head."

"I shall have nothing at all to do with the affair," I replied, stoutly.

"O, yes, you will, Jack," he returned. "I don't see, for my part, how you can very well avoid it; here you are in the boat, without a possibility of getting out until we get back to Liverpool with the goods."

"I shall hail the first craft we meet, and state the case to them."

"In that way you'll bite your own nose off with a vengeance, don't you see? If you were to do such a silly thing as that, when the craft you hailed came alongside, each of us would swear he was the man that hailed, and there would be a couple or three years in choker for the bunch of us, so the best thing for you is to lead us a hand and take your money like a good boy."

"I saw that I was in a tight place, and that the easiest way to get out of it was to lend a hand to accomplish the business as speedily as possible. I was, nevertheless, highly indignant at the means taken to bring me into the scrape, and in moody silence I seated myself apart from the rest, refusing to join in their conversation, and answering their questions only in snappish monosyllables. Not that I had any scruples of conscience as to the sin of doctoring the revenue a bit, but a disagreeable recollection of a dreary three months passed in the gloomy French prison at Liverpool, for the horrible crime of taking a pound of tobacco through the dock gates, without paying the queen for the privilege, made me dread with many forebodings, the years which I should probably pass in the same institution, for the much greater crime in which I was an unwilling accomplice.

"By this time it had become quite dark, there being no moon, and some light, fleecy clouds that had been gathering in the north-west, now began to drift slowly across the heavens, obscuring the dim starlight. We continued to run seaward nearly an hour longer, by which time, as near as I could judge by the light, we had made a distance of from forty-five to fifty miles from the city, when the helm was suddenly put hard down, bringing the boat into the wind, and shivering her sail in the breeze. Harry now stepped forward to the bow, and taking from the cuddy a small dark lantern, lifted the slide, letting a bright ray of light from a powerful lens stream far over the water, and almost instantly closed it again. This was repeated three times at intervals of about a minute, my companions, meanwhile, looking eagerly through the darkness ahead.

"In a short time a signal precisely similar to the one we had shown, was made about three points off our larboard bow, at an apparent distance of about two miles.

"All right so far," said Harry, with an air of satisfaction, which was echoed by the other two men.

"The sail was again filled away, and keeping the boat's head nearly as possible in the direction of the signal which had answered ours, we continued to run something like twenty minutes, when we found ourselves within hail of a small schooner, which was laying to.

"Hard down your helm," said Harry, in a low voice, and again our craft was run up into the wind.

"Boat ahoy!" hailed a voice from the schooner.

"Hulloa!"

"Where are you bound?"

"To the moon," replied Harry; "how shall we find it, full or not?"

"Fall," responded the voice. "How is it where you come from, light or dark?"

"Dark as your pocket."

"All right," was the reply from the schooner.

"And with a few strokes of the oars we were alongside, and a rope was made fast to her fore-shroud. Harry sprang upon her deck, and an examination of his credentials having proved satisfactory, four packages, weighing some fifty or sixty pounds each, nicely done up and sealed, were passed over into our boat.

"Good night," said Harry, as we shoved the boat away from the vessel's side.

"A safe passage to you, boys," replied the voice from the schooner; "you'll have to look out sharp for yourselves."

"No fear of us—look out for yourself," was replied, as we quickly drifted out of sight and hearing.

"Now then, Jack," said Harry, slapping me encouragingly on the shoulder.

"Yes—to a home that we shall find it rather difficult to quit for a few years, in my opinion. I've not the remotest idea that we can get these goods ashore without being taken. I've seen the thing tried too many times without success, to believe it can be accomplished now."

"O, don't always be looking on the dark side of the picture. I've travelled this road quite a number of times without breaking my shins, and if things go badly to-night, why we can slip the duds overboard in the dark, and they are heavy enough to go quietly to the bottom."

"In which case we may think ourselves lucky to get off with an acquittal after several months' imprisonment and a trial on suspicion. I tell you what it is, Williams, I consider it a contemptible thing in you to entrap me into this scrape, and though I shall lend a hand to get the thing accomplished as soon as possible in order to get out of the affair, yet I do not sanction any such proceedings, neither do I wish any of the proceeds."

"As you choose, Jack," he replied, a little nettled by my speech, for, not feeling anything like fear himself, he could not understand what must have seemed to him my foolish obstinacy, and walking aft, he seated himself in the sternsheets, leaving me to my reflections.

"The breeze freshened considerably as the night advanced, but being fair, we were only too glad to have it blow a gale, and after three hours smart sailing we were up with the mouth of the Mersey. Our course lay through the fleet of vessels riding at anchor, and by the city where the ever watchful eyes of the revenue officials were constantly on the alert to detect anything bearing the slightest resemblance to contraband traffic. Here our danger commenced—could we pass the city unobserved all would be well.

"Lower the sail and strike the mast," said Harry, in a low tone. "We must trust to our oars now, my lads, and be prepared for any emergency; the sail, although it would help us greatly, would be likely to be seen, and create suspicion."

"The mast was struck, the sail stowed as silently as possible, and with muffled oars we bent to our work, impelling the boat through the water at a rate which only a consciousness of our danger could have enabled us to compass. In silence and under cover of the darkness we had already accomplished half the distance, when one of the thole pins in the forward rowlock broke off with a sharp crack, precipitating the bow oarsman into the bottom of the boat with considerable violence and with not a little noise. He was not at all injured, however, and the pin being immediately replaced, we kept on our way. But the disturbance had attracted the attention of those we had the most cause to dread.

"Who goes there?" hailed a voice not more than a hundred fathoms from us. "What boat is that? Stop, or we'll fire into you!"

"Pull! pull!" whispered Harry, in an excited tone, and we bent to the oars with the vigor of desperation.

"A flash, a report, and a musket ball crashed through the sides of the boat.

"Stop! or we'll blow you out of water!" exclaimed the voice again.

"Down with you, my lads," said Harry, in his usual tone, for there was no longer any use in keeping silent; and following his example we all tumbled together into the bottom of the boat.

"Nor were we at all too soon, for the next instant a volley of musket balls pattered over the upper works of our boat, but being ourselves below the water line, we escaped uninjured.

"Now's your time, my boys!" exclaimed Harry, springing to his feet and seizing an oar. "We can gain on them while they are reloading, and perhaps dodge them in the darkness."

"We needed no second command, but buckled to our work with a will. All hope of escape seemed lost to us, however, when the occupants of the revenue boat astern struck a blue light, flooding the whole river with its lurid glare, and showing our position as clearly as though it had been noonday. One of our men seized one of the packages of goods with the intention of casting it overboard, but Harry kicked his hand away, and with an impatient gesture motioned us to continue rowing. There was no chance of avoiding our pursuers by any method we could suggest, and so we mechanically obeyed him.

"They pull six oars," he muttered, glancing uneasily astern, "we can't run away; however, I don't despair of fixing them yet."

"As the blue light, which had burned several minutes, began to fade, Harry shifted his oar from the after rowlock to the stern, where it could be used as a steering oar, and upon the light disappearing altogether, he suddenly turned the boat's head directly across the stream, which course we pursued until a feeble glimmer from the pursuing boat showed that another light was about being struck, then directing our course directly down stream, and aided by the strong current we ran alongside the hull of a steamer that had been launched the day before, keeping the steamer between us and our pursuers, and by the time the light had acquired sufficient strength to render objects distinct, we were holding on to the paddles, completely hid from their sight.

"It was natural to suppose that a four-oared boat, in endeavoring to escape from one impelled by six, would pull with the stream, and toward the shore, until an opportunity offered for landing. This appeared to be the opinion of the revenue officers, for upon missing us, they turned and pulled rapidly down stream, with the evident intention of heading us off when—as they expected—we should emerge from the fleet of vessels among which we had vanished. By this manoeuvre we placed something like a quarter of a mile between us, and added materially to our chance of escape. But although we were lost to the sight of our first pursuers, we were in plain view from the shore, and by the lights that were now kept constantly burning, we had the satisfaction of seeing several boats leave the side of the docks, and pull toward us.

"Up with the sail, boys, and be lively about it; then man the oars for your lives," cried Harry, pushing our boat into the stream.

"Never was order more promptly executed, and, with our large sail drawing in the stiff breeze, together with our frantic efforts at the oar, we dashed along at a wonderful rate; but the revenue boats, having the advantage both in build and an additional pair of masts, gained slowly but surely upon us. Onward flew our little craft—past the ships in the harbor, past the city, till its multitudes of lights glimmered feebly in the distance—up the broad Mersey we held our way, the fleet of pursuing boats coming fearfully nearer and nearer, until we got fairly into the country, where the banks of the river shelved down to the water.

"Stand by to grab your bundles and land," shouted Harry, in a fever of excitement.

"And with one stroke of the steering oar, he drove the prow of our boat high on to the bank. Following his example, each one of us seized a package, and with the speed of men flying for their liberty, we darted up the bank and across the country. A volley of shots from the revenue boats whizzed around us, but without inflicting any injury, and the pursuit was kept up for some time on shore, but Harry's perfect knowledge of the locality enabled us to dodge them with the greatest ease.

"Having finally got rid of them by starting them on a false scent, we walked rapidly on, making a wide circuit to enter the suburbs of the city on the landward side. I, poor miserable, filthy alley and down another we followed our guide, through what would have been a perfect labyrinth to a stranger, and fortunately without meeting a policeman, which saved us the trouble and danger of poking him over, until we reached a wretched, tumble-down building in the worst quarter of the city. At the door of this rookery Harry gave a peculiar knock, which at once procured us admittance, and leading the way up stairs as though he was familiar with the place, we deposited our burdens upon a table in a well lighted and furnished apartment.

"So dish ish de goods, eh? All right and safe," said a greedy-looking Hebrew, examining the seals of the packages to see if they were not broken.

"Yes—my jolly child of Israel, there are the goods, and trouble enough we've had to get them, so shell out the rocks as quick as you can possibly make it convenient, for I want to disperse, I do," said Harry, rapping the table with his knuckles to enforce his request.

"The Jew, having satisfied himself that nothing had been abstracted from the packages, drew from a safe a bag of coin, and slowly counted out a hundred and twenty gold sovereigns.

"There, boys, is your money," said Harry, dividing the coin into four separate piles, one of which he pocketed; then turning to me, he extended his hand with, "we're as good friends as ever, ain't we, Jack?"

"I looked in his handsome, good-humored face, then at the money spread so temptingly before me, and thought what a fool I should be to bite my own nose off for a little spite. So I pocketed the money and the affront, wrung Harry's hand, and slipping out of the house, made my way unobserved to my old boarding place. The early train next morning carried me to London, and that money stood me in for a cheap, but very pleasant summer trip up the Rhine."

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

A CURE FOR DESPONDENCY.

BY MRS. E. WELLMONT.

"PLEASE, sir, take me over the crossing," said a little, faint voice, as I was leisurely taking my morning walk.

The strange request aroused me from my reverie, and looking imploringly in my face stood a thin, shivering little girl, who carried a small bundle, which she held in her hand with singular tenacity. I gave a searching look into the child's face while she imploringly repeated:

"Will you take me over the crossing, quick, sir? I'm in such a hurry!"

Tossing her in my arms I bounded over the muddy pathway, and just as I set down my little charge, the bundle slipped from her grasp, or rather its contents, leaving the empty paper in her hand and an embroidered vest upon the sidewalk. I picked up the vest, and in doing so, unrolled the same, when lining, sewing-silk and padding were all disengaged, so that the nimble fingers of the poor child picked up and brushed and packed them together again with scrupulous care, and tying them firmly she gave me a sweet smile and bounded along. She would soon have passed from my sight, had I not again called after her, and interrogated her why she made such haste.

"O, sir," she replied, "because my mother must have expected me an hour ago. I have been waiting for the young gentleman at the tailor's shop to decide which color he preferred, and then the tailor told me to stop while he cut it, and then he gave me such a beautiful pattern for my mother to embroider it by—but it's a sight of work to do it, sir, and I'm afraid she will sit up all the long nights to sew, while I am sleeping, for the man said he must have it completed by next Thursday; the young gentleman is to be married then, and will want it—and if it isn't done, maybe he would never give mother another stitch of work, and then what would become of us?"

And as the child hurried on I caught the same quickened footsteps, and followed on until we came to another crossing, when again came the beseeching tone:

"Will you take me over this crossing, too, sir?"

It was done in a trice, and my interest in the child increased as her prattle continued:

"Mamma is to have two whole dollars for this work, and she means to buy me a new frock with a part of the money, and then we shall have a great loaf of bread and a cup of milk, and mother will spend time to eat with me—and if there is any money left, she says I shall have a little open-work straw bonnet and go to Sunday school with Susy Niles."

And her little feet scarcely touched the walk, so swift and fairy-like was her tread.

"And does your mother work for one man all the time, little girl?" I inquired.

"O, no, sir; it is only now and then she gets such a nice job—most of the time she has to sew for shop-shops, where she earns but about ten or twelve cents a day, and then she has hardly enough to pay her rent, and it isn't all the time we get enough to eat—but then mother always gives me the big slice when there is one great and one little one; sometimes she cries, and don't eat her's at all."

A coach was passing—the child looked toward it and remarked:

"I know the lady in that pretty carriage—she is the very one that is going to marry the young gentleman who is to wear this embroidered vest. She came to my home yesterday to get my mother to spangle the wreath round her white satin dress, and it's just the same pattern that is to be put on the vest—but she could not do it, 'cause her eyesight is poor and the spangles shined so."

My tongue was silent—could it be that these were the very articles which were to be worn at my Ellen's wedding? For did I not pay for two ounces of spangles yesterday, and what was it that vexed Ellen so but because she could not find anybody to sew them on when she returned? She said Mrs. Taggard was almost blind.

"My little girl," said I, "is your name Taggard?"

"Yes, sir—Gusta Taggard, and we live down in Bleak Court. Are you going home with me?"

It was a sensible conjecture, for why else should I follow on.

"I am going to see you safely at the door and to help you over all the crossings."

"There's only one more, sir, and here it is—we live down there at No. 3, on the basement floor. Maybe you would come with the missionary some time and see us."

The child looked kindly, and, as she sweetly bade me "good-by, sir," I thrust my hand in my pocket and drew from it all the change it contained, which was a bright fifty-cent piece, and placing it in her little palm, "Gusta Taggard" gave me her heartfelt thanks, and was soon out of my sight.

An hour before, I had started from my home an invalid. I had long deliberated whether an exposure to a chilly east wind would not injure rather than improve me. I was melancholy, too; my only daughter was about to be married—there was confusion all over the house—the event was to be celebrated in fashionable style. Ellen's dress had cost what would have been a fortune to this poor seamstress, and I moralized. But I had forgotten myself—the cough which had troubled me was no longer oppressive; I breathed quite freely and yet I had walked more briskly than I had done for months, without so much fatigue as slow motion occasioned—so that when I returned, my wife rallied me upon looking ten years younger than when I left her in the morning; and when I told her the specific lay in my walk with a little prattle and the satisfaction of having left her happier than I found her, she took the occasion to press the purchase for Ellen of a diamond brooch, affirming if the gift of fifty cents made me so much happier, and that, too, to a little errand street girl, what would fifty times that amount confer upon one's only daughter, upon the eve of her marriage?

I gave the diamond brooch—I paid the most extravagant bills to upholsterers, dry goods establishments, confectioners and musicians with which to enliven the great occasion, and yet I found more satisfaction in providing for the real wants of little Gusta Taggard and her mother than in all the splendid outlay at the wedding ceremony; and it was not that it cost less which made the satisfaction, but it was that a' extravagant outlays, in the very nature of things, are unsatisfactory, while ministering to the necessities of the truly needy and industrious confers its own reward.

I had seen the glittering spangled dress—but it was made ready by some poor, emaciated sufferer, who toiled on in patient trust, and the embroidered vest was finished by the strained vision and aching head of another, who was emphatically one of "God's poor," upon whom blight nor disgrace had fallen, save by His appointment, and the diamond brooch was borne off with admiring throngs but to be envied and coveted, while the simple fifty cents bestowed upon my little street acquaintance, had introduced me to a new species of enjoyment which never cloy in the retrospect or causes uneasiness in the prospective. I had learned to do good in small ways—my morning walks have now an object and aim. I pass by splendid palaces to hasten to Bleak Court, and thence on to yet other sources of enjoyment, so that my invalidism is fast leaving me by the new direction which is given to my thoughts.

I am free to acknowledge that while I cheerfully pay for flannel robes, and whalebone skirts, and opera hats, and jewels, and silver ware, and servants, and all the requirements which fashion imposes, I derive far less pleasure from surveying them, than in sitting beside some worthy recipient of charity, who tells me that the little sum "you gave me saved me from despair and self-destruction, and enabled me to become helpful, so that no other assistance is now necessary." Such a confession fills a void which administering to luxury never can; and all this satisfaction originated in first helping a little child over the crossing.

CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY.

Encouraged by the unprecedented success which this popular monthly has met with, and the rapidly with which it has increased its circulation, the proprietor has resolved to make it still more worthy of the patronage of the public. That this admirable work is a MIRACLE OF CHEAPNESS, is admitted by every one, containing, as it does, one hundred pages of reading matter in each number, and forming two volumes a year of six hundred pages each, or twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for ONE DOLLAR!

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY is printed with new type, upon fine white paper, and its matter is carefully compiled and arranged by the hands of the editor and proprietor, who has been known to the public as connected with the Boston press for nearly fifteen years. Its pages contain from the best and most popular writers in the country. It is also spiced with a record of the notable events of the times, of peace and war, of discoveries and improvements occurring in either hemisphere, forming an agreeable companion for a leisure moment or hour anywhere, at home or abroad, each number being complete in itself.

NEWS, TALES, POEMS, STORIES OF THE SEA, SKETCHES, MISCELLANY, ADVENTURES, BIOGRAPHIES, WIT AND HUMOR.

No sectarian subjects are admitted into its pages: there are enough controversial publications, each devoted to its peculiar sect or clique. This work is intended for THE MILLION, north or south, east or west, and is filled to the brim each month with chaste, popular and graphic miscellany, just such as any father, brother or friend would place in the hands of a family circle. It is in all its departments, fresh and original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive a copy gratis.

Sample copies sent when desired.
M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
Corner of Tremont and Bromfield Sts., Boston, Mass.

THE CITY OF CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

The views on this and the succeeding page were drawn for us by Mr. Kilburn, and are some of the fruits of his recent tour undertaken for the purpose of procuring fresh and authentic material for the pages of our paper. Our cities and towns change so rapidly in the fiery progress of the day, that a picture of a settlement taken last year would exhibit a totally different scene from one sketched to-day. We have labored in these transcripts of nature, to ensure accuracy in every case. Chicago is one of the most flourishing cities of the West. It is situated at the mouth of the Chicago River, on the borders of Lake Michigan, surrounded on all but the lake side, by open, flat prairie. In rapidity of growth it has far outstripped all the cities of the Western States. Twenty-six or seven years ago, the present city consisted merely of the enclosure of Fort Dearborn, and the oldest native of Chicago cannot be over thirty years of age. Our large picture represents Fort Dearborn and the block-house, the last relics of ancient Chicago, which are now being demolished. In the centre is seen the block-house, a building of heavy timbers, with narrow loopholes for light and defence, the appearance of which carries one back to the days of the early settlers, who not only had to fight against the difficulties of the inhospitable wilderness, but to arm themselves, and use their greatest exertions against the Indians. At the right of the picture is seen the light house, and near it the light-keeper's house. To the left, immediately over the buildings of the fort, is the marine hospital, a fine, commodious structure, while in the rear are glimpses of some of the buildings of the modern city. "Early in the present century," says a writer in Putnam's Magazine, "an officer of the United States army, stationed at Green Bay, was ordered, with the troops under his command, to the Lower Mississippi, on what was known at that time as our Spanish frontier. A similar order would now

Fort Dearborn, at the mouth of the Chicago River. He remembers his uncle's voyage, and recognizes the site of his unexpectedly fortunate portage. The Illinois canal, proposing to render this connection permanent, was already talked of, though the forests that skirted the banks of the river still afforded a refuge to Black Hawk and his warriors. It was an unpromising place for the site of a future city. A dead level stretch of prairie, lying but a few feet above the level of the river, most of it undrained swamp, of that species called wet prairie, where the water stands from one to four feet deep, the rest of it but little better. But still bearing in mind the portage, and youthful fancy being on the whole confirmed by maturer judgment, a patch of swamp was duly bargained for, and thus arose a fortune in Chicago." Owing to the rapid, the almost electric growth of this city, hundreds have acquired large fortunes by the rise of lands, who bought ten or twelve years ago, when it was cheap. Notwithstanding its infancy, in 1850 it had a population of 26,000. The present population is not far from 90,000. It is the great centre of an immense trade which flows into its lap from its position upon the lake, and from the great chain of railroads which centre here and connect all parts of the West and Northwest with the city of the lakes. The immense travel and trade from the East passes through this place, and far-seeing men assert that its present prosperity will prove but a faint shadow of its future greatness. Our next picture is a view of the reservoir, on Adams Street. The water used in the city is pumped from the lake into the reservoir, and thence distributed. The general level of the city does not require any great elevation in the reservoir, and the style of the building affords a pleasing contrast to the massive square structures usually erected for that purpose. We present a view of the West Market. It is a fine brick building, with a tower of a graceful and unique be given by the telegram from Washington on Monday morning; by Wednesday morning the troops would take their places in the cars; and by Saturday night, they would be all safely lodged—barring collisions and explosions—in their destined quarters. How long this letter might have been on its way from New York to Green Bay I cannot say; but a letter from the same officer, written at Fort Adams, on the Mississippi, some years afterwards, regrets that he cannot visit his friends in the States, as he could only get leave of absence for six months, which would hardly give him time to go and return. The prescribed method of travel from Green Bay to the Mississippi in those days, was to load in light boats and canoes; coast southward along nearly the length of Lake Michigan, then, ascending as far as practicable some of the streams which enter the lake on the west side, to make a portage (that is, carry by main strength both boats and freight) to some of the head waters of the Illinois, there to be re-launched and descend to the Mississippi. On this occasion it was spring, and the streams were swollen with the melting snows. As the party ascended the one selected for this purpose, they found it had overflowed far beyond its banks, converting the level prairie into a broad lake. The head-waters of the Illinois had overflowed and mingled with the stream running into Lake Michigan, and the voyageurs, in crossing in boats their usual portage-ground, passed from the tributaries of the St. Lawrence to those of the Gulf of Mexico. A portage in the wilderness is a serious matter—to be avoided if possible—and dreaded, if inevitable; and especially must this be the case, when not only the light canoe and scanty equipments of the voyager and trapper are to be transported, but when heavy boats, with the arms and provisions of a large body of troops are to be carried by the main strength of men across the wilderness. The piece of good fortune above mentioned, therefore, did not fail to make an impression on the minds of the travellers, and the officer, writing to his brother in Connecticut, dwells upon it at length. Now mark the Yankee. A nephew, then a stripling, reads the letter, and calculates there is a chance for a good 'location.' Twenty-five years afterwards, so it happened, the nephew, then himself an officer, was stationed at pattern. It is situated in the centre of West Randolph Street. The lower part is used for a market, and the upper is occupied by police station No. 2, and a large hall. There is a plenty of building material in the city. At a few feet depth, the soil is clay, of a quality to make good brick. About twenty miles from the city, on the line of the Illinois canal, is found limestone of a pale yellow tint, fine grained and easily wrought. Various other stones suitable for building, can be readily obtained. Our last scene is sketched through this and the other streets greatly impresses a stranger. Everything seems in a whirl of excitement—a lounge is never seen, and each person you meet looks as if intent on some pressing and important business. A bridge is in the process of erection in Randolph Street, as will be seen by the posts, etc., in the centre of our view. The large building beyond is the West Market, of which we have just given a separate delineation. Randolph Street, and, indeed, all the streets of the city, are planked and provided with sidewalks of the same material. As the site is so perfectly level and so little elevated from the surface of the lake, the drainage is imperfect. To remedy this defect, the city is being gradually raised, and the new buildings placed at an elevation of about four feet, which renders the sidewalks very uneven, the passenger being obliged to ascend and descend these elevations by steps and inclined planes. The streets are wide and commodious, and have nothing of that new and unfinished look which might be anticipated from the early age and unprecedented growth of the place. A fine view of the whole city is obtained from the top of the court house, and no stranger should neglect to make an observation from this elevation. An impartial survey will convince him that Chicago is not only a great, but a beautiful city. There is nothing probable to check the onward march of this important place. The same elements which have given it its present position, will continue to work out its future development, and the Chicago of half a century hence will afford as remarkable a contrast to the Chicago of to-day, as the city of to-day does to that of yesterday, and the influence it will exert upon the whole West cannot now be conceived.

LIGHT HOUSE, BLOCK HOUSE, AND MARINE HOSPITAL, AT CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

RESERVOIR, ADAMS STREET, CHICAGO.

MAKING A NEEDLE.

I wonder if any little girl who may read this ever thought how many people are all the time at work in making the things which they every day use. What can be more common, and you may think more simple, than a needle? Yet, if you do not know it, I can tell you that it takes a great many persons to make a needle; and it takes a great deal of time, too. Let us take a peep into a needle factory. In going over the premises, we must pass hither and thither, and walk into the next street and back again, and take a drive to a mill in order to see the whole process. We find one chamber of the shops is hung round with coils of bright wire, of all thicknesses, from the stout kinds used for cod-fish hooks to that for the finest cambric needles. In a room below, bits of wire, the length of two needles, are cut by a vast pair of shears fixed in the wall. A bundle has been cut off; the bits need straightening, for they come off from coils. The bundle is thrown into a red-hot furnace; then taken out, and rolled backward and forward on a table until the wires are straight. This process is called "rubbing straight." We now see a mill for grinding needles. We go down into the basement, and find a needle pointer seated on his bench. He takes up two dozen or so of the wires, and rolls them between his thumb and fingers, with their ends on the grindstone, first one end and then the other. We have now the wires straight and pointed on both ends. Next is a machine that flattens and gutters the heads of ten thousand needles an hour. Observe the little gutters at the head of your needle. Next comes the punching of the eyes, and the boy that does it punches eight thousand in an hour, and he does it so fast that your eyes can hardly keep pace with him. The splitting follows, which is running a fine wire through a dozen, perhaps, of these twin needles. A woman with a little anvil before her files between the heads and separates them. They are now completed needles, but rough and rusty, and what is worse, they easily bend. A poor needle, you would say. But the hardening comes next. They are heated in batches in a furnace, and, when red hot, are thrown into a pan of cold water. Next they must be tempered, and this is done by rolling them backwards and forwards on a hot metal plate. The polishing still remains to be done. On a very coarse cloth, needles are spread to the number of forty or fifty thousand. Emery dust is strewn over them, oil is sprinkled, and soft soap daubed by sponges over the cloth; the cloth is then rolled up hard, and, with several others of the same kind, thrown into a sort of wash pot, to roll to and fro for twelve hours or more. They come out dirty enough, but after a rinsing in clean hot water, and a tossing in saw dust, they look as bright as can be, and are ready to be assorted and put up for sale, which is quite a work by itself.—Household Words.

With the hand we demand, we promise, we call, dismiss, threaten, entreat, supplicate, deny, refuse, reckon, confess, express fear, express shame or doubt; we instruct, command, unite, swear, accuse, condemn, acquit, insult, defy, disdain, flatter, exalt, regale, applaud, bless, abuse, ridicule, gladden, afflict, discomfort, discourage, astonish, exclaim, indicate silence, and what not, with a variety, and multiplication that keeps pace with the tongue.—Montaigne.

WESTERN MARKET, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

AFRICAN SUPERSTITION.

When the father of a family dies among the Mendi tribe of Africans, it is said, all the servants and children of the family worship his spirit, and if he has been a great man, a chief or a warrior, many people will join with them. At first, the worship is frequent, but after a few weeks is observed only by appointment of the leading members of the family. For the first day or two the worship consists of short prayers mingled with wailing and mourning, but after that regular sacrifices and funeral prayers are made at the grave or by the side of the dead body. The first things offered are cloths and meats. Food is set before the body, and after burial, which takes place many weeks after death, it is set by the grave. If the dead man is a chief of note and power, fowls, sheep, goats and cattle are brought to the grave (over which there is a house built), and there killed with a formula of words, as if the dead were present, and the animals sacrificed had been given to him as presents. The flesh is then divided between the friends, and eaten in common—the liver, heart, or some other part, being cooked and set by the grave. If the deceased happens to be a warrior as well as chief, human sacrifices are offered to him, especially if he was killed in war, and forays are made at night to obtain victims, who are brought to the grave, and beheaded amid frantic shouts and frightful ceremonies. An instance is related that, when at the death of a warrior, six human beings were beheaded, morning and evening, for nearly two weeks, and a number of women were put to death in a cruel manner; and in the belief that the spirits of the dead are sometimes in the water, more than forty children were drowned at the close of the ceremonies. Thus deplorable are the practices to which they resort to testify their respect for the dead.—American Missionary.

THE PITTI PALACE.

Probably no palace in the world contains such an amount of wealth, including the picture galleries and the library, as the Pitti Palace at Florence. Connoisseurs declare that there is not a poor picture in the immense collection, and no doubt it is the choicest, if not the most valuable known. In 1843, Ferdinand, father of the reigning Leopold, offered the Pitti gallery to England for half a million of dollars—a price far, far below its value—this government being greatly in debt. Pitt, the English prime minister, refused the golden occasion, and it is to be hoped that Florence will never be despoiled of this, her crowning glory. The library was mostly collected by Ferdinand III., a curious and passionate amateur of scarce books, and numbers now over eighty thousand volumes. The selection of authors, quoted by the Academy della Crusca, is the most complete extant. There is a precious collection of ancient Italian mysteries. Magnificent works of art with colored plates, the best geographical maps ever made, numerous copies of blue and vellum paper, and a collection of Italian books on the fifteenth century, which comprises the rarest. The manuscripts, all Italian, are about fifteen hundred in number, among which are invaluable correspondences of Tasso, Machiavelli, Galileo, and others as famous. The massiveness and interior decorations of the building itself, the furniture—all richly gilded—and various pieces inlaid with gems, and the treasures of plate are almost priceless.

One large room is filled with gold and silver vessels, the gathered wealth of ages, many of them elaborately wrought in bas-relief figures, engravings or historiated, by Benvenuto Cellini, and other renowned artists. There are several Christs of different sizes, the largest two feet, in pure gold; others in silver and bronze, by John of Bologna—that wonderful modeller and artificer; there are immense plateaux and vases in the same precious metals, and each one a study for its expressive design and exquisite workmanship. But the richest and most curious treasure in the collection is a gold cathedral, some three feet in height, of perfect architecture, and divided within into little chapels, each having its altar and presiding priest, adorned with diamonds, emeralds, rubies and sapphires. Over the whole is suspended a gold Christ on a jewelled cross. This gem of the gems is kept under glass, and turns on a pivot for the benefit of inspecting visitors. Indeed, all these precious things are in glass cases, and most of them only expressive shows. In the modern department—as rich if not as rare as the antique—the plate used on state occasions is included. Among the sacred ornaments, there is one called the fontaine—a baby-Christ in a cradle of calcodon, the tiny figure itself of a stone resembling opal; the whole is of common baby-house size. This plate-room seems a fairy tale, but weighs solidly in the priceless worth of the whole establishment. Two of the long suit of saloons—there are in all over thirty—opened for the royal balls, were in part refurnished last year at an expense of $100,000. Nothing can exceed in richness some of this furniture: the chairs cost $100 each. The magnificent mirrors—reaching from the ceiling to the mosaic pier tables—hang facing each other, multiplying themselves and their branching wax-lights by reflection ad infinitum. The effect is magical.—Correspondent of Newark Advertiser.

VIEW IN RANDOLPH STREET, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

"I NE'ER ACKNOWLEDGED THEE!"—EASTER CONFESSION.

BY BLANCHE D'ARTOISE.

When childhood's bark was launched away,
My little lips were taught to pray,
The while I hent the knee;
In all creation God descried—
Nor in the whirlwind terrified,
Only remembered thee.

The world soon caught my rapturous gaze,
And fasting on it, all amaze,
I to it prostrate fell;
And glittering dance, and song, and mirth,
Chained down my spirit fast to earth;
The world—I loved it well.

And syron song, and visions bright,
To my wild spirit brought delight—
Delight I may not name;
And magic pages that unfold
All the mind's riches, deftly told,
Aroused a thirst for fame.

And one high spirit shared my joy,
And love seemed gold without alloy,
Pleasure unmixed with pain;
But in one moment snapped the cord—
Death stopped between us with his sword,
And tears and sighs were vain.

O blind, infatuate, sinful child,
Where is the faith, pure, undefiled,
That points the arm of Heaven?
But not in heaven or earth for me,
Could I one ray of comfort see,
One consolation even.

Alone, in that dread hour, alone—
Father, I wandered from thy throne,
In unbelief's dark shade;
With blind philosophy vainly sought
The peace with which thy Word is fraught—
Peace for the loved and dead.

Alone, to racking visions left,
Of joy, and hope, and love bereft,
Imagination's sway
Was boundless o'er the realms of night—
Despair and darkness chased the light
Of joy and peace away.

Thou, my Creator, knowest how wild,
Impulsive fancy sways thy child—
Thou only read'st the heart:
O, can it be thou wilt forgive
My life's mistake, and bid me live
To yet retrieve a part?

Thou, O my Father! hear, I pray,
Nor cast thy penitent child away,
E'en though I left thee quite;
Thou knowest few there are below,
Whose thoughts from the same fountain flow—
Whose very souls unite.

Confessing, wilt thou now forgive
The sin which all my life I grieve—
Loving a child of clay
Better than all thy gracious laws—
Better than thy most holy cause—
The life—the truth—the way.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE SUICIDE.

BY ARTHUR ELLINGWOOD.

It was about seven o'clock on the first day of May, when Jack Altamont arose from one of the longest benches in Hyde Park, and yawned. If you had asked Jack why he yawned, he could not possibly have told. It did not proceed from any drowsiness, for he had passed a good portion of the night on that same bench, as sound asleep as if he had been tucked up by his grandmother between a pair of lavender sheets. Neither did it arise from any fatigue, for he had absolutely done nothing at all for the last few days. It might have been a signal that he was going to speak, and had nothing in particular to found his remarks upon. Whether or no, he advanced a little, and indulged in the following soliloquy: "Ahem! A—hem! Auspicious commencement of the third day since my stomach has had any employment. By Jove! I must do something—but what? Here I have nine tragedies on my hands, all refused by every manager in this stupid town, besides all my poems in manuscript, and an immense amount of light literature; moreover, have tried my luck in every kind of business, and at present have not a cent in my pocket; with all my digging, I never could reach the root of all evil; money has always been a non sequitur with me; I never sold anything yet, but that I had to pay for it."

Here intervened another yawn, which was prolonged into a heart-mourning sigh, and finally ended in a most murderous groan.

"I wonder if suicide is practicable?"

He drew out a pistol from his pocket. Unfortunately there was nothing in it but a "Sonnet to an Eye," rolled up—the sonnet, not the eye—very carefully. This, however, did not seem to disconcert Mr. Altamont in the least. He sat attentively regarding this horrible instrument of destruction, and meditating, as was natural, in rather a gloomy vein:

"Perhaps I had better write my epitaph and put it in my coat pocket. It will lend a melancholy interest to the catastrophe, as well as assist the coroner's jury, who would otherwise pronounce my untimely decease in consequence of a surfeit of oyster-pie, or choked by a fish-bone; but on reflection, I believe I haven't any pencil. If now my rich old uncle would only turn up, who promised to make me his heir—by Jupiter! ecstatic thought!"

Here Mr. Altamont tossed up his pistol several times, catching it in the most remarkable fashion; but at last happening to get struck on the head, he resumed his speculations in time to see an old gentleman coming up the path. This very fat person was wiping his forehead with a red bandanna, and had, to Jack's infatuated eye, a most benevolent expression of countenance.

So, when he was within a short distance, Mr. Altamont—who in the meantime had been loosening his neckcloth, and assuming every imaginable cast of countenance, fixing at last upon the one in which Mr. Howard Harcourt, alias Dick Jones, is said to have faced death—rushed forward. The old gentleman stopped. Jack threw himself upon his knees, shut his eyes, and placed the pistols to his head, exclaiming:

"Thus do I end a miserable existence!"

This scene was intensely tragic. Imagine a young man upon his knees, his locks scattered to the wind, with a pistol in each hand—no, I mistake, he had only one; Jack had exchanged the other the week before for a mutton-chop. Imagine this Apollo, I say, threatening to discharge, not only those brains which had given birth to nine tragedies, one hundred and one poems, and a "Sonnet to an Eye," but also a double-barreled pistol! O!

Jack, as I said, was on his knees. Considering that his pants were worn rather thin in that place, this position was slightly painful, not to say embarrassing. He ventured to open one eye, and there he saw—O, confusion!—the fat man cramming his red handkerchief down his mouth, and trying to suppress his laughter, which shook him from head to foot.

"Ho! ho! ho! why don't you fire, my boy? Ho! ho! ho! I say, fire away there!" cried he, when he saw Jack's half opened eye. "Ho! ho! can't come it over me, hey, my fine fellow?"

The unfortunate suicide sprang up in a violent rage, inflamed at his own stupidity, and would have executed vengeance upon his tormentor, but that he took to his heels and soon disappeared, making the air resound with his violent guffaws.

"Confounded unlucky!" said Jack, who was rather discomfited. "I might have known from the abominable leer which that man possessed, that he was no philanthropist."

By this time the park was moderately full of people passing in different directions, and Jack knew if his end was coming, it must be soon. But Heaven was sending him a deliverer in the shape of a young lady dressed in blue silk, who, with her maid, was advancing up the walk. Jack, looking out between the trees, almost forgot his purpose in gazing upon her face, which was radiant with youth and beauty.

"What a miserable wretch I am!" thought he. But for all that, he tied up his cravat in a most extinguishing style—by that adjective I did not intend to give the reader the impression that he was trying to choke himself—tossed his hair back from his face, and cocked his pistol. Then, throwing himself gracefully forward, he fell on one knee, and again holding the pistol to his head, repeated with most tragic emphasis:

"Thus, thus do I end an ill-fated life!"

But Jack was doomed to live. The young lady sprang to his side, and with a scream, cried out: "Forbear, wretched man!" And at the same time her attendant seized him by the shoulder and shook him so lustily, that the pistol soon dropped from his not very reluctant hand. Having procured a long stick, she poked the fearful weapon carefully out of the way.

"Hang me!" said Jack, when he related the story to me afterwards, "if I wasn't ashamed of myself when I looked up at her face so full of nobility and truth." And the young lady herself blushed like a damask rose, when she met the ardent gaze of the handsome young man she had saved from destruction.

"My dear sir, what could be your motive?"

"Dash it, madame, would you have a man starve?"

"But consider the wickedness!"

"Think of living like a chameleon all your life!"

"Would you rush unprepared into the presence of your Maker?"

"Unprepared! I've fasted for three days!"

"Would you have your friends to weep for a suicide?"

"Friends! Humph!"

I don't think Jack was very polite in this interview, but he managed to send volley after volley of ardent glances towards his deliverer, till it was a wonder she was not consumed. At last, after a number of manœuvres, my lady engaged Jack for the performance of some literary commission, nobody knew what, paying him in advance, and desiring that he would call in the evening at her residence in Portland Place.

After she had gone, Jack danced one of the most joyful jigs he could turn out his toes to, brandishing his pistol like a trophy on high, till a policeman came up and inquired if he wished to be taken to the station-house. On this hint, Mr. Altamont's spirits subsided a little.

He then proceeded to a tavern, where, after showing his purse to the waiter, who knew him of old, he sat down to a most astonishing breakfast; ditto dinner in about an hour afterwards. He then composed what he declared to be his chef-d'œuvre, threw himself on the bed and slept away the remainder of the day. This was one of Jack's happiest peculiarities. With but two pence ha'penny in his pocket, and on a rough plank, he could sleep as well as a prince on down. But at present he was in no such fearful straits; his pocket was very comfortably filled, and he was stretching his limbs on the best bed in the house.

It is traditionally related of him, that, being arraigned in his more youthful days before Judge Bigwig, by the enraged inhabitants of Bath, for the purloining of twenty-seven knockers and six bell-pulls, he fell sound asleep while pleading innocent; and in this unguarded state, his pockets were emptied of five dragons' heads and a vulture's claw, which effectually proved his delinquency.

At eight o'clock Mr. Altamont arose and arranged his toilet—that is, he changed hats with a person who was so foolish as to leave his by the side of Jack's—and proceeded to Portland Place, where he expected that his fallen fortunes would be entirely restored. He was admitted by a footman, who did not seem to understand his request to see Miss De Courcy, but mumbled out:

"Up stairs, first door on left hand; here, Peter, show this gentleman the way."

But Peter wasn't there; so Jack, trusting to his usual good luck, went up alone and tried the first door he saw. It opened into a very handsome dressing-room, elaborately adorned and arranged as if for some expected occupant. There was no one in it, and Jack sat down to inspect matters. A very brilliant masquerade dress, accompanied by a print, for the character of the Earl of Leicester, was spread out on a lounge. On this last interesting object Jack's gaze lingered until he began to think how nicely it would fit him.

"Green velvet, slashed with white satin—a very becoming color to me. How finely I should look with all those orders strung round my neck!—how the deuce am I to tell for whom it was intended! There can be no harm at least in trying it on."

He had scarcely uttered this concluding sentiment, when the door was thrown open, and two young men entered. Jack vanished behind the window curtain.

"Hum!" said the first one, with his eye-glass stuck into his eye, gazing about the room.

"Quite passable," said the second ditto eye-glass.

"Ah, there's my dress," said No. 1, looking at the apparel on the sofa. "Had that made in Paris, old fellow. How d'ye like it? I had it sent on last week."

"Not equal to my Duke of Buckingham. Seen it? Up stairs. Where's your cousin Jenny?"

"I have not seen her yet. She is dressing, I believe. It is seventeen years now since I've been here. Don't you think I shall make an impression? Is she handsome?"

Jack was so enraged at hearing these cool remarks about the heroine of his morning's adventure, that he was unable to listen to the rest of their conversation till No. 2 proposed to go and dress. This was a great relief to Jack, who, by this time, was rather tired of the standing position, and who hoped to see them both go out together.

But Mr. Hamilton—for that was the name of Miss De Courcy's cousin—instead of leaving the room with his friend, told him he would dress there, and he with him in a short time. He did not seem in a very great hurry, however, but lounged round the room, looking at the various articles of his dress, and practising attitudes before the mirror. Jack's indignation rose fearfully, and he began to contemplate the possibility of coming forth from his concealment, and doing something desperate, when Mr. Hamilton opened a door at the back of the room and passed out.

Mr. Altamont came forth into the light and stretched himself. A brilliant idea flashed across his mind. He ran to the door, turned the key in the lock, tore off his clothes, threw them behind the lounge, donned the habit of the Earl of Leicester, and was admiring himself in the glass when Lord Fitzhenry, Mr. Hamilton's friend, entered!

"Confusion! What's to be done now?" thought he. But his wit came to his aid. He put on his mask, stooped down pretending to adjust his shoe, and, imitating Mr. Hamilton's voice, said as rapidly as possible, for he was momentarily expecting a shout from that gentleman:

"Tom, you scapgrace, there has just been a lady here inquiring for you, beautiful as Venus and graceful as Juno. She asked me to tell you to come immediately to Brooks's, in the Strand; or, if you didn't find her there, to somebody's—hang me if I remember who—in Cheapside."

"Venus! Brooks! Juno! Cheapside! call immediately! Who can it be?" said the bewildered peer. "O, I think I know—no—yes, it must be; hurrah! good-by, my boy—shall see you again before the evening's out."

"I hope not," said Jack, after the deluded representative of the Duke of Buckingham had left. "I've had quite enough of you!"

Mr. Altamont then, with rather a fearful heart, shut his door and proceeded to the drawing-room. It was brilliantly lighted, and filled with crowds of gaily-dressed people. But the most radiantly beautiful of all was Miss De Courcy, dressed as Mary, Queen of Scots, and surrounded by a circle of devoted admirers. As soon as Jack advanced in sight glittering in his spangles and medals, she came quickly forward to meet him.

"My cousin Harry, I suppose from the dress; for remember I haven't seen you since I was a year old, and besides you have your mask on."

"At your service," said he, taking it off, and kissing two of the most charming lips in the world. Jenny started.

"You don't say you remember me any better with my mask off," said Jack, carelessly.

"Well," answered she, "if it was not an absurd thing to pretend to such a memory for a baby, I should say I would have known you anywhere."

After this propitious beginning, Jack began to feel rather more at his ease. "Possession is nine-tenths of the law," argued he. So he gave himself up to the enjoyment of the evening. He polked with nine nuns in succession, waltzed with Minerva, danced a minuet with Queen Elizabeth, and succeeded in getting into everybody's good graces. While he was engaged in a very interesting conversation with his cousin pro tem., he was overwhelmed by the sight of a very portly old gentleman approaching.

"My godfather, cousin; dear godpapa, this is cousin Harry."
 "How do you do, sir? It seems to me I've seen you before. Let me think—no, it can't be. Ho, ho, ho! Beg pardon, sir; beg pardon."

Jenny seemed rather astonished at the old gentleman's remark, but Jack blushed.

"Dence take the old foggy!" said he. "What a confounded memory!" He then inquired very sternly if the gentleman was laughing at him.

"Ho, ho, ho! O, no! Beg pardon; I'm sure—ho, ho!"

Jack took his cousin under his arm and strode off. But as the fates would have it, who should he come in contact with but Lord Fitzhenry! He slouched his hat over his face, while the noble lord whispered ferociously in his ear:

"I demand satisfaction, sir, immediately."

"You shall have it," answered the pretended Hamilton. "Meet me in five minutes in my dressing-room. I will but change my dress."

"Enough," answered Fitzhenry.

When he was fairly out of sight, Jack took his cousin to a retired part of the room, and having helped her and himself to ices, prepared for a quiet time. But he had calculated rather badly. Had Mr. Hamilton been a man of spirit, affairs might have fallen out as Jack expected. He supposed Mr. Hamilton would lay the blame of his duress upon Fitzhenry. Fitzhenry would retaliate upon his own account, and "between them both," said he, "if affairs ever get straightened, my name isn't Jack Altamont!"

But our youthful Machiavel was destined to disappointment; for no sooner had the two parties met, by Fitzhenry's bursting open the inner door, and telling the poffoon to come forth from his place of concealment, than Hamilton, grateful only for his release, disclaimed all idea of a duel, and the dispute was ended by the infuriated young lord, who dragged him to the drawing-room, and denounced him for a coward. Jack shook in his borrowed shoes when he heard the uproar. He knew that his time was come, and, rising from his seat, determined to abdicate as gracefully as possible.

But he was stopped in his expected harangue by Fitzhenry, who stared at him in utter astonishment, and from him to Hamilton. The latter gentleman, plucking up his courage, called out:

"What business, sir, have you in my dress?"

"Your dress?" asked everybody. "Who are you? This is Mr. Hamilton, Miss De Courcy's cousin."

"That Mr. Hamilton! I am Mr. Hamilton."

But the unfortunate man received nothing but "Pooh," "Pshaw," "Madman," and other flattering expressions, which, instead of comforting, made him perfectly furious.

"O, Tom, Tom, why don't you help me?"

But Tom sat immovable, not seeing through affairs as yet. At length Jack spoke:

"I acknowledge the truth of Mr. Hamilton's statement. In joke, while he was absent from the room, knowing the company to be unacquainted with him, I assumed his dress and character, not thinking the matter would end so seriously."

"Ho, ho, ho!" It was the fat gentleman, who was standing at Jack's elbow. He started.

"But who are you then?" asked the company.

"My name is John Altamont."

"What," said the fat gentleman, tumbling forward, "not the son of Admiral Jack Altamont, who died in Algiers?"

"The same."

"My dear boy, come to your uncle. How much you do look like your father, to be sure!"

And the old gentleman took out his handkerchief and wiped his eyes; then he embraced his nephew very tenderly; then, recovering himself, he poked him in the side and whispered, slinking from head to foot: "So the pistol hung—"

"Hang the pistol!" interrupted Jack.

Jack was only great under the inspiration of tragedy. Misery exalted his genius; perfect happiness always prostrated him—on a lounge or in bed. He submitted to congratulations and embraces, but ventured on only one original remark:

"I say, old fellow" (this was to the avuncular old foggy), "what time do we folks in high life—ah—retire? I mean—ho!"

The clock struck twelve; Jack yawned as if he had been a churchyard. Since then Jack has basked—that's his favorite figure—in the smiles of fortune.

CIRCISSIAN BEAUTY.

It would be easy to let the imagination run wild in describing such ideal charms of face and limb as prescriptive fancy bestows on the Circissian girl; but unless the remotest interior possess nymphs of another and more celestial mould than those who meet the traveller's eye along the coast, such hyperbole of praise may be awarded with greater justice to elements nearer home. There is, indeed, a natural gracefulness about these Circissian maids which a western education might develop into an elegance that would contrast favorably with the artificial gloss of mere conventional refinement; but for the wildering beauty that dazzles the eye and carries the heart by a coup de grace, you may see more of it on a fine spring afternoon in Rotten-row and the Drive, than I have been able to catch sight of here during three industrious weeks. Lest it should be inferred from this admission of non-success in this respect that the result mentioned has arisen in any degree from the retiring bashfulness of the sex, I may add that it is the married women—and of them the ugliest are, as in Turkey, ever the readiest to hide their charms from the stranger's eye—who wear the veil; the single and unsold may be looked at till the gazer is content.—Correspondent of Daily News.

The weakest living creature, by concentrating his powers on a single object, can accomplish something; the strongest, by dispersing his over many, may not accomplish anything. The drop, by continually falling, bores its passage through the hardest rock; the hasty torrent rushes over it with hideous uproar, and leaves no trace behind.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

TO MY DAUGHTER MARY.

BY HENRY S. Y. ROBERTSON.

Struggling all the daytime
 In that whirlpool called the world,
 A thousand wild waves rushing,
 The sternest spirit crushing
 In their angry, stormy whirl:
 'Tis delicious to remember,
 And I do so with a sigh,
 Those tones so soft and tender,
 Of my darling child's "Good-by."

Struggling all the daytime,
 On the battle plain of life,
 A thousand foes advancing,
 All their hostile weapons glancing,
 In the sternness of the strife:
 'Tis delicious to remember,
 And I do so with delight,
 The tones so soft and tender,
 Of my darling child's "Good-night!"

Struggling all the day-time,
 Panting wildly in the race,
 Where selfishness and meanness,
 With a vicious, grasping keenness,
 Strive for riches or for place:
 'Tis delicious to remember,
 With emotions all my own,
 One heart so true and tender,
 Awaits me there at home.

Welcome, then, the night-time,
 With its sable wings outspread;
 When the surging tide of life,
 With its tempests and its strife,
 Lies in silence like the dead:
 Then dreaming, I remember,
 As her form to mine is pressed,
 How truthful and how tender,
 Is that heart upon my breast.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

DOGS OF DAMASCUS.

BY DR. J. V. C. SMITH.

THERE are several plagues in all Mohammedan countries besides the awful disease which bears that name—the plague of vermin, the plague of insecurity of property, and the plague of poverty. But no one has particularly described the plague of dogs.

In discussing upon this subject, it would be quite proper to embrace extensive geographical boundaries, and to take in the varieties and distinct families of dogs on the old continent of Asia. They collect in and about every town and village, and the number appears to bear some kind of proportion to the population. A great city has more canine plagues than a small one.

Asiatics do not entertain that fondness for the animal, when domesticated, that is evinced by Europeans and Americans. They are considered unclean, and therefore held in semi-abhorrence. They are as ancient, in the condition in which we now study them, as man himself. When the Jews fled from bondage, the city dogs unquestionably followed upon the heels of the camp, for the garbage that they found.

Moses directed that when the domestic animals had been "torn of beasts," in other words killed, the flesh should not be eaten, but cast to the dogs. This implies their existence, certainly, if not their abundance, outside. Goliath said to David, when he stood before him, sling in hand, "Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves?" This passage conveys the idea of their prowling character, and the enmity that was manifested towards them, by keeping them at bay with staves. "As a dog returns to his vomit, so a fool returneth to his folly," says Solomon in the Proverbs, which shows his familiar knowledge of the habits of the semi-domesticated dogs, the progenitors of the present dogs of Judea. The savage animals will gorge themselves excessively, when an opportunity presents. If the stomach is over-distended, and the putrid mass is ejected, their appetite, no way impaired, enables them to fill up again immediately.

Damascus, the capital of Syria, located in the centre of an extensive plain, beautifully watered, swarms with dogs. Their number is past finding out. They are not the variety which associate on friendly terms with men. They could not be domesticated to become companionable, and yet they always cluster about human habitations. Were it not for the refuse crumbs and scraps of food thrown into the streets, on which they principally subsist, thousands of them would inevitably die of starvation in a single week. As it is, large numbers undoubtedly perish in that way, since they scramble and fight so furiously for a morsel, the strong must succeed better than the young and weak. Detested, they are tolerated as a necessary nuisance, because they are the scavengers to remove every morsel of meat, bread, and bone, which would otherwise accumulate to the public detriment. Charitably disposed Mussulmen throw into the streets an occasional supply, as offerings of pity for the wretched looking creatures. They could not be driven away, nor could they be exterminated without actually periling the public health, under the ordinary municipal arrangements. Through the day they are sleeping, or at least keeping quiet; but with the approach of evening shades, they astonish the spectator with their numbers and ferocious appearance. These dogs are small, of a dingy yellowish color, with sharp snouts, bright, fierce eyes, and the sharpest, whitest, wickedest rows of teeth ever seen in any jaws.

Whether in Damascus they have divided the city into sections, which are recognized as the specific domain of a family or particular tribe, was not ascertained; but in Alexandria or Cairo, such divisions of territory are actually defined. Many a puppy is slaughtered without mercy, from being ignorant of the line, and running over the limits.

Constantinople is infested by the same race of scavenger dogs to an enormous extent. There may be nearly a million of them. Their habits in one city illustrates their economy in all. So vastly numerous are they in the streets through the night, no one dares venture out without a lantern. No person is allowed by the sentinels to attempt walking out in the evening without a light, lest they should be instantly devoured by the packs in pursuit of prey. The lantern is suspended by a string from the hand, and carried close to the ground. A circle of dogs move with the light, but never venture to get very near it. Were it not for the fear of a light, it would be extremely hazardous to attempt going from one door to another through a gauntlet of these blood-loving animals. They bark incessantly through the night. Being accustomed to the everlasting annoyance, the inhabitants are less disturbed than they otherwise would be. Their multiplication is quite astonishing, when the difficulty of sustaining life is taken into consideration.

Litters of puppies may be seen almost everywhere through the day. The dam nurses them very quietly, paying no attention to the passer—unless by accident a foot or a tail is trodden upon. Then the welkin rings with their howlings, which is propagated by the nearest dog, and extended till the yelpings are lost in space.

At the village of Gezah, opposite the ruins of Fastat, once the capital of Lower Egypt, there is a depot for cattle which are driven from the interior of Africa, following the windings of the Nile for the sake of the water. The cattle have a hump on the shoulders, large as an ordinary hut—which is much of a curiosity, and therefore worth going to see. Sometimes nearly a thousand head are collected at Gezah, waiting to be sold. They become restive from the irritation of insects, thirsty and hungry, too, and in their excitement gore and trample many to death. Others die from other causes, so that every morning one or two are found dead.

The dogs lie about the borders of the enclosure, fully expecting every morning a new carcase or two. When the herdsmen drag the dead bodies to the line, the dogs stand in rows impatiently waiting; and as the men step back, they seize the carcase and drag it as firemen run with an engine, making the dust fly as they go—and in an incredibly short space of time after, it is torn into shreds, and the bones gnawed as though they had been rasped with a steel rasp. When these multitudes of dogs can find no other food, in the superficial graves, in which bodies are interred without coffins, they seek subsistence. Their whole history, therefore, is extraordinary.

Several varieties of the dog, which have no intercourse with man, either as his friend, companion, or look-oner, waiting for what he is disposed to give away, are met with in Asia. They hunt in packs like the wolf, and combine for mutual protection. These half-savage, scavenger dogs of the East licked up the blood of Naboth, and ate the body of Jezebel, all but the palms of her hands and the soles of her feet. Thus, by understanding the habits of these dogs of Damascus, the Bible accounts of them are cleared from all obscurities.

BULLET WOUNDS.

The hospital at Scutari is said to afford some memorable specimens of the resistance capable of being offered by the human frame to the action of bullet wounds. One man, shot through the chest, recovered; another, who had a ball for two days in his brain, did well after the ball was extracted. One man, who was shot in the leg, had such a hard, sharp bone, that it split the bone which struck it into halves, as if the lead had been severed with a knife, and he escaped without a fracture. A rifle ball completely scooped out the eyes of a man, but he recovered, without any other injury.—Liverpool Mercury.

NOTICES OF NEW PUBLICATIONS.

SIX MONTHS IN KANZAS. By a LADY. Boston: John P. Jewett & Co. 12mo. The authoress of this work went to Kansas in September, 1855, and returned to Massachusetts in 1856. Her book is made up of familiar letters detailing her experience and impressions of the new territory.

THE GREY-BAY MAZE, AND OTHER MEMORABLE AMERICAN SKETCHES. By HENRY P. LELAND. Illustrated. Phila.: J. P. Lippincott & Co. 12mo. pp. 314. A capital book for summer reading—full of humor and fun, oddity and quaintness, with north-provoking pictures to match.

NEW MEXICO.—Oliver Ditson has just published "The First Gift," a ballad, "The Bridge," words by Longfellow, "Comin' thro' the Rye," and "Buy a Broom," with variations.

THE LIFE AND TRAVELS OF HERODOTUS, ETC. By J. TALBOT WHEELER. 2 vols. 12mo. New York: Harper & Brothers.

By means of an imaginary biography of Herodotus, founded, however, on fact, the author contrives to give us a correct picture of the cities, countries and peoples of the fifth century before Christ. The author is a ripe scholar, and has applied his information most ingeniously and instructively. One of the most valuable works published for a long while. For sale by Redding & Co.

THE HUGUENOT EXILES; OR, THE TIMES OF LOUIS XIV. An Historical Novel. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1856. 12mo. pp. 453.

In this romance the author has succeeded in embodying the spirit of history, without any of its dryness. The story is sufficiently interesting, while the portraits of the poor persecuted Huguenots are admirably drawn. For sale by Redding & Co.

LIFE SKETCHES FROM COMMON PATRONS. A Series of American Fables. By Mrs. JULIA L. DOWNTON. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1856. 12mo. pp. 286.

Very interesting and very well written are the stories in this unpretending volume. There is a truthfulness in the pictures of life, which proclaim the true artist. For sale by Redding & Co.

LEARNING TO READ. By JACOB ABBOTT. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1856. A very ingenious system, illustrated with beautiful engravings. For sale by Redding & Co.

HASWELL'S MECHANICS' TABLES. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1856.

These tables are too well known to require recommendation. They contain the areas and circumferences of circles—various other tables of measures and weights, and is an essential book for the engineer and mechanic. For sale by Redding & Co.

NEW MUSIC.—G. P. Reed & Co., 13 Tremont Street, have published "The Mother's Smile," a song, "Blue-Eyed Bell," as sung by the Avondales, and "Il Balen del Son Sorriso," from "Il Trovatore." "When at the quiet evening hour," a romance, by Verdi, "Bonnie Woman's Smile," a song, by E. J. Welles, "The Vow," a duet for two voices, from Donizetti's "Gloria."—

WINSLOW LEWIS, M. D.

The accompanying portrait of our much esteemed fellow-citizen, Dr. Winslow Lewis, the distinguished physician and surgeon, was drawn expressly for us by Mr. Barry from a photograph by Masury, Silsbee & Case, and is an excellent likeness. Winslow Lewis was born in Boston, July 8, 1799, and is consequently 57 years of age. After receiving an excellent preparatory education, he entered Harvard University, and was a member of the class that graduated in 1819. He now commenced the study of his profession, and received his degrees of M. D. and M. A. in 1822. Directly after this he sailed for Europe, and pursued the study of his profession in the best continental schools of medicine and surgery until 1824. On returning to Boston, he entered at once on his professional career, and soon obtained a large practice, chiefly surgical. He has always devoted a large share of his attention to surgery. Dr. Lewis is a counsellor of the Massachusetts Medical Society, a member of the American Medical Society at Paris, and consulting surgeon of the Massachusetts General Hospital. As a surgeon and anatomist, he unquestionably stands at the head of his profession in his native State; and his position may be inferred from the fact that, during the last twenty years he has imparted instruction to more than four hundred pupils. Though mingling but little in politics, he has more than once yielded to the wishes of his fellow-citizens to ensure his services, was chosen a member of the common council in 1839, and a representative to the legislature in 1836, 1852 and 1853. Dr. Lewis is an active and honored member of the Masonic order, which he joined in 1829, and, after having filled various offices, is now Grand Master of Massachusetts. No man enjoys a higher reputation among the "brethren of the mystic tie." In 1849, Dr. Lewis revisited Europe, with his family, and remained abroad about three years, residing chiefly in Florence. He was eminently fitted to enjoy and improve this period of relaxation from professional duties. With a cultivated mind, a fondness for literary and antiquarian pursuits, for art, and also for society, he was enabled to enjoy thoroughly the attractions of that storied land which combines all the material for the gratification of such tastes. He was warmly welcomed back to Boston by that wide circle of friends, to whom he is endeared by the possession of the rarest social qualities; by his professional associates, by whom he is esteemed and honored; and by those sufferers to whom his ministrations are most grateful. Blessed with good health and a happy temperament, the subject of our brief sketch has probably many years of enjoyment and of usefulness before him.

THE COOPER INSTITUTE, NEW YORK.

We present on this page an accurate view of this building, which was commenced in 1853. It stands opposite the new Bible House, at the corner of Astor Place and Fourth Avenue, not far from the Astor Library Building. It extends 195 feet on Third Avenue, 86 on Seventh Street, 162 on Fourth Avenue, and 183 on Astor Place, covering an area of nearly 20,000 square feet, including the inner court. The edifice is six stories in height, the upper story being appropriated for an observatory, with choice astronomical and microscopic apparatus. In the basement is a hall 135 feet long and 84 1-2 feet wide, to be used as a lecture room. Peter Cooper, Esq., a well known merchant of New York, appropriated $300,000 to the establishment of this institution, designed as a free gift to the city of New York. The plan as proposed by him was as follows:—The objects of the institution are the physical, mental and moral improvement of the people, and particularly of the young. There will be lectures and debates upon all useful sciences in its halls. In order to unite all kindred institutions in a common bond of interest, the halls of the edifice are to be opened free of charge for anniversaries, commencements, etc. A feature of the new institution will be a large room always open and free for the use of such women as may wish to meet for the discussion and consideration of the application of natural and practical sciences to their own benefit, or who have the talent and knowledge which will enable them to add anything to the treasures of science already known. There will also be an office in the institution for the benefit of those seeking scientific, educational or professional employment, where their names will be registered, and applications received and recorded for the benefit of all. For further encouragement to women, a sum of five hundred dollars is annually set apart to be given by the vote of the members of the Institute to the female who is proved to have exhibited the truest heroism, or the greatest self-sacrifice in the cause of suffering humanity. It is hoped in this way to draw public attention to the thousand self-devoted acts which characterize the sex, and to make the young men of the Institute more observant of the virtues which true humanity calls out. Another large room in the building is appropriated to general discussion among the members of the Institute, of philosophical and other appropriate matters; and notes and copies of such discussions are to be preserved as the property of the institution. The institution will be under the government of a board of trustees, comprising the judges of the United States Court residing in New York, the three judges of the Superior Court, the mayor, the eldest male member of Mr. Cooper's family, the president of the Free Academy, the president of the Mechanics' Society, and the editors of the principal daily and weekly papers of the city, who have one vote in the board. The trustees have power to appoint the professors, and a superintendent, who must make an annual report to the board, to the corporation, and to the legislature. Professors may be removed, on good cause, by the trustees, or by a vote of three-fourths of the students. To become a member and a student of this institution requires no other credentials than a good moral character. Laws for the government of the students will be made by themselves; and expulsions will be made only by a majority vote of the whole body. The plan thus sketched is entirely original; we are not aware of any existing institution in the world so constituted.

WINSLOW LEWIS, M. D.

JERUSALEM AT THE PRESENT DAY.

"Walk about Jerusalem" is a divine injunction, and we were literally obeying it. In some respects we found it at once widely differing from any of the oriental cities we had seen, and by no means answering any of the expectations we had formed of the city of the Jews. And very rarely are our expectations answered when we, for the first time, set eyes on a man, or a place, or a picture which we have heard of often, and earnestly desire to behold. To stand within the walls of Jerusalem, has been the longing of the Jewish and the Christian heart from youth to old age, as an exile longs to see his native land before he dies. And the desire excites the imagination, until we are in expectancy of seeing something other than the reality, when we come to enter its narrow streets, and wander among the heaps on heaps that still distinguish the city, as if the curse of the rejected Messiah still hangs upon it. As we look down upon the town from our tent door on Mount Olivet, it appeared to us nearly a plain with a slight declivity to the east. But now we are constantly going up and down as we thread our way, ascending mountains of rubbish, on which houses are built, twenty or thirty feet above the original level. The streets are not so wide as the sidewalk on Broadway, in New York, and indeed rarely exceed eight or ten feet in breadth, and sometimes the houses actually meet; and stranger still, they accomplish the apparently impracticable feat of standing on both sides of the road at the same time. For, as the pathway leads under them, they are supported by arches, and the dwelling thus occupies the space over the street as well as on each side. The same plan of building I have noticed in Nablous and other Eastern cities; and, as in Cairo, the sun was excluded altogether from some of the streets by coverings thrown across from one house to the other, so here in Jerusalem, an awning is made, sometimes of mats, and sometimes of boards, rendering the streets gloomy, but inviting a current of air that refreshes one in hot weather, and compensates fully for the loss of the sun. These streets generally are at right angles, are wretchedly paved, with a gully in the middle for the passage of animals, that prefer a softer path than this broken causeway of irregular stones. The limestone that abounds in this region, affords the material of which the houses are built, and as there is no lack of stone, the walls are substantial. It is a novelty to observe that windows are rarely seen towards the street; and the few that are so situated for the purposes of light and air, are strongly protected by casements. The inner court, on which the windows and doors open, is surrounded by a wall, which forms part of the house; and the whole edifice, so far as is possible, is constructed without the use of wood, which is too expensive to be employed where any other material will answer the purpose. The floors and stairs are, of course, made of stone. All of the timber that is in use must, even at this day, as in the days of Solomon, be brought from Mount Lebanon, and the means of transportation are not so good now as they were in those days. The water that falls upon the roofs is carefully led into cisterns under ground, often cut out of the solid rock, and every house has at least one of these, on which the people must depend for all their culinary purposes. Many of these now in use have doubtless served the Jews of far distant ages, and as some of them are immense, and in the rainy season a supply is taken in sufficient for six or eight months, to be re-supplied from a source that no enemy before the gates could cut off, it is plain that Jerusalem could not be made to suffer for want of water in the midst of the most protracted siege. The house of one of the missionaries has four cisterns, the largest of which is thirty feet square, and twenty feet deep. Other cities in this country are similarly provided, as fountains and streams are rare; and from the very earliest times of which we have record, wells were among the most valuable and cherished kinds of property. These facts heighten the beauty and propriety of those figures of Scripture so often drawn from the fountain, the well, the cistern with its wheel, the water, the river, the rain, all of which are associated in the Eastern mind with the most precious of the gifts of Providence, and are therefore the most beautiful emblems of the gifts of grace.—Correspondent of New York Observer.

COOPER INSTITUTE, NEW YORK CITY.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

JOHNNY CLARENCE PHELPS.—A LAMENT.

Tearfully inscribed to the bereaved, as a token of sympathy in their sorrow.

BY WILLIE E. PABER.

I've often heard it said,
"The old must die; the young may die!" and now, alas,
I think how truly this has come to pass,
As muse I on the dead.

How sad that he should die,—
A father's pride,—a mother's joy,—a sister's sweet delight;
That on such dawning should descend such sudden night,
The spirit asks, "O, why?"

How sad that he should die!
Ere the white pages of youth's joyous years were turned;
While yet the incense fire of gentle childhood burned
In his bright, beaming eye.

June roses fill the air
With fragrance precious as the magi's myrrh of old,
But he regards them not. The once warm heart is cold,
For death sits victor there.

This thought we cherish now,
That he—the beautiful—has gone away to rest,
In the safe haven of a Saviour's loving breast,
Whose hand is on his brow.

The household joy is gone;
Fled with the hopes that faded with his fading hours,
And, though we know he blooms in fair, elysian bowers,
Our stricken hearts will mourn.

We know that here below
If he had lived, his would have been man's common life;
Man's heritage of pain; man's share of earthly strife,
Of sorrow and of woe.

And yet, and yet—we weep!
Because we miss his step, his sunny smile, his voice,
For these made hearts that loved the gentle child, r
With joy not loud, but deep.

And now the willows wave
Where sleeps the child, with white hands folded on his breast,
And roses round his brow. So was he laid to Within the quiet grave.

Tears sanctified the sod,
And tears still flow, and hearts still ache, in love's eclipse;
And words of wailing fall from the parental lips,
Beneath the Father's rod.

Soon will the wound be healed;
A little season and the veil will then be rent
In twain; and they who thither weeping went,
Will find grief's fountain sealed.

The flower, from the mould;
The angel, from the earth. O, read the lesson well,
And let it teach you, while on earth ye still must dwell,
God's arms his own enfold.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

ALMOST TOO LATE.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

PROVIDENCE—that Power which mortals call Providence—had dealt very kindly with Mary Brittan. Nature had been bountiful, too, and the world, always ready to follow suit where Providence and Nature have been kind, was ready to fall down and worship her. She did not need that worship. She did not want it, either, for her soul was above that miserable favoritism which the world gives indiscriminately to those whom fortune or some adventitious circumstance has favored. Her friends—her true friends—loved her for her goodness of heart, her unaffected cheerfulness and her kindness. They would have loved her if she had been destitute of those great social advantages which she possessed. Handsome, wealthy and accomplished—graceful, intellectual and gay—(we put them all in the same category, and the reader may arrange the terms to suit the individual taste), it may well be supposed that Mary Brittan did not long lack suitors; but indeed, this was not the case. Admirers, she had many; but she did not allow them to become suitors. She was determined to have no opportunity to say "no," and her "yes" should only be spoken when the "coming man" should appear, if she waited until age and sorrow should have dimmed her bright eyes. They could never wither her strong and fearless heart nor destroy her beautiful disposition.

And thus it happened, that because the coming man had not yet met her gaze, Mary was fast tending towards the dreaded age of thirty. Not that it was dreaded by her; for she was lovely and beautiful as ever. Her bright locks waved as softly, her eye had not lost its young sparkle, nor her step its grace—and her heart was as youthful as at fifteen.

So thought and felt Herman Deloraine. He had loved her when he was a child—before he knew what love meant; for there were eight years between the two, and when the boy was almost an infant at school, the girl was radiant in her young beauty, in the glory of sixteen. But times had changed now. The boy had grown up to manhood, led on and encouraged by the vision that was ever before his sight, for never, for a single moment, had he ceased to think of and to love Mary Brittan; to think of her, too, as a wife—and yet he kept the secret in his soul from all but Mary herself. To her, he scrupled not to tell his wildest dream—and when she urged the disparity between them, his answer was, that souls had no age—no decay.

No moon-struck, ranting lover was Herman Deloraine. He was sincere, ardent and manly in his love for Mary—and she well knew the quality of his affection, and appreciated him accordingly. One day he told her that if he was the fated one for her, it must be when he had grown into maturer life, not now. She did not yield, for a moment, in her earnest and unaffected purpose of making him forget that he could be anything to her but a friend—and she an elder sister, and as such she ever bore herself toward him. She accepted his escort as she would that of a younger brother—frankly and freely told him of his faults, and never by word or by look encouraged him to tenderness.

It was a rare instance, and one in which most women would have sometimes failed. But Mary Brittan was not an ordinary woman; and with a feeling generously free from rivalry, she gathered beautiful and intelligent girls around her, and welcomed Herman to their presence. And yet she loved him! She loved him so well that she could not bear that the breath of society should come upon his motives or his taste even, in marrying one so much his senior. She did not care for herself. Age or youth—it was all the same to her, if the soul was right; but she did not wish to feel that the foolish sneers of the multitude could ever have power to make him regret what they might call youthful folly.

Herman made himself worthy of her love. If a generous or a noble feeling influenced him, it was all the wider and deeper because it accorded with her known feelings. If a noble deed found its way from his hand, the knowledge that Mary's ear would hear of that deed, and her heart sympathize with it, would bring a sweetness to his purpose, only equalled by the joy which he ever had in doing right.

Among the many whom Mary drew around her, was Melanie Bruce, whose manifold charms, she thought, must attract Herman. Indeed, there were many points of attraction about her, which Mary herself possessed. She really loved Melanie, and to her, Mary would have been willing to make the sacrifice of Herman's heart. It was no use. Mary wept bitterly when she found her purpose was foiled, and had only resulted in the young girl's real unhappiness—for Herman had not bestowed a single thought upon her, while she had already learned to look upon him as the highest and best of men.

"It all comes of your not growing old, as you ought to do, Mary," said her friend, Mrs. Eaton, when Mary was lamenting this result.

"What shall I do?" asked Mary. "Would you advise me to paint some wrinkles, and put on mother's caps, to make myself appear elderly?"

"By no means—and yet, when I look at Herman Deloraine, and think how his life is wasting for the love of one like you, I feel perplexed to know how this matter is to end."

"It will end thus, Sara; if, years and years hence, Herman retains his affection for me, and he grows old faster than I do, I will marry him—but that is so unlikely, because men do not grow old as fast as we do."

And so ten years more slipped by, and then eight more, and Herman never had married. His profession had taken him in some measure from her sphere, and they no longer inhabited the same town. People said that Mary Brittan was living single for his sake. Perhaps she was—for she would not listen to the many who came round her, asking for a heart which she had not to give.

And Mary was now forty-six years old! Like everything else—Providence, Nature and the world—old Time had touched her gently and kindly. The brown locks were as dark, the bright eyes as soft, if not as sparkling, and the cheek as smooth as twenty years ago. Sunny and bright had been her life, and not even Herman had cast more than a passing shadow over its gladness. The shadows were still to come. Human life does not exist without them, but happy are they who can bear them well and patiently. To the meek heart, they come like gentle showers; but to the passionate, they are like the mountain torrent that breaks into floods.

On one single turn of fortune hung the whole of Mr. Brittan's possessions. It turned against him, and in a day he was ruined. The world looked on, and then hurried on in its own schemes of ambition or grandeur. Mr. Brittan had unconsciously loved the enjoyments, the dignity, the distinction which the possession of riches brings to the owner, and he was prostrated by the reverse. His wife's feelings ever reflected his own, and she, too, was powerless against the blow.

Even Mary did not rise, at once, to the exaltation which is sometimes, but rarely, experienced by those who have for the first time tasted poverty. There were many days when she shared the prostration of her parents' hopes. It was hard to see them, now that they had arrived to old age, stripped of the luxuries which had only been mere necessities to them, so habitual had been their use. It was hard, too, to see their benevolence crippled—that benevolence which had known no stint—the broad-cast charities, which left no perceptible loss in their coffers.

For the first time, the hues in Mary's life were fading into gray; and clouds were deepening around her. She would have scorned to have any one think that her present feelings arose solely from the loss of fortune—and yet they were all consequent upon it, too. It was painful to see how the summer friends flew away from the bare tree, in which they had loved to linger when its branches were fresh and green. Mary was glad that her father did not seem to notice this. He had been loved and respected so many years, that it had become a second nature to him; and it was difficult for him to imagine that he could be less so.

From his busy home, where hourly and momentarily he was called upon to give healing to suffering frames, Herman Deloraine came, at the first intelligence of this painful affair. He had prospered, was beloved and courted by all, and more than one, fair and bright as Melanie Bruce, would have felt herself honored by his choice. But he lived on in solitary state, his heart still beating for his early love, and never learning the lesson of forgetfulness. He could not bear unmoved, the story of his old friend's loss; and he left home instantly. He needed no ceremony at the house where he had spent so many happy hours in his childhood and youth; and before she was aware that he was near her, Mary looked up from her musing gaze and saw Herman.

She did not affect to disguise her pleasure at seeing him. It was genuine and friendly—her reception of him whom, above all others, she had valued. And in his comforting and genial look, she found a source of inexpressible relief. No man had ever been to her father what Herman Deloraine had been. Mr. Brittan had earnestly wished from the first, that Mary would lay aside her prejudices in regard to disparity of age, and make Herman happy as he deserved to be. She knew how her father felt towards him, and there was a truly pleasurable feeling in the thought that he, at least, was not one of the butterfly crowd who were frightened away when winter came.

Herman's voice assumed a softer tone than usual when he addressed her. She had not seen him in many months, and their friendly correspondence had died gradually away. But he was here now, with his large heart full of friendship and sympathy, and his voice expressed it all.

"Look at me, Mary," he said—"you will see how the furrows have deepened and the hairs whitened since I saw you. I have come to be an old man, while you sit there with little perceptible change in your looks, and I am sure, much less in your heart."

And he took her hand and led her to the tall mirror. It was true—he looked ten years her elder. His life, so earnest, so full of thought, so devoted to his profession—while it had made his heart keep its youthfulness, had yet planted wrinkles on his cheek and gray hairs on his brow.

It was not in woman to help appreciating his devotion, and now it seemed sweeter than ever. The dying perfume of the rose is as fragrant as the breath of its early bloom, and the love of woman loses nothing in its beauty or intensity as her spirit is nearing to the eternal city. Freed alike from the vanity of youth, and the practised coquetry of a riper age, the last love of woman is more enduring, more self-sacrificing than the first. And before the twilight had closed in that day, Herman knew that Mary would come to his home, and let him make glad the declining years of her parents.

"Twenty years lost in sacrificing to the opinions of the world, Mary! How many happy days you would have made for me, that have been spent in repining at your decision! Well, that is all past now, and the only thing that comforts me for it is, that it has helped to make me look older. When I take my bride back to Lindenwood, no one will ever think of you as being nearly as old as myself."

"Pleasant flattery enough, Herman, but let alone people for detecting ages. Well, it is hardly fair for me to go to you now that I have nothing but my aged self to carry with me."

"Do you call your parents nothing? I think I gain something by having my oldest and dearest friends—the friends of my boyhood and youth—to be with me in my old age."

It was settled. Lindenwood, so long solitary, was to be renewed in all its former beauty. Mr. and Mrs. Brittan were to take the house, and Herman and Mary were to live with them. This saved the feeling of dependence which might arise to check the freedom of action and speech which Herman's generous heart could not bear to see abridged in his old friends. It was a happy household—none the less happy because long lives of wedded happiness were not to be expected; and still there were very youthful ones a thousand times more brief than theirs might be. Melanie Bruce came to see them, cured of her youthful fancy for Herman, and rejoicing in the new dignity of wife—and Mary looked hardly less fair and young than Melanie.

Some might think that, to make the happiness complete, wealth and position should have been restored to Mr. Brittan; but, as he truly thought, there is something in this world even better than fine houses and broad lands, and no murmur was ever heard from the old man's lips, respecting the past. He was, indeed, living more truly, more broadly than ever before. And if you would see happiness as perfect as it can be on earth, you must look in at Lindenwood.

CURIOUS DEPARTMENT OF ART.

Our readers are all familiar with the processes of pencil, crayon or India ink drawing, but we doubt if any of them ever studied, or even heard of the art of poker drawing. A correspondent of the Philadelphia Saturday Post, in a letter from London, describing a visit to St. Paul's, remarks that among the multifarious pursuits in which the canon of the cathedral employs his leisure hours, is that of drawing pictures upon sheets of pine wood with a red hot poker; and these pictures are finished in a style that would do credit to not a few instruments of a far more elegant character. At the time of the visit, the artist had just completed a large circular picture of Evangeline and her grandfather. The head of the old man especially was surprisingly good—the deep shadows being burnt in with a very hot poker, and the lighter shading done in the blue gray produced by the same implement in a somewhat cooler condition. A red hot poker is sometimes brought into requisition for the purpose of touching off cannon, but we do not often hear of a canon touching off pictures with a poker.—Traveller.

REVOLVERS OF OLDEN TIME.

Revolving fire-arms are by no means of modern invention. Amid the various and extensive assortment of ancient and modern arms which is collected in the magnificent old castle of Warwick, the curiosity of visitors may be rewarded by the sight of muskets and carbines, a century or two old, which possess the qualities both of revolving barrels and of loading at the breech. Considering how much has been said of the ingenuity of these inventions, and of the talent displayed in their attainment by certain modern manufacturers, some astonishment is often occasioned by these evidences of their antiquity; and it is very evident, from these and other guns in the collection, that the art of gun-making was carried to a point of excellence, within a century of its origin, which was not maintained for the next two centuries, although it has been greatly advanced of late.—London Literary Gazette.

If life is short for pleasure, it is long for virtue! It is necessary to be always on your guard.—J. J. Rousseau.

EDITORIAL MEXANGE.

The 300-year comet of 1365 and 1356 is now about due, according to astronomers. They need a water company at St. Paul, Minnesota. The Pioneer says: "Good spring water, carried about the city, as it now is, in carts, at this season of the year, about thirty cents per barrel, and river water from ten to fifteen cents, according to the distance conveyed. In the winter time it is even higher than these rates." A terrible storm, with hail "as big as lemons," visited Auburn, Ala., recently. The crops in Upper Canada never looked so promising at the same season of any former year as they do this. Fruit trees of all kinds promise an abundant yield. Terrible inundations have lately prevailed in the south of France to a great extent. In the space of three years, the population of Chicago changed from thirty-four to sixty-five thousand, and her railroads from one to eleven. Two children of Mr. Donough, of Evansville, Ia., died recently from the drinking of coffee with which toluene had become accidentally mixed. Bowling is an English game, and was common as early as the thirteenth century, especially among the higher ranks. Charles I. played at it, and it formed a daily occupation for leisure hours with Charles II. George Haneroff, the historian, is sojourning temporarily at St. Louis, engaged in investigations connected with revolutionary history. Budding can be done on the pear, apple and cherry, in June and July, and on the peach to the middle of September. Those who have failed to graft, and have stocks large enough, should avail themselves of budding at this time. A Galveston paper says that in eastern Texas the prospect for good crops is unusually fine. The State of Deseret will have her senators and representatives knocking at the doors of Congress for admission, before the close of the present session. A statue of Washington is about being erected in Union Park, New York, at an expense of $27,000. Lady Blessington once wrote: "I feel that I am growing old for want of some one to tell me that I am looking young as ever! Charming falsehood! There is a vast deal of vital air in loving words." Two hundred boats, with their crews, are now employed in planting oysters in Delaware Bay. The crop will be gathered next season. Ammonia, rubbed upon a hot wet scalp, in a green-house, has a most miraculous effect in developing a profusion of flowers, buds and leaves. After each application of the ammonia, the tints are said to deepen and increase in brilliancy. Some years ago, a young and beautiful lady was destroyed in London by strychnine administered by her sister's husband, but the villain escaped, only to perish, however, by a bandit's hand in Mexico. The piano-forte was invented by J. C. Schroder, of Dresden, in the year 1717, during which year he presented a model of his invention to the court of Saxony. The instrument immediately became popular. In England, before the time of the Stuarts, it was felony and death to sell a horse to a Scotchman! Not long ago, an Englishman observed a stone roll down a staircase. It bumped on every stair till it came to the bottom; there, of course, it rested. "That stone," said he, "reminds the national debt of my country; it has bumped on every grade of the community, but its weight is on the lowest." A tunnel of four thousand feet in length is being bored under Bergen Hill, for the New York and Erie Railroad, to be finished by November, 1857. Letters from all parts of Italy speak of the very slight hopes the Italians entertain of any reforms suggested by Austria. At Turin and Genoa there had been disturbances in the streets. Exciting placards were affixed to the walls, and cries were raised of "death to Austria!" After a time the excitement subsided. Tuesday, the 4th day of November next, being the Tuesday after the first Monday of that month, is the day on which the people throughout the entire country will cast their votes for electors of president and vice-president of the United States. James Gordon Bennett, of the New York Herald, has purchased, for $60,000, the magnificent mansion of Joseph L. White, Esq., on the corner of Madison Square and Fifth Avenue, for a residence.

A COURAGEOUS LADY.—The Richmond Whig says a lady went to the office of a dentist in that city, recently, and had eight teeth extracted. It appears that the dentist refused to administer chloroform unless a physician was present, and the lady engaged one for that purpose. He failed to attend, however, and after waiting some time she submitted to the operation without the use of the anæsthetic. There are few men who can boast of courage like that.

A POET'S RECOMPENSE.—The Nottingham (England) Journal states that a purse containing £1000, the result of a public subscription commenced some time ago, has been presented to Mr. Thomas Cooper, the chartist poet, author of the "Purgatory of Snicides."

INCREASE OF BOSTON.—The current that seemed to tend countryward a few years since, now seems to set cityward, and our population seems to be increasing quite rapidly. It is said that five hundred new houses will be erected this season, principally at the South End.

NEW SEA.—Dr. Redman, a missionary, has verified the existence in Africa, of an immense sea, without outlet, twice as large as the Black Sea, between the equator and 10 degrees south latitude, and between the 22d and 30th meridian.

MINNESOTA.—The population of this prosperous Territory has been ascertained, with reasonable accuracy, to be 120,000—more than sufficient to justify its admission as a State.

DEFINITION FOR THE TIMES.—Humbag, a species of chloroform, by the aid of which dollars are extracted without pain.

Wayside Gatherings.

Lord Palmerston has been buried in effigy, in Greece. It is stated that the famous trotting mare Lady Moscow has been purchased by James Irving, of New York, for $3500. The "old Porter residence," at Niagara Falls, has been turned into an ice-cream garden, under the name of "Park Place."

It appears by the annual message of Mayor Manners that the debt of Jersey City amounts to $50,000.

Provisions are scarce in Salt Lake City, which makes it very hard for those Mormon gentlemen, who have ninety wives, to support their families.

Boots made from the skin of the white porpoise are among the latest novelties. These, with rat-skin gloves and whalebone fixings, must be nice.

The Southern newspapers make mention of a great scarcity of preachers in certain sections, and that capable men would find ready employment in that capacity.

The family of Crawford, the sculptor, have arrived from Europe, and he will follow as soon as arrangements for the conveyance of his "Washington" are completed at Munich.

The last accounts from Australia are to the 6th of March. They state the gold production to be larger than ever, and that a million sterling a month will be regularly forwarded to England.

Franz Thies, late agent of Ole Bull, denies that he absconded from Richmond with the funds of the great fiddler, as stated in some of the papers.

The St. John papers report that the scarlet fever at Shippegan and Carleton, New Brunswick, has carried off over one hundred and fifty children within ten weeks.

They have had two shocks of earthquake, and a brilliant aerolite which illuminated the whole city and burst with a loud detonation, at Vera Cruz, Mexico, recently.

The Scotch Presbyterian Synod has refused to allow the use of organs in its churches, and enjoins sessions to employ all judicious measures for the improvement of vocal melody.

Direct steam communication is about to be established between Liverpool and the west coast of Africa, and the Liverpool African Association have petitioned government to allow a portion of the African mails to be sent from Liverpool.

Tom Moore describes a dress in which Miss Coutts appeared one evening, at a party, and which she was about sending to the bank the next morning for safe keeping, as valued at half a million of dollars!

The American and Foreign Christian Union received some seventy thousand dollars into its treasury last year. It has now 119 laborers in its service, at home and abroad, and aids in the support of a Protestant chaplain in the "Eternal City."

The South Side Democrat says that Miss Cappell, who was a member of Taylor's theatrical company in Richmond, has recently been married to a wealthy young Virginian, who fell in love with her from seeing her in Petersburg.

At a concert recently given by M. Carlotus, the Belgian minister in Lisbon, the king of Portugal sang the sonno di Mercadante, an air of Verdi's in the "Vepres," and took a part in a duo from "Linda," with Bartolini, the baritone.

New Albany, Ind., is getting to be a fast town. The Tribune states that during the last term of the Floyd Circuit Court, thirty-six divorces were granted, and three of the parties in these cases were married again before the adjournment of the court.

M. Antoine Jean Baptiste Simoulin, the oldest dramatic writer of France, died on the 4th ult. The last of the 214 pieces of which he was author (sole or joint) was a vaudeville entitled Les Mémoires de ma Tante, produced at the Ambigu-Comique, in November, 1853. He was born in January, 1780.

According to the New York Chronicle, the great and distinguished feature of the Baptists' Bible Revision Society, is to translate that volume into every known language now in use, and in just such terms as will most unmistakably convey to the mind the intended import of the text.

The Western Book Concern, after paying their proportion of the award to the Methodist Episcopal Church South, have a capital of $150,405. The report of the New York Book Concern states that the sales of the last year amount in the aggregate to upwards of one million of dollars, with an aggregate profit of $191,000.

Says a scientific writer:—"To obtain some idea of the immensity of the Creator's works, let us look through Lord Rosse's telescope, and we discover a star in the infinite depths of space, whose light is 3,500,000 years in travelling to our earth, moving at the velocity of twelve millions of miles in the minute. And behold, God was there."

Rev. E. H. Chapin recently paid a handsome compliment to Florence Nightingale, whose star, he said, rose higher o'er the blood-stained fields of Balaklava and Inkermann than that of any of the warriors who had fought the battles, or the diplomats through whose exertions peace was secured.

St. Paul's Cathedral, of London, is the largest church in England. It is an immense stone edifice, but without much beauty, either in its exterior or interior. It covers about two acres of ground, and the dome is nearly four hundred feet high; still, large as it is, it would stand in St. Peter's, at Rome, with plenty of room to walk around it.

The New School Presbyterian Assembly in this country includes 24 synods, 108 presbyteries, 1567 ministers, 111 licentiates, 238 candidates for the ministry, 1659 churches, and 113,629 communicants. The Old School Assembly includes 30 synods, 148 presbyteries, 2216 ministers, 237 licentiates, 435 candidates for the ministry, 3079 churches, and 221,404 communicants.

A writer in the Medical Gazette, in an article on sugar as food, maintains that candy properly made is not only one of the greatest luxuries of life, but one of the most beneficial additions to the daily food of all ages and classes. Those who tend in the shops where candy is sold, occasionally eat largely of it, and have never any deleterious results from it, either to health or the teeth.

The average amount of church rates levied in England is £600,000, and the last return of liabilities on account of repairs of churches—incurred on the security of the rates—amounts to half a million sterling. A bill is now before Parliament for the total abolition of these church rates—a measure which will relieve dissenters from the taxes now imposed upon them for the support of a church with which they have but little sympathy.

We learn, says the Van Buren (Ark.) Intelligencer, that the grasshoppers are entirely ruining the crops in some portions of the Indian territory. They are in some places as thick as mosquitoes in the Mississippi swamps, moving about in armies. They are said to be worse among the Seminoles than anywhere else; so much so that many of them have despaired of making any corn at all, and to those it is particularly distressing.

Foreign Items.

The Emperor of Russia has made a formal avowal of his design gradually to emancipate the serfs.

Russian engineers are surveying Sebastopol, which is to be entirely rebuilt on a new plan.

The recent rumors regarding the hopeless illness of the Empress of the French, have been contradicted on authority.

Coffee in France is now mixed with best-root instead of chicory, which is more agreeable to the taste, and does not require half the quantity of sugar.

Prince Frederick William, of Prussia, is in England, courting the princess royal, and all the papers are talking about it. The marriage is deemed certain.

The London detectives disguise themselves in the pursuit of their vocation—now as a foreign naval officer, then a jack tar, and anon as a buxom widow, fair, fat and forty!

Spain demands an old debt of Mexico, and threatens her with a fleet in case she don't pay. A war between Spain and Mexico would be like a squabble between a cripple and a broken down beggar.

The sales at the Billingsgate fish market in London, amount to upwards of three thousand millions of fish, annually—weighing altogether, two hundred and thirty thousand tons, and worth ten millions of dollars.

The Mount of Olives, near Jerusalem, has been purchased by Madame Polack, the widow of a wealthy banker of the Hebrew persuasion, at Konigsberg, in Prussia. The lady intends to beautify the place and improve the whole neighborhood, at her sole expense.

Sands of Gold.

.... Interest is the spur of the people, but glory that of great souls.—J. J. Rousseau.

.... There are certain eyes, which, seeing objects at a distance take snow for sunshine.—Landon.

.... Let your will lend whither necessity would drive, and you will always preserve your liberty.—Locke.

.... All other love is extinguished by self-love; beneficence, humanity, justice, philosophy, sink under it.—Epicurus.

.... When men are sorely urged and pressed, they find in themselves a power which they thought they had not.—Tillotson.

.... The reason why so few marriages are happy, is because young ladies spend their time in making nets, not in making cages.—Swift.

.... There is an authority due to distress, and as none of the human race is above the reach of sorrow, none should be above hearing the voice of it.—Addison.

.... When a true genius appeareth in the world, you may know him by an infallible sign, that dunces are all in confederacy against him.—Swift.

.... The monument of the greatest man should be only a bust and a name. If the name alone is insufficient to illustrate the bust, let them both perish.—Landon.

.... Such as are still observing upon others, are like those who are always abroad at other men's houses, reforming everywhere, while their own runs to ruin.—Pope.

.... Prejudices are notions or opinions which the mind entertains without knowing the grounds and reasons of them, and which are assented to without examination.—Bishop Berkeley.

Joker's Budget.

Why is the inside of everything unintelligible! Because we can't make it out.

The man who "shot at random" did not hit it—he has since lent his rifle to the youth who aimed at immortality.

"I say, Pat, what are you about—sweeping out that room?" "No," answered Pat, "I am sweeping out the dirt, and leaving the room."

The London Herald announces that Lord Palmerston is "laboring under symptoms of indisposition." We hope the noble lord will not become really indisposed.

It is stated by a German philosopher that the sun is increasing his distance from the earth. It is to this that Courtney attributes the high price of coal during the past two or three years.

A gentleman just returned to this country from a tour in Europe, was asked how he liked the ruins of Pompeii. "Not very well," was the reply, "they are so much out of repair."

A leather statue of St. Crispin is about being erected in Lynn, by the shoemakers of that city. It is to be modelled by Mr. Wax, whose grandfather "staked his awl" when the people of Lexington bristled up to the British.

A merchant of a certain city, who died suddenly, left in his desk a letter, written to one of his correspondents. His sagacious clerk, a son of Erin, seeing the necessity of sending the letter, wrote at the bottom: "Since writing the above, I have died."

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

An elegant, moral and refined Miscellaneous Family Journal, devoted to polite literature, wit and humor, prose and poetic gems, and original tales, written expressly for the paper. In politics, and on all secular questions, it is strictly neutral; therefore making it emphatically a PAPER FOR THE MILLION, and a welcome visitor to the home circle.

It contains the foreign and domestic news of the day, so condensed as to present the greatest possible amount of intelligence. No advertisements are admitted to the paper, thus offering the entire sheet, which is of the MAXIMUM size, for the instruction and amusement of the general reader. An unrivalled corps of contributors are regularly engaged, and every department is under the most finished and perfect system that experience can suggest, forming an original paper, the present circulation of which far exceeds that of any other weekly paper in the Union, with the exception of "BALLOU'S PICTORIAL."

Sample copies sent when desired.

TERMS—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year..... $2 00
4 subscribers, " "..... 7 00
10 " " "..... 15 00

Any person sending us sixteen subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the seventeenth copy gratis.

One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, $4 per annum. Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU.

Corner of Tremont and Bromfield Sts., Boston, Mass.
WHOLESALE AGENTS—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Winch, 116 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 1/2 Myrtle Street, Baltimore; A. C. Bagley, 132 1/2 N. 3rd Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Bays, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Wood, corner 4th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Ringgold, Louisville, Ky.; Wallace, Austin & Buel, 25 Clark Street, Chicago, Ill., &c.

THE BRIDE DRESSING FOR THE WEDDING.

THE BRIDAL TOILET.

The engraving on this page is from a painting by Solomon, and is very felicitous, both in design and execution. The bride is standing before a cheval glass, in her robe of pure white, decked with costly lace and flowers, the bridal veil floating over her dark and wreath-crowned hair, and drooping on her rounded arms. To the left, another beautiful young woman, a bridesmaid, is contemplating her with an expression of mingled admiration and thoughtfulness. The pretty waiting-maid, who is affixing a bunch of flowers, gazes on her mistress with fondness; but even in her face a slight shade of melancholy is discernible. The bride looks not on her own beautiful image—she is thinking of one dearer than herself, and her dark, dreamy eyes are gazing into the rose-hued clouds of the future. It is an eventful moment in her young existence. She is about to commence a new life. She is about to bid adieu to the scenes of her infancy—a farewell to the parents who have watched over the few sunny years that have passed over her beautiful head. It is impossible that a shade of sadness, or at least of thoughtfulness, should not at this moment fall upon her brow and her spirit. At the moment of the realization of her day-dreams—of the moment of union to her young heart's ideal—the blessings that she is leaving appear in all their brightness. She is about to trust her fate into the keeping of one being. That free communication of thoughts, hopes, feelings, to father, mother, brothers and sisters will henceforth be interdicted. Henceforth she will have thoughts, perhaps sorrows, that they cannot share. The future may be bright and radiant as her fondest hopes have painted but the past has been, and the present is so. She leaves a home already established; she goes forth to found one. Household cares have hitherto pressed but slightly upon her; henceforth they will be her daily lot. Even with her limited experience, in the circle of her acquaintance she can call to mind many a bitter disappointment—many a ruined hope. Yet, casting these shadows from her—these intrusive doubts—she will go to the altar with the firm faith of a true woman, and there publicly pronounce the vows her heart has taken long ago. She will see around her smiles and tears; congratulations and sighs will blend in her ear—for a bridal, in its mingled light and shadow, is but a type of life with its woven threads of joy and woe.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { CORNER OF TREMONT
AND BROMFIELD STS.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 26, 1856.

$3.00 PER ANNUM. } VOL. XI., No. 4.—Whole No. 264.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

HON. JAMES BUCHANAN AND JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE.

We present upon this page authentic likenesses of the Hon. JAMES BUCHANAN of Pennsylvania, and the Hon. JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky, the Democratic nominees for the offices of President and Vice President of the United States. We are indebted to Mr. Brady, of New York, for the fine photograph of Mr. Buchanan, from which our drawing was made. Mr. Brady has executed portraits of all the nominees now before the people for their choice, and they form an attractive addition to his famous gallery, 359 Broadway. Our portrait of Mr. Breckinridge was drawn from an ambrotype taken expressly for us by an artist of Lexington, Ky. Mr. Buchanan was born in Franklin county, Pennsylvania, April 13, 1791, and early distinguished himself by his aptitude and love of study. After a thorough classical training he studied law, and made that his profession. In the war of 1812 he enrolled himself as a volunteer. In 1814 he was chosen a representative in the State legislature, and was re-elected to the same post, declining further service at the expiration of his second term. He was elected a member of Congress in 1820, and took his seat in the following year. He remained in the House until March 4, 1831. In that year he was appointed minister to Russia by Gen. Jackson, and accepted the trust. In 1834 he was chosen to fill an unexpired term in the national Senate, was afterwards elected for the full term, and re-elected. Under President Polk's administration he acted as Secretary of State. President Pierce appointed him minister to England, and he remained in London until the spring of the present year, when he resigned and returned to the United States. He has acquired an enviable reputation by years of honorable public service, and his popularity was attested by the enthusiasm with which his nomination was received by the members of his party throughout the country. Though vigorously attacked upon political grounds, no whisper against his private character has ever been breathed, nor is he denied the possession of distinguished talent.

Hon. JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE, the Democratic candidate for the office of Vice-President, is a native of Kentucky, and born about the year 1821. He received a finished education, and commenced life with a promise which his subsequent career has fulfilled. When the Mexican war broke out, he manifested his patriotism in response to the appeal of the government for volunteers by joining one of the fine regiments which his native State sent into the field prepared to shed their blood in their country's cause. This regiment was among those ordered to the support of General Scott, landed at Vera Cruz, and marched to the capital. This corps was admirably drilled and officered. Among his brother officers in Mexico, Breckinridge was as popular as he is at home in Lexington. In 1851, he was the candidate of his party for Congress in the county of Fayette, Henry Clay's district, and elected. He was opposed in this contest by the Hon. Leslie Coombs. He was also re-elected over Robert P. Letcher for a second term. He was offered by President Pierce the mission to Spain, but declined accepting it. He is described as a man of commanding figure, with an open, frank and resolute countenance, a good speaker and debater, and, in private, esteemed for his high chivalric qualities and pleasing address. His opponents recognize in him a "foeman worthy of their steel;" while that portion of Young America which marches under the Democratic banner, is of course pleased with the nomination.

HON. JAMES BUCHANAN AND JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE, THE DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATES FOR THE PRESIDENCY AND VICE-PRESIDENCY.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE GIPSEY'S SECRET:

—OR—

THE LEAGUE OF GUILT.

A STORY OF HIGH AND HUMBLE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE CONTRABANDIST."

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER X.

HEART SECRETS.

"AUNT DOROTHEA, why is it, I wonder, that we hear nothing from Eleanor—that we do not see her?"

Mary Latimer spoke in a low voice to her aunt, as they sat together in the curtained recess of a window in her brother's apartment.

"Indeed, my dear, I am as much perplexed as you are," was the answer, in the same subdued voice. "Her silence is somewhat unaccountable, I think."

Miss Latimer was silent and thoughtful. Presently she said: "The reason must be, I should say, her uncle's unwillingness to have her expose herself further than she has already done to the fever. May not that be more probable than anything else?"

"I was about to mention that very thing myself, Mary. Yes—I think it must be so. Our warm-hearted little Eleanor would not forsake us else."

Again there was a brief silence, which was once more terminated by Miss Latimer.

"I am not more willing than Sir Edward himself that Eleanor should run any further risk; but, next to the recovery of Hugh from the fever, I believe my most earnest wish is to see her. I would at least send a message, or a letter, to her, if I were not apprehensive of objections on his part to even that."

"Better not do it, then, my dear. If he is afraid to have her come here while the fever is in the house, he would probably, as you think, object quite as strongly to having any one sent from here to Ashby Place."

A scarcely-audible sigh was Miss Latimer's only rejoinder. Laying aside the sewing with which she had been engaged, she crossed the apartment to the bedside of her brother, and silently regarded the unconscious face before her. The deep flush of fever was there. The fine features were sharpened in their outline by the wasting hand of the disease. The beautiful eyes, whose kind and tender glance had dwelt with such earnest affection on his sister's countenance, were half closed; they had grown larger and deeper; there were hollows there that told of a heavy and wearying illness. Their glance was not turned to hers now, as she looked upon him, for he was insensible to it. Nearly ever since the commencement of his illness he had been delirious, and his restless mental wanderings only ceased, at times, to be replaced by a state of partial stupor, like that in which he now lay. The tears gathered in Miss Latimer's eyes as she regarded him. "I wonder what Eleanor would say to see him now?" she thought. "Poor Hugh—poor Hugh!"

She bent silently, and touched her lips to the beloved brow, unconscious now of their pressure. Larger and heavier grew the tears that trembled, ready to fall from her drooping lashes, and dimly through them shone the golden gleam of the tiny, long-treasured locket, lying half-hidden in Hugh Latimer's breast. Silently she covered it from sight, and turned away with a dull pain at her heart. That little treasure, guarded so long, so tenderly, so hopelessly! Still he cherished it, though the gulf was wide that separated him from her he loved.

Slowly and wearily passed the days of Hugh Latimer's illness. At first, the disease had appeared comparatively light; but as time grew on, it gradually assumed an aspect of the gravest character. The physician's anxiety was fully visible to Mary's watchful eyes, and at her earnest questioning, he could not deny to her that Hugh's case gave him a great deal of uneasiness.

"It would be not only useless, but unwise," he said, "to conceal from you the danger in which he lies. Not many would recover from such an illness as his; but his constitution has been a sound one, and to that we may look for our encouragement."

Aunt Dorothea listened to him, looked anxiously in his face, and turned away to Hugh's bedside in utter silence. Mary heard, and a look of mute trouble that touched Doctor Gregg's kind heart filled her brown eyes.

"Only that," she murmured, in a voice of grief,—"only that!" "My dear Miss Latimer," said the doctor, taking her hand gently in his own, and speaking in a subdued tone of earnest sympathy, "would that I might give you a stronger hope! I could ask for no greater happiness. But everything that human power can do, shall be done for him; the rest is in higher hands. Let me entreat you to have courage. The life that is so dear to you, I trust may yet be preserved."

Faint, indeed, was the prospect now; but faint as it was, Mary Latimer's hope was not quenched. The hope of her brother's life—how she clung to it! Hovering around his bed noiselessly as a spirit, night and day she watched by him, while he lay there insensible to her cares. Not once did she relax her vigils; not an hour's rest did she afford herself; never for an instant did slumber visit those anxious, care-filled eyes, during the time of her brother's peril. Vainly did her aunt and the good physician attempt to persuade her to allow herself the smallest period of rest. She would shake her head.

"No, no—not yet," she said, gently,—"not yet. Wait a little. If he recover, shall I not have rest enough? and if he dies—" The words faltered and ceased. Her heart was full of tears unshed.

And Aunt Dorothea could only resume her own sorrowful watchings in silence; while the physician, in his care for the brother, could but yield involuntary reverence to the faithful, unwearying devotion of the sister's heart. He, on his part, was almost unremitting in his attendance, now. The fever had nearly ceased its progress in the village, and of his remaining patients, Hugh's case was decidedly the most dangerous. Beside his pillow, then, he spent every hour he could gain, and with alternating hopes and fears, awaited the result.

It was on the day of the crisis that Miss Latimer, while watching in tearful suspense by her brother's side, was told that some one from Ashby Place had come to Briarfield, and desired to speak with her. Up to this time, not a single word had been received from Eleanor. Now it was with a troubled heart that Mary left the chamber, and sought the messenger who waited below.

It was Lucy Elmore; and instead of being sent by Eleanor, she had come unknown to her.

"For, Miss Mary," said Lucy, "Sir Edward has utterly forbidden my mistress to come near your house on account of the fever, though she wished to come, and he knows it would give her no more harm than she got by going to the village before she came. She would very gladly have come to see you, Miss Mary, and I know she thinks it very hard that she should be told not; but she does not dare disobey her uncle. So I thought I would come, whether he liked it or not, just to let you know the reason of her not coming."

"I am glad you did," said Miss Latimer, gently,—"I am glad you did, my good Lucy, though, perhaps, I am to blame for saying so, for you may have put yourself in danger by your kindness in coming hither."

"O, I do not fear that, Miss Mary,—I do not fear that, in the least," said Lucy Elmore; "and I shall stop at Betty Williams's on the way back, and change my dress, so that my coming will do no harm at Ashby, either. Then Mr. Hugh is very ill, indeed—is he not?"

The tears fell from Miss Latimer's eyes.

"Yes, Lucy, he is very ill—very ill, indeed. I do not know whether he will recover. For three days he has not moved, or unshed his eyes."

Lucy could not help crying herself.

"I am very sorry for you, Miss Mary," she said, "and so, I am sure, will my mistress be. But, indeed, I hope he may get better."

Miss Latimer thanked her; and then, as Lucy rose to go, bade her give her love to Eleanor, and gave her many affectionate messages for her.

"And tell her," she added, with a faltering voice,—"tell her that by to-morrow noon, my brother will be either pronounced out of danger, or he will be dead."

With a heart full to overflowing, she went back to Hugh's bedside, to watch and weep in silence. We will not linger over the night of suspense that followed. Let us rather hasten to record the hour of rejoicing in the dawn of the new day, when the first ray of returning consciousness beamed on Mary from her brother's eyes, and the sister's love was rewarded.

Very slow indeed was the progress of Hugh Latimer's recovery, at first; but when he once began to gain strength, it proceeded now rapidly. In three weeks' time he was able to walk out, leaning on the arm of his happy sister Mary, alternating with Aunt Dorothea, or the good physician, whose happiness was scarcely less than that of those to whom he had been the instrument of restoring the life that was so dear to them.

Meanwhile, though the fact of Hugh Latimer's recovery was well known at Ashby, they saw nothing of Eleanor. On the day after Lucy Elmore's visit to Briarfield, Mary had received from Eleanor an affectionate yet sad letter, full of earnest and tender sympathy, and deploring the necessity which compelled her to refrain from meeting her. "I long to see you, Mary, to tell you with my own lips how I feel for you; to express my sorrow for your brother's danger, and, side by side with you, unite my prayers with yours for his restoration. But I am utterly forbidden to visit either Briarfield or Woodthorpe at present, or even to go in that direction, and I dare not—dare not disobey my uncle. Forgive me, Mary, for telling you of this prohibition; believe me, it wounds me as deeply as it can you; but, Mary, I could not bear that you should think me willing to neglect you in your great sorrow."

For some time after the commencement of his recovery, Hugh had not mentioned Eleanor's name, though Mary knew that he thought of her continually. Often he sat in deep thought for hours, and many a time he unclosed the tiny golden case concealing Eleanor's likeness, to behold the lovely pictured face within.

One day he leaned on the back of her chair, as she sat sewing. "Mary," he said, "did Miss Ashby come here during my illness?"

"Once she came," answered his sister, in a low voice.

"When?"

"The third day."

"And not afterwards?"

"Not afterwards, Hugh."

He rose and turned away in silence.

"Idiot!" he said, mentally; "why do I dwell on this? What is it to me whether she came or not? What a mad passion is this that I cherish so hopelessly! Is she not another's?"

With stern brow and gloomy eyes, he was pacing the floor from side to side, when Mary came and put a letter into his hand.

"Read it, dear Hugh," she said. "It is from Eleanor." He read it and sighed.

"Well, Mary, it has nothing to do with me, after all. Come—let us go somewhere. Have you no visits to make?—no poor people, or sick, or lame, or blind, to minister to? Take me somewhere, for pity's sake!"

She put on her bonnet, ordered the chaise, and in five minutes was driving slowly along the road towards the cottage of old Dame Wilton. It was not long ere they reached it. Hugh tied the horse beneath an elm, at a little distance, and then they went up together through the garden to the door.

But it opened before they had gained the rose-covered porch, and forth from the cottage came Eleanor Ashby. She paused involuntarily on seeing them, while her pale cheek colored with surprise and pleasure. Then she came forward with a look of sincere, earnest happiness.

"O, Mary—Hugh!"

There was a thrill through all Hugh Latimer's frame as he beheld her,—a deeper one as she thus in her gladness unconsciously addressed him and gave him her hand. His own trembled as he touched it. He could scarcely speak calmly to her. Mary's arm encircled her tenderly and with unspeakable joy.

"O, Eleanor—dear Eleanor," she uttered, "I little thought to meet you here! It is so long—so long since we saw you!"

The tears quickly filled Eleanor's eyes.

"I knew it," she said, in a sad voice; "but indeed, indeed, Mary, I could not come to you. My uncle—"

She hesitated. She felt unwilling to allude to her uncle's harsh command. Mary understood her, and tenderly pressed the hand she held.

"I know; but now—now he need not fear. He will let you come now, that it is all over?"

Eleanor could not speak directly. She shook her head, and turned her face aside to hide the tears that would fall, despite her efforts to repress them.

"What—not now, even? Tell me, Eleanor," said Miss Latimer.

"No, Mary," she said, in a suppressed tone. "He is very strict—very severe. I cannot come. He will not let me. He can scarcely go out at all now, except Morley is with me. He came here with me to-day, and is coming for me in a little while to go home."

At that moment Morley Briancourt drove up in the chaise to the gate, and, with a slight frown, alighted and entered. With astonishment and anger he beheld the three standing there together; but hiding the dark agitation he felt, he advanced towards them. Hugh Latimer had turned his head towards him, and for an instant the glances of the two met. In that brief moment, each read the other's feelings. Then their eyes were withdrawn from each other.

Mary Latimer just glanced towards Morley as he approached, and then pressed Eleanor's hand with a tender, earnest, sympathizing clasp.

"At least, then," she said, "we can think of each other."

"Yes—yes. That, at least, Mary, he cannot surely forbid it."

"And now, good-by, Eleanor. Remember us, will you?—and Aunt Dorothea, who loves you so!" And Miss Latimer pressed a silent, eloquent kiss on her friend's lips.

Eleanor could not raise her eyes for tears. She held out her hand to Hugh.

"Good-by, Mr. Latimer."

"Miss Ashby—Eleanor, good-by." Again he lifted his eyes to the face of Morley Briancourt; then turned them to the sweet, sad countenance of Eleanor once more, and with a tender, lingering pressure of the hand he held, released it, and went in with his sister.

"I am ready, Morley," said Eleanor, in a sad tone, turning to him.

He gave her his arm in silence, and conducting her to the chaise, seated her in it, took his own place, and drove rapidly homeward. She did not speak once during the whole way, but sat with her eyes cast down, in sorrowful thought. Morley Briancourt was burning with suppressed anger the while. He had done his best to prevent Eleanor from meeting with the Latimers, and the discovery of this meeting to-day aroused his deepest ire; but he would not let Eleanor suspect it. Indeed, jealous as he might be, his passion for her was too deep for his jealousy to cool it, and he could not but manifest towards her the same tenderness as ever.

He kissed her hand as he led her into the house, on their return, and while the passionate pressure of his lips was yet warm upon it, turned away, and sought his servant, Humphries.

"Humphries," he said, "let me know whenever any message or letter is brought from Briarfield hither. Either you or Sir Edward Ashby's valet will receive it, and bring it to me—to me alone."

There was a little dark figure, with coal-black hair, and black eyes that shone with malice on Morley Briancourt, crouched down close by in the shrubbery. The bright eyes followed, gleamingly, both master and man, who walked slowly along, and stealthily, among the bushes, he skirted the walk, following close upon their steps.

CHAPTER XI.

AN UNWELCOME CONFESSION.

THREE weeks had passed from the time when Eleanor encountered the Latimers at Dame Wilton's cottage; and during all that time, she had heard nothing from any of them. Her uncle, naturally cold, gloomy and taciturn, was of late more so than ever; and while he controlled her movements with a strictness that was severity itself, she hesitated to rebel against his commands; for she could not but think that some secret anxiety troubled him.

She was perplexed by the silence of Mary Latimer. It seemed strange—unaccountable. Every day she thought of it, and every day it grew stranger to her. Miss Latimer herself had offered to communicate with her—why then did she fail to do so? Eleanor could not know that all this time the Latimers themselves were awaiting some token from her in answer to the letters and messages that had already come from Briarfield to Ashby. For such had come at different times, though of late they had ceased coming; for not one had been answered. Morley Briancourt had carried out his plan—that of putting a stop to the communication between Eleanor and her friends. Everything that had been sent had been received either by Hawkins or Humphries, who were always on the watch, and conveyed by Sir Edward's consent to Morley Briancourt himself, who took care that they should never reach their intended destination. He saw the perplexity of Eleanor from day to day, as she failed to receive any notice from Briarfield. He saw that she felt concerned—even sad, at times, respecting the matter; but this only made him the firmer in his resolve. And as the time passed on, and she seemed to think more of it, and dwell on it for hours together, his jealousy, which had been for a time quieted, was thoroughly roused again. He watched narrowly, to see that she did not herself send to Briarfield, to Mary; but this she did not do. She waited to know first the reason of Mary Latimer's seeming silence. He redoubled his vigilance, that no chance word or line from thence should reach her, after all, and bring to light the act by which he had terminated their communication. The letters which Miss Latimer sent her friend he read carefully; and in more than one of them were passages which, although written without any motive such as he attributed to them, still stung him to the most angry jealousy. They were those in which she spoke of Hugh.

Now, he did not retain that invariable self-command which formerly had enabled him so well to control his emotions, let their nature be what they might. The inward disturbance that he experienced was outwardly visible. His passion for Eleanor grew daily stronger, and the conflict between that and his jealousy made him moody and irritable. He could not bear Eleanor out of his presence. She never rode out now but he attended her; he regarded her with alternate suspicion and confidence. His manner to her, at once abrupt and tender, passionate yet distrustful, betrayed the pitiful workings of his mind. It could not fail to impress her, so visible was it, with unpleasant emotions, even though she was unable to tell the reason of the change in his manner. She felt that he loved her, but it was his jealousy that, all unconsciously to herself, made the knowledge painful to her.

There was one, meanwhile, watching them both, unseen. It was Pequin the dwarf. Morley believed that the secret of the intercepted letters was known only to Sir Edward, himself and the two valets. He had no suspicion that every movement of his was observed by an eye, vigilant and unwearied, from hour to hour, from day to day, week in and week out. He rested secure in that belief for the time being.

But the state of continual uneasiness regarding Eleanor could not endure long without some decided movement on his part to remove the occasion of it. The time when Eleanor would be of age was drawing nigh. The agreement had been that the marriage should take place at that time. But even the space of time intervening seemed too long to Morley. One evening, therefore, requesting an interview with Sir Edward, he expressed his desire that the hand of Eleanor might be bestowed on him at an earlier period.

The baronet appeared to agree unquestioningly to every suggestion of the young man with regard, to Eleanor. Nay—he even seemed to dread thwarting or disputing him. He immediately, therefore, signified his perfect readiness to adopt this measure, and directly addressed a letter to the elder Briancourt in London, requesting his presence at Ashby.

It was about a week after this that Morley had gone out—an unusual thing of late—to ride alone. To Eleanor, this was actually a relief, for his continual presence troubled her. A little while after his departure, she ordered her own horse, and also went out in an opposite direction. After enjoying a brief ride, none the less pleasant for being solitary, she set out again for home. Slowly she rode, to prolong the unwonted enjoyment; but soon the staked chimneys of Ashby rose above the trees, scarce more than half a mile distant. She fancied Morley Briancourt, if he had returned, pacing the lawn, waiting for her appearance; perhaps coming down the great avenue to meet her. The old feeling of trouble and perplexity came back at this. Doubt, weariness and impatience at once filled her mind again.

But Morley Briancourt did not come to meet her. He was not in the great avenue when she entered it; and when she came in full sight of the lawn, he was not there either. But whom, instead, did she see? Two persons stood together just within the hall door: in one of whom she recognized her uncle, Sir Edward Ashby; in the other, the father of Morley Briancourt. Yes—it was he, most certainly. A slight feeling of surprise accompanied this discovery, for Eleanor had not heard of his contemplated visit; but, prepared to give him the friendly greeting with which she had ever met him, she rode forward, at a slightly accelerated movement, to welcome the new-comer.

Preserving, at the usually sober age of fifty, not a few of the attractions which had marked him at a much earlier period, still handsome, graceful, plausible and self-possessed, Mr. Briancourt was one who would universally have been termed an extremely fine-looking and agreeable man; and with his elegant exterior, his bland and pleasing manners, and easy address, he certainly presented a most remarkable contrast to his friend, Sir Edward Ashby; so remarkable, indeed, that you would have marvelled at the intimacy existing between these two men; you would have wondered how they could ever have been so attracted one to another, as voluntarily to form the alliance which promised to make their union yet closer.

Something like this passed through Eleanor Ashby's mind, as she drew near the mansion; but she had no time to dwell upon this enigma, for Mr. Briancourt, immediately on perceiving her, left the side of his companion, and hastened to meet her. She held out her hand with a friendly smile and a pleasant greeting, as he approached.

"My dear Eleanor," he said, in answer to her graceful and friendly welcome, "I am charmed to behold you again. I need not ask concerning the state of your health; I see—that lovely bloom leaves no necessity for the question. But where is your knight, fair lady? He should be at your side, and yet I do not see him."

"Indeed, sir, I do not know," answered Eleanor, quietly, as she received Mr. Briancourt's hand and dismounted from the saddle,—"indeed I do not know. Then he is not at home?"

"No, but doubtless will be, shortly," rejoined the gentleman, drawing the hand of his fair companion within his arm, and proceeding with her across the lawn, while the groom appeared to take Selim to the stables.

"Then you have not yet seen your son?" asked Eleanor.

"Not yet; but he cannot be far distant, for is not Eleanor here?" returned Mr. Briancourt, with graceful gallantry, touching the hand of the young lady to his lips. "There can be no doubt that he will return shortly. I wish very much to see him. It is some weeks since I had that pleasure."

"Yes—you must be impatient to see him," said Eleanor.

By this time they had reached the hall door, where she was received by Sir Edward with a constrained salutation. She immediately repaired to her dressing-room, leaving her uncle and his guest together.

"Well, Victor," said Sir Edward, coldly, as he paced back and forth in the hall, "I trust you are as well satisfied as ever!"

A peculiar smile rested on Mr. Briancourt's lip—a smile of calm security and self-content, as one who has gained possession of a prize whose value he is confident of.

"O, perfectly—perfectly," he answered. "Why, Ashby, I fancy I have got the best part of that little bargain which we made so many years ago, or, rather, Morley gets it. I faith, though—but I am tempted to wish I had secured the hand of the charming Eleanor for myself."

Sir Edward Ashby's cold and gloomy countenance never betrayed any sign of the feelings with which he heard this. He made no reply, but continued his walk to and fro, with his eyes bent downward, beneath their cloudy brows. Mr. Briancourt, occupied with his own reflections, failed to notice him.

"However," he went on, presently, "it is not to be helped now; the matter is too nearly settled. Well, Ashby," and he turned to his host, "so Morley wishes this marriage hastened—does he? Lover-like! But who can wonder at his impatience to win so fair a wife! And, doubtless, my dear friend, you are not unwilling that he should have her now?"

"Victor, this is hardly the place," said Sir Edward, "to discuss—"

"Ah, you are right, my dear sir. Well, let us talk this matter over in the library. We shall be sufficiently secure there."

Sir Edward Ashby summoned a domestic, and bidding him, when Morley Briancourt should come, let him know that his presence was desired in the library, repaired thither with his guest.

Meanwhile, Eleanor, in her own apartment, was busy at the toilet, with her maid. She saw, shortly, from the window, Morley Briancourt returning homeward across the park; and Lucy, having occasion to run down stairs on some errand for her mistress, reported, on coming back, that he had immediately gone to the library, where Sir Edward and Mr. Briancourt were, "and they are all shut up there together now," she concluded.

"Shut up together, Lucy?" echoed her mistress, remarking Lucy's peculiar mode of expression.

"Yes, indeed, Miss Eleanor; doors and windows, too," answered the maid,—"doors and windows, too. I should rather open them, I think, this warm weather, instead of closing them so tightly, as I saw Sir Edward doing just now."

Miss Ashby thought so, too, though she did not say so, since Sir Edward Ashby was not answerable to her for his actions, and still less to her maid. But it seemed to her something strange that her uncle and his guests should be thus closeted together in so secret a manner, almost at the very first moment of Mr. Briancourt's arrival, and some slight curiosity moved her concerning the nature of their business. It was evident that Lucy, as well, marvelled somewhat in regard to it, but she said nothing.

She did not see either of them until dinner, and then nothing betrayed in the countenance of either the nature of the business which they had been transacting so privately. Her uncle, though in some measure reserved and taciturn as usual, maintained also his usual air of stately courtesy, undisturbed and unruined. The elder Briancourt was elegant, graceful and courtly as ever; his fine conversational powers, his delicate and brilliant flashes of alternate wit and sentiment in full force. Morley Briancourt had resumed his customary ease and fascination of manner, but wore yet a slightly subdued air; and Eleanor fancied that his bearing towards herself was one of even perceptibly deeper tenderness than usual.

It was so; and there was also, in his feelings, what gave no outward sign—a dark and restless agitation, the offspring of his fears and apprehensions to which he had been subject for the last few weeks, so fearful was he of losing the prize which he had all but won. Perhaps, too, the memory of the murderous deed he had lately done haunted him.

When Miss Ashby left the table, instead of proceeding immediately to the drawing-room, she went out upon the lawn, and thence passed into the avenue, whose graceful elms were already silvered by the mild radiance of the full moon, that chequered the broad, smooth path with its yellow beams falling through the leaves. Somewhat to her surprise, she was almost directly joined by Morley, who had left the dining-room nearly as soon as herself, contrary to her expectations. He took her hand as he reached her, and drew it gently within his arm.

"I am glad to find you here, dear Eleanor," he said, tenderly. "I have much to say to you. Will you listen patiently and respond favorably?"

"Nay, Morley," said Miss Ashby, with an attempt at carelessness of manner. "I must first know what the matter is of which you would treat. I promise you to listen patiently, but the response must rest on conditions."

She could not see it, but his brow suddenly darkened. He answered directly, however, with even deeper tenderness than before.

"Then if that is the case, my beloved Eleanor, I must throw myself on your mercy, trusting that you will not refuse to grant the plea I am about to make. Eleanor," and encircling her form with his arm, he drew her closer to his side, "it is a long, long time now since we were betrothed. You were a child then, and that was all, but a beautiful, graceful, impulsive creature, lovelier than any vision my boyish dreams had ever painted. And I was a youth, ardent, impassioned and warm-hearted—a lover of beauty in every form. And I loved you, my beautiful one! Do you remember those days, Eleanor?" and bowing his head, he gazed with a passionate glance into her dark eyes.

Eleanor's cheeks were burning with a crimson flush. With the doubts, fears and perplexities which had harassed her mind so painfully, even yet distracting her, this fervor of her lover's language was deeply embarrassing. Her heart swelled; a sense of suffocation almost overpowered her, as, during the pause that followed his words, his ardent glance fascinated hers. She averted her head to escape from it.

Morley Briancourt's breast was filled with a sudden triumph. He mistook the signification of her blushes, her confusion, her averted glance. He said to himself, "My fears were groundless: she is mine still; she has no suspicions. Maiden deceived me."

"You remember those days, Eleanor, when I first learned to love you?" he said again, pressing his lips to her throbbing brow that burned beneath their touch.

"Yes, Morley, I remember," she answered, nerving herself to calmness with a sudden effort.

"And then," he went on, "we parted. A year passed, and another, and yet a third, and then we met again, and you, my sweet Eleanor, were grown to womanhood. If you had fascinated me in your childhood, how much deeper was the passion with which you inspired me then! How I adored you—how I worshipped my beautiful idol! But though I was permitted to look forward to a day when I might call you my own, that day was set far in the distance. I remonstrated, prayed, entreated, that it might come earlier, but in vain. I was permitted to behold you but once every year, and from year to year I prayed for the time of my trial to be shortened. But it was of no avail. And now seven years have passed, and still the contract parts us for yet almost another twelvemonth. At length your uncle has consented that, if you are willing, our marriage shall take place without further delay. He granted me this to-day. Eleanor, my beloved, give me your sanction now. Say that you will be mine—that we shall be united soon." Standing beneath the beautiful moonlight, with his arm about Eleanor's form, as his words died away on the warm night air, he drew her closer to his breast. He pressed his lips tenderly—passionately to hers. "Eleanor, my beloved, my darling!" he murmured again.

His earnest words, his ardent, impassioned tones thrilled through her. But a strange heaviness pressed upon her heart. A wild and painful sense of her own desolation—of her need of knowledge and guidance in this hour, filled her breast. She could not answer.

"Speak, Eleanor," uttered her lover, softly.

Still she was silent, pale, motionless, her troubled eyes downcast. Suddenly she started, sprang from his embrace, and stood at a little distance with her hands clasped and her glance fixed upon the earth, her head half bowed, as one who listens for some sound.

"Eleanor, what is this? what?" But Morley Briancourt could not utter more. Disappointment, and anger, and astonishment flashed in his glance for an instant. Then, recovering himself, he approached her. "Eleanor—dearest Eleanor, will you not answer me?" he said, tenderly. And he was about to clasp her hand in his own, but she moved back a step, waving him off.

"No—no, Morley; not now—not now!" she uttered, in a clear but agitated tone. "I am going. Do not speak to me; do not follow me." She turned away, leaving him there. She sped silently up the avenue, crossed the broad moonlit lawn, and paused only when she had reached her own apartment.

And while Morley Briancourt, with muttered curses, strode hastily in the same direction to join his father, unable to account for this incomprehensible scene, there crouched behind a great elm a little, imp-like figure, that threw up its long arms and danced about with strange, wild, uncouth gestures, and gave utterance to a low, triumphant chuckle. And then it, too, sped away, noiselessly as a spirit, through the broad moonlight. With its grotesque motions, and rapid, shuffling gait, and elfish shape, it looked a strange, eerie thing enough. It might have been taken for a dog, or an ape, at a distance. You could scarce have told truly what it was.

But Eleanor Ashby had heard, and was safe.

CHAPTER XII.

THE FRIENDLY WARNING.

ELEANOR ASHBY'S cheek was paler than usual, when, a few moments after she had so abruptly left Morley Briancourt's side, she regained her own apartment. She had heard something which both startled and perplexed her. It was a voice that whispered, during the silence which succeeded her lover's entreaty, the single word "Beware!" Down there under the elms in the great avenue it had sounded seemingly by her very side. No living form had been visible besides her own and Morley's, and yet a human voice must have uttered that word. It was not fancy that had deceived her; it was not the night wind sighing through the arches of the interlacing elms; it was not the rustle of the whispering leaves. There was no deception whatever in the matter. The sound had been that of a voice as much human as her own, and so plainly distinguished as to denote the close proximity of the one who breathed it, although not another being had seemed to be near her, except Morley himself.

That it was intended for her, she did not for one moment doubt. Its meaning, following as it did on Morley Briancourt's very last words, and preceding her answer while her mind was in a state of the most trying perplexity, she interpreted at the moment. Perhaps the very hesitation she herself had felt in the nature of her answer had helped her to do so, suggesting immediately the purpose and signification of the words whispered by this invisible monitor. They presented themselves as a warning against the step she had been expected to take, in accepting Morley.

He could not have heard them, as was evident enough, and yet Eleanor wondered that he had not, when they reached her ears so plainly. He was in ignorance, then, of the cause of her sudden departure. What would he think of it? how account for it? she asked, mentally. But such queries as these were not to the purpose. The main thing of consequence now was the mystery itself, for a mystery it was, so far. She wished to know who had been concealed near her, to utter these words; why the warning had been given, and what was the interest which had prompted it. All these questions were to be solved.

The first, as she dwelt on it, was almost immediately met by a thought which flashed suddenly across her mind in the midst of her perplexity. She remembered Maida the gipsy. Was not this secret warning from the same source as that which she had received from her only a short time since? Was not Maida herself the one who, to-night, had given it? The mystery—the secrecy of the thing was associated, in Eleanor's mind, with her. True, the gipsies had vanished from Penshurst Common, but might not Maida still remain? And especially if her purpose in this matter had been an earnest and sincere one, which now Eleanor was not so skeptical about as she had been before.

She had fixed on an hypothesis certainly reasonable enough, but one which Morley Briancourt himself had deprived of probability, when his own hand had ensured Maida's silence, when his own dagger had drank her life-blood, and the dark waters of the Wye closed over her, in a midnight gone by.

"Lucy," said Miss Ashby, to her maid, "have you seen of late any of the gipsies who were at Penshurst a short time ago?"

"No, Miss Eleanor. They were gone the very day after you went there, if you recollect."

"Yes—I know—I know," returned Eleanor. "But are you sure none of them remained?—not a single one?"

"It might be possible," answered Lucy Elmore, thoughtfully; "but I have not seen one of them since they went. Why, Miss Eleanor? Have you seen them?"

"No—no. I only wished to discover whether any had remained in the neighborhood—that is all, Lucy. You need not say to any one that I asked you."

And she fell into thought again. Of the conviction that Maida was the author of the warning which she had so mysteriously received to-night, she could not divest herself. She had made light of her first caution; now, she only wished to behold her once more, to gain something more definite—more satisfactory from her; to learn, if possible, the meaning which lay concealed beneath all this enigmatical obscurity.

And should she not learn something further? She resolved at least to wait and see,—to ascertain exactly her own position, and be enabled to discern clearly the state of safety or of peril in which she stood with regard to her projected marriage with Morley Briancourt, before she took another step in the matter. She herself had been undecided whether to marry him, without, at the same time, being aware of any serious reason why she should refuse him. The repetition of Maida's warning convinced her that it was not one to be passed by unheeded; that there was a reason for its being given. It decided her to wait awhile, at least, till she discovered that reason. She wished she might behold her invisible monitor, who, it was evident, was hovering near her, while she knew it not. She could not guess how soon that wish would be gratified.

Morley Briancourt, from the avenue, had, meanwhile, gone straight to his own apartment, where he paced the floor from side to side with moody haste, his arms folded, and his brow shadowed with a dark look of inward anger, disappointment and impatience.

"What does she mean?" he muttered to himself. "Can it be that, after all, I am too late—that she intends to put an end to this? Ah, I have waited too long—too long! But if this fellow—this Latimer, of Briarfield, has been the one to baffle my hopes, he shall repent it! And yet, what makes me such an idiot!" he went on, with a smile of self-assurance. "Is she not bound to me irrevocably? For what can break her uncle's promise? And so long as my father possesses his present power over him, I have nothing to fear. Her consent, even if she should refuse to give it, will be unnecessary. He must give her to me, or he is at my father's mercy!"

A knock was at the door, and directly Victor Briancourt entered.

"Well, how speeds the wooing, Morley?" he asked, lightly; and an easy smile diffused itself over his countenance as he advanced to the chimney-place with a careless, buoyant step, and threw himself into a cushioned arm-chair,—"how speeds the wooing, Morley?"

"Faith, I can scarcely tell myself," answered the son, with a frown. "Eleanor is in an incomprehensible mood to-night. I have gained no answer from her, for she scarcely heard me mention the object of the interview, before she left my side with a degree of haste by no means flattering, and for what reason, is beyond my power to tell."

"A strange caprice, by my word!" said the elder Briancourt, in a careless tone; "but nothing more—nothing more, rest assured, Morley. To-morrow will bring everything into order."

"You think so?"

Morley Briancourt paused within a little distance of his father's chair as he asked the question.

"Think so? My dear fellow, what in the world should prevent it?" asked his father, nonchalantly, playing with his watch-seals,—"what in the world should prevent it?"

"May not her own will do so? I confess I fear—"

"What?" And on the gentleman's lips rested an undisturbed, graceful, self-confident smile.

"That this Hugh Latimer, of Briarfield, yonder, has become already my rival."

"Well—and if he has, what then?"

"A great deal of trouble may be anticipated."

"I beg your pardon: I must differ from you there. You said something, if my memory serves me rightly, relative to her will, as being exercised in the matter of this marriage. Do you recall the fact, my dear Morley, that she has, or will be supposed to have, no will, except such as agrees in every point with that of her uncle? And he, in his turn, has no will but what is subservient to mine. He is completely in my power. I can do with him what I please. Therefore, you need give yourself no uneasiness whatever. He is to give you his niece in marriage, at such a time. The fact is an extremely simple, and at the same time, an indisputable—an unalterable one. You see it?"

"Yes."

"You will, then, I presume, mention to our fair Eleanor the matter in debate, some time to-morrow again?"

"Excuse me: I prefer that Sir Edward himself should receive her agreement after this."

Victor Briancourt laughed.

"Cool, on my honor, Morley!" he said. "Why, he can be but a lukewarm lover who yields to so slight a mortification as that occasioned you to-night."

"Lukewarm?" Morley Briancourt's brow flushed, and his eye kindled. "Lukewarm?" he repeated. "Nay; you are light, and gay, and trifling in your nature, and yet you know the strength of a Briancourt's passions. No lukewarm love is mine. Eleanor Ashby has roused its fiercest power."

His father smiled quietly.

"To the utter exclusion, I believe, of a certain fancy which you must remember?"

A slight frown darkened the brow of Morley.

"I have no desire to revert to that, at this time. It has cost me trouble sufficient, I should judge, already."

"That is your own fault, my dear fellow," said the elder Briancourt, lightly. "But, after all, a very venial one, taking your extreme youth into consideration. It is well that it cost you no more. Well that you were enabled to evade the consequences as you did. You have destroyed the papers, I trust, years since?"

"On the contrary, they are in yonder box, within my dressing-case."

"You are careless, Morley."

"I think not. They are as safe there as if burnt, and I have no fear of their ever doing me any harm."

"Nevertheless, take my advice and burn them. They may fall into hands which might do you an injury yet. And now, will you oblige me by accompanying me to the library? Sir Edward will wish to see you, undoubtedly."

They went—the father and son.

But a few moments had the door been closed behind them, ere a small dark figure crept out cautiously from behind an Indian screen in one corner, and darting across the floor, also left the room. It was Pequin the dwarf.

Morning dawned, and Eleanor, at the usual hour, prepared to meet her uncle and his guests at breakfast. They were all there—Sir Edward, and Victor Briancourt, and her lover. Eleanor had slightly shrunk from the prospect of encountering Morley this morning; but she must necessarily do so, and therefore endeavored to think as little as possible of last night's occurrences, that she might do it with as much composure as she could command. She felt that Morley must have experienced considerable annoyance at her strange and unexplained conduct, and this consciousness of having appeared somewhat singular in her proceedings, was not a little embarrassing. However, she went quietly into the breakfast-room, and met him there.

His manner, as he bade her good-morning, was somewhat reserved, bearing still the mark of the feelings she had aroused the night before; and yet there was a blending of impatient anxiety, of tenderness and passion, in his manner, and in the expression of his eyes, as they rested on her face with a glance that seemed striving to read her feelings towards him. She saw that it was so, and dropping her eyes, passed him and took her seat.

Sir Edward, she observed, was even more silent and reserved than usual, and spoke little. Mr. Briancourt alone preserved his customary demeanor—one of graceful and careless ease. And she herself, as may be supposed, was also comparatively silent. Mr. Briancourt's easy nonchalance alone gave anything like life to the party, and still the greatest degree of constraint was perceptible among the other members of the little party. The baronet scarcely looked up once; spoke but rarely, and then with as few words as might be. Eleanor mentally revolved the probable reason. Was his taciturnity connected in any way with her? It seemed allied to that of Morley.

The unsocial repast was concluded shortly. Immediately on rising from the table, Sir Edward requested his niece to accompany him to the library. She felt now that it was on the subject which Morley had broached last night that he was about to speak. A feeling of unequity and troubled apprehension filled her heart; but she obeyed, without a word. Mr. Briancourt stood by the glass doors looking out upon the lawn, as she left the room; and Morley's eyes were fastened on the pages of a book which he had taken up. He did not raise them until she reached the door, near which he was sitting. Then they were turned for an instant to her face, with a glance filled with inquiry, and immediately withdrawn.

She followed her uncle, and in five minutes found herself seated opposite him, at the library table.

"I have called you hither, Eleanor," he said, "for the purpose of conferring with you on the subject of your marriage with Morley Briancourt."

That was it, then? Eleanor merely bowed, and he went on.

"It is now some years," he said, "since this matter was arranged. As a child, you were, in a manner, betrothed to Morley. The fact that you were to become his wife, on arriving of age, has, I believe, always been fully understood by you."

Eleanor bowed silently.

"That period is not far off," he resumed. "Morley is desirous that the marriage should take place early in June. You gave him, I believe, no definite answer last evening, when, as he tells me, he consulted you on the subject. Therefore—" He paused a moment, and leaned his head on his hand, apparently considering.

Eleanor, meanwhile, sat startled and confused. What course she should take she could not tell. She had not counted on matters being brought to so decided a crisis so soon.

"Therefore," continued Sir Edward, raising his head, "I have myself to request that you will name the day when—"

To the relief of Eleanor's agitation, at that moment there was a knock at the door. Sir Edward rose to open it, and found there a domestic, who informed him that a visitor in the drawing-room requested to see him. It was Mr. Vernon, the son of a brother magistrate of the baronet, come on some business from his father. Sir Edward turned to Eleanor, still holding the door open.

"You will excuse me," he said, "for a few moments. I will return shortly, if you will have the goodness to await me here."

He went on, and Eleanor was left there alone.

"What shall I do? What course shall I take?" she said, to herself, in a troubled tone. "O, if I could only tell what is best!"

Suddenly, it seemed within the very room, a strange, sweet, peculiar voice half recited, half chanted the following words:

"Gentle maid, beware—beware!
If the day thou wouldst not rue thee,
Shun the snare that others spread;
Ware the evil they would do thee!
List the voice that gives thee warning,
Treat it not with slight or scorn;
Give its accents timely heed;
Well 'twill serve thee at thy need.
For few there be, like thee, that know,
But foe be friend, or friend be foe!"

The sound ceased.

"O who is it that addresses me? Surely I have heard that voice before!" uttered Eleanor.

There was a movement—a rustle in the silken drapery of a window near, and forth from his concealment stepped her monitor. "Pequin!"

"Pequin, at your service, fair Eleanor; and come to show you a plot of which you are ignorant. We have met but once before: then you took my part against one who would have hurt me; now it is my turn. Pequin is not so insignificant that he cannot help you when you need help, and show you your way when you cannot see it yourself."

"Help me? O, if you could! But what do you know of my need? How did you come here? What?"

"Nay—let me do my errand, fair Eleanor, and do not lose the little time you have. I will show you something. I will show you the character of the man who would wed you, and takes care to guard against rivalry. See!"

A writing-desk of Morley Briancourt's lay on the table. With a key which he possessed, the dwarf quickly opened it, drew forth a thin packet of letters, and placed them in Eleanor's hand. They were those which Morley had intercepted—Mary Latimer's letters. Perplexity and astonishment pervaded Eleanor's breast as she examined them; but before she had time fully to comprehend the matter, Pequin touched her arm.

"Keep them; they are yours, you see, though your jealous lover has kept them himself, and still fancies them safe. But come now—come with me. Do not speak, but do as I bid you for a little while, and other secrets shall be unfolded to you—secrets that concern you and your safety. So have no scruples, but do as you are told, fair Eleanor. Hasten! You must know all before Sir Edward's return."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

CHINA AND THE CHINESE.

CHINESE TRADING JUNKS.

CARGO BOAT.

FLOWER BOAT.

HUSBANDMAN'S DRESS.

FISHING WITH BIRDS.

PALANQUIN BEARERS.

CHINESE MILL.

CHINESE IRRIGATION.

We present on this page a number of neat designs illustrating the industry and habits of the Chinese—that curious people about whom so much interest is felt, and so little, comparatively, known.

RICE BOWL AND CHOPSTICKS.

Our first engraving represents a Chinese trading-junk under sail, a most cumbersome contrivance, and yet not unlike, in the build of the hull, the European vessels of the 16th century. These junks are caulked with a putty composed of burnt gypsum and oil, and have flat, unwieldy sails of matting and flat keels. The cargo-boat shown in our next illustration is used for the conveyance of grain on the great canal. They are about 100 tons burthen each. The Chinese flower-boat, or hwa-chow, is employed by the wealthy classes for pleasure sailing on fine evenings. It rides high on the water, and has the same quaint peculiarities as the other boats. The Robin-on-Crusoe-ish individual in the next engraving is a Chinese husbandman. The garments of the Chinese farmers are well adapted to shield from the weather. The next engraving shows a fisherman's boat, with the trained birds that save him the expense and trouble of hooks and lines, and bait in capturing his scaly prey. These birds are cormorants, excellent swimmers, divers and fliers. They are trained as men rear spaniels and hawks, and one man can readily take care of a hundred. When a large fish is seized, these birds help each other, one taking the head, the other the tail. The boatman stretches out an oar—the bird perches on it, is relieved of his burden, and then flies off to continue his sport. As they are very voracious the owners have a ring clasped or a string tied tightly about the neck. The next engraving shows an irrigating machine used by the Chinese. A tread-mill keeps in motion a chain on which are fastened a number of square boards running in a trough which hold and draw up the water. The principle is the same as that of the chain-pump so extensively used in this country. The picture next in order represents a palanquin such as is now used in the East by persons of rank. There are four bearers. Palanquin travelling is prevalent in China, where, according to Mr. Davis, in the streets a "mandarin of high rank would be considered degraded except in a chair with four bearers." Throughout

Asia the roads are so bad, and labor is so cheap, that palanquins and sedans are used to a very great extent. Our next illustration shows us the method of cotton bowing practised in India and China. The carder uses an elastic bow with a tight string. He places it in a heap of the material, and having pulled the string with some force allows the bow to recoil; the vibration of the string scatters the cotton about and separates it into fibres freed from knots and impurities. Our next illustration shows us the Chinese mill, or pestle and mortar, a simple but effective contrivance worked with a treadle. The next print of the series delineates a Chinese rice bowl with the chopsticks, which supply the place of a spoon or knife and fork. The opium pipe of the Chinese, shown in the next picture, bears some analogy to the tobacco pipes of other countries. The dignitary with the peacock's feather seems to highly enjoy his dally and forbidden luxury. The Chinese mill, the last object delineated, is worked by hand with a lever, but has two stones, something like a corn mill. In almost everything the Chinese differ from us—marking the direct antagonism of the East and West. That they are an ingenious people is undeniable. They have made many discoveries, but few improvements. What they are capable of when the Central Flowery Land is thrown open to European arts and sciences, remains to be seen.

BOWING OF COTTON.

OPIUM PIPE.

RICE MILL.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

IT MAKES ME SAD TO ROAM.

BY FRANK FREELOVE.

It makes me sad to roam amid the halls
Where heaven-born art and godlike music reign;
I, joyous child—I frequented those halls—
A transient passer, now repair again;
Art from her nicest touch the chisel drops,
Painting her glowing brush suspends in air—
Music's high thrilling tones abruptly stops;
Ah me, I weep harsh tears with black despair—
The Muses cry "Avaunt! ye have no heritage here!"

It makes me sad to roam amid the marts
Of busy industry and toiling strife;
For din and clatter sing: "Gold costs the smart
Of many aspiring soul and gladsome life."
But time rolls on, as chariots roll along,
Save that he steals with stealthy pace and slow,
While industry peals up her burdened song,
And naught except the grave is free from woe—
The wheel of life turns swift—I, too, must onward go.

It makes me sad to roam amid the haunts
Where once my gleesome steps in gladness danced;
Fashion nor riches now supply my wants,
Nor touch one chord in all my soul's expanse.
Surrounded by a crowd I breathe alone;
The tones of friendship greet my ear in vain—
Or, if I heed them, I again bemoan
A tone once dear—remembrance's dulcet pain;
And from the reverie I start, yet sigh to dream again.

(Translated from the German for Ballou's Pictorial.)

MARIETTE:

—OR—

THE BROKEN PITCHER.

BY H. E. HOUSTON.

LA NAPONLE is only a small town on the coast of France, and yet it is known throughout the whole province. It lies embosomed in evergreen shades, midst dark pomegranates and bright palms. People say that the finest grapes, the sweetest roses, and the most beautiful maidens are there, and I can well believe it, though that is not the reason why La Napoule is so celebrated. You shall see.

Though all the maidens of La Napoule were called charming, the little Mariette was doubtless a wonder among wonders. She was always called little Mariette, though she was not smaller than a person of seventeen years generally is. Indeed, her forehead just reached the lips of a full-grown man. The Chronicle of La Napoule had very good reason for talking about Mariette. I should have done the same had I been in the place of the Chronicle, for Mariette, who until now had lived with her mother Manon at Avignon, turned the whole village of La Napoule upside down. Not the houses indeed, but the people and their heads, and perhaps not the heads of everybody, but certainly those whose heads and hearts are ever in danger from the proximity of a pair of soul-full eyes. I know that very well.

Mother Manon would have done better had she remained in Avignon, but she inherited a little property in La Napoule, some land with a little vineyard, and a neat house pleasantly placed in the shadow of a great rock, between olive trees and African acacias. That is more than every poor widow has, and Manon was, in her own opinion, happier than if she had been countess of the whole province. But the good woman fared all the worse for so thinking. She did not foresee the misfortunes that awaited her; nor had she ever read in Homer how a pretty woman could bring whole countries into turmoil and discord.

The little Mariette had hardly been a fortnight in the house between the olives and African acacias, than every young La Napoule knew that Mariette lived there, and also that in the whole province there was no more charming maiden than in this self-same house. When she passed through the place, flitting lightly with floating drapery, wearing in her bosom an orange blossom or rosebud, with the ribbons of her hat shading her sweet face, even the sourest old people talked to her, and the young ones were silent from admiration, and everywhere in her path would open on the right hand and the left, doors and little windows, with "good morning, Mariette," "good morning, little Mariette," and she nodded gaily and smiled both right and left. When she went to church, all hearts, especially those of the young men, forsook Heaven, all eyes the holy priest, and the lingering fingers forgot the beads of the rosary. That must have given great offence, especially to the devout.

About this time the young women of La Napoule became suddenly pious, for they were very much vexed; and they could hardly be blamed for it, as since Mariette's arrival more than one swain had grown cold, and more than one lover had forsaken his betrothed. The young people spoke no longer of marriage, but of separation. They sent back their plighted faith and their rings. The old people joined in the ill feeling of their children. Quarrels and strife spread from house to house.

"Mariette is the cause of all this," said the devout maidens; then their mothers repeated it, then the fathers, and at last the young men took it up.

But the little Mariette, enclosed in her innocence and purity, like the first opening glow of the rosebud through the dark green of its chalice, guessed nothing of all this trouble, and remained good through all. After a while first the young men praised her and said, "why trouble the pretty, harmless child—she is without guile." Then the fathers said—then the mothers—and last the pious maidens; for who could help being won by Mariette's sweet voice? Before six months everybody had spoken to her and already loved her. She could not believe that she was so much beloved, as she could not before believe that she was so much disliked. Everybody now wished to atone for their injustice towards Mariette. Compassion heightened the tenderness of affection, and all were friendly to the pretty child, kindly greeting her and inviting her to all the rural dances and plays. But alas! all men have not the gift of compassion, but have hearts as hard as Pharaoh's. This comes doubtless from the natural wickedness of men since the fall.

The young Colin was a striking instance of this. He was the richest farmer and land-proprietor in La Napoule. His vineyards and olive gardens, citron and pomegranate groves, could not be counted in one day. But one thing well proved his natural hardness of heart—that he had reached the age of twenty-seven without ever thinking for what purpose young maidens were created, though indeed, some people, especially ladies of a certain age, thought Colin the best young man under the sun; they admired his figure, his frank, open manners, his smile, which they said must have been granted him as absolution for sins forgiven. But on such persons' judgment it is not well to depend. Meanwhile everybody in La Napoule had become fond of the little Mariette—all except the hard-hearted Colin, who remained cold to the lovely child.

When any one spoke of Mariette, he was dumb as a fish; if he met her in the street, he turned red and white by turns, and glanced spitefully at her. When, in the summer evenings, the young people collected near the ruins of an old castle by the borders of the sea, to dance or sing, Colin was not absent; but as soon as Mariette appeared, then the spiteful Colin became silent, and would not sing any more for all the gold in the world. It was a pity, for he had a sweet voice and every one liked to hear him sing. The maidens of La Napoule all looked upon Colin with favor, and he was friendly to all. As we have said, he had a roguish glance that the young women liked, and when he laughed he was worthy of being painted; but, naturally enough, the neglected Mariette noticed him scarcely at all—and she was quite right. Whether he smiled or not, it made no difference to her; she did not care at all for his roguish glance—she was still right. When he told stories, which he often did, she bantered her neighbors and pelted, now Pierre and now Paul, with uprooted weeds, laughed and chattered, and did not even hear Colin. That vexed him, perhaps, for he often broke off in his relation, and went gloomily away. Revenge is sweet. Manon's daughter had triumphed; but after all, Mariette was a good girl, and her heart was tender. If he was silent, she was sorry—if he was sad, she lost all wish to laugh—if he was absent from a pleasure gathering, she did not wish to remain—and if she was unseen, she wept more tears than Magdalen, though she had not half so much to cry for.

The priest of La Napoule, called Father Jerome, was a man of seventy years. He had all the virtues of holiness and only one failing—namely, that by reason of many years he was deaf. On that account he preached chiefly to the children and youth of the village, who listened to him very attentively. It was true that he preached from only two texts, but then his entire religion was contained in these. One was: "Children, love one another," and the other, "Children, the ways of Heaven are wonderful." The young people tried to be obedient to the first commandment, and hoped to gain the wonders of Heaven. Only Colin with the stony heart would pay no attention to it. He was designing though he did not so appear.

It was the time of the state fair at Valence. Everywhere was gay and busy life, and though perhaps but little money, much pleasure. Mariette with her mother Manon, was there, and Colin was present also. He bought numberless gifts and knickknacks for his lady friends, but for Mariette not a son's worth, and yet he was continually at her heels; but she did not speak to him nor he to her. Anybody might see that he was plotting mischief. Presently Mother Manon came out of a stall near by, and said:

"O, Mariette, see this beautiful pitcher! A queen need not disdain to touch her lips to it. Only look! the border is pure gold, and no flowers could grow in gardens more beautiful than these, and yet they are only painted; and see, Mariette, in the midst of Paradise, how tempting the apples look on the trees—one almost wishes to taste them. Indeed, Adam could not resist, when the lovely Eve offered one to him; and see how lovingly the little lambs play by the side of the old tiger, and the snow white dove with green and gold throat nestles close to the hawk as though it wished to coo to him."

Mariette could not admire it sufficiently.

"Such a pitcher is too beautiful to drink out of," said she; "if I had it I would put my flowers in it, or at least glance into Paradise. We are, to be sure, only at the fair at Valence, but when I look at this pitcher, it seems as if we were at the gate of Paradise."

So said Mariette, and she called all her young friends to come and admire the pitcher. Soon these stood by it—the young maidens and men—and finally nearly half the population of La Napoule had seen and admired this most wonderful pitcher. Very beautiful it seemed, made of the most costly and clearest porcelain, with gold and bright borders. To the inquiry, "What is it worth?" the answer was—"one hundred pounds;" then the questioner would be silent and go sadly away.

When, finally, there were no more people around the stand, Master Colin came quietly up, laid the hundred pounds on the table, and ordered the merchant to pack it carefully in a box, as he should take it away with him. He told his design to none. He had not gone far, before he met the judge's servant, old James, who was coming from the fields. James was a very good man, but excessively stupid.

"I will give thee a crown, James," said Colin, "if thou wilt carry this box to Manon's house and leave it there, and if anybody should ask where thou gottest it, tell them a stranger gave it to thee, but do not betray my name, or I shall never forgive thee."

James listened with attention, took the fee and the box, and went toward the little house between the olive trees and acacias. On his way he met his master, the Judge Hautmartin, who asked what he was carrying.

"A box for Mother Manon,—but, master, I cannot tell where I got it."

"Why not?"

"Because Master Colin never would forgive me."

"It is well that thou canst be so silent—it is too late now, though. Give me the box. I shall go to Manon's to-morrow, and I will deliver the box to her and not betray that it came from Colin. It will spare you a walk and do me a good turn."

James gave the box to his master, for he was accustomed to obey him in all things without contradiction. The judge carried it to his room and examined it by the light with great curiosity. On the cover was neatly written with red chalk, these words:

"For the beautiful and beloved Mariette."

Judge Hautmartin very well knew that this trick was probably Colin's, and that mischief looked behind it. So he opened the box cautiously, lest a rat or a mouse might pop out, but when he saw it contained the wonderful pitcher that he had seen at Valence, he was silent from very fright, for the judge was equally learned in right and wrong, and knew well that the dispositions of men were evil from their youth up. He saw immediately then that Colin wished to bring Mariette into trouble by means of the pitcher—for the people who saw her with it would naturally imagine some absent lover had presented it to her, and would therefore cease their attentions to her. Then Judge Hautmartin kindly thought he would banish all such suspicion by presenting the pitcher to Mariette in his own name. Besides, he loved the pretty girl in secret, and would rather have liked it had she followed toward him the maxim of Father Jerome, "Children, love one another."

To be sure, the judge was a child of seventy years, and Mariette thought the text could not apply very well to him, but, as Manon said, he was a very intelligent youth—had money and influence from one end of La Napoule to the other. When the judge spoke of marriage, Mariette always ran off; but Manon remained and did not appear in the least shy of the tall, lean man, for though indeed Colin was considered the handsomest man in the place, the judge had, in two things, much the advantage of him—namely, in many more years and a great, great nose. Yes, this nose always preceded the judge, like a satellite, to foretell his coming, and was a real elephant among ordinary noses. Well, with this elephant, his good intentions and the pitcher, the loving judge went the next morning to the little house between the olive trees and the acacias.

"For the beautiful Mariette," said he, "nothing is too costly. Yesterday you were pleased at Valence with the pitcher. Permit me, beloved Mariette, to lay it, together with my loving heart, at your feet."

Manon and Mariette were both astonished when they heard the speech and saw the pitcher. Manon's eyes sparkled, but Mariette hesitated and said:

"I will not take either your heart or your pitcher."

Then Manon grew cross, and said:

"But I will accept both heart and pitcher for you. You little fool, how much longer are you going to scorn your good fortune? Who are you waiting for? Do you expect a duke to marry you, that you repel the judge? I know better how to choose for you. Judge Hautmartin, I shall deem it an honor to call you my son-in-law."

Then Mariette went out weeping bitterly, but Judge Hautmartin struck his nose with the palm of his hand, and spoke wisely:

"Mother Manon, hasten nothing; the little dove will in time submit—when she knows me better. I am not impatient, I understand women, and before a quarter of a year goes by, I shall possess Mariette's heart."

"But his nose is so big!" murmured Mariette, who had been listening behind the door, and secretly laughing to herself.

The quarter of a year passed away, and Judge Hautmartin had not put even the tip of his nose into Mariette's heart. But during this quarter of a year the little Mariette had several other troubles. The pitcher brought her much vexation, and there was yet more than this. For a fortnight nobody in La Napoule spoke of anything but the pitcher, and everybody said, "it is the gift of the judge, and the marriage is already decided." Though Mariette told all her companions that she would sooner throw herself into the sea, than marry Judge Hautmartin, the wicked maidens only bantered her so much the more, saying: "Ah, how delightful it must be, to rest in the shadow of such a nose!" This was the first trouble.

Then Mother Manon had a habit of sending Mariette every morning to rinse the pitcher in the spring by the rock, and fill it with fresh flowers; thereby she hoped to reconcile Mariette both to the pitcher and the heart of the giver. But she only succeeded in making her hate both gift and giver all the more, and her labor at the spring was only a grief to her. Second trouble.

Again, when she came in the morning to the spring, twice a week there lay on the rock beside the water, the most beautiful flowers, already arranged, as if made on purpose to adorn her pitcher, and on the stalks there was always a strip of paper on which was written, "Loved Mariette." Mariette could hardly believe that there were yet fairies and magicians in existence, but as the flowers were continually on the rock, she took them because they were better than wild flowers, though she would not even smell of them because she supposed the breath of the judge's nose had breathed upon them, and the strip of paper she tore in bits and scattered it in the place where the flowers had been laid; but that did not vex Judge Hautmartin at all, for his love for her was as great in its way as his nose was. Third trouble.

At last it came out in conversation that the judge was not the giver of the flowers. Who then could it be? Mariette was very much astonished at this unlooked-for discovery, but she took the flowers more kindly from the rock and even smelled of them. But who put them there? Mariette was unlike all other young maidens—very curious. She guessed first this and then that young man in La Napoule, but this could not be guessed out. She waited and watched, far into the night—she rose early, but she gained nothing by all her watching and waiting, and still twice a week in the morning regularly, there lay always in the same place the wonderful flowers, and with them the constant strip of paper bearing the sigh, "Loved Mariette." Such a thing must have made even the most indifferent a little curious, but curiosity at last brought trouble. Fourth trouble.

One Sunday morning Father Jerome preached as usual from the text, "The ways of Heaven are wonderful." And the little Mariette thought, "perhaps they will be wonderful enough to reveal to me the invisible flower-giver, for Father Jerome was never wrong."

One summer night, when it had been very warm throughout the day, Mariette could not sleep; so she sprang lightly from her couch when she saw the first dawn of morning glance through her windows. She dressed herself and went out to bathe her face and arms in the cooling spring. She took her hat with her, in case she should walk a little way by the stream. She knew a secret place to bathe, but before reaching the bathing place it was necessary to pass behind the house and then descend through palm trees and pomegranates. This time Mariette could not pass, for under the youngest and straightest tree lay in deep sleep a young and slender man—by him a basket of the most beautiful flowers, and besides, a strip of paper could be seen, upon which breathed the customary sigh. How could Mariette get by? She stood still and trembled in every limb. She wished to return home, but hardly had she advanced a few steps than she found herself nearer the sleeper, and remained standing; yet from the distance she could not see his features. Now or never was the time to gain a secret. So she tripped lightly by the palms, her curiosity prevailing over her fright, and took a good look at the sleeper, who slept as soundly as though he had not slept before for four weeks.

And who was he? Who indeed, but the most mischievous Colin! It had then been he, the first old enemy of the good maiden, who had brought her into so much trouble with the pitcher and also the affair with the judge. He had then brought her the flowers to torment her curiosity. What for? He hated Mariette—he conducted himself in all company in a most unpardonable manner to her. He vexed her when he could; and when he could not he avoided the good child. To all the other maidens of La Napoule he was affable and friendly—to all but Mariette. Only to think! he had not once invited her to a dance, and she danced most charmingly. There he lay, detected—caught! Mariette thought of revenge—what trick should she play him? She took the basket of flowers and threw them softly over the sleeper, but the strip of paper with the usual "Loved Mariette" upon it she looked at, then hid it quickly in her bosom. Perhaps she wished to keep it as a proof of his mischievousness. Mariette was cunning, and she could not go away without repaying Colin's trick by one equally roguish, so she pulled from her hat the violet-colored ribbon and wound it round the sleeper's arm, then she tied it with three knots, and left Colin fast to a palm tree.

"When he awakes, how astonished he will be! And how he will wonder who has played him this trick. Of course he can never guess," she thought to herself, and then went slowly into the house.

The next day Colin put another trick in execution. He appeared to wish to mortify the poor child publicly. Ah, she had not dreamed her purple ribbon would be known in La Napoule, but Colin knew it only too well. He wound it proudly round his hat, and wore it where all the world could see it, as a trophy, and every young man and maiden in La Napoule said, "it is Mariette's;" and then they called Colin a villain.

"How is this, Mother Manon?" cried Judge Hautmartin, as he neared Manon's house, and he cried it so loud that his great nose echoed wonderfully. "What does it mean, that my affianced gives her hat ribbon to the young farmer, Colin? It is high time that the marriage was celebrated; after that, I shall have a right to speak."

"You have a right now, judge," answered Manon; "if the affair stands thus the marriage must take place quickly."

"But, Manon, Mariette has always refused her consent, and she never seemed friendly to me. If I ever sat myself by her side, she springs away like a deer."

"Judge, only prepare the wedding feast."

"But if Mariette resists?"

"We will surprise her. We will go to Father Jerome early on Sunday morning, and the ceremony shall be performed very quietly. We will make him understand that. You are of the most authority of any one in La Napoule, and he must listen to you; yet Mariette need know nothing about it. I will send her in the early morning to Father Jerome of an errand, so she can guess nothing. Half an hour after, we will both of us come; and then quickly to the altar."

"And if Mariette should say no, there?"

"What matters it—the old man cannot hear, you know? But be silent about this to Mariette and everybody else."

This was the agreement between the two. Poor Mariette did not dream what fate awaited her. She was thinking how spiteful it was in Colin to make everybody talk about her, and yet she in her heart forgave him. She told her mother and her companions that:

"Colin found my lost band; I did not give it to him. He is only teasing me."

Mariette was entirely too good.

One morning, early, Mariette went as usual with her pitcher to the spring, but this time there were no flowers on the rock. Perhaps it was too early. The sun had not yet risen from the sea. There were rustling steps—then Colin appeared, bearing in his hand the flowers. Mariette turned crimson, and Colin stammered:

"Good morning, Mariette."

But the greeting did not come from the heart, he could hardly bring his lips to utter it.

"Why do you wear my ribbon so publicly, Colin?" said she, setting the pitcher down on the rock. "I did not give it to thee."

"Thou didst not give it to me!" said Colin, and he turned white with vexation.

Mariette was a little ashamed of her falsehood—she lowered her eyes and said, after a pause:

"Well, I did give it to thee—but thou hadst no right to wear it so openly. Give it back to me."

He untied it slowly, and his grief was so great that he could not conceal the tears in his eyes.

"Sweet Mariette, let me keep the ribbon," said he, softly.

"No."

Then his partially concealed vexation turned to desperation. He glanced with a sigh towards heaven, then on Mariette, who still stood devoutly by the spring with dejected eyes and drooping arms. Then Colin pulled the purple ribbon from the basket of flowers, and cried:

"Take everything from me now."

And he threw the flowers so violently on the splendid pitcher that it fell to the ground and broke in bits. Mother Manon, who had been watching from the window, had heard and seen all; but when she saw the beautiful pitcher broken, she lost all power of seeing or hearing more. She had no words to express her dismay, and when she saw through the narrow window the flying guilty one, she leaned against the sash with such violence, that it fell out of the crumbling stone and broke to pieces. So many misfortunes would have put any one else out of countenance, but Manon soon recovered herself.

"It is fortunate," said she, "that I was witness to this mischief. He shall go with me to the judge, and pay me for the window and the pitcher."

But when Mariette brought in the pieces of the much valued pitcher, and Manon saw Paradise lost, the good Adam headless, Eve with only one limb remaining, the serpent erect, but the dove broken in two—then Manon burst forth into a rage against Colin, and said:

"It is plain this work came from the evil one's own hand."

And taking the pieces of the pitcher in one hand and Mariette with the other, she went to the court where Judge Hautmartin was. There she made her complaint, and showed the broken pitcher and the lost Paradise. Mariette wept bitterly. The judge, when he saw the wonderful pitcher broken, and his beautiful Mariette in tears, fell into so great a rage against Colin that his nose became as purple as Mariette's violet band. He ordered his constables to bring immediately before him the guilty person. Colin appeared. Mother Manon told her story with great willingness to the judge, the constables and the clerks, but Colin did not listen. He bent over to Mariette, and whispered:

"Forgive me, dear Mariette, as I forgive you. I have broken your pitcher unintentionally, but you have broken my heart."

"What is the meaning of all that whispering there?" cried the judge. "Listen to your accusation, sir, and defend yourself, if you can."

"I shall not defend myself," said Colin. "I broke the pitcher without intending to."

"That I can well believe," said Mariette, softly. "I am as guilty as he, for I vexed him and he broke it in anger. He could not help it."

"Goodness!" screamed Manon, "will the child take his part? Judge, speak! He has broken the pitcher—let him deny that, if he can, and also that I broke the window by his means."

"You can deny neither, Mr. Colin," said the judge, "so pay three hundred pounds for the pitcher, and for the window—"

"No," said Colin, "it is not worth so much. I bought it at Valence for Mariette, and gave one hundred pounds for it."

"You bought it, Sir Impudence!" shrieked the judge, and he turned in his whole face like Mariette's ribbon, but he could say no more.

Colin grew angry at the implied reproach, and said:

"I sent the pitcher in the evening of market-day to Mariette by your own servant. There stands James at the door—he will prove it. James, speak—did I not give thee the box and tell thee to carry it to Mother Manon's house?"

Judge Hautmartin wished to interrupt them, but the simple James said:

"I gave it to you, you know, judge. You met me with Colin's box and promised to carry it to Mother Manon. There stands the box under your papers yonder."

This was James's story, and Colin motioned him to go out until he should be wanted.

"Very well, sir judge," began Colin, "but this trick will be your list in La Napoule. I know very well that you have tried to gain favor with Mariette and her mother, by means of my property. If you need me, perhaps the high-sheriff of Grasse will tell you where I am."

So saying, Colin went out. The wise judge was sorely perplexed by the turn affairs had taken, and did not know what he did in his confusion. Mother Manon shook her head. The affair was very dark and mysterious.

"Who will pay me for the pitcher?" said she.

"To me," Mariette said, with glistering eyes, "it is already paid for."

Colin was gone several days from Grasse for the high-sheriff, and came back early one evening. Judge Hautmartin had finally reasoned away all suspicions from Manon's mind, and swore he would sooner cut off his nose than Colin should escape without paying three hundred pounds for the pitcher. Then he and Manon went to Father Jerome about the marriage, and impressed it upon him that Mariette, as a good daughter, would not resist the marriage. The good old priest promised just as they wished, though understanding only a part of what they screamed in his ear. When Sunday morning came, Manon said to her daughter:

"Dress yourself well and carry this myrtle wreath to Father Jerome. He needs it for a bride."

Mariette attired herself in her Sunday best, took the wreath and without suspicion carried it to Father Jerome. On the way she met Colin, and as she told him where she was carrying the wreath, he said he would go with her; and as they went along Colin gently took her hand, and both trembled as if they were guilty of some crime.

"Hast thou forgiven me, dear Mariette?" spoke Colin. "What have I done that thou shouldst be so cold to me?"

But she only said:

"Be quiet, Colin; you may keep my ribbon and I will keep your pitcher. Is not that sufficient for you?"

"O, Mariette, I would give all I possess if thou wouldst look as kindly on me as on others."

She said nothing, but as they went into the church, she glanced sideways at him from her beautiful eyes, and lisped:

"Loved Colin!"

Then he stooped and took her hand, and they went into the room where Father Jerome was, in his robes. The young people seemed in a dream, and remained standing by one another. I don't know whether it was the effect of the kiss of the hand or awe of the priest. Then Mariette gave Father Jerome the myrtle wreath. He laid it on her brow and said, "Children, love one another;" and exhorted this young woman in a most touching manner to love Colin—for the poor man had only half heard the name of the bridegroom by reason of his deafness or had forgotten it, and so thought Colin surely was the bridegroom. The old man's words moved Mariette to tears, and she cried:

"Ah, I love him indeed, but he hates me!"

"I hate thee, Mariette?" answered Colin. "My soul has lived only in thee since thou has been in La Napoule. O, Mariette, how can I hope to believe thou lovest me? Is not all La Napoule at thy feet?"

While they were thus talking to one another, the good priest imagined they quarrelled; so he put his arms around them both and said:

"Children, children, love one another."

Then Mariette sunk on Colin's breast, while his arms enclosed her, and both faces beamed with silent transport. They forgot the priest—the whole world. Colin's lips were pressed to Mariette's sweet mouth—it was only a kiss, but a kiss sometimes contains a great deal. They had so lost all recollection that almost without knowing it, they followed the delighted Father Jerome into the church, and to the altar. There were a few devout ones in the church who heard with amazement Colin's and Mariette's marriage. Some of them left their prayers to be the first in La Napoule to announce that "Mariette and Colin were married." When the ceremony was over, Father Jerome felt very much pleased that he had succeeded so well, and met with so little opposition from the couple who were to be made one, and he led them into the parsonage.

At last Mother Manon came, breathless. She had awaited at home the arrival of the judge, but as he did not come, she set out to meet him. New troubles were yet to come. She learned that the high-sheriff, together with several of the police, had taken the accounts and records of the judge for examination. In the same hour, the Judge Hautmartin was arrested for his misdeeds and imprisoned.

"Certainly, the goddess Colin has brought this about," was Manon's thought, and she hastened to the church to excuse to Father Jerome the delay of the marriage.

There the good man, smiling with pride at his work, hastened to meet her, and by his side the newly married pair. Now forgot Manon in good earnest both thought and speech, when she saw what had happened, but Colin had more ideas now than he had ever possessed before in his life. He spoke of his love, the broken pitcher, the judge's falsehood, and how he had unmasked the evil-doer to the police at Grasse. Then he prayed for Mother Manon's blessing and pardon for the marriage. Father Jerome, who did not understand a word of what was passing, received an entire and satisfactory account of the nuptials; and, taking the hands of both, said, with an upturned glance:

"Surely, the ways of Heaven are wonderful!"

The broken pitcher was ever afterwards preserved in the family as a precious relic, and it is to be presumed that Colin and Mariette ever after lived very happily.

To prove a man a fool is more likely to make him angry than to make him wise. A quiet exposition of truth has a better effect than a violent attack on error. Truth extirpates errors as grass extirpates weeds, by working its way into their place, and leaving them no room to grow.—H. Hughes, Esq.

THE BOSTON TEA PARTY.—DESTRUCTION OF THE TEA IN BOSTON HARBOR. DECEMBER 16. 1773.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

TO EDITH.

BY MRS. M. W. CURTIS.

What shall I wish for thee, dear little girl?
While the sunbeams toy with each glossy curl—
Thou art looking so archly into my face,
With a winning smile and bewitching grace.

I would wish thee a life exempt from all care.
A path decked with roses—no thorns to be there:
But this may not be, for sunlight and shade,
Thorns and roses alternate this bright world pervade.

Now is thy springtime of life, little one,
Hope-gilded flowers life's paths overrun;
Sweet is their fragrance, but transient their day,
The visions of youth all too soon fade away!

I would wish thee a treasure all sadness and pure—
Our Father can give what will ever endure—
A claim to the mansions where death may not come,
Where the loved and pure-hearted are ever at home.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

LITTLE CHILDREN.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

"Up—up—higher yet," said a feeble voice, as I was trying to find my way to the room of a poor woman, who had sent for me to see her die. The voice was that of another poor creature, who was lame, and who was painfully toiling up the dark, narrow stairway behind me. "Higher—one flight higher." "Good heavens!" I inwardly exclaimed, "can this feeble thing go up and down these steep stairs, and take care of the sick woman and her child, without murmuring; and shall I—strong in health and limb, with the fullness and affluence of life about me, and the spirit unquenched within me—shall I complain of the interminable height?"

But in truth I panted, and was weary before I got to the top. O, the sickening misery of poverty in the city! If one must be poor, give him at least a chance where earth, and air, and water are free; where the pinching blasts that come to him from the hill-side are not so terrible to the human frame, as the chill that penetrates and fills the cold attic, reeking with the scents that years on years have left on the unwholesome walls, and the soiled floors, to which your feet almost cling as you step across them.

To such a place was I now conducted. It was so dark when I entered, that I was obliged to wait several minutes before I could distinguish a single object. At length I began to see more clearly, and on a ragged bed I beheld a figure which I knew to be Jane Walker's, because it was in her name that I was entreated to go to this house. Amidst all the squalor and poverty that surrounded her, from the miserable rags that covered her emaciated limbs, and the dim light that entered the room, there was one thing gleamed up pure and beautiful. It was the face of a little child. It was sitting at the head of the bed, playing with a broken toy, and smiling as sweetly as if its surroundings had been of the most splendid and attractive nature. The lame woman had seemed intuitively to feel that whatever of misery was in the room, the child must not partake of it; and the rosy face had been freshly washed, and the matted hair had been smoothed, and its garments were clean, if not whole.

I revered the woman for this involuntarily act of reverence towards the nature of a little child. It showed that poverty and wretchedness had not dimmed the spirit of truth and piety within her, if she could thus recognize the beauty of that infantile nature, and separate it thus from surrounding stain. The thought of "God's possible angels" must have been in that woman's heart; and the blessing which that poor heart needed must one day come back to her. But beautiful as this seemed to me, in the brief moment in which I had time to reflect upon it, I was recalled from it by the sight of Jane Walker's sufferings, and the evident gratitude which she felt at my coming so soon after her message.

"And where have you been, Jane, since I saw you last? Indeed, I am sorry enough to see you thus."

"I know you would be," she said, speaking with some difficulty. "I could not help sending for you, to tell you all my troubles, and to beg you to see to my little one when I am gone. Poor lame Martha sees to her now, but winter is coming on and Martha must go to the poorhouse—but, O, can I think of little Mary going there?" And she cast a look of unutterable love to the little creature perched up behind her pillow.

I gave her some drink that stood beside her, for she coughed painfully, and then she resumed:

"You know, Mrs. W.," said she, "when I was married at your house, how favorably you and every one thought of George Walker. And indeed you did not think too well of him then. He was all that he seemed to be—steady, temperate and industrious. He had a little shop by himself, and everybody liked his work, and mine, too—for I bound every shoe that he made. We got along well. The shop was close to our little home, and indeed made a part of it; for I could step through a passage directly into it, and often carried my work in and sat and chatted with him. He used to say that his work went off lighter. We lived so three years; then we lost our baby. I think George was never himself after that."

She paused, seeing something in my looks, I suppose. I was only thinking of the way in which woman ever strives to find excuses for man's failings.

"After that he seemed different. I thought he did not like so well to have me go into the shop; and I thought, may be, it was my black clothes and my sad, thin face that troubled him. So I would just put on the dress that pleased him, and put on a smile, and walk in before him with a cheerful word or two.

"But lately I had seen two men there, and George sent me back whenever they came in, saying that he had business with them. O, how lonely I felt to be thus thrown out from his presence, when I was dying with grief for my baby. I used to go to its little grave then, and weep; and when I went back, George would be angry at my pale face and tearful eyes. I felt that something was wrong with him, but I did not know what it was. Sometimes he would not be in bed all night, but would stay in a garret chamber that had no window except in the roof. I had used this to hang my clothes in when it was too cold to go out, but now he locked the door, and would not let me go in. He said these men had stored something there, to keep out of the way of their creditors."

"Well, surely that's not right, is it, George?" said I, one day. "Ought not they to give up what they have to pay their debts?" He laughed at what he called my ignorance, but I turned away dissatisfied, and feeling that he had not the same sense of right that I had.

"One night, the man whom he called Stickney, the youngest and best-looking of the two, came and knocked at the door, and called George down from his bed. It was about one o'clock, and my poor husband had been tossing and moaning all night, never shutting his eyes, and I not daring to ask what was the matter. I had begun to be afraid of him, for he was growing very fierce and cruel to me, in words, if not in actions. This little Nelly was then only a mere baby."

"When he went down so hastily to see Stickney, he forgot to shut the window which he had opened, and I could not help going to it to see what the man wanted at that time of night. I heard him tell George that Buzzell (meaning the other man who kept with them so much) had gone off, and he was afraid he would bring it all out. The rest of the conversation was in low whispers, and presently they went up to the garret, where I heard them moving about until daylight. Then Stickney went off."

"While I was getting breakfast, George asked me if I should like to go to New York. I laughed at the idea, and asked him what he meant. 'I mean just this, that I am going there, and I want you to pack your largest trunk, and be ready this afternoon.' There was something in his eye that made me afraid of saying anything more, and I agreed to be ready, thinking all the time that it would be so strange for a little quiet body like myself to take such a trip with my child. In the forenoon George sent me out on some pretence, and when I came in, he was packing my trunk. I laughed, and told him I should take everything out again."

"No, no, indeed you must not. I have placed everything just right here."

"Indeed you have not, George. Baby's little nice frocks must go in above our heavy clothes."

"He took them out again, and told me to go and get dinner. When I came back, the trunk was packed full, but several things were left out which I fully expected to get in. He would not let me try, however, and I had to take a bag for the rest."

"We started in the cars at four o'clock, and arrived at New York in the morning. I was vexed to see Stickney in the cars, but George did not speak with him, and I breathed a little freer. I could not bear the sight of him; and when I looked at him involuntarily, I absolutely turned ill and faint. Somehow, I felt that he was leading George on to his ruin, in some way that I could not make out."

"We went to a miserable, low place, where the scent of tobacco, and of something worse, filled the air, and impregnated my baby's pure little dresses. I was sick, and George was cross and out of spirits. Stickney came in and out our miserable, dirty chamber whenever he chose, and once I saw George opening my trunk while Stickney stood by. My husband caught my eye, and I heard him say, 'Not now; wait till she is in bed.'"

"It was somewhere near morning I judged—for I had been awake some time—when I heard a noise at the door, and I called George to get up and see who was there. He did not bear me, for he was stupid with the liquor which he had drunk the night before on pretence of pain in the stomach. I therefore jumped out of bed, threw on my dress, and opened the door. Three men were in the passage, and they pushed the door wide open."

"Not in here, sir!" I said to the one who came first. "You must be mistaken in the room."

"Not at all," said he, "we want your husband." I do not know what I thought, but nothing like the truth certainly, for I waked George myself, and allowed them to come in."

"You will rise and dress you," said the man, "and meantime you, Ross, will guard the door, while Burnham and I look over this lady's trunk."

"By this time George was awake, and was staring stupidly at the men, who had taken my trunk, and were turning out the contents. I could not have spoken then if it had been to save my life. I held my baby fast, almost fearing that these creatures would take her away from me. When all the clothes were out, the man took a chisel from his pocket, and began to rip up the bottom of the trunk. A few strokes of the chisel brought out a piece of the bottom, and displayed underneath a large quantity of thin papers which resembled bank bills. All at once I knew what had come upon me. My husband was a counterfeiter! I had heard of such things being done, and I knew that it was a great crime; but I did not know what the penalty was, so I kept very calm."

"Shall we take the woman, too?" said one of the men.

"We must do so," he answered; "the things are found in her trunk."

"This then was why George had brought me here—to hide his own sin. In that moment all the love I ever had for him went out. It seemed so selfish and deceitful for him to make me the instrument of his own guilt! And as if to complete the sensation, that horrible Stickney walked into the room. He started at sight of the officers, for he had gained access only by the man at the door deserting his post for an instant to secure George, and he had no idea that any one was there but ourselves. I ran and placed my back against the door, which he was trying to reach again, and exclaimed, 'This is the man—he is the very one who has done all this.' In a moment he, too, was secured; but O, the look which he gave me! Never shall I forget it! It haunts me yet. I have not much more to say, nor much more strength. I was acquitted and set free, but George and the other man were sent to prison. I fell sick, and could not take care of my baby. This poor lame woman found me on the church steps, where I had fallen, and brought me to her poor chamber, where she has taken care of me ever since. I have this terrible cough, and I know it is killing me. I knew where you lived, and I thought if you would take my child, and place it somewhere out of the reach of its father, I would die happy."

It was true; Jane would not see another day. She had exhausted her little strength in telling me this sad story, and she had not told me probably half her sorrows. I knew there must be some terrible cause for her utter hatred for the husband she had loved, but I forbore to question her further. I sent Martha out for comfortable things, and having put some biscuit dipped in wine and water into her lips, and bade her not talk any more, I promised her that I would see to her child, and that she should never know who her father might be. "Thank God! thank God!" she said, and soon she lay in a quiet sleep.

I went out for an hour, and when I returned, it was to find that she had rallied a little, and had asked for her child. It was sleeping, but I laid it on the bed before her, on which I had just put some clean clothes. Martha had taken off its dress, and put on a clean night-gown, and no child of a noble house ever looked sweeter or lovelier than little Nell. Her mother's pale lips moved, as if in prayer, over her, and with her last remaining strength she held her to her bosom once more, and then motioned to me to take her. I obeyed, and put the child into the rude crib of boards nailed together, which Martha had made for her. When I turned back to the bed, Jane was sleeping the tranquil slumber of the dead.

I took little Nelly away from that room; she at least had no further right to be there. I carried her to the house of a friend whom I had met in my walk the day before, and who was mourning the loss of an only child. She gazed upon me when I entered with Jane's child in my arms, and asked eagerly whose it was. "Yours, Mary," I said. "God has surely sent this poor forsaken child to supply the place of your lost darling. Look at her!" And as I spoke, little Nelly woke and stretched out her hands to the beautiful lady in whose lap I had placed her. The sweet rosy cheek, the dimpled mouth with its seed-pearls just peeping from the red lips, the beautiful wavy hair so like her own darling's—I did not need to say a word more. It was a mute compact; and just then her noble husband came in and sealed it with a kiss on the little white brow.

Nelly has fallen into the right hands. Her new parents are not wealthy, but they have enough to bring her up respectably; and in their management of the little one, I know they will be kind, tender and judicious. I have ever thought it the sweetest and loveliest of all charities—that of taking a little child from the depths of poverty and the influence of evil, and acting the parents' part towards it. So much of this beautiful charity exists in the world, and so finely has it succeeded (for in no case have I yet known a child so nurtured that has not turned out well), that I am surprised at all childless people who do not try the same method of doing good, and, at the same time, of making themselves happy. Only yesterday I met a gentleman and his wife leading along a little pet of two years old between them. "Ah," said I, "I suppose you begin to think she is your own by this time."—"Begin to think so!" they exclaimed. "Why, we took her when only ten days old, and it would be difficult to think anything else."

My thoughts went back to that child's birth (of which nothing is known definitely), and I wondered what would have been her state now had not these noble-hearted beings taken her to their bosoms. My answer lay in the sight of two or three other children, who were playing by a door-step, the largest ones tyrannizing over and throwing down the smallest, and all of them encrusted with the marks of poverty, dirt and wretchedness.

CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY.

Encouraged by the unprecedented success which this popular monthly has met with, and the rapidity with which it has increased its circulation, the proprietor has resolved to make it still more worthy of the patronage of the public. That this admirable work is a MIRACLE OF CHEAPNESS, is admitted by every one, containing, as it does, one hundred pages of reading matter in each number, and forming two volumes a year of six hundred pages each, or twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for ONE DOLLAR!

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY is printed with new type, upon fine white paper, and its matter is carefully compiled and arranged by the hands of the editor and proprietor, who has been known to the public as connected with the Boston press for nearly fifteen years. Its pages contain

NEWS, TALES, POEMS, STORIES OF THE SEA, SKETCHES, MISCELLANY, ADVENTURES, BIOGRAPHIES, WIT AND HUMOR, from the best and most popular writers in the country. It is also supplied with a record of the notable events of the times, of peace and war, of discoveries and improvements occurring in either hemisphere, forming an agreeable companion for a leisure moment or hour; anywhere, at home or abroad, each number being complete in itself.

No sectarian subjects are admitted into its pages; there are enough controversial publications, each devoted to its peculiar sect or clique. This work is intended for THE MILLION, north or south, east or west, and is filled to the brim each month with chaste, popular and graphic miscellany, just such as any father, brother or friend would place in the hands of a family circle. It is in all its departments, fresh and original, and, what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive a copy gratis.

Sample copies sent when desired.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor.
Corner of Tremont and Bromfield Sts., Boston, Mass.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

OLD LETTERS.

BY LILLIE LIGHTFOOT.

O little sheets of glistening white,
How many thoughts you bring,
Of dear loved friends, and by-gone days,
When life was in its spring;
As one by one I read these o'er,
How memory wakes again,
And brings before me all the past,
Of pleasure and of pain.

The one whose name is signed to this,
Now trends a southern hall;
She is a planter's cherished bride,
And dearly loved by all;
Heaven's peace be with thee, gentle friend,
In thy home so far away;
May thy new-found friends be kind and true,
As those of thy childhood's day.

How delicate this writing is—
How lady-like and clear;
It brings to mind the gentle face
Of one who's very dear.

Well, she's a wife and mother now,
And round her husband's home
She sheds the cheerful, steady light
Of affection pure and warm.

Ah! well I remember the hand that wrote this,
The hand that's now chill and gory;
He bade me "good-by" with a smile on his lip,
And a heart that was beating for glory.
He sleeps in the far-off summer land,
Where he fought his country's foe;
He fell 'neath the folds of the starry flag,
In sunny Mexico.

O, lift this up gently—the name on this
Is now carved on a marble stone,
That tells when she entered into bliss,
Our dear, our stricken one.
We pilloved her baby upon her breast,
And laid them beneath the sod;
There they sweetly sleep in the still churchyard,
Till the trumpet-call of God.

And this package of letters too dear, too prized,
Were all traced by one dear hand;
'Tis long, long months since I trusted my eyes
To the spell of this magic wand.
I must not, I dare not open them,
Or my heart will bleed afresh,
To think that we who so deeply loved,
Should be parted by night but death.

I could better have borne to lay him down
On sweet Mount Auburn's breast,
And felt that his spirit was watching o'er me,
From his home in the land of the blest.
They say he still loves me, and the heart that was mine
Is heavily wailing for me;
O, help me, Great Heaven, to keep in the path
Where duty is leading me.

But the heart that was yours, my only love,
Can ne'er be another's home,
And though we are parted forever on earth,
We shall meet in heaven, mine own.
O, I will never look at these letters again,
For it always brings the tears,
To think of the friends of childhood's day,
And the love of my riper years.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE PARISH SPECTRE.

BY C. MINOT KENDALL.

A QUARTER of a century ago, the good people of the village of N— were thrown into commotion from two causes. The one, that they had lost their schoolmaster, who had been enticed into a neighboring town by the offer of a salary of six hundred a year, two hundred in advance of what he had been receiving; the other, that a strange apparition flitted about in the old churchyard at late, to the terror and sore perplexity of all its well-disposed citizens.

The first admitted of something like a remedy, for another teacher could be procured; but the latter was an affair with which they did not know precisely how to deal. Few doubted this spectral existence, for Deacon David Sampson had seen it with his own eyes, although it fled from him, as if conscious of the dignity of the position which he occupied in the church. Several old ladies and village swains had caught a glimpse at it—the latter while returning from the nocturnal sparking of their sweethearts. O, it was well authenticated. Although this was the favorite topic, yet the more matter-of-fact subject of a new schoolmaster demanded immediate action, and was discussed accordingly.

"Good morning, 'squire," said the deacon, meeting 'Squire Noddle in the post-office, "any letters for me this morning?"

"Yes, several."

If one were to judge from the variety of his professions, he might pronounce the 'squire a man of varied attainments; for he not only acted as postmaster, but played the parts of justice of the peace, apothecary and green grocer, and all very acceptably to the villagers of N—.

"Ah, very correct," said the deacon, regarding one of his letters with a close scrutiny; "a good writer, spells correctly, and uses very decent grammar."

"An application, I should surmise," said the little 'squire.

"Even so; and he very properly writes that he shall do himself the honor to apply to me in person, as chairman of the school committee, to-morrow," replied the deacon, with an air of consequential dignity.

"Then, deacon, it will be the legal mode to notify the members of this board to meet for the examination of the candidate."

"Such was my purpose; and I pray Heaven, that the next master may be above the temptation of filthy lucre. To think, that after all our kindness to Master Slater, that he should treat us with such ingratitude; it only shows the depravity of human nature."

"Do you know, deacon, that I think it is well that we are rid of him—for he was always complaining how difficult it was to support his family upon so small a sum; and then his health began to fail, and he was continually pestering the board to increase his salary."

"True, 'Squire Noddle; and I have no doubt but that it was all ordered for the best."

"By the way, deacon, my clerk, Jason, says he encountered the spectre last night. I had sent him at a pretty late hour to take some medicine to old Farmer B—, and when he returned, as he was passing near the churchyard, it suddenly appeared to him."

"These are indeed sad times; but call the boy, that I may question him."

Jason made his appearance with hands reeking with molasses, and looking evidently surprised at the unusual summons.

"The 'squire tells me that last night you saw the—the—you know what I mean," said the deacon, with becoming gravity.

"The ghost?—yes, sir, I am willing to make my affidavit of it."

"You are sure that you are not mistaken?"

"Yes, sir," said the boy, confidently, and giving particular emphasis to the sir.

"What was it like?"

"It was white and formed somewhat like a horse, only it seemed to have wings, and got over the ground at a two forty rate."

"How long did it last?"

"I rather think I didn't stop long in those parts; but the last I saw of it, the ghost was taking a regular bee line for your house, Deacon Sampson, and going like the very—"

"No profanity, young man!" interrupted the party addressed.

"Now, 'squire, when we get this school business settled, we must see to this affair, for it is a duty which we owe to the community and to ourselves."

"Have you consulted with our minister about it?"

"Yes; but he treats it with rather an unbecoming levity, I must say, for one of his calling."

"Yet he would be just the man to assist us."

"True, but we must depend upon ourselves, for I am confident that he will not move in the matter; in fact, he as much as told me that it was beneath the dignity of any man to descend to such idle superstitions."

"This to a man of your years? I am surprised!"

"And so was I; but it is our duty to bear one another's infirmities with all meekness and forbearance."

"That is gospel, deacon; but we have also law, and I like a little of both."

"Ah, that reminds me that I must foreclose on Widow Rickett's estate; it was part of my errand to you this morning. The mortgage was up, and during the last year I have not received one cent of interest."

"I am your man," said the delighted Noddle. "Put it through, for the law justifies a man in recovering his own."

The rumor having spread through the village that a new teacher would make his appearance on the morrow, as many as could find time to gratify their curiosity, assembled at the post-office to await the arrival of the mail-coach in which he was expected. In due time it arrived, and a pale, student-looking, handsome young man leaped lightly from it, and inquired for the residence of Deacon Sampson.

He was neatly but plainly dressed; and Jane Sampson, the pretty daughter of the deacon, as she opened the door in response to his knock, thought she had never seen such a beau ideal of a man. Her father was also pleased with him, and after some little talk caused the examination to come off at once. The young man bore the ordeal with patience, and answered the nonsensical questions of the deacon and the squire without any show of contempt; while he delighted the minister with his familiarity with the more subtle depths of scholarship.

The examination over, the young man retired to await their decision in the sitting-room, where the blushing Jane was to entertain him. The consultation was brief. He had placed satisfactory letters of reference in their hands, and the minister spoke warmly in his favor, because he was convinced of his qualifications, and hoped to find in the young man a congenial spirit, to explore with him those beautiful regions of classics which were his passion. The deacon advocated him, because he had paid proper respect to his dignified position, and thereby evinced his good sense. The 'squire was in ecstasies, because he had worked out his favorite problem with a mere dash of his pencil. And so it was unanimously decided that Bradford Dale was accepted as the teacher of our parish, in place of Aristides Slater, resigned.

The deacon offered him board in his own family, which a glance from the blue eyes of Jane caused him at once to accept. Time passed on, and he became quite a favorite with both old and young, while his scholars were declared to make wonderful progress. Meanwhile, the spectre continued his visits, which had the good effect to keep children within doors, while it put the young men, and not a few of the old ones, to the inconvenience of making a wide detour to avoid the churchyard in their nocturnal walks.

In vain young Dale sought to convince the good people that their fears were illusive. Many had seen it with their own eyes, and could not be brought to doubt the evidence of their own senses.

So that at last, determined to unravel the mystery, he announced to the deacon his intention of passing a night with the spectre.

'Squire Noddle heard of this, and offered to accompany him; for though he possessed but little courage, yet he felt that he would be comparatively safe in the presence of a man whose talents he felt were equal to almost any undertaking, while the affair would be sure to give him personal reputation in the village. So one dark night at a late hour they bent their steps towards the churchyard, the 'squire being armed with a rusty horse-pistol and an enormous bludgeon.

As they slowly wandered amid those stone memorials of affection for the departed, Bradford fell into a gloomy reverie. He thought of the time when he had seen his own parents laid in their quiet resting-places; of the joys of parental love which he had so briefly known; of the endearing smiles his mother had lavished upon his boyhood; of the affectionate counsels of his father, until a sense of dreariness came over him, which, for the time, made him forget the object of his visit into this solemn place.

A convulsive grip upon his arm dispelled his dark dreams in a moment, and he turned to see the 'squire speechless with fear, pointing to some object which was revealed in the distance. He at once hurried forward, dragging with him his companion, whose teeth were fairly chattering with terror. Finding, however, that the object receded as they advanced, he wrenched his arm from the convulsive clutch of the 'squire, and commenced a vigorous pursuit. His active limbs enabled him soon to gain a near approach to the spectre, when, to the horror of the worthy Noddle, he saw the young man disappear as it were into the very jaws of the earth.

He fired his pistol in the air, and then his little dapper legs flew like drumsticks, as they bore their quivering trunk to the nearest house, which was the deacon's, where he fell fainting into the arms of that astonished man, who had opened the door. It was some time before his scattered senses returned to him, and then the terrible tale was told. They had seen the spectre in the form of a snow white winged horse; and when Mr. Dale had outrun him, and came near to it, the earth had suddenly opened and swallowed him up. The deacon was paralyzed with wonder; but Jane, having no faith in such spectral agency, with tearful eyes besought her father to go to the churchyard, for that doubtless he had fallen and was seriously hurt. But when she found that his fears were superior to her entreaties, she declared that she would go alone. She hastily threw on her bonnet and shawl, and got outside the door, when her father and his friend seized her, declaring that it would be perfect madness on her part to attempt such a thing.

At that moment Noddle shouted, "The Spectre!" and made a leap into the house. The father and daughter looked up, and saw in the distance what seemed to be a winged steed, while some dark object was evidently pursuing it. On it came, and the deacon's heart beat quickly, as he saw it approach directly towards his own house. In a few moments the distant hills echoed with his gruff peals of laughter. He had recognized his old gray mare, which young Dale was driving home.

The mystery was easily solved. While Bradford was running in the graveyard, the arch of an old tomb had given away beneath his weight, and down he went into it. He was somewhat bruised, but not severely hurt; and when he recovered his self-possession, he at once saw the difficulties of his unpleasant position—for although he had made a speedy entrance, yet an egress was not so easy a matter. The aperture was not much larger than his body, and that in the centre and considerably above his reach.

He dared not make any attempt upon the sides, for fear of bringing the whole upon his head; nor did he relish the idea of passing the night in this place. At length he thought of an expedient. He groped about, and found that the tomb was not without its silent inhabitants; and although he felt that, under any other circumstances it would be sacrilege to disturb those wooden tenements of dust, yet by piling them up directly beneath the opening, he was enabled to regain the surface, when the first object he saw was our parish spectre, the deacon's mare, quietly feeding near him. She at once started off, and then the mystery of the wings was manifested.

It was no more nor less than the old faded blanket, which was confined to the body by a kind of half belt, which the motion of the animal caused to flap up and down in the wind, not very unlike the action of a pair of wings. The grass grew rank in the churchyard, and no doubt that was the reason that caused the old four-footed lady to stray from the pasture in which she was placed at night. The deacon took the precaution afterwards to lock her securely in the stable, and the parish was no longer troubled with a spectre.

The schoolmaster is now known as an eminent lawyer; and his accomplished lady, endeared to a large circle of friends by her companionable qualities, has of course for many years ceased to subscribe her notes as Jane Sampson. The deacon and his friend have both passed away; but they often took their grandchildren upon their knees, and related to them the story of "The Parish Spectre."

PUGNACITY OF INSECTS.

It is a singular fact that the smallest varieties of insects seem to be actuated by feelings similar to those possessed by the larger animals—they all have propensities to rob and despoil, defend their homes, are jealous, revengeful and disputative, and war in armies. Bees, if hard pressed for food, will attack with great force the inhabitants of a neighboring hive, with intent to rob them of their provisions. The white ants have a portion of their community set apart for the duties of war; and they exhibit in their operations a most perfect knowledge of insect tactics. Some of these ant battles have been described by naturalists, and appear to have been conducted with a valor and skill which would have done honor to the chosen troops of a Napoleon, or the volunteers of a Taylor.—Board's Lectures on Nature.

REV. JOHN PIERPONT.

AUTHOR OF THE "AIRS OF PALESTINE."

The portrait on this page was drawn expressly for us by Mr. Barry, from a daguerreotype by C. Seaver, Jr., and is a correct likeness of Mr. Pierpont, as he now appears. The head is a very striking one, the countenance being one of those that, even on a casual glance, we associate with genius and energy of character. John Pierpont was born at Litchfield, Connecticut, April 6, 1785. He belongs to a family distinguished for the intelligence and high character of its members. His great-grandfather, the Rev. James Pierpont, was one of the founders of Yale College. The early years of the subject of our sketch were surrounded by the happiest influences. His mother was a gentle and pious woman, whose religious and moral teachings were listened to with reverence and profit. In one of his latest productions, her son says: "Her words and prayers were my young spirit's dew."

"That dew that blessed my youth—
Her holy love, her truth.
Her spirit of devotion and the tears
That she could not suppress—
Hath never ceased to bless
My soul, nor will it, through eternal years."

We may suppose young Pierpont's literary advances were good, and that he was a diligent student, by the fact that we find him entering Yale College at the age of fifteen. He was graduated in 1804. Like many young graduates, who choose to be independent from their first step into the world, he commenced life as a teacher, making his first essay as an assistant of the Rev. Dr. Backus, in an academy of which he was the principal before being elected to the presidency of Hamilton College. His engagement occupied a portion of the year 1805, and at its termination he went to South Carolina, where for nearly four years he was a private tutor in the family of Col. William Allston, who resided a part of the year in Charleston and the remainder on a fine estate on the Waccamaw, near Georgetown. Here the future poet was enabled to extend his acquaintance with nature, and to contrast her productions under a genial sky with the stern and bold features of his own New England. While residing in the South he commenced the study of the law, and continued it assiduously after his return to Connecticut, in 1809. In 1812 he was admitted to the bar in Essex county, Massachusetts. Had he continued in his chosen profession, we have no doubt he would have risen to eminence and fortune. With a logical and cultivated mind, quick in its operations, a powerful command of language, a forcible delivery, he united the qualities that command success at the bar. But his debut was made at an unfortunate season. The breaking out of the second war with Great Britain caused a general prostration of business, and gentlemen of the bar suffered from a lack of cases. Moreover, his severe studies had begun to tell upon Mr. Pierpont's health, and he felt that it would be dangerous to continue to lead an active life. He accordingly engaged in mercantile pursuits, commencing his new experiment in Boston, and following it up in Baltimore. He was unsuccessful, however, as a merchant—a fact attributable not to his inaptitude but to the hard times in which he embarked in trade. His abandonment of business occurred in 1816, and now, in the cultivation of his literary tastes, he found a solace for his worldly disappointments. He had already produced a sensation, in 1812, by a poem delivered before the Washington Benevolent Society of Newburyport, his then residence. He now (1816) published his "Airs of Palestine," a poem prepared originally with a view to public recitation. It contains about eight hundred lines, is written in the heroic measure, and its theme was the power of music and the universality of its influence—sacred history furnishing a large number of the illustrations. As a work of art, it is one of the most elegant compositions written on this side of the Atlantic, and produced at a period when American art was in its infancy, its impression on the public was proportionably great. It was first published at Baltimore; two more editions were published at Baltimore, and it was before long republished in England, in a work entitled, "Specimens of American Poetry," with a commendatory preface by Roscoe of Liverpool. It abounds with lofty and tender religious sentiments, with beautiful descriptions of natural scenery, and with striking dramatic pictures. One of the finest passages describes a moonlight night upon the Arno, in Italy. The sound of the convent bell suddenly strikes the ear:

REV. JOHN PIERPONT.

"Hark! 'tis a convent's bell: its midnight chime;
For music measures even the march of time.
O'er bending trees, that fringe the distant shore
Gray turrets rise:—the eye can catch no more.
The boatman, listening to the tolling bell,
Suspend his car:—a low and solemn swell,
From the deep shade that round the cloister lies,
Rolls through the air, and on the water dies.
What melting song wakes the cold ear of Night?
A funeral dirge that pale nuns, robed in white,
Chant round a sister's dark and narrow bed,
To charm the parting spirit of the dead.
Triumphant is the spell! with rapturous ear,
That uncaged spirit hovering, lingers near;
Why should she moult? why pant for brighter bliss?
A lovelier scene, or sweeter song than this?"

Mr. Pierpont, soon after the date of the publication of his poem, commenced the study of theology with great earnestness, completing his course at the divinity school in Cambridge, in 1818. In the succeeding year he was ordained as minister of the Hollis Street Unitarian church in this city, with which he remained connected for many years. From time to time he has written a great many poems, chiefly lyrical. His hymns are beautiful compositions; his odes, written for public occasions, glowing, spirited and vigorous. As Moore said of Sheridan:

—"he ran Through each mode of the lyre and was master of all."

His services to the cause of education have been great: and his "First Class Book," an admirable reader, has enjoyed a prodigious popularity. Mr. Pierpont has taken an active part in the great movements of the day, moral and political. He was an early and zealous advocate of the temperance cause. He has never courted popularity in his course, but always acted from conviction, so, that while he has often provoked enmity, he has always secured respect. In 1835 and 1836, Mr. Pierpont passed a year abroad, visiting the principal cities of England, France and Italy, and those of Greece, Turkey in Europe and Asia Minor. No man was ever better fitted to enjoy such a tour, and though he has not published his experience in a set record, its influence is traced in several of his minor poems.

LITTLE FALLS ON THE MOHAWK, N. Y.

The second picture on this page is an accurate representation of the village of Little Falls, New York, with the broad Mohawk pouring through the valley, and descending in cascades which give the name to the town—one of the pleasantest villages in our country. Here the river, after reaching the eastern boundary of the so-called "German flats," a vast plain, once the bottom of an immense lake, rushes through the rocky pass cut by the current. To facilitate the passage of boats on the Erie canal, the shore has been cut away, walls erected and sufficient space obtained to allow the waters to descend through a series of locks to a lower level. There are here five locks, each of eight feet lift. The village is situated on both sides of the river, and on the Utica and Schenectady railroad in a most charming valley, 75 miles from Albany. The river descends 42 feet in three-fourths of a mile. The village contains churches of five denominations, a bank, two newspaper offices, and manufactories of machinery, paper, woolen goods, flour, etc. The population in 1853, was estimated at 3000.

VIEW OF THE MOHAWK LITTLE FALLS, NEW YORK.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL.

THE CHEAPEST WEEKLY PAPER IN THE WORLD.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

PRECEDENCE.

From time immemorial, and in all countries, men and women have found fertile matter for wrangling in questions of precedence. Indeed, the grand battle of life is to decide who shall be first and who shall be last. The "highest seat in the synagogue" is striven after with frantic zeal. There are many curious illustrations of the point.

An English lady, whose husband occupied a high judicial post in Demarus, set the whole colony in an uproar as soon as she arrived, by her determination to assume the lead at all assemblies. Of course this presumption made a good deal of trouble and was stoutly contested. The husband took his wife's part, and supported her exactions, by alleging the etiquette adopted in the mother country in similar circumstances. As the governor stood in opposition to the judge, the dispute was referred to Lord Bathurst, then colonial secretary, who did not deem it worth while to interfere, and the question was left an open one. In similar circumstances, General Elliott, when commanding at Gibraltar, showed less reserve and less disdain for the contending parties. He decided peremptorily, that, everywhere and on every occasion, the precedence of ladies should be regulated by age—that the first place should be accorded to the oldest lady of the company, and so on down to the youngest. As soon as his decision was known, it became very difficult to force the honors of the lead upon any one. Since relative position indicated age, there was a perfect struggle of emulation and courtesy among the fair ones in the fortress, each now being willing to yield to her fair friends, and claiming no honor for herself. This adroit decision put an end to squabbles for precedence, for a time at least, among the upper ten of Gibraltar.

MUSIC ON THE COMMON.—The public seem heartily to appreciate the eloquent music discoursed on the Common by our best bands on stated evenings of each week. It is a pleasant spectacle to look down from an eminence on the "sea of upturned faces," while music, moonlight, gas and beauty make up an irresistible combination of attractions.

THEATRICAL.—The old pit is to be restored to the National Theatre, whereat the "b'hoys" rejoice most exceedingly. We presume that there will be no prohibition of peanuts among them for the future.

SPLINTERS.

.... The British engineers employ photography in taking views of places, field works, batteries and other engineering operations.

.... One mode of expressing joy for peace, in England, was the distribution of cakes and coffee to the poor.

.... Lord Palmerston, though seventy-two, rides on horseback. Sir Robert Peel was killed by a fall from his horse.

.... In Paris, if a man criticises the emperor, he gets at least six months in jail and $100 fine.

.... The trainer of Ellington, the winner of this year's Derby, won $90,000 by his unexpected victory.

.... George Francis Train, Esq., now of Australia, but a Boston boy, lately paid us a visit to this city.

.... Mrs. Bishop writes from Sidney, that they drink at dinner ardent spirits or ale, but never water.

.... At the Worcester Medical Association, this brief toast was given—"Prof. Morrow—friends numerous—enemies minus."

.... Ristori has made a sensation in London. Rachel has been sick—no chance to regain her laurels.

.... The next fair of the American Institute will take place in the Crystal Palace, New York, in September.

.... It is said that jewels are hired of the dealers to figure as bridal presents in these sad days.

.... It is a suggestive fact that among the many Mormon immigrants to this country there are no Irish.

.... The Gormas Turners, who lately had a celebration in this vicinity, looked finely on parade with their banners.

.... Coins of an earlier date than Ciesar's invasion, have been found in an old house in Marseilles.

.... A Boston apothecary lately got this order—"A dose of calomel and jollop for a woman 80 yrs. maid in pits."

.... One year ago, Clinton, Iowa, was not known on the map. Now it has 1000 inhabitants, three hotels, lots of stores, etc.

.... An English blacksmith, in giving evidence, says a lock can be easily picked when the key is left in it.

.... Some person asserts that the roots of the common hard-dock make a beverage equal to the best Java.

.... An "Early Rising Association" has been formed in England. The members must be out of bed before 5 1/2 A. M.

.... A large number of American oaks have been planted on the Quai de Tuileries, Paris, and are flourishing.

.... The Emperor of Austria has offered to send the remains of the son of Napoleon I. to France.

.... The Empress of France lately made her appearance at a court ball covered with lace and diamonds.

.... S. S. Osgood, the American artist, has been travelling extensively in the Holy Land of late.

.... Brooklyn, N. Y., is finally to have water works. Brooklyn is a beautiful city and finely located.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

While we are quietly pursuing our task of amusing our readers, our political contemporaries are all busily engaged in advocating the claims of candidates for the highest office in the gift of the nation, repelling attacks upon their principles and character, and diving deep into the records of the past in search of precedents and antecedents. The shibboleths of party are heard in the streets and in the railroad cars. Every now and then some great procession moves through a town or city with banners and music, like an army on the march. Town halls resound with eloquence; men, suddenly inspired, take the stump, and the air is vocal with eloquence from one end of the country to the other. This is rather warm work for the dog-days. To be sure, the voting occurs in November; but all the work of the campaign is done when the thermometer daily disgraces itself by getting high. If the canvass occurred in the winter, there would be a great saving of fuel to our citizens, for political excitement is much better than anthracite or hickory to keep the blood in healthy circulation.

An intense excitement pervades the whole community on the eve of a presidential election. This excitement sometimes leads to lamentable acts of violence—but very seldom. Occasional collisions of hot spirits are incidental to all great gatherings for any purpose, the only exception being under a despotism, where the presence of hired bayonets prevents any outbreak or demonstration. Yet this very universal excitement is not an unhealthy exhibition of popular energy—nor is once in four years too often for the popular mind of the whole country to be stirred up. Jefferson tells us that the price of liberty is eternal vigilance, and the interest of men in public affairs could not be kept up to the proper tone, if our chief magistrates were chosen to serve for a long term of years. That even the intense excitement of which we have spoken is a healthy one, is demonstrated by the aspect of the people immediately after a hotly contested election. Every one acquiesces in the popular verdict. A calm falls upon the multitude. Whichever party triumphs—the victory is the victory of the whole people, for it is the simple result of the mechanism of government transmitted by our fathers, to which we have all sworn fealty. No matter what bitter disappointments are felt—rebellion never rears its head. The persons and property of the victors are safe—their position only can be assailed through the press.

To the foreigner, who sees us in our moments of political excitement—who listens to the fulminations of the tribune, who reads the fierce philippics of the press—who sees the march of armies with banners, who overhears vehement disputes in the streets, it would seem that the defeat of one or the other powerful party at the polls must necessarily be resented by the initiation of civil war. One day he sees surging multitudes uttering party cries and denunciations—the next a universal calm, and the very same men who so lately thundered at their opponents, smilingly acquiescing in their victory. Some such phrases as "better luck next time," or "never say die," "beaten, but not conquered," are the proverbial safety valves of political disappointment.

Of course it would be much better if we could all keep cool, and discuss great questions calmly, and never quarrel with our opponents, and never bet on elections, and behave otherwise in an exemplary manner—but human nature will be human nature, and is not quite angelic, and therefore it is not worth while to moan about its incidental weaknesses.

STRAWBERRIES.

New York is the greatest strawberry market in the world. In 1855, 50,000 bushels of this delicious fruit were sold in that city, against 12,000 bushels in Philadelphia, 12,000 bushels in Cincinnati, and 10,000 bushels in Boston. New York city received from all sources, in 1855, 8,000,000 baskets, the value of which, at the wholesale price of 2 1/2 cents a basket was $200,000, the consumers paying nearly double that sum. Formerly four of the New York baskets were estimated to hold a quart, but it now takes five to make that quantity. The New Yorkers think the fruit is fresher when put up in these baskets, than in the Hingham boxes used here. We think they are mistaken. Strawberries are probably more profitable than any crop raised by the market gardener, although they require constant labor to keep them clear of weeds. This is balanced by the fact, however, that they require only moderate manuring. There are many varieties, but Hovey's seedling commands the highest price in the market, on account of the great size of the berries.

AGASSIZ "SOLD."—At a very learned discussion on stratas the other day, at the house of the learned professor, a Mr. B——, of this city, asked if there were any strata of precious gems. "No, none whatever," replied Professor Agassiz. "I've heard of one," said Mr. B——. "Impossible!" was the rejoinder. "O, yes," said B——, "and it was called a stratagem."

CURIOSITY W(1)ETTED.—Some English travellers were visiting an elegant private garden at Palermo, Sicily; and among the little ornamental buildings, they came to one on which was written, "Non aperite," that is, "Don't open." Of course they opened it—a tremendous jet of water was thrown full in their faces. Such contrivances are common in Italy.

MUSIC.—If Jenny Lind again visits these United States, as she proposes, she will be welcomed back with enthusiasm, and will have no difficulty in exchanging Swedish notes for American gold.

OUR PORTRAITS.—Having presented likenesses of Mr. Fillmore and Mr. Buchanan, in the order of their nomination, we shall follow with a fine portrait of Col. Fremont, now being engraved.

THE BOSTON TEA PARTY.

The spirited original picture, another of our national series, from the pencil of Billings, which occupies the whole of pages 56 and 57 of this number, cannot fail to be highly appreciated. When the obnoxious revenue acts were passed, the leading patriots, including many of the ladies of America, who indeed, set the example, formed associations agreeing to abstain from tea, from which article the British government expected to derive a large income. They adhered to their resolution with great constancy. Lord North then allowed the East India Company to export tea to America without paying export duty, thinking that if the Americans could get it at less cost than the British, they would be willing to pay the duty. He was mistaken. The ship Eleanor, Capt. James Bruce, and the ship Beaver, Capt. Hezekiah Coffin, arrived with cargoes of tea in Boston harbor, Nov. 29, 1773. A public meeting of citizens was immediately called, and it was resolved that the tea should not be landed, and that the ships should be sent back. The governor and council refused to clear the ships without landing the tea. The consignees, menaced by the populace, sought refuge from violence in Castle William. Meetings were held in Faneuil Hall and the Old South, and the patriots resolved to maintain their position. The authorities continued obdurate. The captains of the vessels were willing to clear if permitted, but the collector of the port refused to grant them leave, and ships of war guarded the entrance of the harbor.

At dark, on the 16th of December, a large party of men, disguised as Mohawk Indians, some of whom had attended the popular meeting in the Old South, on the afternoon of that day, rushed to Griffin's Wharf, where the tea ships lay, shouting, "Boston harbor for a tea-plant!" There were about one hundred and forty banded together, a few disguised as Indians, the remainder with their faces blackened for fear of discovery, as it was a moonlight night. They boarded the ships, broke open the hatches, and in the space of three hours broke up 342 chests of tea and threw their contents into the dock. This revolutionary act excited the astonishment and wrath of the ministerial party; its fame circulated throughout the land; in the great seaports no person ventured to receive the tea, and the company's ships were compelled to return to England. Some of our first citizens participated in this deed, and long afterwards, when crowned with fame and years, related with pride their agency in this bold execution of the popular will.

The locality depicted is near the foot of Gridley Street. A crowd are collected on the end of Griffin's Wharf, cheering the patriots. A boat filled with them, in their Indian disguise, is polling off—but their comrades are already engaged emptying the contents of the ships. There are some half dozen in view with the "Mohawks" on board of each. The full moon in the sky is an historical incident, it being nearly as bright as daylight when the daring deed was committed.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. Mr. Robbins, Mr. John Ladd Flanders to Miss Sarah Elizabeth Holbrook; by Rev. Mr. Alger, Mr. James Lodge to Miss Mary Langdon Greenwood; by Rev. Mr. Smith, Mr. Johnson S. Ennis to Miss Mary McClosky; by Rev. Mr. Hinney, Mr. Samuel G. Lane, of Leicester, to Miss Mary S. Hince;—At Somerville, by Rev. Mr. Williams, Mr. Samuel Caldwell, of Boston, to Miss Amelia A. Reynolds;—At Lynn, Mr. James M. Emerson to Miss Hannah Graves;—At Salem, Mr. George W. Merrill to Miss Lydia A. Kimball;—At South Danvers, by Rev. Mr. Sutherland, Mr. Ichabod B. Rogers to Miss Clara Russell;—At Newburyport, by Rev. Dr. Dimmick, Mr. George H. Stevens to Miss Hannah M. Sumner;—At Raynham, by Rev. Mr. Carver, Nathan W. Shaw, Esq. to Miss Sarah J. King;—At Fall River, by Rev. Mr. Porter, Mr. John Henshaw to Miss Maria Connor;—At Taunton, by Rev. Mr. Blake, Mr. John C. Reynolds to Miss Helen M. Super;—At Worcester, by Rev. Mr. Bushnell, Dr. Rufus Woodward to Miss Jenny Fox;—At West Boylston, by Rev. Mr. Cross, Mr. F. C. Hardy to Miss Della Maria Price;—At New Bedford, by Rev. Mr. How, Mr. Edward Manchester to Miss Lucy J. Stearns, of Fairhaven;—At Wingham, Vt., by Rev. Mr. Ballou, Hosea B. Ballou, Esq. to Miss Adelia A. Murdock.

DEATHS.

In this city, Hon. Luther Stearns Cushing, 53; Miss Chloe A. Lee, 41; Mr. Mary B. Backus, 31; Mr. Mary Jane Page, 24; Mrs. Mary Elizabeth, wife of Professor Honeybun, 25; Mr. William A. Field, 62; Mr. George Balmain, 24;—At Charlestown, Widow Fanny Goodale, late of Portsmouth, N. H.;—At Roxbury, Mr. Jesse E. Henderson, 48; Mrs. Mary A. Hall, 53; Mrs. Celia Colegate, 51;—At Dorchester, Mr. E. Henry Preston, 48;—At Newtonville, Mr. George W. Badger, 34;—At Westbury, Mr. John F. Stephenson, 26;—At Quincy, Mr. Henry French, 28; Mr. John Wren, 37;—At Waltham, Mr. Eleanor S. Treat, 31;—At Stoughton, Mr. John Atherton, 30;—At Salem, Mr. Joseph Marshall, 58; Mr. Rodney C. Fletcher, 43; Mrs. Helen Miranda Chamberlain, 22; Widow Mary F. Hovey, 38; Mr. Nicholas L. Derby, 48; Capt. Parn Dodge, 62;—At Ipswich, Widow Judith Manning, 74;—At Gloucester, Miss Lydia Ingersoll, 80;—At Danversport, Mr. Samuel McIntire, 72;—At Peppercorn, Ebenezer Lawrence, M. D., 86;—At North Andover, Mr. Parker Tyler, 78;—At Kingston, Capt. William Bedford, 30;—At Newburyport, Miss Mary Upton Pease, 42;—At Taunton, Mrs. Sarah Jane Parkin, 28; Mrs. Hannah Leonard, 28;—At Oxford, Elnathan Jones, Esq., formerly of Boston, 76.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION.

A Record of the beautiful and useful in Art.

This paper presents in the most elegant and available form, a weekly literary melange of notable events of the day. Its columns are devoted to original tales, sketches and poems, by the best AMERICAN authors, and the cream of the domestic and foreign news; the whole well spiced with wit and humor. Each paper is enriched and illustrated with numerous accurate engravings, by eminent artists, of notable objects, current events in all parts of the world, and of men and manners, altogether making a paper entirely original in this country. Its pages contain views of every populous city in the known world, of all buildings of note in the eastern or western hemisphere, of all the principal ships and steamers of the navy and merchant service, with fine and accurate portraits of every noted character in the world, both male and female.

TERMS.—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year	$3 00
4 subscribers, " "	10 00
10 " " " "	25 00

Any person sending us sixteen subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the seventeenth copy gratis.

* * One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, when taken together by one person, one year, for $4.

Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU.

CONSER OF TREMONT AND BOWDOIN STS., BOSTON.

WHOLESALE AGENTS.—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; W. B. White, 115 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; A. C. Bagley, 102 Vine Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Ross, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Woodward, corner of 4th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Ringgold, Louisville, Kentucky; Trubner & Co., 12 Paternoster Row, London, general agents for Europe.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

BIRTHPLACE OF OUR SAVIOUR.

BY DR. J. V. C. SMITH.

Six miles from Jerusalem, nearly in a southerly direction, is the poor, degraded town of Bethlehem. It is elevated and excessively rough for cultivation, on account of the vast amount of bits and fragments of coarse limestone which are strewn over the surface of the arable land. Bethlehem, in the Hebrew, means bread town, or the place of bread. Ephrath, which signifies fruitful, was appended to it at an early period in Jewish history, on account of the productiveness of the soil.

Some travellers describe Bethlehem to be beautifully located on the brow of a hill, with one broad street. To me there is not a single beauty in or about it. On three sides of the main straggling village of low, one story, rough stone houses, almost windowless, the hills rise to considerable elevations, and present immense patches of bare limestone on which there is neither tree, shrub, nor grass. From the village southerly, there is a rapid descent to the Dead Sea, some seven or eight miles distant, I imagine, from the time it required to walk my horse from the great plain of Jericho, through the wilderness where John preached, up to the Convent of the Nativity, at Bethlehem.

During the imperial rule of Rehoboam, the town was fortified, according to the then prevailing system of walling points intended to be strongholds of the government. Not a vestige of the masonry remains, referable to that distant period. Being on the direct line of travel from Jerusalem to Hebron, more importance was probably attached to the place while the Jebusites held possession of the former, and King David held his royal court for seven years in the latter city.

From an attentive examination of the region in and about Bethlehem, it is evident that the land must have been considered exceedingly valuable at some distant epoch of its history, from the circumstance that all the hills, far back from the town, perhaps one or two miles, were terraced from their bases to their tops. Even the solid limestone was cut like stairs, so that by covering them with earth, a prodigious extent of surface was thus gained for cultivation.

It presupposes a dense population, that led to such economy. And it also shows that the demand for food was such as to warrant the enormous expense of time, money and human labor required for an agricultural undertaking so extraordinary, at any period during the occupancy of the twelve tribes in the Holy Land.

Two events occurred in Bethlehem to give it an undying renown. It was the native town of David, the poet and king of the Jewish nation, by divine appointment; but more illustrious for being the birthplace of Jesus Christ, the Saviour of mankind. As far back in the chronicles of the children of Israel, as when they were under the guidance of magistrates called judges, the town existed and seems to have been considered an old town. It belonged to the tribe of Judah. Jesse, a descendant of Obed, the father of David, resided in Bethlehem; and if the particular well from which the king longed for a draught of water, on his father's land, is the one still pointed out by the guides, it is easy to show some of the land which belonged to him. He is said to have had his property principally in sheep.

Modern Bethlehem looks old enough to satisfy the most enthusiastic antiquarians. If any of the dwellings are of clay they escaped my observation; and the same may be said in regard to brick structures. I can only recall to memory the principal feature in the outside appearance of the houses—rough, square blocks of stone comprising the walls. Others may have discovered a broad street; but the widest that myself and companions passed through on horseback was barely wide enough to permit a horse or camel coming towards us, to pass by without friction.

Flat roofs are another anomaly to persons from snowing sections of the United States, not only in Bethlehem, but throughout Asia Minor. It is not necessary to have pointed or inclined roofs to favor the sliding off of bodies of snow, as none falls there below the peaks of Mount Lebanon.

As a whole, it is now a dirty, neglected village, with narrow streets and crooked lanes. Nothing cheerful, social or inviting is discoverable in it to the civilized stranger. There are considerable enclosures of olive trees near by the village; and very rude stone wall land divisions here and there. Just at the north of the village there are large piles of small stones, thrown together, it was presumed, to clear the land of the incumbrance. The inhabitants are Arabs, speaking, of course, the Arabic language. They are a swarthy, black-eyed, coarse black-haired race—having a restless, wild expression. Nowhere in Palestine are the females of a more unrefined appearance. A majority of them were pretty tall, with high cheek bones—walking about in a single blue cotton garment, something like a farmer's frock. Every one of them, in door or out, wear veils over their faces—which, with the masses is nothing but a piece of cotton cloth, as hard in texture as their blue tunics.

Females have no position in that country, whether native or of foreign birth. They are very considerably in excess over the males, and always will be so long as the present mode of raising recruits for the army consists of stripping a settlement by surprise, of all the men capable of bearing arms—who seldom ever return when once in the army. No woman would hazard her reputation by exposing her face to the gaze of a man, however low her condition in the social scale. Even little girls of a tender age seem instinctively to cover their faces when a man is in sight. They contrive to liberate one eye, partially, in passing or ranging through the streets.

Sheep and goat-raising is the main business now, as in ancient times, with the Bethlehemites. Unpromising as the surface of the land appears, however, with the miserable cultivation it has, it yields amazing crops. Neither composts nor manures are used. The fertility of the soil appears to be exhaustless. A constant decomposition of the limestone most largely contributes to this curious and satisfactory result.

Sitting on my horse one day, I saw a farmer at a short distance in a field, sowing grain. He scattered the seeds freely in the customary manner, but on ground in no manner of way fitted to receive them, according to American notions of farming. He was followed by a miscellaneous troop of birds, of different plumage and sizes, whose little bills seemed to pick up the kernels as fast as he scattered them.

A few rods in the rear, another Arab farmer was driving a yoke of miserable, feeble cattle. Their horns were gnarled, in ridges, similar to a ram's and hardly half developed, besides pointing at different directions. The yoke was a long, straight stick, with long pins let through holes each side their necks. It is not uncommon to see the cattle at the extremities of one of these yokes, all of ten feet apart.

Nothing could have been more primitive than the plough with one handle. Perhaps the contrivance, tipped with a bit of iron, was nothing but the crook of a limb from a hard wood tree. He held in his right hand a pole, about six or seven feet long, quite the size of a rake handle, armed with a sharp iron goad at one extremity, and a dull, rude chisel at the other. He ploughed in the grain which escaped the industrious pursuit of the birds. Occasionally the plough caught a root of a grape vine, or some other similar obstruction, which, if the cattle had not the strength to drag the plough through, was cut off with the chisel. It was painful to witness the severity and cruelty practised with those goads. A sharp needle thrust into the haunches is abominable, but it is the custom, and therefore followed by all preceding as it will be by succeeding generations.

At best, the furrow was superficial, and consisted essentially in turning over the stones, and a very little soil over the grain. What I thus witnessed, brought to mind the parable of the Sower. The Saviour actually stated a well-known fact in husbandry, at that day, which he saw, and the same thing is practised now, as it was eighteen hundred years ago. Hence it was no poetical description in the parable, as suggested by biblical expositors.

Kindness to birds and horses is a distinguishing trait in the character of the Mohammedans. I have often had an opportunity in Egypt of seeing birds instantly take wing on discovering persons dressed differently from the fellahs, or farmers, but remain quite unconcerned in their presence. They have no guns, while hats and coats indicate to their small intelligence, absolute destruction.

It possesses a most excellent soil for barley and wheat. Barley is the principal crop, easily raised and requires the least attention. Grapes will grow anywhere in Syria, but attain their fullest size and flavor in Palestine, as does the fig also. Wine of an admirable quality, which is really nothing but the pure juice of the grape, might be made in almost unlimited abundance. It has the color of sherry; is mild and delicious. In Jerusalem, the man with whom I lodged told me he manufactured his own wine from grapes brought in from the surrounding country by the Arabs, which could be afforded by him at fifteen cents a gallon. No grapes are cultivated expressly for wine-making, except, perhaps, a few vines by the monks in the Greek and Latin convents, here and there among the mountains. Mohammedans use no wine, and hence none being required for their own consumption, all they make by gathering wild grapes is clear gain out of the Christians and Jews.

Radishes, melons, beans and some other garden pulse are grown abundantly in Bethlehem. Poultry, too, is raised to any amount, according to the demand, but always exceedingly cheap. Eggs may be had extremely low.

Honey abounds. Stacks of bee-hives may be seen close to the houses in Bethlehem, consisting of earthen pots, a foot or so in diameter, by two in length, piled up their sides, one above another, like logs of wood. The outward end is covered over with a sheet of clay, leaving a small hole in the centre for the entrance of the bees. Each pot has a colony. When full, the owner knocks in the clay with a pole, pulls out the sheets of virgin comb, leaving a little to keep the bees at home, claps on a new sheet of clay, and labor is immediately recommenced.

Fig trees attain the dimensions of our largest apple trees, many having a trunk one foot in diameter. It is a clean, beautiful tree, very much resembling a field beech, as observed in old pastures in New Hampshire and Vermont. Their productiveness is amazing, and if there was any market for the fruit, the profit would be most satisfactory.

At the eastern end of the village, there is a large stone edifice, standing on a foundation of limestone. It is the Convent or church of the Nativity, covering the manger where the Lord Jesus Christ first appeared on earth. A winding road passes by it down hill towards the Dead Sea.

In coming up from the Dead Sea, the traveller comes through a winding gorge of the mountains, and the first view of Bethlehem exhibits a kind of inclined oval basin facing the east. Exactly in front, is a high mass of rock, on the top of which stands the convent.

Just before reaching the centre of the basin, there is a lot, containing, to appearance, about four acres, which has formerly been enclosed by a wall, now in ruins. A stone edifice stood nearly in the middle, which has been thrown down and the blocks of hewn stone scattered about. A few old olive trees are growing in the midst. This is the exact field, says all tradition, where shepherds were watching their flocks when the glad tidings were announced to them that the Saviour had been born at the inn of that day, or properly, stopping-place for strangers, now called caravansaries, at the top of the rock where the convent stands to mark the holy place. Panoramic views of the convent are quite common, but it would be difficult to exhibit on canvass the appearance of the interior.

Originally, the Church of the Nativity, which is embraced in the convent, is said to have been erected by the Empress Helena, mother of Constantine. How many times it has been destroyed and rebuilt since, no record declares. Certain it is, that the present building is comparatively modern.

The place called the manger appears to have been originally a kind of grotto or cave in the limestone, which are numerous in Palestine. If it was enclosed in the original premises of the caravansary presumed to have been on that spot, the shelving roof of rock might have been used for sheltering horses and sheep from the violence of rain storms, which are severe and copious there in the rainy season. Without discussing the subject of whether the sacred place was an elementary stable or not, no shadow of doubt is in the way of believing that the Saviour was born just where the perpetually burning lamps indicate the great event occurred.

Close by it are two stone boxes, or technically, sarcophagi. One contains the bones of St. Jerome, the translator of the Bible known as the Vulgate. In the other, the bones of Eusebius, the ecclesiastical historian, a native of that once proud city, Caesarea, which Herod the Great made the capital of Judea, now without a solitary house of any description, or a human being residing within its former jurisdiction.

The convent is inhabited by indolent monks, and the unceasing quarrel maintained between the Latin and Greek monks for the exclusive control of the manger, is disgraceful to any party professing Christianity.

In 1851, there was a hole in the stone floor, perhaps three quarters of an inch in diameter, which shows where a large silver star had been placed, to indicate where the star rested which was followed by the wise men from the East. It had been stolen a year or two before, by being wrenched from the bolt in the floor. Grave negotiations between the French and Russians, for the honor of fastening down another star, are fresh in recollection.

Upon what authority the population of Bethlehem is fixed at three thousand, is unknown. I was there on the day of a fair, when neighboring villagers came in with various vegetable products for sale and exchange; and lively as the scene was, the strangers added to the inhabitants, it struck me, fell far short of three thousand.

Weaving on the ground, by the most primitive contrivances imaginable, may be seen in passing by the doors. I even saw a woman in the road, sitting on the ground, weaving a reel of cotton cloth, of good texture. Seeds of cotton are all separated from the wool by the fingers, and the cotton spun on a wooden spindle, twisted adroitly and rapidly by the thumb and fore-finger of the right hand.

Beads, rulers, paper folders, little boxes, etc., made of olive wood, are manufactured as holy keepsakes for travellers. The Jews peddle a variety of small articles of the same kind. Mechanical and artistic skill are in a low state in Syria generally, except among the manufacturers of jewelry, in which the work vies with European ingenuity.

Not many Jews are seen in Bethlehem. It is not one of their favorite stations on account of holy associations, like Hebron and Jerusalem. Between Bethlehem and Jerusalem, however, there is a square structure of hewn blocks of limestone, precisely where Rachel, the ancestral mother of the Hebrew nation, died in childbirth. Delegations of foreign Jews are frequently arriving and departing from the venerated grave. Their respect for it and their prayers, when their eyes are first gratified with the sight, are characteristic.

When a traveller arrives at the convent, which is of necessity on horseback, groups of idle boys collect about the door to examine the stranger. When he re-appears to depart, he is beset by the hawkers of small wares, already described. They have learned the veneration which foreign Christians entertain for everything down to a pebble, from their locality, and take advantage of it by palming off lots of articles, no doubt, which had their origin somewhere else.

A luncheon is always procurable in the convent, of wine, bread, cheese, butter and dried fruits, if out of season for fresh grapes, figs and oranges. No price is fixed for the entertainment, but it is expected they will be paid for, generously, of course.

From a cursory ramble through Bethlehem, and the positive evidence of its former large population when the mountains were terraced, patient explorations by digging would bring some curious remains to the surface. Stone coffins are frequently found in tilling the land, at great elevations in Mount Lebanon, and they, no doubt, abound not far below the surface in the valley of Bethlehem. Near the pools of Solomon, which were magnificent achievements in their day for supplying Jerusalem with water, future archeologists, it is safe to predict, will make interesting discoveries.

Hebron, however, and the whole plain of Jericho, to the antiquarian, to say nothing of Jerusalem, whenever the civilization of the people is sufficiently advanced to protect and encourage explorations, will yield up memorials of infinite importance, to illustrate the ancient condition of the Canaanites and Jews.

Among well bred people, a mutual deference is affected, contempt of others is disguised, authority concealed, attention given to each in his turn, and an easy stream of conversation maintained without vehemence, without interruption, without eagerness for victory, and without any airs of superiority.

EDITORIAL MELANGE.

The three principal lumber markets of the Union, are Chicago, Albany and Bangor. — The steam fire engine "Miles Greenwood" was weighed on approved scales at the City Yard a few days since, when its weight was found to be 17,126 pounds, or a little more than eight and three-fourths tons. — "Patriotism," said Samuel Johnson, "is the last refuge of a scoundrel." — In the Atlantic mills, in Lawrence, are 176 female operatives who have worked there for three years or more. Seven of them have worked there seven years. — There are 120 colleges in the United States. The students exceed 12,000. — Since the loss and starvation of two children in the Union township, Bedford county, Pa., the mother has died from excessive grief, and the father is lying in a critical condition from the same cause. — The canker worms infest the trees in large districts in West Cambridge, Somerville and Medford, destroying the foliage. Some large orchards look as if they had swept through them. — The steam navigation of the western waters is said to employ fifteen thousand officers and men. — Hereafter the name of a vessel once recognized by the government, could not be changed except by a special act of Congress. A law has recently been passed vesting the power to make such changes in the secretary of the treasury. — Five hundred tons of ordnance stores, including 20,000 muskets, have just been shipped by the government from New York to California. — An organ, to cost twenty-five thousand dollars, has been ordered for the Music Hall in this city. — Deacon Benj. Hsley, an old and highly venerated citizen of Portland, died suddenly during service at the Federal Street Baptist Church, on a recent Sunday. His head was observed to hang one side by those near him, supposed in a fainting fit. He was immediately taken out of the church, and died without a struggle. His age was 86. — This country never saw so prosperous a time, as the one in which we live. To whichever side one looks one is amazed at the unbounded prosperity, enterprise, wealth and progress which meet the eye. — Decency is a matter of latitude. In Turkey a man with tight pants on is considered so great a vulgar that he is not tolerated in respectable society. To spit in the presence of an Arab is to make the acquaintance with his cheese-knife. In Russia that man is considered low who refuses a warm breakfast of fried candles. In this country vulgar people are such as keep good hours and live within their income. — The ship-yards at Baltimore are now in a more prosperous condition than for several years past, and there will be twice the number of large class vessels launched this year that there were last. — The New York Sunday Courier understands that Harum has received an offer from the Sydenham Crystal Palace in England, of five thousand dollars a year to go over there and take charge of one of its departments, and the editors learn that Harum thinks seriously of accepting the proposed offer. — Vestrali is a Pole by birth, and is unmarried. She is accompanied by her brother, and intends to return to Mexico in the fall, where she is idolized. — When a buffalo, in his way across the prairie, comes upon a spot, where one of his kind has recently shed his blood, he sets up a gathering cry, or roar: one after another, the whole herd, summoned by his indignant bellow, hasten to the spot, and toss up the earth, with hoof and horn, till they have wiped out the stain. — Rev. Edward Anthon, rector of the Episcopal church in Taunton, is about to remove to New York, to become assistant minister at St. Mark's Church, in that city, of which his father, Dr. Anthon, is rector. — A company of capitalists is about making another attempt to raise the sunken steamer Atlantic in Lake Erie. They design to sink and fasten to her hull a great number of buoys, somewhat resembling empty casks.

WHY THEY ANNEX.—The reason why our British friends keep so busy annexing kingdom after kingdom in the East, may be found in the prodigious wealth of the storied land. Of precious stores of gold, Nadir Shah, in 1740, carried away not less than £2,500,000. In Jahanquie's biography, he relates that a golden platform round his throne weighed forty tons: and the tomb of Akbar cost eleven millions of dollars.

GONE OFF.—Colonel Colt, of revolver reputation, was recently married at Middletown, Connecticut, and with his lady, is now making the European tour. No doubt he will be extensively lionized abroad, for his arms have made him famous everywhere. "Three is he armed who hath his quarrel just," but six times is he armed who has a Colt's revolver.

'TWO BAD.—By a blunder of the types, a bookseller's advertisement lately announced, instead of "The Virginia Comedians, or Old Days in the Old Dominion, by a Lawyer of Richmond,"—"The Virginia Comedian, or Old Dogs in the Old Dominion, by a Sawyer of Richmond."

MERCANTILE LIBRARY ASSOCIATION.—The new president of this society is Ira Chase, Jr., Esq., of the firm of Chase Brothers, an active business man, and well qualified for the post. Mr. Carlos Pierce, the retiring president, has been presented with a splendid service of plate.

THE GREAT BORE.—Many intelligent persons who have recently visited the Hoosac Tunnel, predict that it will be completed in five years. We hope it will, but we must confess it appears to us a "hard road to travel."

THE COMEDIANS.—Mr. and Mrs. John Wood, of the Boston Theatre, have summer engagements at Washington, Baltimore and Montreal. Wherever they appear, they are sure to please.

Wayside Gatherings.

Vast numbers of grasshoppers have again made their appearance in California.

The Emperor of Brazil has been elected an honorary member of the New York Historical Society.

One hundred and thirty-two farmers are at present in the Connecticut House of Representatives. There are also seven farmers in the Senate.

A new lighthouse, which is to be ninety feet in height, is now in course of erection on the Louisiana side of the Pass into Sabine Lake, Texas.

The Grand Trunk Railway has been opened as far westward as Guelph, a distance of 87 miles from Toronto, and extending towards Port Sarnia, the terminus of the road.

The New London Star learns that the $200,000 necessary to be raised to extend the N. H. & N. L. Railroad to Stonington has been subscribed, and that the road will be put under contract at once.

The Wheeling Intelligencer does not remember a time when a greater number of citizens of Western Pennsylvania and Virginia, and Eastern Ohio, were making preparations to go West. The fever appears to be at the highest point.

There are at present sixty-three factories situated in different parts of California in which quartz grinding and extracting the gold by machinery is carried on. Thirty of these are driven by steam engines, the others by water wheels.

The editor of the Eastern Argus has seen a butterfly caught in Buxton, that measures about five inches between the tips of his wings when spread; the body is an inch and a half long, and three quarters of an inch round. The colors are exceedingly beautiful.

The submarine cable connecting Ogdensburg with Prescott, Canada, has been successfully placed in the St. Lawrence River, thus putting New York and Canada in direct communication. But fifteen minutes were required to stretch the wire the entire distance, one mile.

A monster owl was lately killed in Hardwick, Vt., whose extended wings measured six feet from tip to tip. There was one of equal size killed at that place some time since. They were both white, and did not surrender until several rifle balls had been fired into them.

During a recent thunder storm, the lightning came down upon a pasture of Charles Titcomb, of Kensington, N. H., descending perpendicularly into the earth for about thirty feet, so as to form a good well of water. The hole is as big as a barrel, and it was formed, like the holes of the chipmunk, without throwing out any earth.

Near Monticello, N. Y., a flock of pigeons lately settled, nearly twelve miles in length. The wild pigeons seem to gather from all parts of the country at certain seasons for important purposes. Perhaps they hold conventions and nominate candidates, and lay down platforms—who knows!

In Fort Bend county, Texas, a man walking in the forest, leaned upon a stake driven into the ground. The stake broke, and lo! a fancifully arranged cell formed by bricks was disclosed, nearly even with the surface of the earth. In the cell was $1500 in gold and silver. It is supposed a robber hid the money there.

The lady editor of the Clyde (New York) Times thinks that "just the time" for ladies to walk is in the morning, when the sun just illumines the landscape; when the song-birds joyfully trill their melodious notes; when the flowers send forth their sweetest fragrance; when all nature is lively, lovely and refreshing.

Ira Davis obtained a drove of young cattle in Litchfield, London-derry and Hudson, N. H., under an agreement to pasture them in Washington, in the same State, drove them to Hillsborough, and sold the whole lot. The roguesy was discovered, and the cattle recovered. Davis, it is supposed, got $1000 or $1500 for the whole.

Lafayette sent for a hoghead of earth from Bunker Hill to be placed over his body at his interment. The selectmen of Boston received the application from his agent. It was taken from the spot where General Warren fell, and accompanied with a certificate that it was "genuine," signed by three of the oldest veterans of the town.

The people of Bernardston, Franklin county, have organized the "Powers Institute," with the $10,000 given by the late E. E. Powers, of Georgia, a former resident of that town, and have taken measures to put the institution into operation as soon as possible. A committee has been appointed to procure plans and estimates for a suitable building.

Two hundred and four inhabitants of the counties of Mackinaw, Chippewa, Delta, Emmett and Sheshegan, in the northern part of Michigan, have addressed a communication to Governor Bingham, representing the suffering to which they have been subjected by reason of Mormon depredations, and praying some relief from the nefarious conduct of their troublesome neighbors.

A singular mode of robbery has been detected at Dublin. A man used to send a large press by the Liverpool steamers, headed "this side up." In this press was a compartment in which he hid himself. At night, when all was still, he would get out and rob the warehouse of valuables, and retreating to his hiding-place, would be safely conveyed with his plunder to his own home.

Madame de Bodisco goes to Paris on the first of August steamer, and thence to St. Petersburg, where her sons are in the imperial service. Waldimer de Bodisco, now attached to the Russian Legion, has lately returned home. He is a nephew of the old baron, and has a brother who served in the Imperial Guard during the war, but has since resigned, and is to marry a Polish princess.

Owen Cooney, of Chicago, was married lately to Miss Cynthia Robinson, of Leyden Centre, Illinois. The bride is the daughter of Mr. Alexander Robinson, formerly a chief, in the right of his wife, of the Pottawatomie Indians, who once inhabited all the broad prairies round Chicago. He was descended from Scotch blood, mingled on his mother's side with the Indian, and was a gentleman.

The Dumfries Standard relates that at Banjarg porter-lodge, a cat had her litter of young ones taken from her and drowned. Next day, while the bereaved cat was wandering about in the fields, she lighted upon a little leveret. She gently took up the tender fowl, carried it home, deposited it on the bed from which her own kittens had been ruthlessly taken, and tended it with paternal care.

A gentleman residing at Livingston parish, La., has a very singular plant in his garden, which appears to be a sort of connecting link between the animal and vegetable worlds. The plant is about three feet high, and its stems reach the ground. At the end it is armed with a small sharp substance with which it pierces insects and lifts them into its calyx, where they are grasped by the plant and appropriated to its support.

Foreign Items.

Receiving a Crimean medal in pawn subjects a pawn broker to a penalty of £20, under a recent act.

Crimean letters to May 31, mention the report that 70,000 masons are to rebuild Sebastopol after the departure of the allies.

It is stated that the Austrian government had resolved to erect the Lombardo Venetian provinces into the kingdom of Upper Italy.

The family of the late Mr. Cobbett are erecting a monument to his memory in Farnham churchyard, in lieu of the one put up shortly after his decease.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert have made a joint contribution of £500 to the fund for the erection of a memorial church at Constantinople.

A marble statue, beautiful and in perfect condition, has been dug up in making excavations for the foundations of a church in Atlantis, Greece; it is of life size, and represents a youth leaning on a column.

The French emperor's intention of visiting Algeria in September, is again a matter of public interest in Paris. It is current that the emperor intends to apportion fiefs in Algeria, which are to be bestowed as rewards for public services, so as to found great territorial families.

Galignani's Messenger quotes a Neapolitan journal, called the "Eco dell' Esperienza," as an authority, for the following proof of royal mercy: that no capital punishment had taken place in the Two Sicilies for twenty-four years, and that during that time 9894 political prisoners had been pardoned!

Sands of Gold.

.... To be vain is rather a mark of humility than pride.—Swift.

.... No ashes are lighter than those of incense, and few things burn out sooner.—Lauder.

.... Covetousness, like jealousy, when it has once taken root, never leaves a man but with his life.—Tom Brown.

.... One should not dispute with a man, who, either through stupidity or shamelessness, denies plain and visible truths.—Locke.

.... If it be true that there can be no calumny without malice, it is equally so that there can be no malice without some desirable quality to excite it.—Lauder.

.... There is no benefit so large, but malignity will still lessen it; none so narrow, which a good interpretation will not enlarge.—L'Estrange.

.... Men are every day saying and doing, from the power of education, habit and imitation, what has no root whatever in their serious convictions.—Channing.

.... If the sacrifices to virtue are often hard to make, it is always joy to have made them, and a person never repents having done a good action.—J. J. Rousseau.

.... Names that lie upon the ground are not easily set on fire by the torch of envy, but those quickly catch it which are raised up by fame, or wave to the breeze of prosperity.—Lauder.

.... It would be most lamentable if the good things of this world were rendered either more valuable or more lasting; for, despicable as they already are, too many are found eager to purchase them, even at the price of their souls.—Colton.

Joker's Budget.

The fellow who dammed up the Mississippi with a chip, has been sent for to cure the cancer at the tropic.

Five glasses of whiskey and a gallon of beer, will enable one to see a sea-serpent even on dry land.

In this dollar-and-cent-age, when utility is the great god of our idolatry, if Mount Calvary were to stand in the way of a railroad, it would be carted away as so much rubbish.

A rich journeyman printer is found out west. He is being exhibited with ring-tailed monkeys, wild hogs, shaved horses, three legged calves, and other trinkets.

At a recent exhibition of a menagerie, an elephant was seen to pick up the loose hay with his trunk, when an Irishman exclaimed, "What sort of a baste is that atin' hay with his tail!"

My opponent, Mr. Speaker, persists in saying that he is entitled to the floor. Whether this is so or not, I shall not inquire. All I have got to say is, that he will get floored if he interrupts me again.

A fashionable gent tripped up on an orange-peel, the other day, and broke his neck. A brass locket, three cents in change, a bottle of hair oil, and a whalebone cane, are awaiting redemption at the coroner's office.

The Gloucester News tells of a man who lost a favorite cow, and who wound up his eulogy on her by saying: "She was as handsome as a schoolmarm." It must be a great relief to know that the question of a schoolmarm's beauty can now be so easily decided.

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

An elegant, moral and refined Miscellaneous Family Journal, devoted to polite literature, wit and humor, prose and poetry, gems, and original tales, written expressly for the paper. In politics, and on all sectarian questions, it is strictly neutral; therefore making it emphatically a PAPER FOR THE MILLION, and a welcome visitor to the home circle.

It contains the foreign and domestic news of the day, so condensed as to present the greatest possible amount of intelligence. No advertisements are admitted to the paper, thus insuring the entire sheet, which is of the maximum size, for the instruction and amusement of the general reader. An unrivalled corps of contributors are regularly engaged, and every department is under the most finished and perfect system that experience can suggest, forming an original paper, the present circulation of which far exceeds that of any other weekly paper in the Union, with the exception of "BALLOU'S PICTORIAL."

Sample copies sent when desired.

TERMS.—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year..... $2 00
4 subscribers, " "..... 7 00
10 " " "..... 15 00

Any person sending us sixteen subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the seventeenth copy gratis.

One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, $4 per annum. Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU, Corner of Tremont and Bromfield Sts., Boston, Mass.

WHOLESALE AGENTS.—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Welch, 115 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; A. C. Bagley, 162 Vine Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Ross, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Woodward, corner 4th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Ringgold, Louisville, Ky.; Wallace, Austin & Buel, 25 Clark Street, Chicago, Illinois.

THE CATHEDRAL OF ST. ISAAC, ST. PETERSBURG.

The magnificent structure accurately delineated on this page is one of the noblest church edifices in the Russian empire. Our engraving not only delineates its magnificent façade, its towers and its lofty, elegant and elaborate dome, but the adjacent buildings; and shows us the characteristic life of a Russian street—the mounted troopers, groups of officers, a pleasure carriage, and ladies and gentlemen promenading. The drawing has the minute fidelity of a daguerreotype. Isaac of Dalmatia, whose name is given to this cathedral, was the patron, in the calendar of the Greek church, of Peter the Great's birthday. Accordingly the church in the navy-yard of the infant city was built in honor of that saint, of timber only, Peter feeling certain that this indication of his wishes would induce his successors to erect a more pretentious edifice. This first church was burned down, and he built another of stone. In 1763, a marble one was substituted, and in church is approached by granite staircases, each nine feet wide, and contains twenty stoves for heating the church. The portico on each front consists of twelve Corinthian columns, each of seven feet diameter and fifty-seven feet long, in one block. They are the largest monoliths yet employed for such purposes; those of the Pantheon, at Rome—only forty-seven feet—exceeding in size all those of antiquity remaining. The dome is surrounded by twenty-four columns, each forty-two feet, and the bell towers have similar ornaments, thirty feet each in height. This series of one hundred and four monolithic granite columns is unsurpassed in number, size and costliness, by any similar work of ancient or modern art. A remarkable fact was discovered in their excavation, viz., that the unanimity with which the workmen were made to place their tools, to raise their arms and deliver their blows, detached such enormous masses from the living rock with little expenditure of time or trouble. The celebrated erection of the obelisk in the bronze angels, nine feet high, each weighing 34 cwt. The balustrade beneath the figures is also bronzed. The dome, which has a very beautiful outline of high merit, is, internally, avowedly constructed on the principle of that of St. Paul's; but instead of timber, brick and stone, the Russian dome is of iron, filled in with vases like our garden pots, which the architect deemed the best mode of obtaining the junction of strength with lightness. Externally it is covered with bronze, divided by 24 bold ribs, and gilt in three thicknesses of leaves of sterling gold. This operation was entrusted to the supervision of three of the principal gilders of the city, who rejected every leaf that showed any, however slight, defect on being tested. The gilders worked in glass masks, with air-tubes like an elephant's proboscis, down to the knees, to avoid the effects of the mercurial amalgam, the electro process not then being known. Deprived of the easily imagined effect produced by the reflection of the sunlight, this ovoid of pure gold relieves itself at twilight

CHURCH OF ST. ISAAC, AT ST. PETERSBURG, RUSSIA.

1817, the Emperor Alexander ordered the Chevalier de Montferrand to make such additions as should render the building worthy of the position it occupied in a fashionable quarter of one of the most splendid cities in Europe. Montferrand was directed to leave the east end standing. A year was occupied in erecting suitable buildings for the accommodation of the machinery, engineers and army of workmen destined to be employed on the building. The foundation stone was laid August 6, 1819. During the next year ten engines were busy in driving 10,762 piles, which the marshy nature of the soil required, for the support of the ponderous superstructure. Then the whole surface was covered with two layers of blocks of granite, beautifully wrought, although they were to remain fifteen feet below the surface. They serve as a base to the walls of the cathedral, of which the more important are granite, to the level of the pavement, the remainder being constructed of compact masonry of picked stone, laid and rammed like street pavements. The crypt formed below the Vatican loses its importance in comparison with the raising of the first column of the portico of this cathedral, which was fixed in its place in forty minutes, before the present emperor and empress, the grand duke, and a crowd of highly excited spectators. The twenty-four columns of the dome each weighed in the quarry sixty-six tons, and each was raised one hundred and fifty feet into its place, in two hours, by the efforts of 300 men, in perfect silence, the ringing of a bell giving the signals of command. The first was placed Nov. 28, 1837, and all were finished in two months of Russian winter. The main walls of the building above the granite plinth are faced externally and internally with white marble from Finland and Italy, where new quarries were opened, for which roads were made and bridges and houses built, to obtain a marble superior to that of Carrara. The roofs are of bronze or copper on iron framing. The groups in the tympanum, or triangular space in each pediment, with the figures at the angles and on the summit, are of plaster electro-bronzed, as are also the twenty-four in simple majesty against the azure sky; but its greatest glory is at night, when a thousand sparkling lights are constellations surrounding the far-beaming emblem of our religion. Internally, the cathedral is divided into a Greek cross, with the dome, as usual, at the centre, and four square chapels, each surmounted with a campanile at the angles. Amongst the more striking decorations are 40 bronze angels, each 21 feet high. The centre nave is 175 feet long, and 53 wide; the total length, 268 feet—the total width, 153 feet; ornamented at the east end by an iconostasis, or altar-screen, 150 feet long and 70 feet high, of white marble, encrusted with porphyry, jasper, and other precious stones, and enriched with eight Corinthian columns of malachite. The great bell, of worn-out and recalled coin, weighs 1800 pounds, the diameter is eight feet. The large bells are similar in form, but differ in their embellishments. The paintings throughout the cathedral, at present, are in oil. They are in three tiers, painted on a gold ground, in most glowing colors, before which are pendent massive silver lamps.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { CORNER OF TREMONT
AND BROMFIELD STS.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 2, 1856.

$3.00 PER ANNUM. } VOL. XI., No. 5.—WHOLE No. 265.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

STATE OF NEW JERSEY.

The engraving on this page is by John Andrew, after one of Billings's spirited and characteristic designs made expressly for our journal. The State arms are conspicuous within the circle; the device on the shield being three ploughs, superimposed with a horse's head above, the supporters being a graceful figure of Liberty and Ceres with a horn of plenty. On one side a cider-mill worked by hand, and on the other a group of young men and girls picking and harvesting apples, represent the agricultural character of the State. A locomotive in the distance shows the modern improvements that science and capital have introduced. The scene below is in striking contrast with the upper portion of the design. It carries us back to the days when the shore of the Atlantic was the hunting-ground of the red man. Surrounded by his listening countrymen, the medicine man of a tribe is discoursing of grave matters to his auditors. The earliest settlement in New Jersey was made in the county of Bergen, between the years 1620 and 1630, by Dutch emigrants from New York. Being joined by Danes and Norwegians, who, in 1638, were followed by a number of Swedes and Fins, a colony was formed on the Delaware River, the land on each side having been purchased of the aborigines as far as navigation extended. In 1664, the territory between the Connecticut and Delaware rivers was granted to the Duke of York, brother of Charles II., and, as the grant included New Jersey, the Dutch were dispossessed, and the territory conveyed to Lord Berkley and Sir George Carteret. Philip Carteret being sent over as governor, fixed on Elizabethtown as the seat of government in 1665. In 1676, the province was divided, the western part being annexed to New York, and the eastern remaining a separate colony under the direct dominion of the British crown. Twenty years afterwards it was surrendered to Queen Anne, and incorporated with New York; but in 1738, both provinces were again placed under the immediate rule of the crown, and so remained till the war of the Revolution. The republican constitution of the State is dated July 2, 1776. During the war with Great Britain, the heroic State of New Jersey made many sacrifices, and her sons gave their treasure and their blood freely in furtherance of the popular cause. Here was fought the battle of Trenton, and the State is full of memorials of those trying and heroic days. The whole amount of the State debt, January 1, 1854, was $65,000. Value of the productive property owned by the State, $252,174 12; whole amount of productive school fund owned by the State, $395,043 59. There are 189 common school districts in the State. It contains 30 banks. There is a State Lunatic Asylum at Trenton. The face of the country at the north is rather mountainous and broken, the central part is undulating, and the south level. The agriculture of the State is very productive, even the sandy lowlands producing the finest fruit through liberal culture. Among the most important works of internal improvement are the Morris Canal, the Delaware and Had-on Canal, the Camden and Amboy, the Patterson and Had-on, the New Brunswick and Trenton, the Morris and Essex, and other railroads with divers branches. The last census shows a population of nearly 500,000 persons, including 22,000 free colored persons. The climate of the State is mild.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE GIPSEY'S SECRET:

—OR—

THE LEAGUE OF GUILT.

A STORY OF HIGH AND HUMBLE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE CONTRABANDIST."

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER XIII.

AN ASTONISHING REVELATION.

In silent astonishment, Eleanor obeyed. Passing from the room through a side door, she accompanied the dwarf through a long corridor, leading along the rear of several apartments, till they entered a door at the extremity, opening into a small room which was seldom used. A small square closet led from this, and was situated just at the back of the apartment which Eleanor had left with her uncle awhile before. Here the dwarf half paused.

"Be silent now," he said, in a whisper, "and enter here. Have no scruples with those who are unscrupulous themselves. Do not leave this closet until you are fully acquainted with what is going on in yonder. Go! You have a right to a share in this business; it concerns your fate."

Noislessly he opened the door; and the next instant she found herself shut up in the little dark closet; and yet not quite dark, for opposite the door was a small window, opening into the breakfast-room, and covered only by a blind, through which the faintest light came, but still not sufficient for her to distinguish plainly any object about her. Through this blind it was easy to see and hear everything passing in the breakfast-room adjoining, while all in the closet itself was invisible.

At a table in this room, Victor Briancourt and his son were seated, with pens, ink and paper strewn about before them.

"Sixty thousand—sixty thousand! payable to Victor Briancourt on the day of the marriage of his son, Morley Edmond, with Eleanor, daughter of the late Sir James Ashby, of Ashby Place, etc., etc.; and a life annuity in the bargain. Really, my dear boy, that opportunity of obliging Sir Edward has been quite a good thing for me. I have lived quite at ease ever since it was presented to me. I may say, I think, without flattery, that few men would have thought of turning it to such golden advantage. A goodly fortune for myself, and the Ashby estates for you, with simply the loveliest incumbrance that could well be, in the shape of pretty Eleanor herself. Not badly managed—eh, Morley?"

"Not by any means, if it all succeeds. But—"

"If—but! Excuse me, but this is rather ridiculous, my dear fellow. You suspect that this Hugh Latimer has managed to rival you in her good graces. It is mere nonsense to think so. That he may have tried—that he would have deemed himself only too fortunate to do so, I do not for an instant doubt. But you have succeeded in preventing their meeting for so long a time, that I have not the least apprehension in that respect. Those letters it was well to suppress, however; for, though they were only from the sister, they might have had an effect little to be desired."

"As it is, she never has even suspected that any were sent. Humphries took them whenever they came. I dare say Miss Latimer and her dear brother are wondering at this moment why Eleanor never acknowledged those precious missives."

"Sir Edward was only too willing to help you in this affair, I suppose?"

"Willing! He had but to say the word, and he gave his orders to her directly that she should go no more to Briarfield. He would have shut her up a prisoner if it had been necessary, rather than lose the means—the only means of fulfilling his bond to you."

"Ha, ha! I am glad he feels his need of fulfilling it so religiously. It leaves me less trouble. You see plainly, Morley, that, feeling his obligation to me, as he does, there can be little that would prevent him from meeting it. If Eleanor, even at this late hour, should, from any caprice, refuse to marry you, he would not allow that to deter him from his purpose. He must make her yours, whether she is willing or not."

"And mine she shall be!"

This was the conversation in the breakfast-room. The door of Eleanor's closet was locked by the dwarf, till she had heard it through.

It was a full hour, ere, after leaving the library, Eleanor and Sir Edward Ashby returned thither. He found Eleanor seated where he had left her; her face paler than it had been when he went out, with some inward agitation depicted upon it in the expression of the troubled yet almost stern eyes, and the slight compression of the lips. He saw it and half paused, ere resuming his seat, regarding it with an involuntary questioning glance. But immediately recollecting himself, he made some slight and formal apology for having kept her so long waiting, and took up the subject again, where he had left it off.

"I observed to you, I think," he said, "before leaving you, that I wished you to appoint a day when this marriage shall take place. If convenient, it would be desirable that you do so to-day—now, if you will. The sooner the matter is definitely arranged, the better, perhaps, it will be."

He waited, expecting her to answer; but she sat quite silent, with her hands clasped, resting upon her lap, and her eyes fixed upon the floor. If he had observed her more closely, he might have seen that within the clasp of those small hands, was a packet of papers; that the fingers were closed tightly together about them, and that her seemingly set glance moved to these more than once. It was then that Eleanor was seeking strength for a new-formed resolution. She neither moved, nor spoke, nor raised her eyes for a little while.

"Eleanor, you comprehend me, I think?" he said, frigidly, after a moment's pause. "I stated, I believe, with sufficient plainness, that I desired you to fix at once on the day of your marriage."

"I have considered, sir," now answered Eleanor, calmly, "what you were pleased to say to me. But I do not wish to appoint the day of which you speak."

He regarded her with a cold and slightly perplexed air.

"O then you leave it, I presume, to the option of Morley?"

"On the contrary, I do not wish to have it appointed at all."

She uttered the words in a tone of quiet yet resolute decision that could not well have been mistaken. But her auditor seemed for a moment unable to comprehend or credit its full meaning. He started and turned pale. His eyes were fixed on her face with a look of almost agony. His lips, grown suddenly livid, moved with unspoken words. His thin fingers clutched nervously.

"Eleanor—Miss Ashby," he said, at length, in a hoarse tone, "I do not quite understand you, I think. Will you have the goodness to speak a little more explicitly? What is it that you mean?"

She looked at him for a single moment without speaking. In the emotion she beheld, was the evidence of the importance he placed upon the bond which he had given to Victor Briancourt, and which required her for a sacrifice.

"Well, well, Miss Ashby," said he, recovering himself, as he saw that her attention was attracted to his emotion, and shrinking angrily from her glance, "I believe I am entitled to an explanation from you. Why do you not give it?"

"I mean, sir," she said, "that I have reasons for declining altogether the honor of this union with Morley Briancourt."

He started, and half rose from his seat; his features working, his lips quivering, his whole frame convulsed with an unaccountable emotion.

"You decline! you—" He stood there, unable to finish, for the terror and wrath that inspired him.

And Eleanor Ashby, trembling at the storm she had raised, pale as death, but nerving herself to courage, sat silent.

"Eleanor Ashby, dare to say that again!" he uttered, finally, in a voice hoarse with inward passion.

She did not waver or shrink.

"Sir, I have said it," was her answer. "I repeat it!"

"You will not repeat it, Eleanor Ashby. You cannot—you dare not!" he uttered. "What is the meaning of this? How have you the insolence to oppose me? What accursed spirit prompts you to break the bond of years—the promise given for you, and agreed to by you? Tell me your reason—tell me, I say, this instant!"

He paused, trembling with his own violence—a violence that agitated and shocked his niece; but she would not give way. A two-fold reason actuated her in her decision, for she would have died rather than submit to a measure which made her hand an object of deliberate sale, and the man whom she had learned to despise, she would never marry in any case. She could not prolong this scene. She had come with the fixed purpose of declaring her motives, of showing him the knowledge she had so strangely gained; but his passionate violence unnerved her.

"Sir," she said, "I cannot tell you now. This evening I will do so. Meanwhile, I must seek an interview with Morley Briancourt. Now I pray you to excuse me from prolonging this discussion."

With a grave but respectful inclination to her uncle, she slowly left the apartment. Sir Edward Ashby remained standing for a moment, when she had left him, perfectly silent and motionless, thunderstruck, as it were, with his eyes fixed on the door by which she had disappeared. Then, with a form that trembled from head to foot, and a countenance rigid and pale as death itself, he sank gradually into his arm-chair. A little while he sat there, leaning his head upon his hand, his eyes fixed upon vacancy, with a cold and gloomy stare of despairing misery. It would have been hard to tell why this single act of Eleanor's should thus affect him; but an indescribable expression of anguish rested upon his features. The tempestuous fury of a short time since had entirely disappeared. He was weak, helpless, miserable now.

Soon he rose, and pouring a goblet of water from a pitcher upon the table, drank it slowly. It seemed slightly to restore him. He walked back and forth, across the apartment, for a few moments, and then rang the bell.

"Tell Mr. Briancourt," he said, to the servant who appeared, "that Sir Edward Ashby requests the favor of an interview with him here."

The man, evidently struck by the strange alteration in his master's countenance, bowed silently and withdrew.

The baronet resumed his seat by the table, and shortly Mr. Briancourt entered. His quick eye marked the lingering expression of misery upon the countenance of his host, and an almost imperceptible cloud darkened his own brow. But he came forward with a smile.

"Well, my dear sir, what said our fair Eleanor?" he asked, lightly.

"She informs me," answered the baronet, slowly, "that—" He paused, hesitatingly. His paleness increased. He looked nervously at Mr. Briancourt, and then turning away, rose and commenced pacing the floor again, with a half-suppressed groan.

"Well, my dear friend?" said that gentleman, with an air of utter carelessness, leaning back in his chair, with folded hands.

"That," went on Sir Edward, as if every word were wrung from him with the most exquisite torture, "she has found reasons for declining the honor of Morley's hand."

"She has, eh?" observed Mr. Briancourt, with easy indifference. "Well, that is simply what we had all suspected before. Of course you showed Eleanor that she had expressed her intentions too hastily, without due consideration?"

"Victor," said the baronet, and his tones were hasty and agitated, his glance one of deprecating anguish,—"Victor, I could not; I must tell you the truth. I was unable—"

"Tut, tut, my dear friend," returned Mr. Briancourt, smilingly, "how modest you are! You really undervalue your own powers of persuasion. I really cannot bring myself to believe that you allowed our fair friend to leave you without having exhibited to her the mistake she had made in declining this alliance."

"It is too true!" groaned the baronet.

"Still, I beg your pardon, but I can scarcely credit it of one who has so much reason for enforcing obedience in this case."

His voice and manner were perfectly bland; his fine gray eyes rested with the utmost softness of expression upon the face of his host.

"Victor, Victor, have mercy!" uttered the baronet. He groaned with agony.

Mr. Briancourt did not seem to hear. With that same soft glance and tone, he said:

"I cannot help thinking, my dear Sir Edward Ashby," and he laid peculiar stress upon the last three words, "that had I been in your case, she would have been persuaded to change her mind."

"I could not persuade her, Victor!" murmured the miserable man.

"O, well, there is time—there is ample time. You will confer with her again to-morrow, or this evening, perhaps, and then, doubtless, we shall come to the point satisfactorily enough." And Mr. Briancourt rose with a friendly smile from his chair, as if about to take his departure.

"But, Victor, I fear," said Sir Edward, tremulously, "she—"

"My dear sir, there is nothing whatever to fear," smiled the guest. "You will, of course, open the subject with her again, as I said, either this evening or to-morrow!" He spoke very softly, with the utmost politeness and deference of mien.

The baronet writhed.

"Yes, yes! I will do anything—everything. But you know her. She is an Ashby—her father's child. And she says she will not marry your son."

"She will not?" echoed Mr. Briancourt. His utterance was slow, moderate, smooth. "She will not? O yes, Sir Edward, she will; or—"

He paused—a pause of significance. The baronet shuddered through every limb. Mr. Briancourt approached, and took his hand.

"My excellent friend," he said, "you really are wanting in confidence. As I remarked before, you fail to place a sufficient estimate upon your own abilities. I am quite sure you can bring your fair niece, my future daughter-in-law, to reason. And the incentive to action on your part, too; it is a remarkable one, you remember." He pressed his host's icy fingers meaningly, and glided from the apartment.

CHAPTER XIV.

ANOTHER TURN OF THE SCREW.

For hours had Eleanor Ashby remained in the solitude of her own apartment, meditating upon the discovery she had been enabled, through the means of Pequin, to make. Resentment and indignation filled her as she thought of Morley Briancourt's late proceeding. It was no longer a matter of mystery—the silence of Mary.

And as she thought of the reason of the suppression of this correspondence, she trembled and blushed with confusion and shame. Jealous—and of Hugh Latimer! She covered her face with her hands. The bare suggestion of a possible cause for such a feeling on Morley Briancourt's part, presented now for the first time to her mind, sent a thrill to her heart, and suffused her cheek with a vivid color that came and went a thousand times in a moment. Hugh Latimer!

Rousing herself from these reflections, with a still burning cheek, she drew her desk towards her, and proceeded to pen a brief note to Miss Latimer, concerning the intercepted correspondence. She did not say to her that Morley had been instrumental in the work. She merely said: "I have not, since we met, heard a single word from you, or received one of your letters, until to-day." She did not mention the name of Hugh. The letter, which, had not justice required it, she would have shrunk from sending at all, was sealed, directed and despatched immediately to Briarfield by Lucy; and then Eleanor sat down to think once more, and prepare herself for the approaching scene with Morley and her uncle.

There was a bond between her uncle and Victor Briancourt which gave the promise of her hand to Morley, and certain large sums of money to his father, with the accession of the Briancourt family to the estates and titles of Ashby, in return for some secret obligation of Sir Edward, contracted in former times to his friend. Of the nature of this obligation, Eleanor could form no idea; but she was persuaded that it was a mysterious—even a fearful one, by the hints that had been dropped in the conversation between the father and son, and by the inexpressible dread Sir Edward exhibited of losing the power and means of fulfilling the contract. She shrank from increasing the violent excitement he had betrayed; and with long and serious thought, resolved not to mention to him her suspicion of his secret, whatever it might be; but yet, to adhere firmly to her resolution of resisting all attempts to make her wed with Morley. The affair of the letters alone would she mention. This would be sufficient for her purpose.

Resolving to make the business as brief as possible, and nerving herself to firmness, she prepared to encounter Morley. It was evening when, for the first time since morning, she met him in the drawing-room.

He was deathly pale. He had learned from his father of her refusal to marry him, and he had been brooding over it all day. He met her now with a countenance colorless, gloomy and severe, like his manner in addressing her.

"Well, Eleanor," he said.

He had remained standing. She also stood. Her clear, calm eyes were raised to his.

"I have withdrawn, sir," she said, gravely, "all share in the contract made some time since between my uncle and your father, respecting my marriage with you. You are probably already aware of this fact?"

"I am. It is to leno your reasons for this unwarrantable step that I have come hither."

"My reasons for this unwarrantable step! You shall have them. I think they will be sufficiently satisfactory. You will not be at a loss to understand them, I think. Here they are!"

She laid on the table that stood between her and Morley the packet of intercepted letters. He started at the sight of them, knowing them but too well. His brow flushed, then grew black as midnight. She saw the effect.

"I think this matter requires no further explanation," she said, quietly; and taking up the letters again, she left the room without another word.

And shortly, Morley Briancourt went also, to seek his father, his countenance betraying suppressed but deadly feelings of excitement. He swore an oath, now, to possess her at any cost.

From the drawing-room, Eleanor now repaired to the library, where she knew her uncle awaited her.

He sat there by the table, his head resting on his hand, and his face white as that of a ghost. Half rising, as she entered, he motioned her to a seat opposite to him.

"Well, Eleanor Ashby, you have come?" he said, harshly.

"I have come, sir," she answered.

"To give me your reasons for refusing to wed Morley Briancourt. Well, let us hear them—these admirable reasons." And his voice, trembling though it was, had a sarcastic sneer in it. "Let us hear them. But let me warn you beforehand, Eleanor Ashby, they will have no weight with me."

"They should have, sir," answered Miss Ashby, "if you had not yourself assisted in laying the foundation for them. As it is, you are already familiar with the circumstances connected with them. This will show you what I mean." And she gave him the letters which he had helped to intercept. "There is no force, sir, sufficient to make me wed a man who is guilty of the dishonorable act performed in the suppression of letters intended for me by friends."

He looked startled, confounded, angry, as he beheld them.

"How did you come possessed of these?" he asked, trembling with wrath.

"That I cannot tell you, sir," she answered. "But I will say, at least, that it was by no contrivance on my part. They were in Morley Briancourt's writing-desk yonder; but I did not take them thence, nor persuade another to do so; for I was unaware of their existence till this very morning. I have learned how he intercepted them—with your connivance."

"Well, it is all out then. You may or may not know the reason for which Morley suppressed these letters; it does not matter."

"I do know," she answered, with a deep blush, "and am ashamed of the motives—for which there was no occasion—which prompted the act."

"Never mind—never mind!" he said, sternly. "That will make no difference. You will marry Morley Briancourt. It is my command."

"And I cannot obey it," said Eleanor. "You are determined, but I think you cannot have forgotten the resolution I expressed in the interview of this morning."

"I have not indeed forgotten it," he answered, hoarsely; "but as I do not recognize your right to make such a resolution, I do not consider it of any consequence. You are the betrothed bride of Morley Briancourt, and as such, he claims the fulfilment of your promise to him. If you are not prepared to render that fulfilment, I shall find it necessary to enforce it."

Eleanor trembled with excitement and agitation; but her clear eyes were fixed full and proudly upon her uncle's face, and she subdued, with a strong effort, the quiver that ran through her nerves, as she answered him.

"Sir," she said, "I have signified my unwillingness to wed the son of your friend; and while you deny my right to oppose your will and his in the matter, I refuse to acknowledge your title to enforce my obedience contrary to my wishes. You are my uncle and my guardian, but that is all; and your relationship to me is not such as to warrant you in compelling me to a measure repugnant to me. None but a parent has the right to assume the tone with which you address me; it has that authority to which I will not submit."

"Then I shall teach you how to do so!" uttered Sir Edward, with a white and passionate countenance, his whole frame agitated, and his lips trembling with wrath. "Eleanor Ashby, you shall wed him to whom I have promised you; you shall wed him, I say, spite of every power on earth. Dare not oppose me! You shall be his bride ere this month is out, or—Rage and excitement rendered him unable to finish his threat. His thin hand was clenched convulsively. For a moment, he seemed about to suffocate. Finally he dashed his hand down upon the table with fearful violence. "Go to your room, girl!" he thundered,—"go to your room, but dare to leave it until I bid you!"

The sight of his terrible wrath had almost overpowered Eleanor. At first she had scarcely strength to rise from her chair. But she struggled to collect her energies.

"Do you disobey me?" ejaculated her uncle, madly, stamping with fury,—"do you disobey me! Away this instant, or you shall know what it is to thwart me!"

"Hold, sir!" uttered Eleanor, sternly, restored to herself by his brutal tyranny, and rising to her full height,—"hold, sir! Remember, it is a woman whom you are addressing, and that woman your brother's child. I go, but I dare you to place a restraining hand upon my freedom. No prisoner will I be in the house that was once my father's; no gazer's power shall limit Eleanor Ashby's liberty within these walls!"

He recoiled once or twice while she spoke, as though she had struck him, and as often his eyes blazed with wrath at her air of royal defiance. She passed slowly out from his presence, calm, and proud, and pale; and as the door closed behind her, he sunk upon the seat from which, in his fury, he had risen, and a groan of mingled rage and agony broke from his white lips.

"O," he muttered, "for means to crush that girl's spirit, or to rid myself at once and forever of Victor Briancourt's power! The fiends tempted me into it! O for rest—rest—rest once more upon this earth!"

With an expression of the most bitter anguish, he threw himself forward upon the table, and bowed his head upon his hands. His whole frame shook with emotion.

Suddenly there was borne through the apartment the sound of a faint, prolonged moan—a fainting, dying moan, as of a spirit passing from the clay. He started from his seat with a shudder of horror, his wild eyes almost bursting from their sockets, the great drops of perspiration standing out upon his pallid, wrinkled brow.

"What's that?" he uttered, in a strong, quick, terrified whisper,—"what's that?"

He waited, with shaking form, holding tremulously by his chair for support, and listening in awful suspense. But the sound had gone; all was silent.

"Fool!" he murmured, weakly, to himself,—"fool that I am! It was but the night wind sighing through the room. My fears make a child of me."

Slowly and with a hand that quivered as in an ague fit, he wiped away with his handkerchief the drops of moisture from his cold forehead. But still his fearful eyes wandered wildly to every corner of the apartment with a nameless dread. It was as if he expected some apparition to appear before his horrified vision. Slowly he sank once more upon his seat, with his elbows resting upon the arms of the chair, and his skeleton fingers clenching nervously together as he folded them within each other; and still, ever and anon, his frightened, wandering glance roved fearfully about on every side.

There were shadows in the room—shadows dancing hither and thither on the walls, as the light airs floated in from some open window, and made the lamp-flames flare this way and that. He was afraid of them. They inspired him with a nervous dread. To his excited fancy, they took a thousand fearful, ghostly forms that were horrible to look upon. He could not bear them. He rose, and with stealthy steps, looking about him on every side as he went, advanced to the windows and shut them close. It was a hot night; the air was stifling. But no matter for that: he could not bear the shadows; anything rather than them.

But they were there still. The draught from the sudden closing of the windows made the shadows flare more wildly than ever. He sprang from his seat again, and rang the bell with mad violence.

"More lights here!" he shouted to the servant who came.

The man started wondering at his master, and retreated quickly from the apartment to execute the order. He was startled at the sight of that ghost-like face, that harsh, strange voice. And truly no wonder. It would not have taken a great stretch of fancy to believe Sir Edward Ashby mad.

It was better when the other lights came. There was not a corner of the great room now that was not flooded with a blaze of radiance. He walked back and forth with less of fear this time. The shadows tormented him no more. The moan he had heard, he said assuringly to himself, was nothing but the night wind. There was nothing to make him afraid—nothing; and so he walked to and fro securely, and thought, as he walked, of his stubborn niece, Eleanor, how she had refused to marry her lover, how she had defied him, how she had dared him to control her. But he would control her. She should marry her lover; she should be his tool to fulfil the contract he had made so many years ago with Victor Briancourt; and Sir Edward Ashby, as he said these last words to himself, shuddered fearfully again, and stopped his walk. But with the next words, he resumed it. "Yes—she should wed Morley, and then the contract would be fulfilled, and he should be safe—safe at last. Victor Briancourt would say so; he would give back that hateful paper, written and signed in blood. Ha! What was that?"

Again through the still apartment sighed that faint and awful moan; and he started, with the ejaculation of horror dying into silence on his white lips, his eyes fixed, his flesh creeping, every hair standing erect upon his head.

There was something that fell upon the floor before him with a dull, dead sound, causing him to spring back with an involuntary shriek. Then, as if moved by an invisible power, he crept forward, with his glance fascinated awfully by it. His tremulous fingers advanced to touch it—advanced by no volition of his own. A trance of agony enwrapped him. What was it that he clutched? Up before his eyes he held a small rusted dagger, with great splashes and stains of red upon its corroded blade. And even at that moment, on his own right hand there fell a single drop of human blood.

A horrible cry, a scream, a yell of agony, found its way from his laden breast. It pierced through every room, rang through every corridor, penetrated to every corner of that vast old mansion. Not a soul was there from end to end of the house but shrank appalled at the sound. They rushed from every side in one direction, servants and all. Straight to the library, from whence that awful sound had come, and there upon the floor lay the master of Ashby Place, as one dead.

It was strange, but no one saw anything of a dagger; no one remarked any stain of the sanguine drop that had soiled the hand of Sir Edward Ashby. And no one saw the dwarf, perched in a lofty, dark nook, at the very top of the book-shelves, beneath the ceiling.

CHAPTER XV.

WORKING OF A TROUBLED MIND.

It was a strange, almost inexplicable mystery. They talked of it in subdued whispers all over the house—of the strange and fearful shriek that had rung out upon the midnight air from the walls of the old library—a shriek so terrible that many believed it to have been uttered by no human voice, and of the death-like swoon in which Sir Edward had been found lying there upon the floor. Various were the surmises in regard to these things, but nothing definite or satisfactory could be learned. Among the domestics of the household, however, the general belief was that he had been visited by some ghostly apparition—some evil thlog or other; for it was an incident most favorable to their love for the marvellous; and the fact of its having occurred at midnight added strength to this view of the affair.

It is, perhaps, needless to say that Victor Briancourt and his son were not those to enter into such a belief as this; but they held their peace, and allowed the people of the household to account for the occurrence as they pleased; for both allowed that there was a shadow of mystery in the affair.

They had carried him immediately to his chamber, and dispensing with all assistance from others, resorted to every means in their power to restore him. But their utmost efforts availed nothing, and finally it was found necessary to despatch a messenger for a medical man, who shortly arrived, in all haste, at Ashby.

The syncope into which the baronet was plunged, resisted, however, for an alarming length of time, every appliance of the physician's skill, and his grave countenance testified to the anxiety which he felt. Both Victor Briancourt and his son also gave undeniable evidence of uneasiness, as the time wore on, and the patient lay still in that deathlike state. Of more than uneasiness, if one looked closely; for upon the dark brow of each was stamped a gloomy, lowering shadow of almost unbearable suspense. In the heart of each there were huddled, dearly cherished expectations that hung for fulfilment upon his life. They would crumble into dust if he should die now. He must live—he must live, they said to themselves; he could not die yet. And moment after moment they watched for hope in the physician's face, and moment after moment they grew more uneasy—more anxious.

And, meanwhile, the domestics were gathered together in the great kitchen of the mansion, talking of the affair in fearful whispers, and exchanging their various and ever-changing surmises concerning it, in low voices scarcely raised above a whisper, so strange a thing it seemed.

And in her own apartment, Eleanor sat with her maid, pretty Lucy Elmore, who went ever and anon to Sir Edward's valet for tidings concerning the state of his master, and then went back to Miss Ashby to report his answer, as dictated by the medical attendant. That Eleanor felt astonished and concerned at this sudden indisposition of her uncle, it is, perhaps, needless to say; but it was with solicitude that she thought of his dangerous state; but it was unaccompanied with that deep tenderness, that painful and affectionate anxiety, which she would naturally have experienced had he ever treated her with that kindness, ever manifested towards her that love which he should have extended to her, his ward and his niece. He had never taken any pains to endear himself to her; on the contrary, he had been cold, distant, reserved. She had never learned to love him, and now it was as if she had heard of the illness of a stranger, only that a stranger could not have treated her so harshly as he had treated her that evening. But she tried to forget this now.

In the apartment of the patient, the attendants still watched for some sign of returning life to animate the cold form before them. And at last, when the dawn was just beginning to steal up the eastern heavens, it came. Sir Edward Ashby was safe. But that was all. The tidings were sent out to those waiting of the household. But he was very weak, and it was only by the slowest degrees that full consciousness was restored to him. For a long time he was powerless to move or speak.

But he was safe. It was enough for Victor Briancourt and Morley. They were at ease once more. The medical attendant, after satisfying himself concerning his patient, and giving manifold directions concerning him, took his departure, promising to call again in the course of the morning.

And so the son rose brightly over Ashby Place, and the day shone fair and beautiful, but softly fell its beams into that quiet chamber through the draped casements. And slowly Sir Edward Ashby's faculties returned to him. He lay there, gradually and painfully collecting his perceptions and his recollections; and the two—the father and son—watched for him to speak. But it was a long time ere he did so. Once or twice his glance was turned to their faces, rested there a moment, and was withdrawn, to remain fixed for a longer time upon some other object, with an expression of one endeavoring to realize his own situation, and seeking to recall things past.

By-and-by a sudden flash lighted up his eyes; a strong and fearful shudder ran through his frame. He closed his eyes with a quick and agonized contraction of the brow, a spasmodic convulsion of the features. Victor Briancourt touched his son's arm warningly, and bent forward. Suddenly Sir Edward re-opened his eyes, and looked up to meet the gaze of his friend.

"Victor," he said, in a sharp whisper,—"Victor, that dagger—where is it?"

A faint flush rose to Mr. Briancourt's forehead. He thought the sick man insane. He cast a quick, meaning glance towards his son; then answered soothingly to Sir Edward:

"My dear Ashby, you must be perfectly quiet. Presently I will tell you everything you wish to know."

"No, no!" uttered the baronet, shuddering again; "I must know now—this instant. Victor—Morley," and he turned his gaze from one to the other of them, "tell me—ah! but I forgot: you were not there; you did not see it. But it must be there now. Go, get it and hide it—quick!"

Morley Briancourt looked at his father.

"He is not wandering," he said; "he knows us, you see. What, then—"

"Wandering?" echoed Sir Edward, catching the word,—"wandering? No! I am as sane as you, Morley Briancourt. Don't think me mad. But that—the dagger!" and he glanced with shivering fear from the son to the father,—"the dagger! How did it come? Victor, tell me. And the blood on my hand; you have washed it off—have you not? you did not let it be seen, eh?"

"Ashby, you have been dreaming, that is all. Try to forget the dream, and think of something pleasant," said Victor Briancourt.

"Victor," uttered the baronet, struggling suddenly to rise, and resting, with trembling frame, upon his arm, while he spoke with tremulous energy, "I tell you it was no dream! I stood there in the library, and that dagger fell to the floor before me! That was human blood that fell on my hand—the blood of—" He paused and writhed in agony. "O, Victor," he exclaimed, "I tell you again it was no dream! It was too horrible—too real! I saw that dagger as plainly as I see you now. I felt that warm blood fall upon my hand. I shrieked aloud. O, it could not have been a dream!"

He sank back, and covered his face with his hands, quivering in every limb with excitement. Mr. Briancourt grew pale; he looked alarmed at Sir Edward's agitation, yet perplexed by his earnest and impressive words. He thought rapidly a moment; then turned to Morley, saying, in a low voice: "I see it all now. He was dwelling on dangerous subjects, last evening. He nursed his own morbid fancies until he gave way to their power in insensibility. They must indeed have been awful, for him to retain their impression still."

Then addressing the still shuddering baronet once more, he endeavored to persuade him of the extravagance of his belief in the reality of what had been only fancy. He declared to him that nothing like a dagger had been visible on their reaching him—that there had been not the shadow of a stain upon his hands. Morley corroborated his father's evidence in the strongest terms of assurance; and their combined assertions at length quieted Sir Edward, and induced him to believe that the cause of his illness was really nothing more than his own fancies. And finally the baronet yielded.

A nervous shock, such as he had endured, would have been productive, in the case of many another man, of the most alarming results. In that of Sir Edward, it happened that, beyond its first effects, he experienced from it no serious consequences. He continued very weak during the day, but at evening he came forth from his chamber, leaning on the arm of Mr. Briancourt. His countenance was extremely pale, but possessed, in a great degree, its usual cold, unmoved expression, and he conversed with his guests with his old self-possession. Striving to forget the events of the preceding night, he endeavored to regard them only as a vision of his own distorted fancy, which Victor Briancourt and his son also believed them to have been; and horrible as they had been, he felt the necessity of banishing them, and not allowing them to deter him from giving his attention to affairs which at present demanded it.

These affairs were connected with the rebellion of Eleanor. Sir Edward did not leave his room until after the usual dinner hour, and then he found Miss Ashby seated at her embroidery in the drawing-room; for she had not, according to his orders, confined herself to her own apartment that day. He scarcely replied to her respectful inquiry for his health; but with chilling harshness, intimated to her that obedience to his commands would not be unbecoming in her, and ordered her instantly to retire to her room, and remain there until he recalled her.

Eleanor's cheek flushed for a moment, and her spirit rose in defiance of this unwarranted authority; but she would not willingly thwart him, and rouse him into an excitement that might prove dangerous to him, ill as he had been. Therefore, she retired in silence; but it was with a heart throbbing with sorrow and indignation.

As it happened, Lucy Elmore was passing the drawing-room door at the moment; and sympathy and anger were stamped upon her countenance, as she heard Sir Edward's harsh orders, and witnessed the voluntary obedience of her mistress. She paused on the great staircase till Miss Ashby reached her, and then said, earnestly:

"Dear Miss Eleanor, how can you submit so quietly? Is it wicked in him?"

"Hush—hush, dear Lucy," said Eleanor, kindly, endeavoring to repress her own tumultuous feelings; "you must remember he is my uncle."

"I do remember it," answered Lucy, humbly,—"I do remember it. But for all that," and the tears rushed down her cheeks, "I can't forget how overhearing he is. I declare, if you were not here, nothing should tempt me to stay here another hour. I wish you would go away, Miss Eleanor, and take me with you."

"O, Lucy, I wish I could!" uttered Miss Ashby, passionately, the tears springing to her own eyes.

At that moment, as they reached the stairhead, Lucy touched Miss Ashby's arm quickly, with a sudden start, as if something had alarmed her; but motioning for silence, passed hastily along the hall to Eleanor's chamber.

"Lucy, what was it—what startled you?" asked Miss Ashby, in a tone of surprise, as they stood within the apartment, and the door was closed behind them.

"O, did you not see, Miss Eleanor?" uttered the girl, eagerly. "It was Mr. Morley Briancourt. He heard what we were saying. Didn't you see him gliding so silently into that niche on the landing till we passed? I dare say he is going down stairs this moment."

Quick as a flash, Eleanor threw open the door. Yes—there he was, gliding stealthily down the hall stairs. He had heard the remarks of the two, as they came up stairs, while he was passing along the hall, and had concealed himself, as Lucy saw, not only that they might not believe themselves overheard, but also for the mean purpose of overhearing the continuance of their conversation.

"Aha!" he said to himself, as he stole out from his concealment, and down to the library, without dreaming that he had been seen, "so my pretty bird would escape—would she? Well, we must clip her wings—we must clip her wings! And that pretty little maid must be disposed of forthwith, or we shall have trouble. Sir Edward shall know of this." And he entered the library. But nobody was there, and he proceeded to the drawing-room, where a conference ensued between the three, lasting a long time.

"So he heard, did he?" said Eleanor Ashby, indignantly. "Well, never mind, Lucy—never mind. Let them know it. For O I do wish I were safe hence!"

She gave way to the intensity of her feelings in tears; and Lucy, poor girl, wept with her; for she had been Eleanor's own foster sister, and Eleanor's troubles, which had never been concealed from her, were as her own.

It was late when Eleanor retired; and not until her mistress was prepared for repose, would the faithful Lucy betake herself to her own couch in the ante-room. Then tears were on the cheeks of both.

It was late the next morning when Miss Ashby awoke; for notwithstanding her troubles, she had slept the sound and peaceful slumber of youth. Lucy was not yet awake, but she started from sleep at the sound of her mistress's voice, and dressing with alacrity, proceeded to attend to Miss Ashby's toilet.

Eleanor was unusually thoughtful. During the whole time she was engaged in dressing, she was debating the question of obedience or disobedience to her uncle. "Shall I keep my room, as he bids me do?" she said. And then she asked herself: "What right has he to imprison me? Shall I yield?"

"Dear Miss Eleanor," said Lucy, "you do not mean to stay in here all day, do you? I had forgotten till this instant about what Sir Edward said last night. I slept so soundly that it all went out of my head. But you did not forget it, I dare say?"

"No indeed, Lucy," said Eleanor, sadly,—"no indeed. But I am sure I do not know what to do."

"O, I would go out—I am sure I would go out!" replied Lucy, earnestly. "I think you ought to go, indeed, dear Miss Eleanor; for if you stay in until he bids you go, I am afraid you will not go soon, and be deprived of exercise in the open air would soon make you ill, for you are out so much generally."

She turned, as she ceased speaking, to leave the room on an errand for her mistress; but what was her astonishment to find that she could not open the door, although she had withdrawn the bolt!

"Let me try, Lucy—let me try," said Miss Ashby, coming forward. "It is difficult to unlodge, sometimes. I think I can open it."

But the first effort convinced her of her inability to do so, for the door was locked on the outside. This was clipping the bird's wings, indeed. Indignation and astonishment were depicted on Eleanor's face.

"A prisoner in my own apartment!" she exclaimed. "Has it come to this? Why, then, indeed, I will be free!"

"O, there is Harry Longworth!" said Lucy, looking from the window. "Shall I speak to him, dear Miss Eleanor?"

"Yes. Tell him to come up. He can undo the outside bolt, Lucy," answered Miss Ashby.

There was no one else in sight. Harry Longworth heard Lucy's call, and coming below the easement, heard with indignation that Miss Eleanor and she herself were both fastened in their room. Instantly he ran into the house.

"Now, Miss Eleanor," said Lucy, joyfully,—"now we shall get out!"

But the captives were doomed to disappointment. Scarcely had Harry Longworth reached the corridor leading through the wing where Miss Ashby's apartments were, when he suddenly found Sir Edward Ashby standing by his side. And Eleanor and her maid, from their new-made prison, heard him say, "Go down stairs, sir, and henceforth meddle not with my affairs. Go!"

Harry hesitated a moment, his stout young frame thrilling with indignation. Then he turned away, saying to himself, "I go, my master, but I shall come again at a better time."

In five minutes more, Sir Edward's valet was stationed at the door, to guard it, and Will Humphries set to watch in another place. Then Sir Edward went down stairs.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

TURKISH PEOPLE.

I have frequently noticed Turkish boys as beautiful as Ashtanax. Ottoman children of both sexes are indeed remarkable for the sweetness and dignity of their behaviour. The latter arises from being brought up in the harem. The father takes no part or apparent interest in their education, and the young mind is left entirely to the sweet influences of maternal love, which is usually strong in Oriental society, from the fact that female life is confined to a narrow and exclusive sphere. Filial and maternal affection, retained throughout life and touchingly manifested on all occasions, is the result of this training. From the strong admixture of Circassian blood, and to a limited extent that of the Greeks, the Turkish is the most perfect type of the human race. Freedom from excitement, political or moral, exemption from the corroding cares of business, and that happy alliance of movement and repose in the open air which the Turk so much loves, conduce to the development of manly beauty, and are highly favorable to longevity. The Moslems, among whom I move, are silent and staturesque, men of the graceful beard, and flowing robe of the Orientals, combine the dignified bearing of an ancient Athenian with the majestic gravity of a senator of Rome. The confined and fruitful life of the harem is, on the contrary, destructive to female charms. Married at the age of twelve or fifteen years, Turkish ladies become ugly at twenty-five, unendurable at forty. Their mode of dress also seems to render the beautiful less beautiful, the uncomely more uncomely. Their ungainly way of sitting, cross-armed and cross-legged on the bosom of mother earth, after the manner of their lords, gives them distorted spinal columns, round shoulders, while the universal habit of smoking contributes to convert the rich tints of Circassian beauty into the shallow wrinkles of premature age.—Correspondent of the New York Herald.

TUNNELS.

The United States have 67 tunnels on canals and railways, the longest of which is about one mile.—England has 48 canal tunnels of an aggregate length of 40 miles; the largest being over three miles, on the Huddersfield Canal. She has also 79 railway tunnels, 49 of which amount to 33 miles, the longest being three miles.—The largest tunnel of which I can find a record is one in the district of Schemnitz, in Hungary. Its length is, variously stated at from 10 1-2 to 11 1-2 miles. It is used to drain an extensive series of mines, and also for the transportation of ore on railway cars.—In France, there are 56 tunnels, on railways, eight on canals, 36 of which are an aggregate length of 54 1-4 miles. The largest of small size is 7 1-4 miles, and that of large dimensions 3 1-2 miles. The Rouen and Havre road has eight tunnels; Paris and Lyons also eight.—On the German railways are ten tunnels. The great "Gallerie d'écoulement" of the Clusath mines, through the Harz Mountains, is 6 1-2 miles long. It was commenced in 1777, and completed in 1800 (twenty-three years), and cost a little more than $350,000. Some authorities state this tunnel to be 7 1-2 miles long.—In Sardinia, there is a tunnel two miles long, through Mount Giovi, on the Genoa and Turin railway. On this road, in 25 miles through the Apennines, are nine tunnels.—In Mexico, there is a tunnel 21,659 feet in length, named Nochistongo, constructed at Lake Tumpango, in Mexico, to drain the lakes in the valley.—Capt. G. B. McClellan, Corps Engineers, U. S.

A "ROMANCE OF THE PEERAGE."

By the death of the Duke of Norfolk, Sir Edmund Lyons becomes father of the present premier duchess of England. The "romance of the peerage" has few prettier chapters than this. The young Earl of Arundel and Surrey was travelling in Greece, when he was attacked by fever, and his life was despaired of. He was removed to the house of the British minister, Sir Edmund Lyons, at Athens, where a "ministering angel," in the person of Sir Edmund's fair daughter, became his nurse, and, by her devoted attentions, was believed to have saved the life of the young heir of the oldest ducal house in England, at the hazard of her own. The gratitude of the young earl to his fair preserver took the usual shape; but, as soon as Sir Edmund Lyons found reason to suspect what was going on, he wrote to the earl's father, informing him of his son's convalescence, and begging that he might be removed, since he knew that his daughter had no pretensions to mate with such illustrious lineage. Sir Edmund's letter displayed so much honorable feeling, and the young man's attachment seemed so insurmountable, that the consent of the parents was obtained. They were married, and "they lived happily ever after," as the story books say.—Liverpool Mail.

COMMERCE.

What has commerce done for the world, that its history should be explored, its philosophy illustrated, its claim advanced among the influences which impel civilization? It has enabled man to avail himself of the peculiarities of climate or position, to make that division of labor which tends to equalize society, to distribute the productions of earth, and to teach the benefit of kindly dependence. It unites distant branches of the human family, cultivates the relation between them, encourages an interest in each other, and promotes that brotherly feeling which is the strongest guaranty of permanent friendship. People differing in creed, in language, in dress, in customs, are brought in contact, to find how much there is universal to them all, and to improve their condition by supplying the wants of one from the abundance of the other. The friendly intercourse created by commerce is slowly but surely revolutionizing the earth. There was a time when man met only on the field of battle, and there was but one name for stranger and enemy. Now, wherever a ship can float, the various emblems of sovereignty intermingle in harmony, and the sons of commerce, the wide world through, in consulting their own interests, advance the cause of humanity and peace.—G. R. Russell.

MOUNTAINS.

Mountains are to the rest of the earth what muscular action is to the body of man. The muscles and tendons of its anatomy are, in the mountains, brought out with force and convulsive energy, full of expression, passion and strength; the plains and lower hills are the repose and the effortless motion of the frame when the muscles lie dormant and concealed beneath its lines of beauty, yet ruling those lines in their every undulation. This, then, is the first grand principle of the truth of the earth. The spirit of the hills is action—that of the lowlands repose; and between these there is to be found every variety of motion and rest, from the inactive plain, sleeping like the firmament, with cities for stars, to the fiery peaks, which with heaving bosoms and exulting limbs—with the clouds drifting like hair from their bright foreheads—lift up their Titan hands to heaven, saying, "I live forever!"—Ruskin.

THE RABBIT ON THE WALL.

This is one of the very best and most popular pictures of the Scotch Wilkie. The scene lies in the interior of a farmer's cottage, which, though plainly furnished, exhibits every attribute of comfort. There is the old-fashioned chimney-place and smoke-jack, the high plate rack and the substantial dresser. While one of the girls is holding a candle, the good man, by a simple combination of his fingers, projects the shadow of a rabbit on the wall so perfectly that the baby in the arms of the mother is dancing with delight as she recognizes the imitation. Who has not been a spectator of such domestic exhibitions which have cost nothing but good will and good humor? who has not been by turns actor and spectator? It is by means of such sports that the hearth has a charm for infancy; that it becomes the theatre for pleasures and affections; that it creates charming memories destined to adorn, like so many graceful pictures, the family interior, and render it forever dear to us. Such amusements are, moreover, a revelation of habit; they testify the solicitude of the father for his children, the need he has of their joy, his aptitude to make himself small to approach their size, his complaisance to retrace the path of life to begin to feel again with them. It is the proof of an ingenuous and complaisant affection, as all sincere affections are. The stooping of the man to the child has something touching in it. We love this subjection of strength to weakness, this humility of him who knows much in the presence of him who knows nothing. "I always distrust the man," says Rousseau, "who loves neither children nor flowers." It is, in fact, by sympathy with these graceful inferiors that one betrays his instincts. The anecdote of Henry IV. going on all fours to amuse his children at the moment an ambassador was introduced, and asking leave to finish the tour of the room, has proved more in favor of his goodness of heart than twenty political acts justly praised by history. The pleasures offered by the world are often transitory—sometimes fatal, almost always enervating; those of the family, on the contrary, strengthen and renew themselves, for we do not borrow them from others, but from ourselves; their source is not in painful efforts, but in our character, which they serve to develop.

THE SHADOW ON THE WALL.

RETURN FROM THE BEACH.

The sun has sunk in the west over the far horizon, leaving a few light clouds to drift over the concave arch of heaven; the cool air of evening wafts those cool and invigorating odors ever rising from the deep; the ebbing tide has left a broad expanse of sea shore, level and smooth as a ball-room floor, except that here and there are drifts of seaweed, intermingled with curious aquatic shells, and now and then a crustaceous animal not swept away by the retreating tide. Here and there, too, the channelled rocks break the monotony of the sea beach. In front, a fisherman's wife who has just been down to the fishing-boat, is pacing her way home, barefooted, with her youngest child upon her back; beside her an elder girl is bearing home a portion of the sealy spoils. The attention of the little group is attracted to the action of a spangle who has made a point at a crab, without appearing particularly anxious to attack an animal which is amply provided with the means of self-defence. In the distance the clumsy and about-bait fishing boat is discharging its freight, partly into a horse cart, and partly into the fisherwoman's baskets. A toilsome life indeed is that led by the fishermen and their families. Exposed to all weathers and to all vicissitudes, liable at any moment to wreck, their success and their remuneration are precarious. But to the men there is the charm of adventure in the life they lead. If they are exposed to danger, there is the excitement of meeting and overcoming it by skill and resolution. The mariner finds the same sort of fascination in the management of his bark that the Arab does in the guidance of his trained charger, and many of them, we are convinced, would find less real enjoyment in a quiet life on shore than in the amphibious career to which destiny has assigned them. Then the charms of home seem doubly bright from a temporary deprivation of them; the welcome is warmer in proportion to the dangers that preceded it. But with the women the case is different. Their hearts are tried by these repeated absences of those they love—husbands, sons, brothers and lovers. They feel the constant pressure and imminence of danger without any of the excitement called forth to meet it, and their nights oft are those of anxious watching.

RETURNING FROM THE BEACH.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

SPEAK GENTLY.

BY MRS. J. C. F.

Forbear! for one word more may crush
The weary, aching heart;
You know not what has been the cost
To bear its bitter part.
Perhaps the world has darkly frowned,
And marred hope's blooming flower;
Then kindly speak one gentle word,
'Twill have a magic power.

Perhaps no ray of love has fallen,
To light her darkened way;
No soothing word to bring her back,
When she was wont to stray.
As dewdrops to the drooping flower
Restore its bloom again,
So gentle words will soon relieve
The heart of half its pain.

If thine has been a happy lot,
No clouds thy life o'ercast,
Chide not the hapless, erring one,
Whose days of joy are past;
With smiles unite the links of love,
That rudely have been riven,
And be the first to guide him to
The path that leads to heaven.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE EAST-INDIAMAN.

BY GIDDINGS H. BALLOU.

"MR. DALE, you remember that you promised, sometime, to tell me your own story."

"Yes, Johnson; and as all seems quiet, and you have Williams on the lookout, I will give it to you before I go below. It is a short story, and soon told. My father, when yet a young man, was a merchant of good property in Boston, and married a beautiful girl of poor family, to whom he had been engaged for several years. In this, he was thought not to have acted wisely, as he might easily have formed a wealthy and influential alliance. But at all events, he did rightly in keeping his troth, and in his life he received the reward of his truth, for he never knew unhappiness till, in an evil hour, his chief clerk, in whom he had placed the utmost confidence, was carried away by temptation, and decamped with a large amount of his employer's money. The loss coming at a moment of great commercial depression, proved the pecuniary ruin of my father. He bore up well against misfortune, for in the love of my mother and the esteem of his friends (among whom were numbered his many creditors), he found all the consolation which this world could give. Nevertheless, something was to be done for the support of his little family, and impatient of dallying with necessity, he accepted a supercargo's berth on board an African trader; not a slaver, or in any way connected with that trade—for he would have abhorred the very idea. When the ship returned, it brought the news of his death on the Guinea coast. My mother did not long survive. My brother and myself found for a few months a second home. But we were then cast adrift once more, and when I was fifteen, made our first, and poor Bob's only voyage at sea. My brother is dead, and that same sea has long been to me both father and mother.

"So there you have the whole of it, my friend; and now I must leave you, and get a bit of sleep. I need not tell an old sailor like yourself, the need of a sharp eye and a ready hand."

And now the Fire-fly, guarded only by Johnson, and Williams the midshipman, sped through the silent night, bearing its freight of desperate and blood-stained prisoners. The Fire-fly, a fast sailing schooner somewhat noted in the slave trade, had been captured two days previous, by the brig Richmond, the second lieutenant of which was placed in command of the prize. The crew afforded him was glaringly insufficient; and out of his three or four companions, only one could be depended on for any beyond mere straight forward courage. This one was our friend Johnson; a hardy seaman, who, several years the senior of Dale, had been shipmate with the latter since the commencement of his naval career.

Hours passed on. The little lamp swung slowly from side to side, and its dim light scarce illumined the murky atmosphere of the Fire-fly's cabin. There were but four berths in the cramped apartment, and in one of these lay the anxious and watch-worn master of the craft. Presently a tall form crept noiselessly down the companion-way and approached the sleeper.

"Mr. Dale!"

It was in the lowest whisper, yet the lieutenant instantly waked.

"Well, Johnson?"

"Sorry to disturb you, sir; but s'pose I must tell you that some of those villains on board seem a little uneasy like. 'Feard there's mischief brewing, sir."

With a sigh for the luxury of sleep denied, Dale stood once more on the cabin floor. He had turned in without removing a single garment, and his first motion was to take a brace of pistols from the breast of his jacket.

"Look out for the deck, Johnson," he said; "I will wake Peters. Tell Williams to fire on the first who shows his head out of the fore-castle without permission. If you want me, strike twice on deck."

Johnson nodded obedience, and disappeared on deck. The master approached the sole remaining slumberer and shook him lightly by the arm.

"Come, Juanita!" exclaimed the dreamer, pettishly—"none of your piaching, or—"

"Here, you dead-head!" whispered the lieutenant, "you are in Fayal, are you? You'll find your mistake, if you are not out of this quickly! Curse the frigate! Must they give me a crew of four to manage these devils, and but one man out of the whole?"

Half a dozen loaded muskets stood in readiness by the gangway, and the middle, roused up by main force, stood on the steps just below Lieutenant Dale, who, near their head, remained watching the aspect of matters on deck. For a moment or two all was perfectly quiet then, and the young commander had almost concluded the warning of Johnson to be a premature one, when he caught the sound of a single voice at the fore-hatch. It was answered gruffly by the middle, Williams, retorting the commands of his master. Dale hearkened for a moment, but all was still. The lieutenant turned to his attendant.

"Peters," said he, "there's work before us. If I had caught but the wind of an oath, I should have been content. But as it is—hand me one of those muskets and bring the rest to the main-hatch. Be lively now. The main-hatch for you."

At the sound of fire-arms forward, Dale was in the waist, and at scarcely more than a bound was by the side of Johnson and Williams, who, having got the hatch hauled over, were pressing it down to its fastenings, although their efforts were hardly adequate against the upheaving of the mass below. It was secured, however, and Dale retired to the quarter deck, bidding Peters, as he passed, to "haul tant on his eyelids," if he desired to fall in with Juanita once more. A glance into the binnacle and a look aloft.

"Wind son'-west and a half-breeze: well, it might be worse," soliloquized the youthful commander; "two or three days will bring us well up to Cape Vincent, and then good-by to all our troubles."

A stifled noise below him for a second transfixed him to the spot. With forefinger mechanically uplifted, he listened for the repetition of the sound. It came once more—a dim, dull grating. "Good heaven!" was the instant thought, "they are sawing through the bulkhead into the cabin!"

He knew that not a moment was to be lost, and accordingly, with quick but noiseless foot, lowered himself down the companion way. Midway down the steps—unlucky chance—lay some object unseen in the dim light of the cabin, and the foot of Dale pressing thereon, lost its hold. The crash with which he brought himself up, as once alarmed the foe. With a loud shout, the quick blows of an axe told heavily on the maimed wood, and hardly had the lieutenant time to deliver his fire, before, leaping through the disjointed partition, a dozen men threw themselves upon him. In an instant he was down. Then a sturdy voice rang through the smoky tumult, and Johnson was at his side. Cutting right and left, thrusting and crowding, the hardy tar bravely seconded the efforts of his superior, and three of their opponents already lay beneath their feet—then a sudden sickness blinded Dale, and he knew no more, till sustained by his sturdy mate, he found himself leaning against the lee bulwarks. A crowd of ruffians encompassed him, and in the darkness he was scarce able to mark the conflicting passions which seemed to sway the conquerors.

"Toss them over!" cried a deep, hoarse voice. "Pietro and Varnum are food for sharks, and why not these flash gentry? Over with 'em then!"

"Fall back, men—fall back!" replied a brawny, dark-skinned man, who now pushed forward in front of the angry group. "No violence, no violence! softly and coolly! Besides, if you will have man for man, why even help the sea-lawyers to yonder two gentlemen who are lying asleep on the main-hatch."

At a sign from their leader, two or three fellows dragged the dead bodies of the two midshipmen to the side of the vessel. Dale's blood ran cold at the sight of their mangled and gory forms.

"You see, your honor," continued the speaker, addressing Dale, with an insulting sneer, "these gentlemen have got very sound asleep in their watch. Don't you think a dip would learn 'em better manners for the future? His honor says ay—over with 'em, boys," he added, to his grinning comrades.

And the next instant the corpses of Peters and Williams plashed heavily in the water alongside. The boat was now ordered to be lowered, and the lieutenant and his companion were obliged to enter. The painter was about being cast off, when Dale ventured to inquire for provision and a boat compass.

"Excuse us, captain," replied the former speaker, "we are bound on a long cruise, and it would really be inconvenient to spare anything at this time. I would suggest that one of you provision the other. I have tried it myself in times past, and found it to work capitally! Anything further, your honor?"

"Cast off!"

"Holla! Qui va là?"

Johnson rubbed his eyes and raised himself in the boat; while the lieutenant still continued insensible from hunger and the weakness caused by his wounds. They were close aboard a large merchant ship, whose bulwarks were lined with gazers. An officer in half uniform, standing in the mizzen shrouds, repeated the hail.

"Holla! mes hommes, qu'etes vous?"

Johnson was just able to articulate through his parched lips:

"American."

"Pauvres hommes, pauvres hommes! oui—yes: Americain: vait mes braves, till I vill send to you un batteau."

More dead than alive, the famished men were borne on board the Josephine, and into her spacious cabin—one of the state rooms of which was appropriated to their use.

It was two or three days before Dale was suffered to leave his bed and mingle with the other occupants of the cabin. Among these, he found a young man (somewhat older than himself), who was returning from India, where he had been a partner in a wealthy house, with the purpose of establishing a connecting house in France. John Morland had been a schoolmate, though not a very congenial one, of Dale. However, Morland seemed glad to meet an old acquaintance, and undertook the task of making him au fait with his fellow-passengers. There was Monsieur de Bernis, returning from his travels. There were two saw-toothed, rather gentlemanly-looking men, who were attached to the great house of Antoine, Bartun & Brothers, of Marseilles. Last, but most important of all, Morland whispered that Monsieur Gnilaumo Moran, the heavily built man, with dark, bilious skin and heeling eyebrows, had been in former years governor of the island of Times, and was now returning to France with the reputation of immense wealth. He was accompanied by his daughter, a girl of sixteen.

All this seemed to Dale rather an uninteresting inventory. But when, at the table, he met Adele Moran, one of the most beautiful creatures who ever grew up in the sunny luxuriance of the tropics, he was quickly forced to alter his opinion. Dale was impressed with her beauty at first sight, and the charms of her wit and sensibility ere long completed his enchantment.

The Josephine had hitherto enjoyed a prosperous voyage. But on the third day of his being about, Dale, going on deck, perceived the approaching change. The light sails were already in, and the master was looking to leeward with an anxious eye. Following the direction of his gaze, Dale saw the cause of this preparation. Well up from the horizon, but far astern and out of the line of their course, he marked a nucleus of vapor, hardly to be distinguished by a landsman even when his eye was directed full upon it. But Dale well understood the tempest which was coming on. The waves rose and fell with a tremulous motion. The vaporous cloud increased in size and peculiarity of tint, and as the quickly uttered orders of the master were obeyed in unthoughted silence, the hearts of all seemed depressed by the thick atmosphere.

Scarcely had all been made secure, when the sea lifted in fiery foam, and then the whirlwind swept over the watery and snow-white level. The Josephine careened to her rail. The fore-to-gallant-mast snapped like a pipe-stem. The next instant, as a racer gathering every limb for the course, she rose and with a mad bound leaped on her way. For half an hour Dale buffeted the storm—then he pushed back the slide and entered the companion-way. Hardly had his foot left the deck when the ship lurched; a single cry—the rush of water—and then a sharp, sudden pause. As quickly as he could, Dale got on deck and ran to the wheel. The decks were full of water—no one on the quarter. With all his strength at the wheel, Dale succeeded in getting it a star-board, singing out at the top of his voice:

"Haul aft the lee fore-braces! Haul for your lives, men!"

The order was obeyed. There was a moment of doubt. Then the groaning ship gradually came in command, and swept forward before the wind.

At length, however, the tempest spent its fury. As soon as it had sufficiently abated, Dale turned his attention to the state of the vessel. The Josephine had lost her fore-to-gallant mast and a few booms. No other damage had been done, for the ship was thoroughly built and almost new; and as soon as the water had been pumped out, was proved perfectly sound. And now that the most imminent peril had passed, Dale saw that his authority was no longer to be allowed—for presently, on giving some new direction, the second mate came aft.

"Ah, my fine sir," he said, with an insolent air, "perhaps you think yourself really the master. But I'll have you to know it is my turn, now that Captain Victor and his mate are gone."

"It's a wonder you did not ask for the post before," said Dale, with a contemptuous glance at the speaker. "However, I am perfectly willing to resign my honors even now."

A week had passed of calms and head winds; things which at any other time would have been quite unacceptable, but which were now even agreeable to Dale. As long as he could breathe the same air with the beautiful East Indian, appropriating now and then a smile or a kind word, the young lieutenant seemed quite reckless of wind and weather. As for the rest, the large part which he had held in the preservation of the ship, established him in the favor of his companions. Even the black-browed M. Moran relaxed from the cold demeanor he had hitherto maintained. For some reason, however, the lukewarm friendship which had been maintained between Dale and Morland, had given place to growing constraint and dislike on both sides.

The sun had gone down. The cool even set in, and the lieutenant came on deck to enjoy the night air. He was leaning against the round house, listlessly gazing out upon the sea, when the rustle of a dress caught his ear.

"Ah, Mademoiselle Moran, is it you?"

"Yes, monsieur; it is so pleasant that I cannot be confined below. How soft and refreshing is the air!"

"Yes, mademoiselle! If all sea-going were like this, a sailor's life would be pastime indeed."

Adele made no rejoinder, but after a short pause, turned with a timid and embarrassed air to the young lieutenant.

"Do you know, my friend, that I have been impressed—I know that I am very foolish to give way to such feelings—but I have felt that some great danger impended over us. I cannot help it—yet I am not superstitious; neither am I often given to presentiments. They say it is all folly, cowardice, they would say, I suppose. But you sailors; you are brave, used to hardship and danger; and yet you sometimes have such feelings, do you not?"

"Yes, mademoiselle; yes. The thing often happens; the brave are oftentimes touched by the shadow of coming evil. I have seen those who never had met danger but with merriment, grow pale with incomprehensible foreboding. But forgive me, mademoiselle, I warn you; you will readily perceive that these things are not to be depended upon. Nor should I have spoken so gravely, had not your words called up a sad event in my own life."

"Ah, monsieur; and that?"

"The death of my brother."

"At sea, monsieur?"

"Yes, mademoiselle. And since I have said so much, I will say more. We were orphans—cast on the world with none to rely on save Providence and ourselves. But our parents had bestowed on us a good education and an honest example, and these were no small matters. Well, not long after they died, we shipped on board a Sicily-bound ship. Our fellows were not hard-hearted, but they were rough and rude, and we were all the world to each other. On our voyage back, my brother Robert, who had become quite a sailor, attracted the admiration of all by his agility and cheerful demeanor; and all went well till one night when I found him sitting on his chest, with the signs of sadness visible in his countenance. I asked the cause of his dejection."

"I hardly know myself," he replied. "There's something weighing on me that I cannot get rid of. Let us shake hands, Charley. You have always been a good brother to me, and if anything should happen, don't forget poor Robert."

"For an instant his manner overcame me; but recovering myself, I attempted to rally him out of his low spirits, but without success, however. As we belonged to separate watches, I was soon called from his side. During the night a gale sprang up. Toward morn, Robert, with five others, was on the foreyard, when a sudden squall struck the ship and three of the number were lost overboard. My brother was among them, and I never saw him more."

"Ah, quelle pitié!" exclaimed Adele, as Dale finished his narration; then, looking at her companion, with a charming sympathy depicted in her countenance, she added: "And I also have neither brother nor sister. Ah, if I had only a brother like yourself, what joy it would be—and then—"

Their eyes met, and Adele, as if with some sudden thought, flushed deeply—her eyes fell.

"And then?"

Adele turned pale and averted her head. Dale felt a strange throbbing of the heart, and hardly conscious of what he did, he pressed the taper hand of Adele within his own.

"Adele! I love you! Not indeed with a brother's love, but with a love far stronger and more enduring. Will you pardon me? Nay, will you—can you return it in any degree?"

The bosom of the maiden swelled with a suppressed sigh. She raised her eyes to meet the glance of her companion. Then quickly withdrawing them, with a sudden cry she snatched her hand from his grasp. Dale followed the direction of her gaze, and saw Morland standing a short distance off, his features distorted with cowardly malice. Meeting the menacing look of the young officer, the intruder retreated to the companion way. Assured of his departure, Adele trembled and fell to weeping, while Dale, supporting her with his arm, gently reproved her agitation. Then it was that he learned, to his surprise and dismay, that Morland, who had in the course of business acquired great wealth, some months since had made suit for, and received the promise of her hand from her father; this, too, in spite of her unconcealed dislike, and the rebuffs which his attentions had received from herself. The utmost that her remonstrances could effect, was the present postponement of the marriage, which she was assured was irrevocably determined.

"You know not the bitter antipathy I have against him," continued Adele, with a passionate earnestness. "But it is said—and I know but too well, what will be the end of my happiness. So cowardly in spirit too, as he is. So smooth-tongued in your presence, did you but know with what slanders he assails you behind your back!"

"Silence!" exclaimed a deep voice.

It was M. Moran, who, darkly frowning, drew his daughter's arm within his own.

"As for you," said he, addressing Dale, "I have only to remark that the less frequently you intrude your companionship on myself or my daughter, the more agreeable to me will be your conduct."

Marking the sudden glance of entreaty which Adele threw upon him, Dale refrained from a reply. M. Moran was evidently disappointed—for, bending his thick brows over his eyes, he shot a fiery look at the young man and again addressed him:

"Your effrontery is but of a piece with the rest of your character. Do not deceive yourself into the belief that I cannot read that character truly."

Our young lieutenant had need of his utmost self-control, so insulting was the tone in which these words were conveyed. So steady and concentrated was the gaze with which he returned the overbearing regard of M. Moran, that the latter involuntarily yielded; and biting his lip in anger, retired with his daughter on his arm.

"So," thought Dale, "the enemy has been at work. My friend Morland, finding me his antagonist in love, has set himself at his school boy tricks once more. It is by his aid that M. Moran has been enabled to read my character so truly. Ah, I must have a care; for meanness and cunning are at all times dangerous foes."

The clear, bright star-light illuminating the waters, soothed the tumult of his thoughts, and disposed him to dreamy reveries.

But from this forgetfulness he was aroused by the distant gleam of canvas. Sprung at once into the mizen rigging he was able to distinguish, about four miles off, perhaps, and a little forward of the starboard beam, a felucca which appeared to be ranging down upon them. Still further north, and apparently more distant, was presently seen another. Dale watched their motions with intense interest, and then silently swung himself on deck. As his foot touched the planks, he was accosted by the second mate:

"What do you make them?"

"Pirates!" said the lieutenant, looking full in the face of his interrogator. "It might puzzle you to understand fully the signs by which I judge—but I am as well assured of their character as if they were already aboard of us."

The man turned pale, and nervously inquired what was to be done.

"We must fight them," said Dale. "But in the meantime we must put about and make a run, in order to gain time and to separate the enemy as far as possible!"

"But is there no chance for escape?" exclaimed the terrified man, already completely cowed by the approach of danger.

"None. Knowing the speed of these vessels, I can tell you that, with no more wind than we now have, we could as well out-sail our fates."

"We are lost then!" exclaimed his companion.

"Not so!" replied Dale, in a cheerful voice, although his heart chilled at the thought of Adele and the peril to which she would soon be exposed. "Not so. I have been in worse straits than these, and got off safe, too. But pardon me, my friend—I suppose it is not your trade to manoeuvre a fighting ship. It is mine; and it is nothing against your own ability to say that I can doubtless carry on such business better than yourself. Are you willing to try my skill, and put the command, for the time being, in my hands?"

"With all my heart," replied the mate, whose swaggering air had now altogether vanished. "Get us out of this trouble, and I'll grant you master of your trade."

In obedience to her helm, the Josephine fell off from her former course. Instantly sail gathered on the strange craft, as they bore in chase. The case was now clear. The command was at once yielded into the hands of Dale, who issued his orders with a calm confidence which went far to inspire a like feeling in the dejected crew. As soon as all necessary dispositions had been made aloft and aloft, the crew and male passengers were mustered, the small arms delivered, and each assigned his proper place and duty. The ship's guns, four in number, were placed in the hands of their appointed crews, who, for a short time, were exercised in pantomimic warfare.

All this while the pursuers were rapidly approaching—and soon the craft first seen, a sharp-proved felucca, apparently completely manned and armed, was close aboard. The two larboard guns of the Josephine were ordered to be brought to windward; and as the ship luffed, a hail from the felucca passed ahead her fore-rigging. Instantly Dale called out loudly in French:

"Tack ship!"

At the same time the men had been directed to give no heed to the orders for tacking ship. But the pirate, overhearing the words, and perceiving the gunners with their lighted matches, luffed immediately in order to avoid a raking fire.

"Now, my lads!"

The broadside of the Josephine was poured directly over the bows of the corsair, raking him fore and aft with murderous execution. The ruse had fully succeeded. Taking advantage of the smoke and the confusion on board the Algerine, Dale ranged to windward, wore ship, and ran directly on his antagonist, striking her between the main and after masts, and cutting her almost completely in two. One short struggle with the drowning wretches and the victory was secure—when, in the very moment of triumph, Dale, pierced by a sudden wound, fell from the quarter rail and sank under the counter.

Nearly a quarter of an hour elapsed before his disappearance was generally known. On inquiry being made, Morland declared that he had last seen him at the taffrail, and that, struck by some falling spar, he had doubtless gone overboard. But an old tar who had been stationed near the main hatch, now said that he last saw Dale at the quarter rail, with one hand on the mizen shrouds, and that the only person near him at the moment was Morland himself. All eyes were immediately turned upon the latter, whose trembling limbs gave rise to instinctive suspicion. Some of the men, running to the rail, sought for signs of blood. But in the midst of this, a loud shout from the spanker boom:

"Huzza, men! here he is—bear a hand!"

A rush was made aft, while Morland, cowering in conscious guilt, slunk from among the crowd. As fortune would have it, the topping-lift had parted during the fight and fallen overboard. Coming in contact with Dale as he drifted past, the rope was grasped with instinctive tenacity, thus sustaining the officer, till, discovered at length, he was hauled on board amidst the shouts of the crew. As he was borne below, the low exclamation which came from his lips more surely indicated the wretched murderer; on whom the infuriated sailors threw themselves with the purpose of summary vengeance. Already the gripe of the holliards was round the neck of the stupefied wretch.

"Hold, my lads!" cried Johnson, interposing between the executioners and their intended victim. "Take care—you are too fast. At all events, spare his life, on condition of his making a clean breast and owning his misdeeds."

"Spare my life!" exclaimed the reviving culprit, "spare my life, and I will confess. Yes, I did strike him. He was my rival.

I hated him. You know I had cause," he added, addressing M. Moran, who, with folded arms, sternly regarded him.

"Wretched man!" replied the former. "Confess the truth, and the whole truth—or be silent."

"It is—it is the truth, I hated him; I slandered him; I struck him; but I—I had cause—"

"To the yard-arm with the liar!" cried a hoarse voice from among the crowd.

And the body of the culprit swung instantly in the air. M. Moran, with some of the less violent of the crew, sprang to the rescue and Morland was lowered on deck. But life was nearly extinct; as much through the effect of terror as from physical injury. In half an hour he breathed his last.

M. Moran's behaviour toward the wounded lieutenant was now entirely changed. Possessed of some medical skill, he devoted himself assiduously to the case of his patient, and in a day or two had the satisfaction of seeing him once more on his feet. Nor was the gentle service of woman altogether without effect toward this rapid recovery. On the morning of the third day, M. Moran, entering the state-room of Dale, found the latter already awake.

"My friend," said the East Indian, with an agitated countenance, "I have some questions to ask you. To be brief then. Your parents—are they living?"

"They are both dead."

"What was your father's employment?"

"He was a merchant, originally. Ruined in business by a dishonest clerk, he accepted the post of supercargo on board an African bound ship, and before his return home died from disease contracted on the voyage."

"It is as I have surmised," exclaimed M. Moran, bowing his head on his breast. "Look on me. I am that dishonest clerk. Do not spare your abhorrence. Nevertheless, I have not gone unpunished for my heavy sin. An embittered temper and a life of constant remorse have been my portion. Some years after my arrival in the Indies, I endeavored in some measure to repair the injury which I had done, and accordingly employed an agent to seek out my former master, and make restitution in my name. But the family had entirely disappeared. 'They were all dead,' my agent assured me, 'and there were no heirs to whom the desired payment could be made.' I then established a hospital with the gains of crime. I was loudly applauded for my benevolent deed—and these praises only added to the stings of conscience. As for yourself, I had become perfectly convinced that not one of my injured master's family was in existence. Furthermore, the slanders of the wretched Morland conspired to deceive me with regard to your parentage, as well as personal character. Be not implacable. Accept what it is in my power to do. I am rich—my wealth is yours. If there is aught more—"

"Ah, M. Moran," interrupted Dale, there is one gift, compared with which, your wealth is of little consequence. Adele—"

"Ah! Well—she will answer for herself."

And Adele did answer for herself. And six months after, the bells of the little church of Autun-la-Mer rang forth a merry peal while Lieutenant Dale led a blooming bride from the altar.

NOTICES OF NEW PUBLICATIONS.

SIBERT'S WORLD. A Tale by the Author of the "Sunbeam Stories." Boston and Cambridge: James Munroe & Co. 1856. 18mo. pp. 234.

This charming little story needs no other passport to a wide and warm welcome than the name of the authoress. Brilliant and pure, it is a literary gem that will sparkle by every fireside.

HEATHA. By FRÉDÉRIQUE BREMER. Translated by Mary Howitt. New York: G. P. Putnam & Co. 1856. 12mo. pp. 88.

A domestic story of Swedish life, written in the best vein of the author. It opens with a scene that reminds us of the old spirit that first awakened thousands of readers to a new source of literary delight when the first translation from Miss Bremer appeared in this country. We gather from the tale that woman has wrongs to be righted in Sweden, as well as in America. She has certainly found a vigorous champion. The book is feelingly dedicated to the memory of the late A. J. Downing. For sale by Sanborn, Carter & Bado.

THE PICKWICK PAPERS. By CHARLES DICKENS. 2 vols. 12mo. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson & Co.

Mr. Peterson deserves the thanks of the admirers of "Box"—and they embrace the whole reading public—for this elegant and convenient edition of the most delightful of his works. And we are glad to learn that the two volumes before us are only the pioneers of a series in the same form. The whole will embrace twenty-four volumes, and contain all that Dickens has written. Those before us contain no fewer than twenty-five illustrations, and the succeeding ones will be illustrated in the same liberal style. This edition cannot fail to command an extensive sale.

THE INTELLECTUAL MULTIPLIER. By JAMES ROBINSON. Boston: Robinson & Richardson. 1856.

This little work comprises concise and easy methods of multiplying numbers mentally, and is designed for the use of public and private schools. There is no one, however, who may not study it with advantage. The author is well known by his Arithmetics, which are in general use.

NEW MUSIC.—G. P. REED & Co., 13 Tremont Street, have just issued, "When I saw Sweet Nellie home," "My Sailor Brother's Grave," and "Mother's drad and gone." Very pretty original songs.

OLIVER HUNSON, 15 Washington Street, has just published "Speak Gently," by W. V. Wallace, "Take now this Ring," from Sonambula, the "Native Maidens," by Stephen Glover, and "Ho, for the Kansas Plains," by J. G. Clark.

HENRY TOLMAN, 219 Washington Street, has for sale the following new music published by William Hall & Son, New York: "I mourn for my old Cottage Home," "Allie by the Willow Tree," "Why that Tear?" "Star of my Home," "Do you really think he did it?" "The Vale of Rest," songs and ballads; also, the "Allie Polka" and "Etude Mazurka."

JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1856.

A clever story that clever writer, the authoress of "Oliver," "The Head of the Family," etc. Like her previous productions, it is a narrative of domestic life, indicating a good moral. For sale by Redding & Co.

CLARA; or, Safe Life in Europe. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1856. 12mo. pp. 533.

Haklander, the author of this deeply interesting story, is the Dickens of Germany, and this work is the highest manifestation of his dramatic power. He shows in it that all classes in Europe live in a certain state of servitude, and that society has letters as galling as physical chains. A great variety of characters are strongly delineated. For sale by Redding & Co.

WESTERN AFRICA. By REV. J. LEIGHTON WILSON. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1856. 12mo. pp. 527.

The author is a missionary, who has spent eighteen or twenty years in the country he describes so vividly and accurately. Besides his own experience, he has availed himself of other travellers' and explorers'. The book is liberally illustrated, and is a work of sterling value. For sale by Redding & Co.

RAINING THE VUL. By BALL FENNER. Boston: James French & Co. 1856. 12mo. pp. 288.

This book contains a variety of dramatic scenes sketched from the life in our police and other courts. It is embellished with portraits and biographical notices of prominent court and police officers.

SYRACUSE, NEW YORK.

The faithful set of illustrations which we present on this and the opposite pages, were drawn and engraved expressly for our paper. Mr. Kilham is very happy in delineations of this sort. Syracuse is situated in Onondaga county, about one hundred and thirty miles east of Albany, and is really a very delightful place—thrifty, prosperous and commercially important; its inhabitants are also noted for their habits of industry and sobriety. The streets of the city are regularly laid out, and are fine, broad thoroughfares; and the place is one of the finest and most flourishing cities of Central New York. Its salt works are extensive and wonderful, giving employment to a vast number of people, and being a rich source of profit to the citizens engaged in the manufacture. The great Erie Canal passes through the centre of the town, while the Central Railroad, running within a short distance of the canal, affords still more extended facilities for enterprise and commerce. The land which contains the salt springs is owned by the State of New York, and the wells are dug and the water pumped at the expense of the State, while the manufacturer pays a per centage of one cent per bushel for all he realizes. But Syracuse is also largely engaged in the building of machinery, steam engines, farming utensils, etc. The present population is estimated at about 50,000. Our first view is in Salina Street, one of the finest and most active streets of the city. The large building on the left is the Syracuse House, one of the best hotels in the place. Beyond is seen the depot of the New York Central Railroad, with a train of cars crossing the street, which here intersects the railroad at right angles. The next building to the depot contains stores, and the Onondaga County Bank, and the Bank of Syracuse. Beyond is the First Presbyterian Church, a fine gothic structure; still further beyond are the Washington stores. On the opposite side of the street, near the railroad, is the Globe Hotel, another fine hotel. Our view is taken from the banks of the canal, corner of Genesee Street. Our next view is the Syracuse Market, a brick building, situated in a fine square. The New York Central Railroad passes in the street in front of this building. The police-office is located in the Market Building. Our next illustration, sketched for its picturesque appearance, is the Unitarian church, on the corner of Lark and Burnet Streets; Rev. Samuel J. May is the pastor. Our remaining view is the Onondaga Orphan Asylum. It was established in 1841, and incorporated May 10, 1845. It is a spacious brick edifice in Fayette Street, Eighth Ward, and occupies a beautiful, commanding site. At the time of its erection, 1845, it was used as an academy; but owing to certain causes, it was converted into a home for the helpless orphan. At present, and for several years past, it has been under the maternal care of Miss Eliza Clark, who has in a highly satisfactory manner directed the domestic affairs of the institution. The school has been taught by the Misses Frances and Miranda Sloan. John Durnford is president, and Ira H. Cobb is secretary of the institution.

A POISONED VALLEY.

A singular discovery has lately been made near Batavia, in Java, of a poisoned valley. Mr. Alexander Loudon visited it last July, and we extract a paragraph from a communication on the subject, addressed by him to the Royal Geographical Society. It is known by the name of Guero Upas, or Poisoned Valley; and following a path which had been made for the purpose, the party shortly reached it, with a couple of dogs and fowls, for the purpose of making experiments. On arriving at the mountain, the party dismounted and scrambled up the side of the hill, at the distance of a mile, with the assistance of the branches of trees and projecting roots. When at a few yards from the valley a nauseous, suffocating smell was experienced, but on approaching the margin, the inconvenience was no longer found. The valley is about half a mile in circumference, of an oval shape, and about thirty feet in depth. The bottom of it appeared to be flat without any vegetation, and a few large stones scattered here and there. Skeletons of human beings, tigers, bears, deer, and all sorts of birds and wild animals lay about in profusion. The ground on which they lay at the bottom of the valley, appeared to be a hard, sandy substance, and no vapor was perceived. The sides were covered with vegetation. It was proposed to enter it, and each having lit a cigar, managed to get within twenty feet of the bottom, where a sickening smell was experienced, without any difficulty of breathing. A dog was now fastened to the end of a bamboo, and thrust to the bottom of the valley. At the expiration of fourteen seconds he fell off his legs without moving or looking around, and continued alive only eighteen minutes. The other dog now left the company, and went to his companion. On reaching him he was observed to stand quite motionless, and at the end of ten seconds fell down; he never moved his limbs after, and only lived seven minutes. A fowl was now thrown in, which died in a minute and a quarter.—Washington Union.

CAUSES OF CONSUMPTION.

Females suffer from the destructive habit of "tight lacing." To think that intelligent beings should sacrifice health and life to a misconceived idea of beauty, is unpardonable. In the statue of the Venus de Medici, or any of those fine statues of antiquity which are justly considered as models of the perfect female form, it will be seen that the waist is large and the chest full. By "tight lacing," the stomach is compressed and digestion interfered with. But the greatest evil is the dead grip of the unyielding band that encircles the lungs, and stifles their natural expansion. Who has not witnessed in these instances the rapid and labored breathing, showing itself, where only it can, in the upper part of the chest, as if the lungs were ready to burst the bonds so unnaturally imposed upon them? Strangulation is taking place as effectually as if a rope were around the neck. Suicide is being committed; consumption is being invited. And yet every year new implements of torture are imposed, thus to sap the foundations of the life and health of thousands! Besides the effects already alluded to, "tight lacing" paralyzes the nerves on which pressure is exerted, compresses the blood-vessels, and produces injury in many other ways. Its subjects take the power of the Almighty into their hands, and hurry themselves into eternity before the allotted time. The "shortness of breath," and the impossibility of drawing a deep and full inspiration, that follow this process, are easily explained. Under the continued pressure many of the air cells become closed, and without doubt permanently, so that by artificial means a pair of lungs naturally of a good size are thus made small for life. Vigorous health will support the graceful curves of the osseous framework of the body without the necessity of artificial props. Let the chest have free expansion; let the blood vessels perform their office untrammelled by fashionable fetters; leave to the nerves the power of sensation, and to the blood its purity and vigor, and the grand temple made for God's spirit to dwell in will appear before us in all its perfection and beauty! There are other causes, however, why the mortality among females from consumption is greater than among males. The occupation of most females precludes out-door exercise. If the advocates of "woman's rights" would first of all inculcate the right of every woman in the land to out-door exercise, pure air, and, in fact, complete physical development, and the duty of every one to secure these, they would be conferring on their fair countrywomen a real and lasting benefit.—Dr. G. D. Sanborn.

CONSUMPTION OF PERFUMERY.

We learn from a foreign journal that all 150,000 gallons of perfumed spirits are yearly consumed by British India and Europe in titillating the nose. One French house alone annually uses 80,000 pounds of orange-flowers, 60,000 pounds of cassia-flowers, 54,000 pounds of rose-leaves, 32,000 pounds of violet, 20,000 pounds of tuberose, 16,000 pounds of lilac, besides other odoriferous plants in still larger portions. Flower plants exist in the south of France, Turkey in Europe, Turkey in Asia and India. Nor is England without the cultivation. In Mitcham, lavender is extensively grown, and produces a plant unrivalled in the world—four times the price of French lavender; the same spot is noted for its cultivation of roses. Nor is this extensive use surprising, when we consider the quantity of flowers necessary to produce an essence; a drachm of otto of roses requires at least 2000 rose blooms. This, however, is nothing to jasmine; the price of its essential oil is £9 the fluid ounce. Of course there is a good deal of "manufacture" going on with the more expensive fumes. The rose leaf geranium does duty for the rose. The "perfume of the magnolia is superb," says our author; but "practically, is of little use to the manufacturer," from the scarcity of the plant, and other causes; the purchaser, however, gets a combination of half a dozen articles instead, and if he is satisfied with his "essence of magnolia," who has any right to complain? The perfume of the lily and the eglantine evaporate to such an extent under any known treatment that they are never used.—New York Mirror.

STEAM POWER ECLIPSED.

The London Morning Chronicle announces an important discovery. It is stated that a great experiment "was recently tried at Vincennes, in the presence of General Lahitte and the officers of the fort. The secret of compressing and governing electricity is at length discovered, and that power may therefore now be considered as the sole motive henceforward to be used. A small mortar was fired by the inventor at the rate of a hundred shots a minute—without flashing, smoke or noise. The same power can, it seems, be adapted to every system of mechanical invention, and is destined to supersede steam, requiring neither machinery nor combustion. A vessel propelled by this power is said to skim the water like a bird. The inventor had already petitioned for a line of steamers from L'Orient to Norfolk, in the United States, which passage he promises to accomplish in forty-eight hours!"

VIEW IN SALINA STREET, SYRACUSE, N. Y.

ORPHAN ASYLUM, SYRACUSE, N. Y.

A YANKEE MAN-TRAP.

Ethan Balch was not swearing exactly; yet he was undeniably wishing uncharitable wishes, respecting the future of certain Englishmen, and using exclamatory epithets to do it with. It was August, the 15th, 1813, and Mr. Balch was wulking slowly homeward from the sea-shore of New London county, Connecticut; and as he went, he whittled. The precise expressions in which he indulged were these:

"Curse them darned Britsers to darnation! Blame their everlastin' picters! I hope to gracious the plaguy old boat'll go slap down with 'em, sarse and all!"

Then, after a pause, he added:

"Jest as ef I mightn't 'a knoon they 'a done it! Ef I'd only kep her bum till night, and crep' round, I could 'a gone strate into New London jest as easy! Near nshout two hundred dollars gone slap-dab for nothin'! O, good thunder!" cried the mourning young Yankee, in the bitterness of his soul, as this crowning misery rose afresh in his mind.

It is no wonder that he was seriously displeased; for the British, then maintaining a strict blockade upon Commodore Decatur, who, with the frigates United States and Macedonian, and the brig-of-war Hornet, had run up the River Thames, had that day made prize of a certain small craft, in which, together with her cargo, was invested a full moiety of his private worldly estate.

Nevertheless, with continuous whittling and many quaint execrations, home went Ethan, and told his sad tale to his parents, who sympathized with him and were grieved.

"Who wuz there in the boat, Ethan?" asked Mr. Balch, senior. "That's the wust out, father," said the junior gentleman. "I've got to go 'n' tell Marthy Robbins; and what on 'arth she'll say, I do no. They wuz Peleg and Zack Robbins; and them darned everlastin' rotted pizen russes has got 'em, and the boat besides, and sarse enough to keep the fleet a week."

"Wal, my son," said the old gentleman, "I rather guess you'd better go right over 'n' tell her, and hev it done with. She'll take on some at fust, that's sartin; but the boys'll come back some time another, and she 'n' Missis Robbins kin come 'n' stay with us ef they're 'a mind to. I guess we could 'tend up to that 'ere little farm, a while."

For Mrs. Robbins, the widowed mother of "Marthy," and of Peleg and Zachariah, owned and occupied, with her children, a small farm near by, and carried on the same; and the capture of her two stout sons had, of course, left the farm quite bare of men. Ethan wulked moodily over to Mrs. Robbins's house. He was welcomed warmly by the two women, but received their greeting with so much embarrassment, that they perceived that something was wrong.

"What on 'arth's the matter with ye, Ethan?" asked the old lady, cocking back her head so that she could peer at him through her spectacles, which usually abode some ways down on her nose; "you're shorter 'n' pie-crust, seems to me."

"Perhaps," said Miss Robbins with a small smirk, "he didn't want to come. 'Taint necessary to come here unless you enjoy it, Mister Balch."

"Well, well!" expostulated the disconsolate Yankee, "don't go to plaguin' a man when he's in trouble a'ready. I didn't want to come, and it's the fast time; and you know it, Marthy. But 'twasn't cos I wasn't glad to see you. I s'pose I might jest as well out with it. Them ere darned British has ketch'd the boat, and Peleg and Zack along with it."

An outburst of lamentation from the women interrupted the further progress of the tale, which Ethan's awkward attempts at consolation did not avail to quench. They gradually recovered themselves, however, and proceeded to inquire how it happened.

"It was," Ethan said, "by means of a well-known row-galley belonging to Admiral Hardy's flag ship, the Ramilles seventy-four, which had already captured many small coasting craft, and which had secured its booty, in the present instance, by 'snakin' out,' as he described it, with joint use of sails and oars, the fair breeze with which the Martha (as Ethan's boat was named) had set sail, having unexpectedly died away nearly to a calm."

Miss Martha Robbins having cried a good deal, did now, as woman-kind are often apt to do, experience a sudden and not very reasonable reaction into anger; and close to insinuate, first, that her lover had very cunningly avoided any personal risk to himself, by sending her brothers off with the boat alone; and, secondly, that anybody who hadn't brains sufficient to keep him from such losses as that, was hardly likely to make a thrifty or a prosperous helpmate.

These aspersions Ethan vigorously repelled, asserting that "the boys" had chosen to go together, both desiring to visit New London; and that, as three were not necessary for managing the boat or for selling the cargo, he had given them their own way; and as to the latter part of the accusation, he inquired: "I want to know ef you think a man ort to hev brains enough to know exactly when it's 'a goin' to fall calm out on the Sound, ten hours ahead?"

But, Miss Robbins being, as we have insinuated, a womanly woman, vouchsafed no answer to these considerations, which he urged by way of argument—argument being a thing totally unknown and unintelligible to the majority of the female sex—and of the male, too, for that matter. And she accordingly said over again what she had said before, rather more loudly and earnestly; and having thus refuted Ethan in the discussion, she informed him that unless he could get her brothers out of the captivity into which he had been the means of their falling, he need not look upon her face again.

Ethan remonstrated, and even Mrs. Robbins ventured a few mild expostulations, but all in vain; the Yankee damsel's blood was up, and the discomfited lover, not considering that it was highly complimentary to him that his lady love should take it for granted that he was simply able to rescue the prisoners from the whole British fleet, pursued his homeward way in much dejection of mind.

"I wish to gracious they'd been fifty men in her!" he exclaimed; "twould 'a ben frustrate fun to jump up and gin 'em a volley, clust in!"

Then, his keen Yankee intellect, pursuing the train of thought thus started, a scheme suggested itself to him which seemed to promise him both a fair revenge and the means of liberating the two brethren of his obdurate mistress.

MARKET, SYRACUSE, N. Y.

Hastening homeward, he consulted with his father, and, after some difficulty, succeeded in gaining his co-operation. Early next morning, the two men, harnessing up the old farm-horse, drove speedily over to New London, and procuring introductions from one or two gentlemen of standing in that place, who bore witness to the trustworthiness and abilities of the bearers, they proceeded up the river to Norwich, near which place the three American war-vessels were moored.

With the customary formalities, they were admitted on board of the Macedonian, then Commodore Decatur's flag-ship; and, having introduced themselves and presented their testimonials, they proceeded to request his assistance in carrying out the scheme which they unfolded to him. After careful investigation and inquiry, the mode, time and manner of proceeding were agreed upon, and Decatur agreed that a sufficient number of marines should be at the appointed place upon the afternoon of the succeeding day; and, having partaken of the refreshments which the hospitable sailor set before them, the well-satisfied Yankee farmers set out on their return.

We pass over to the next day, at a little past noon. At that time there crept out of Mystic River, taking the inside passage between Ham Island and the mainland, a sailboat, heavily laden and managed by two men. With a fine breeze from the west of north, they steered along, close hauled and hugging the shore, until they had passed Long Point, perhaps a third of the distance between the mouth of the Mystic and New London light. They could now see distinctly the lofty masts and towering masts and rigging of Sir Thomas Hardy's fleet, riding at single anchor inside of Fisher's Island; the two seventy-fours looming up in the warm air, and attended, as it were, by the smaller Orpheus and Eolus frigates, and by two or three gun-brigs and tenders. After passing Long Point the sailboat stood rather further out to sea.

"Don't bear away too far, father," said Ethan—for he and Mr. Balch, senior, constituted the boat's crew—"they'll smell a rat."

"No they won't, my son," said the old gentleman, luffing a little, however. "They don't give us no credit for knowin' how to handle a boat; I reckon they'll hev to allow we kin manage a frigate, though! There they be, Ethan!" said the old man, his eyes brightening with excitement. "Set still—set still. They've got good glasses; they'll see us. Make b'lieve you don't see nothin' on 'em."

And sure enough, as he spoke, there shot out from behind the Ramilles the long, low, black row-galley, which had been the means of so many petty depredations along the coast. Hoisting a lug-sail and bracing sharp up, she steered, with the double impetus of sail and oar, straight across, in a direction to cut off the deeply-laden and slow-moving boat.

UNITARIAN CHURCH, SYRACUSE, N. Y.

"Aint it 'a most time to go about, father?" asked Ethan, after ten minutes of rather uneasy silence.

"Don't git worried, my son," said the old gentleman, drily. "Your father's sailed a great many boats. We was to run ashore with them two high trees in range, wasn't we?"

"Yes—there's a peeled pole on the beach, jest at the spot."

"Wal, I reckon we kin see them fellows aboard the galley now," said the elder Balch, with a grin. "You kin be jest frightened as you please."

And he pretended to espy the unfriendly pursuers for the first time; and with an elaborate display of terrified haste and awkwardness, the boat was put about, and steered straight for the beach, now nearly half a mile distant. The English galley, hereupon, slightly varying her course, came in direct pursuit. Ethan and his father, as the foe approached, by way of maintaining the deception, crouched out of sight, occasionally popping up as if to watch the enemy, and then quickly hiding again.

"Pre-a-boo!" said Ethan, looking up a moment. "We shall be hard aground in three minutes, father. They're coming op, hand over hand. There's the pole on the beach!"

"Come well aft, Ethan," said his father, "let's run her well on."

"Hello, there, you Yankee lubbers!" hailed the English lieutenant, now within three rods, "if you beach the boat, we'll shoot you!"

But as he spoke the boat grounded, and the two men quickly disappeared over the steep sand-hills bordering the shore. The English galley grounded fast on the sand in full pursuit. As she stopped, fifty American marines rose from behind the crest of the sand-hills, poured in a fatal volley, and rushing forward captured the remaining crew. One third of their number were dead or desperately wounded, the lieutenant and two or three others being all that were unhurt out of thirty men.

"You've paid rather more 'n' is wuth," said Ethan, pointing to the load of cobble stones. "I reckon we're even with ye now for hooking that boat-load of garding-sarse of mine, day before yesterday, and ketching them two fellows."

In the exchange of prisoners, shortly after negotiated, the liberation of the Messrs. Robbins was secured, and this fulfillment, by Ethan's means, of the hurl commands of his lady-love, restored and even enhanced the amicableness of the relations heretofore existing between them.—New Haven Palladium.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

A TRUTH.

BY WM. RODERICK LAWRENCE.

"This world is but a weary world,
And friends at best are few;"
Thus sang the poet sweet and sad,
But yet, alas! too true—
For friendship is a golden flower
That buds, but seldom blooms;
Its richest blossoms in an hour,
Oft fade within the tomb.

It scarce may bear the chills of this Cold world, and shrinks away
To one, where it is crowned with bliss,
And fades not in a day—
For what the poet sadly sang,
Indeed is all too true,
"This world is but a weary world,
And friends at best are few."

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

COLOGNE—ITS USES AND ABUSES.

BY FREDERICK WARD SAUNDERS.

"Now, this is what I call a little too bad, too ridiculous, too scandalous, too everything that's bad, awful, unreasonable and unhearable; and I'm not going to put up with the nuisance any longer, so!"

This emphatic assertion, together with a choice and extensive variety of kindred sounds, having continued for a considerable period to emanate from the room next adjoining my own, between which apartments there was but a slight and imperfect barrier—several boards of the partition having been forcibly displaced, partly to form book shelves, and partly to facilitate communication. These sounds, I say, having continued for some time, and being considerably disturbed thereby, I laid down my book in despair, and lifted up my voice in fretful remonstrance.

"What the dence has come to you now, Tompkins, that you must kick up such a bobbery?" I asked, in the tone of a man who don't care a snap for the cause, and is only anxious to put an end to a disagreeable effect.

"What's the matter?" Matter enough! too much matter altogether!" he replied, pacing hurriedly back and forth across the strip of carpet by the side of his bed. "Things have come to such a pass, that a man can't leave his mouth open half a minute, without some one stealing the eye teeth out of his head. By what method of reasoning, I should like to know, can it be shown that I ought of right to furnish cosmetics and perfumery, hair brushes and combs—yes, and I verily believe teeth brushes, too, if the truth could be known—to the entire chambermaid world? Now, there's my hair brush completely filled with coarse red hair, at least a fathom in length, which clearly never came from my head, nor from any of my friends. No, the most superficial examination is sufficient to convince the most skeptical that it had its origin on the cocoon of a female Celt, and one of the ugliest of her species at that. Then there is that preventive of baldness I bought the other day—it must have been a very superior article, for it cost two dollars, and had a name that couldn't be pronounced at any price—twice only did I apply that expensive fat to my locks, and now it is gone completely, stock and fluke, the vessel that contained it presenting every appearance of having been scoured. Nor is that all; no longer ago than yesterday, I bought of Asa Fetida, the perfumer, a quart bottle of very superior eau de cologne water." (It may be as well to state in this connection, that Tompkins never enjoyed your advantages for acquiring the French language; neither is he remarkable for that quick perception of the fitness of things, for which you are distinguished.) "A whole quart bottle," he continued, "holding it up for my inspection, 'and now you perceive it's half gone—yes, more than half, at least eleven-twentieths has been appropriated; and that, too, before I had even once drawn the cork. But I'll put a stop to this business, I will! I'll take everything I've got and lock it up in a chest, and throw the key away; nail the covers down, put a rope round it, and seals on the lid. I'll—I'll—no, I won't! I'll do nothing of the kind! Let 'em steal, if they want to; let 'em steal! I'll fix the thieving dam—sels!"

Muttering fiercely to himself, he bounced back into his own room, and for several minutes there was a confused sound of bottles, glasses and vials being moved about; liquids being turned from one vessel into another, and the sharp pop of hastily drawn corks. But as Tompkins is somewhat given to the study of chemistry, and is always trying experiments to the imminent risk of blowing himself and the house up together, I paid but little heed to his manoeuvres; and having presently completed the performance, whatever it was, he ran his head into his hat, and his feet out of the house, leaving me to enjoy the society of one of the most agreeable and fascinating young fellows in existence, but whose name modesty forbids me to mention.

Relieved of Tompkins's presence, I fell to work upon my book again, and was speedily absorbed in the perusal of an extremely laughable and ridiculous burlesque article in a late magazine, in which the writer, affecting to be in earnest in mistaking assertion for proof, endeavors to show that Shakespeare was not Shakespeare; and that the plays attributed to that gentleman were in reality written by John Knox, William Tell, or Franklin Pierce, perhaps—no matter who, but anybody rather than Shakespeare himself. I was highly pleased with the sober face that was placed upon the absurd arguments, and fully appreciated the amusement it must have occasioned the author, that many quite sensible people were unable to perceive at first, that it was intended as a broad satire, and nothing else. While laughing fit to kill myself at the quiet humor of the thing, some one tapped at the door, and little Carrie Grummet, the landlady's daughter, put her head in to inform me that Miss Mary M—, with a couple of lady friends, were in the parlor below, and that she would introduce me, if I wished.

This announcement put me in a tremendous flutter, for I had for a long while been desperately enamored of the young lady, and vainly seeking to make her acquaintance; and now that the long hoped for opportunity had arrived, I could think of nothing but wedding-cake, bridesmaids, "home, sweet home," and all that sort of thing. Hastily diving into my hat, coat and boots, and giving my cravat an extra touching up, I fetched myself a series of dabs on the head with a hair brush, and caught up my cologne bottle. It was empty—it always is. Not to be disappointed in the matter of a trifle of perfumery, however, I made no bones of grabbing up Tompkins's flask, and saturating with its contents the biggest half of a large towel, with which I industriously scoured my countenance, for the double purpose of removing any accidental discoloration, and more to dispel the lingering traces of pipe-smoke, that usually clings to those fellows who are given to the consumption of niggerhead and short-stemmed T. D.'s, and for which delightful odor I am somewhat renowned. These little essentials completed, I composed my features into an interesting Byronic expression, and descended to the parlor. The lovely Miss M—, her two friends and Miss Carrie Grummet had grouped themselves in a picturesque attitude by the draped window, as girls are apt to do. I, of course, feigned a little bit of surprise at seeing them, as though my coming into the room was the merest accident; while they, on their part, manifested considerable astonishment at the singular coincidence of my being in the house at the same moment they were, notwithstanding they had despatched Carrie to hunt me up not five minutes before. However, the introduction passed off with the usual accompaniment of bows, squirms, hand shakings and protestations of delight, and seating myself in the midst of that bunch of loveliness, I did the agreeable, as I flatter myself I know how.

For a time "all went merry as a marriage bell." The girls chattered, and giggled, and gave themselves silly, pretty little airs, and talked charmingly in an affected tone, which they supposed—like many other young ladies—to be infinitely more pleasing than their own natural voices—and perhaps it was—while I, in the meantime, did my utmost to worry myself into the good graces of the hewitching Miss M—; nor do I think my efforts were altogether unsuccessful. If I am not grossly at fault, that discerning young beauty became most intensely interested in me before I had been in her society three-eighths of a minute. It is possible, however, I may be mistaken in this latter particular; for I find, upon reflection, that I am apt to form the same opinion of every woman with whom I have any conversation whatever—even if it be no more than to ask her pardon for stepping on her dress and tearing off a flounce. But be that as it may, things went on delightfully for a while, and I was enjoying myself hugely, when I became aware of a very singular change in the conduct of the young ladies. An expression of puzzled surprise gradually extended itself over their pretty countenances as they looked at me, or cast an amused and inquiring glance at each other.

I was wholly at a loss to account for this singular state of things, and redoubled my efforts to remove the cause, and place myself in an interesting light. But it was in vain I chattered and rattled away my best stories and most amusing anecdotes. Equally in vain that I shot killing glances at Miss M—. Instead of returning them with interest, as at first, she hid her face in her handkerchief, while her form shook with ill-suppressed laughter. Amazed, I looked at the others; they were all similarly employed. A proper degree of self-respect demanded that I should be angry at this treatment—and I was angry, I assure you. Starting to my feet, I delivered myself of a most vigorous and staggering noun, which it is unnecessary to give here, as it doesn't look as well in print as it sounds in the mouth of an angry gentleman, but which any curious reader can readily find in the dictionary, by simply looking in the right place. The immediate effect of my energetic ejaculation was to cause the girls simultaneously to remove their handkerchiefs from their faces, give one glance at me, and explode in a perfect storm of laughter, wriggling and twisting about, and doubling themselves up, as people do in such cases, fairly shrieking with mirth, while I stood stupidly gazing at them with my eyes protruding, and my under jaw depending—an excellent model of enraged bewilderment. At length one of the young ladies with better wind than the others, managed to gasp between her paroxysms:

"What is the matter with your face, Mr. Jinx?"

"My face!" I replied, indignantly; for the question seemed rather personal, and wounded my vanity in a particularly tender point.

"Yes, what does nil it?" they all exclaimed, in a breath, and again relapsed into their absurd cachinatory convulsions, precipitating themselves on to the chairs and sofas, completely exhausted with the violence of their emotions. All the more horrified because of my perfect ignorance that anything whatever was wrong with my face, I glanced hastily round in search of a looking-glass. There was none there—mirrors are not the fashion now, I believe. In an agony of spirit, I darted out of the room, up the three pairs of stairs, into my own apartment, and at a mirror.

Thunder and Mars! what a sight!—such a mug! My forehead and nose were as black as the price of Pandemonium's hoots, while the steel-mixed stripes that crossed my cheeks, and gave to my countenance the pleasing appearance of an animated gridiron, were rapidly deepening in color, and promised speedily to become of the same hue as the rest of my nigrescent visage.

With a prolonged howl of terror, I sank into a chair, and gazed dismally at my claws, which I now for the first time perceived were undergoing the same fearful and unaccountable change in color. Horrible thought! Could it be that I was about to be transmogrified into a negro, as a punishment for my ultra southern sympathies? Instinctively I raised my hand to my hair and lips, to ascertain if the one was becoming woolly, or the other increased in dimensions. For the moment I really thought such to be the case, and a tremulous squeal of despair betokened my utter hopelessness. I started at the sound of my own voice. It did not seem like the moan of a respectable white man; there was more of the genuine Gouven snicker in the intonation. Only those who have been suddenly transformed in a similar manner can form any estimate of my feelings at that moment. Like the Frenchman upon learning the death of his whole family, and loss of his fortune, I was dissatisfied—yes, more, a thousand times more, I was annoyed. But how to get out of the scrape was the question—ay, that was a question! Suicide, of course, suggested itself to my mind as the most reasonable, indeed the only means of escape from myself, and from my dreadful predicament. But a moment's reflection convinced me that I had not hit upon the right plan; suicide would not conceal the disgrace of the monstrous and unnatural event. Surgeons would examine my body, and carefully investigate the cause of the change. Books would be written about it, newspaper paragraphs innumerable would "go the rounds," and to thermostet posterity my name would be handed down, through the medium of short articles in children's books, headed "An authentic account of Aristides Jinx, the white man who suddenly, and without any provocation whatever, turned into a nigger." Notwithstanding I have always considered it the height of human blessedness to achieve undying fame, this particular sort of immortality in no way reconciled me to my fate. "I will go to Africa!" I exclaimed, with animation, as I began to take a brighter view of the matter. "Yes, I will go to Africa, and among the people of my own color introduce the arts and sciences. I will become a great man among them—a prince—the king of Nogo perhaps, or some other equally powerful empire. And who knows," I continued, warming with my subject, "who knows but what, at no very distant period, it may be my fate, like a second somebody or other, to lead the victorious armies of Ethiopia to conquest?—yes, why not follow still further in the footsteps of the immortal hero before mentioned, and a second time overrun with my barbarian hordes the fair provinces of what-d'ye-call-it, and bring proud what's-name an humbled and suppliant captive to my feet?" My exaltation of spirit was but of momentary duration, however; one glance at the mirror redoubled my despair, and in speechless agony I listened to the footsteps of some one ascending the stairs. It was Tompkins.

"Gracious, goodness, mercy me! Is that you, Jinx?" he exclaimed in horrified astonishment, while his great pewter-colored eyes dilated until they attained a preposterous size.

"I wish it was any one else but me," I groaned. "What do you suppose is the cause of it?"

"You don't mean to say—no, it can't be—yes, it must—"

"What?" I whined.

"That you have been at my cologne bottle."

"O, confound you and your cologne!" I exclaimed, in a fury that he could think of anything so trivial at such a moment. "If you grudge the little cologne I used, I'll give you barrels of it—oceans of it! Yes, as I'm fully decided to commit suicide, I leave you the whole of my large fortune, to be expended in the purchase of cologne, to repay, if possible, the fraction of a spoonful I used from your bottle."

"It wasn't cologne you used," faltered Tompkins, in a penitential tone. "I turned it all out; and to come to it on the chambermaid, and spot up her handkerchiefs, I substituted a—I didn't think you'd get hold of it, Jinx, positively I didn't—I substituted an all-fired strong solution of—"

"Of what?" I gasped, beginning to get a faint glimpse of the case.

"Of nitrate of silver."

"The same they make indelible ink and hair dye of?" I asked, with a dismal consciousness of its permanent effect upon any material with which it comes in contact.

"Zackly!" responded Tompkins, with the air of a man who has relieved his mind of a great burthen.

As the horrible suspicion concerning the change of hue in my epidermis began to depart from my mind, a depressing sense of mortification and injured vanity oppressed me—not like a nightmare, but like a night-elephant; and to this day, Tompkins stonily maintains that I visibly blushed clear through the blackness of darkness that overspread the anterior portion of my unfortunate skillet, as I recalled the humiliating scene in the parlor. With vivid distinctness the whole ridiculous affair passed in review before me, as I thought with a squirm of inexpressible sheepishness of what must have been the sensation of the young ladies as they beheld my countenance gradually growing darker and darker, now in stripes, now in patches, and anon alternating between the two, like the fantastic glancing of the northern aurora, until my forehead and nose loomed forth in magnificent and dusky hideousness, gracefully shaded off by the lighter and variegated tints of my cast-iron cheeks, while stupidly unconscious of the charge, I ceased not to smile and prattle, and do my prettiest to look bewitching, until the girls, unable longer to conceal their mirth, exploded as aforesaid. It would not bear thinking of! Frantic with shame and rage, I sprang from my chair, rushed into Tompkins's room, and seizing the unlucky bottle—the cause of all my misfortunes—by the neck, sent it humming through the open window, fourth story, accompanying its flight with a volley of smart but wicked adjectives, which were excusable, I think, under the circumstances.

"Now, Tompkins, what do you propose to do to get me out of this scrape!" I asked, when my repugnance against the unconscious bottle had been satisfied.

"Why, I suppose the application of the proper chemicals will remove the worst of it," replied that gentleman, vainly endeavoring to hide a grin at my decidedly picturesque appearance.

"The worst of it!" I groaned, sinking upon the sofa. "Well, go ahead, and get something quick."

Tompkins vanished into his own room, and soon returned with a vessel of villainous smelling liquid and a sponge.

"Lay down so I can come at you," he said, stripping up his sleeves to the work. Without a word, I proceeded to murmur (see Webster). "I'm not exactly sure that this stuff is precisely what we want," he continued, in a hesitating tone, as he bent over me. "Perhaps it would be as well only to touch up the nose at first, and see what effect it has on that; and if it don't work to suit, why, we shan't have spoiled the whole groundwork."

With a despairing moan, I closed my eyes and turned my mug to the zenith, while Tompkins, shaking with suppressed laughter, sopped away with his sponge at my devoted nasal organ.

"Well, how does it look?" I asked, after an interval of several minutes.

"Why, the black comes off fast enough," he replied, in a tone indicative of doubt; "but—but I don't exactly know whether the color that takes its place will be altogether to your taste."

The idea was disagreeably suggestive; and springing from my recumbent position with such impetuosity as to capsize Tompkins and his dish of acid, I made for the glass. Ah, what a sight was there, my countrymen! That noble feature, the nose, stood forth from the surrounding blackness of a gorgeous purple hue, beautifully shaded off at the edges with a tawny green running into the black.

"That will do, Tompkins," I said, with the calmness of desperation, as I paced the room. "You needn't get any more of that stuff! I prefer a uniform black to any variations of color your skill can produce."

"I wouldn't feel so badly about it, Jinx," he replied, really affected at the sight of my quiet misery. "It will all come right in time. All you've got to do is, to stay quietly in your room two or three weeks or a month, by which time you'll have a complexion like a new-born baby—that is, not too new; say about three mo—"

Before Tompkins could finish his speech, the door was thrown open, and a man—a stranger—entered the room. "Mr. Aristides Jinx!" he asked, drawing a paper from his pocket.

"That is my name, sir!" I replied, walking fiercely up to him. "What the deuce do you mean by coming into a gentleman's room without knocking?"

"I've a warrant for your arrest, sir," he replied, with a glance of astonishment at my face.

"My arrest! for what?"

"For an assault with intent to kill, and dangerously wounding policeman N. O. Greatshakes while in the discharge of his duty."

"When? Where?" exclaimed both Tompkins and myself, in the greatest amazement.

"Bout half an hour ago, directly in front of this house, with a heavy glass bottle," replied the officer with professional brevity and conciseness.

This announcement by no means tended to diminish the amazement of either Tompkins or myself; but as I had not in my anger noticed, or even cared, what became of the bottle after it left my hand, I of course could not undertake to say it had not knocked down one, or even a dozen policemen. There was nothing for it but to plead guilty and back out of the scrape as well as possible. But it was in vain we both protested it was all an accident—that no assault was intended; equally in vain that I directed his attention to my face in confirmation of our statement. The officer shook his head: "He was very sorry for my face," he said, "very sorry; for it did look uncommon bad. But law was law, and when a chap got into a scrape, he would have to face it. He would himself be very happy to let me off, but his orders were peremptory for my arrest." He further intimated that, by going before the magistrate who issued the warrant, I might possibly be admitted to bail—though that he considered somewhat doubtful, as several persons who had been witnesses to the assault had given their evidence that I used harsh and blasphemous language toward the complainant at the time of throwing the bottle, and there could be little doubt that the act was malicious and premeditated.

"Curses like chickens always come home to roost," I muttered, quoting the fool and musty proverb. I saw there was nothing to be effected by standing there talking; so calling a coach, Tompkins, the officer and myself got hastily in and drove off. I, with my face buried in my handkerchief, as though dissolved in tears, thereby leading the spectators to suppose from my emotion that I had committed some horrible crime, for which I was arrested, and was now crying about it, like a spunkless booby.

But I will not dwell upon the events which followed. The magistrate, being satisfied of my innocence of any malice, permitted me to go on my own recognizance, and having spent the entire afternoon under the hands of a skilful chemist, I was enabled to appear at the police court next morning with a countenance bearing a striking resemblance to the half-finished portrait of a peculiarly uninteresting negro, who had but partially recovered from small pox in the worst form. Having convulsed the court by my story and my appearance, I was let off with a severe reprimand. But I understand there is a civil suit commenced against me for "damages," by the wounded policeman, who doesn't seem to be satisfied with the damages already received at my hands—which, by the way, are the only description of damages he is likely to get; for if a jury of my peers can by any device compel me to raise five dollars, I should like to see 'em try it on about now.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE COUNCIL FIRE.

A TALE OF THE OEM OF THE JERSEYS.

BY BEN PERLEY POORE.

"WHAT a pity an ex-governor of West Jersey will make a chimney of his throat, and scent his house with this vile tobacco smoke."

"Nay, it is rather a pity that I and my friends have to hide our pipes when we see the Lord Proprietor of Pennsylvania approach. But come in, friend William, and sit thee by the open window."

The fault-finding visitor who entered was no other than William Penn, who had returned from England to control his flourishing colony. His host was Ex-Governor Jennings, a crafty old Quaker, who was ever haunted by a remembrance of his own peridy in money-getting, and always apprehending a similar crooked policy in others. Yet he was a man of wealth, and at the time when our story commences, several of the most solid men of Western-Jersey had assembled at his comfortable house in Burlington, that loveliest of all the pleasant towns on the Delaware. No traveller now passes through it without admiring its shaded streets, and conceding that it is worthy of being called "The Gem of the Jerseys," yet it was far more picturesque a hundred and fifty years ago. Neither college, nor hall, nor cross-crowned Episcopal residence then adorned it, but the green streets were bounded by the nearest of white stone cottages, their gables covered by climbing plants. The venerable shade-trees, whose branches now entwine across the streets from side to side, like the arches of a gothic cathedral, were then in their prime. Neither was the foliage dense enough to shut out the beautiful waters of the Delaware, slightly ruffled by the breath of heaven, or rippled by some swift canoe. Commerce did not exist, for Philadelphia is near at hand, yet there was no lack of settlers—families of the right stamp too—for in all the Jerseys there was not so quiet, so healthy, and yet wistful so cheerful a settlement as Burlington on the Delaware.

The crafty old Jennings evidently felt mortified that so eminent a co-religionist as William Penn had detected him indulging in the forbidden weed, and he endeavored to apologize: "Let me assure thee, friend William," he remarked, "that we do not smoke to-day from inclination, but as a preparation for the morrow."

"And for what revelry dost thee prepare?" inquired the lord proprietor, with an incredulous air. "Are some of Lord Bellamont's roysterers to come down from the Manhattan, or does the gay governor of Baltimore intend to honor thee with a visit?"

"Neither. But the Leni Lenapes invite us to attend their council to-morrow, and as we hope to induce them to emigrate, we do not wish to offend them by making wry faces over the Virginia weed."

"A good excuse. Tell me, though, will the savages give a quid-deed to all their hunting-grounds?"

"We hope so. Yet there is some pretended old claim or other that we must get set aside."

"If justice so decrees, friend Jennings. Be just, above all things. But where is thy daughter, the comely Patience?"

"I will seek her," and as the governor is finding his daughter, we will avail ourselves of the privilege of romance, and introduce our readers to her, as she sits busily sewing in a summer-house in the garden, on the river-bank. She was a well-formed, graceful young woman, with bright black eyes, and her prim cap could not conceal her curling black hair. Her features, though pale and abstracted, had a decidedly independent cast, and the quick trotting of her small foot showed that her mind was not in repose. It had been her misfortune to lose her mother at an early age, and the selfish temperament of her bigoted father had driven her, as it were, into ways of thinking ill in accordance with the principles of her sect. The plash of a paddle startled her! Another moment, and a warm flush restored the color to her cheeks, as a canoe shot up to the summer-house, and a stalwart young man sprang to the shore.

"Walter Pike!" she exclaimed, the eloquent glances of her fine eyes welcoming the new-comer.

"None other, dearest Patience," replied the young man. "But why so sad? Surely you do not doubt me?"

"Nay, Walter, I do not doubt thee, but I doubt myself. That thou wert innocent and persecuted I am confident—that thou won my affections I have never denied—and yet my father—"

"Will never suffer thee to wed such as Walter Pike," interrupted the governor, with a voice half choked with rage. "Thinkest thou, miserable varlet," he continued, addressing the indignant young man, "that my daughter, with her ample dowry, is to be thrown away on such as thee? Go to. Hurry into the house, Patience, and tarry there, bearing in mind that thy husband is to be good-man Bloomfield, who can support thee. As for thee, pretending youngster, be off. I will see that the lord proprietor keeps thee at his rectangular town henceforth—meanwhile, go to the wharf, where thou belongest."

"You speak harshly, governor," said Walter, with emotion.

"I intended to."

"But will you not listen to me for a moment?"

"Not for a second. My time is not for thieves."

"Let me tell you, then," replied Walter, losing his self-command, "that my name is freer from guilt than your own. Ay, start not! Great, and wealthy, and saintlike as you are, I, the poor boatman of Governor Penn, do not quail before you, and you may yet be glad to give me your daughter's hand."

Ere he had finished speaking, the incensed governor had turned away, and the young man, leaping into his canoe, slowly floated down the Delaware, lost in thought. He was the orphan son of John Pike, one of a party of Puritans who had left Newbury, in Massachusetts, about 1666, and founded a town in New Jersey, which they named Woodbridge, after the minister they had left at home. The elder Pike was soon taken into Governor Carteret's council, and went down upon the Delaware, where he concluded an important land treaty with the Indians. But his prosperous course received a sudden check. A trading house at Ambloy belonging to a Quaker named Bloomfield, was robbed, and the goods were traced to John Pike's house. In vain did he protest his innocence. A jury found himself and his young son Walter guilty of felony, his property was confiscated, and while under this imputation the father died.

At first Walter felt himself an outcast, but he was comforted by his school-boy sweetheart, Patience Jennings, who had been sent to school at Woodbridge. Nerved by her love, and animated by her advice, the young man determined to go forth, in his own strength, and seek the good name denied to him at home. Happy age, when hope ever lights up the future as a path to prosperity, and makes present difficulties appear but as the stepping-stones to future distinction. Walter reached Philadelphia with what proved better than money or friends—a vigorous intellect, a strong arm, and an honest heart—all of them inscribed on his modest yet manly countenance. The very day after his arrival, he was fortunate enough to obtain a situation as largeman for the lord proprietor. An adept in the management of the Indian cause, Walter was soon selected by William Penn to accompany him, and as the young man's sturdy paddle strokes sent the frail bark over the water, his employer drew from him a sketch of his life. Walter related everything with great innocence, and his heart beat wild with joy when, after he had concluded, William Penn deliberately remarked:

"Young man, thy father and thyself have been deeply wronged. Providence will see thee righted."

From this Walter began to have hopes of ultimately proving his innocence, and the return of Patience Jennings to Burlington gave him frequent opportunities of seeing her. She gave him ample grounds to know that she was not insensible of his attachment, but frankly told him that her father had promised her hand to another.

Thus two long years passed away, during which time Walter became a great favorite with William Penn, who committed many important trusts into his hands. The young lover continued, however, to act as boatman whenever the lord proprietor visited Burlington, where he was always kindly greeted by the blooming Patience, the flame of abiding love casting a glow over their stolen interviews. One evening, as Walter was making his canoe fast to the wharf, an Indian came running down, in high delirium, and plunged into the stream. To rescue him from a watery grave was but the work of a few moments, yet from that moment "The War Eagle" became the young man's devoted friend. Sporting "fire-water," the warrior appeared to regard his deliverer with paternal care, bringing him rich furs, soft moccasins, and delicate game, significantly remarking: "You see—Indian never forgets."

But to return to our narrative, which we interrupted in order to introduce the characters, and to explain their relative positions. On the morning after William Penn's arrival at Burlington, almost all the able-bodied men went up the river about half a mile, to attend an Indian council. It was fully attended by the savages, also, for it was rumored that this would be the last time that the Leni Lenapes would meet in the home of their fathers.

At least one thousand warriors were present, each in his full war-dress, and armed with bow and arrow, ponderous war-clubs, or heavy stone axes, while a few had blankets and hatchets of European manufacture. The sachems sat upon a slight eminence, while around them were the warriors, arranged according to rank, in semi-circular lines.

When the English approached, a warrior who officiated as master of ceremonies, conducted them to seats, and a dead silence ensued. Then "War Eagle," standing in the centre of the ring, addressed them in tolerable English.

"William Penn is the father of the pale-faces, and it is good that he should be here. His brother Jennings wishes to buy what is left of our hunting-grounds. Let him listen. They were sold years ago. When the red men ruled here there came a pale-face named Pike—and to him the Leni Lenapes sold these lands. The War Eagle was young then. He loved the fire-water, and his heart was weak. A pale-face persuaded him to steal goods, and to hide them in the wigwam of Pike, and fire-water was his pay. The War Eagle did so. The sachems of the pale-faces accused Pike as a thief. Their council convicted him. He died of a broken heart, and his son went forth a beggar. Still they gave the War Eagle fire-water, and he did drink. But one day Pike's son saved the War Eagle from death, and he has drank no more fire-water since. To-day he will atone for his wrong. Here, William Penn, is the old writing by which the Leni Lenapes sold their hunting-grounds to Pike."

"And who was the instigator of this foul crime?" asked William Penn, as he reached forth his hand to take the parchment, which made Walter Pike a wealthy man.

"Nay," exclaimed Jennings, springing to his feet, but the inward struggle had already taken place, and with an unintelligible cry, he sank to the ground, a corpse. Just when he had expected to have his long-arranged plans crowned with complete success, a divine justice had not only thwarted them, but had exposed his long-concealed villany.

"The Great Spirit has punished him," said War Eagle.

"Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord," devoutly responded William Penn.

A year past, and the star of Walter's love shone brightly through the benighted thoughts of Patience Jennings, who found herself helpless and alone after her father's sun of prosperity sank into his dishonored grave. They were married, and settled down upon their large estate near Burlington, whither the War Eagle came every year, on a visit from the new hunting grounds of the remnant of his tribe, west of the Susquehanna.

THOMAS COMER,
OF THE BOSTON THEATRE.

The portrait on this page is from the pencil of Mr. Charles Barry, and the design is made from a photograph by Whipple & Black. It is one of the best likenesses we have ever published, and felicitously reproduces the beaming and genial expression which characterizes "honest Tom Comer." Mr. Comer was born in Bath, Somersetshire, England, but he has passed the better part of his life in this country and in this city. He made his first appearance in English opera in his native city and was well received. He first appeared on the London boards in 1816. His first appearance in this country was as "Forage," in "Turn out," at the Bowery Theatre, New York, in 1827. He was a favorite member of the old Tremont Theatre, and many an old play-goer will doubtless recall with pleasure his "Dandini" in "Cinderella," during the first run of that opera. Mr. Comer was, while on the stage, very happy in dialect parts—made a very good Irishman and a highly acceptable Jew. His "Moses," in the "School for Scandal," was always considered a nice bit of acting; and long after the leadership of the orchestra was committed to his care, he was frequently summoned behind the footlights to enact favorite characters which none could fill better. For several years Mr. Comer was connected with the Boston Museum, in the capacity of leader of the orchestra and musical director, and Mr. Kimball's various brilliant spectacles have been rendered yet more attractive by the original music composed for them by Mr. Comer. He is now attached in the same capacity to the Boston Theatre, and exhibits the zeal and fire of youth in the discharge of his duties. Enjoying a high professional reputation, the subject of our sketch is equally esteemed in private life, and no man has a wider or more attached circle of friends. Long may he live to wield the leader's bow in the beautiful establishment managed by Mr. Barry, and which even the satirical Beauvallet has acknowledged to be one of the finest, if not the very finest in the world.

THOMAS COMER.

VITALITY OF INSECTS.

If the head of a mammaliferous quadruped, or of a bird is cut off, the consequences of course are fatal. But the most dreadful wounds that imagination can figure or cruelty inflict, have scarcely any destructive influence on the vital functions of many of the inferior creatures. Lueenhock had a mite which lived eleven weeks transfixed on a point for microscopical investigation. Valliant caught a locust at the Cape of Good Hope, and after excavating the intestines, he filled the abdomen with cotton and stuck a stout pin through the thorax, and yet the feet and antennæ were in full play after the lapse of five months. In the beginning of November, Redi opened the skull of a land tortoise, and removed the entire brain. A fleshy integument was observed to form over the opening, and the animal lived six months. Spallanzini cut the hearts out of three newts (in Scotland called asks), which immediately took to flight, leaped, swam, and executed their usual functions for forty-eight hours. A decapitated beetle will advance over a table, and recognize a precipice on approaching the edge. Redi cut off the head of a tortoise, which survived eighteen days. Colonel Pringle decapitated several libellule, or dragon flies, one of which lived afterwards for four months, and another survived for six months; and what seems rather odd in connection with this circumstance, he could never succeed in keeping alive those with their heads on, above a few days at the farthest.—Ballou's Dollar Monthly.

DEER STALKING IN GERMANY.

The landscape on this page represents a glade in a forest at Coburg, Germany, with a number of sportsmen engaged in the amusement of deer-stalking. The sportsmen at the foot of an ancient oak are watching for a shot at a deer bounding past their station, while a noble buck has just breathed his last at their feet. This forest scene is sketched in the ancient domain of the dukes of Saxe Coburg—the birthplace of Prince Albert. Some few years since, the Queen of England visited this place, and deer-stalking was among the amusements got up for the entertainment of the royal guest. It was a specimen, on a very grand scale, of what in Germany appears to be considered as sporting, but which is, in fact, the wholesale destruction of deer driven into a confined space for the purpose, and deprived of all chance of escape. They call it a deer hunt; but it has none of the characteristics of that noble sport, and is, in fact, the same practice to describe which the term battue has been used in England. It is, however, the mode of sporting adopted in the country, and which has, in some shape or other, existed for centuries; and those who resort to it do not seem to associate with it any idea of unnecessary cruelty, or to be aware that in thus depriving the object of sport of the power of indulging its instinct of flight, they are losing one at least of the great charms of sporting—the excitement of pursuit. The place chosen for this exhibition of skill in shooting at a living target, was distant three or four miles from Reinhardtsbrunn, and about fourteen or fifteen from Gotha. Here stretch the skirts of the great Thuringian range, which break into magnificent hills, of very great height and covered to their summits with the pine. This plateau was enclosed on all sides with a sort of wall of white canvass and network sufficiently high to prevent the possibility of any of the deer escaping. In the centre, and for the purpose of this exhibition, there was erected a sort of pavilion, open at the sides, formed of fir branches and leaves, and decorated with heather, forest flowers and berries. In the interior of the enclosed space were also the chasseurs, or huntsmen, of the duke, all clad in brilliant uniforms of green and gold, looking more like soldiers than sportsmen. Shortly after it was announced that the royal party were coming, and in a few moments the carriages were seen winding round a hill facing the place of battue, the band striking up a lively air. The queen was attended by a large retinue of English nobility and princes and princesses of Germany. Her majesty the Queen of England and the other ladies were, on alighting, escorted to the pavilion before described. Easy chairs (a rather odd association with "sport") had been placed there, on which Queen Victoria, the Queen of the Belgians, and the Duchess Alexandrina sat during the greater part of the time the work of destruction was going on. They were accompanied to the pavilion by Prince Albert, the King of the Belgians, the Prince of Leiningen, and Duke Ferdinand of Saxe Coburg. The other gentlemen took up a station in another part of the enclosure, which was deemed favorable for shooting the deer. As soon as the party were all thus arranged, the process of driving in the deer commenced, and after a little time the shooting began. As a herd bounded by at the full reckless speed of terror, in a few minutes after the discharge of the guns, one, two, three or four of the noble animals might be seen suddenly to halt, stagger and fall, struggling for a brief space in the agonies of death. Soon the field became gradually more and more covered with the slain, as the herd that rushed wildly about the enclosure grew thinner and thinner, till at last there were not enough to justify an aim. At this part of the display came the crowding act of the sport. The dead or dying deer were either dragged, or carried suspended from poles, across towards the pavilion, where the huntsman plunged his enormous couteau de chasse into their throats. All sporting must, to a certain extent, be attended with a degree of necessary cruelty; still its more harsh and revolting features are becoming gradually softened down, or concealed from view. Not to pursue the subject to a wearisome length, this continuous shooting, relieved by music, lasted for upwards of two hours, until either nearly all the deer were killed or the rest were allowed to escape, and then the royal party prepared to return. In England, deer-sporting is noble and manly. A deer-stalker in the Highlands goes through fatigues, and sometimes encounters dangers, which, if undertaken in a campaign, would fill a soldier's budget. English stag, fox and hare hunting, in like manner, involves great fatigue and labor—the huntsman almost earns his game. Mind and body are alike braced and nerved by the pursuit. Above all, the poor brutes are given a fair start and fair play. All the chance nature gives them they keep—it is skill and perseverance against fleetness and cunning.

DEER-STALKING IN GERMANY.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL.

THE CHEAPEST WEEKLY PAPER IN THE WORLD.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
FRANCIS A. DUBVAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH.

Archdeacon Coxe, in his memoirs of this great captain, whom Macaulay handles so glovelessly in his last volume, represents him as having retained his mental powers to the very last; but Pope, with more truth probably, gives a very different picture of his closing moments:

"In life's last scenes what prodigies surprise,
Fears of the brave and follies of the wise:
From Marlborough's eyes the streams of dotage flow,
And Swift expires a driveller and a show."

There is a similar passage in Churchill:

"What bitter pangs must humble genius feel
In their last hours to show a Swift and Steele;
To drive out whole years of illot breath,
And sit the monuments of living death!"

By the way, speaking of Marlborough, Tom Taylor relates the following anecdote: On one occasion, when the great Lord Chesterfield was present, the Duchess of Marlborough was urging the duke to take some medicine contrary to his inclinations. At length she said, vehemently, "Du, my lord, take it. I'll be hanged if it won't do you good." Lord Chesterfield added, slyly, "Take it, my lord, it will certainly do you good one way or other."

A NARROW ESCAPE.—A young Irishman at Bristol, England, lately had a needle run into his breast and broken off in the casing of the heart. A surgeon laid the heart bare, and extracted the piece of steel. It is averred that the heart itself may be pierced by a sharp instrument without causing immediate death.

IDA PRYFFER.—This enterprising lady is off again on a voyage to the Indian Archipelago. If she lives to get back, she says that she will wander no longer, but seek a quiet place wherein to await the coming of death. A small chest contains all her wearing apparel, books, etc., for a three years' voyage.

PRESERVING FISH.—The Russians keep fish perfectly sweet for a long time in the hottest weather, by dipping them in hot beeswax, which forms an air tight covering. Our trouting friends in New Hampshire will please remember this, and lay in a good supply of wax.

FRANCE AND AMERICA.—The government of France does not propose to interfere with this country on account of the recognition of the Walker government in Nicaragua.

THE FROG BUSINESS.—This is quite a lively branch of business in New York. At many of the restaurants frogs are a favorite dish, not only with Frenchmen but Americans.

SPLINTERS.

.... Cod liver oil cures consumption by promoting a restorative process in the system. Its efficacy is undoubted.

.... Kossuth lately realized $1900 from two lectures in Edinburgh. He is on an extensive lecturing tour.

.... A new theatre is to be erected in Paris, called the "Theatre of the Imperial Prince."

.... The English have found out that our available militia force numbers two and a half millions of men.

.... Love is a common cause of suicide among women, and the immoderate use of ardent spirits among men.

.... Well-dressed swindlers are in the habit of eating their meals at the New York hotels, and never paying for them.

.... The New York Sunday Times says it is nonsense to talk of "French without a master;" the French will always have one.

.... The citizens of Liverpool and Manchester have issued peace addresses to the citizens of this country.

.... It is said that false swearing has become so general in the New York courts, as to excite the alarm of the bar.

.... The entire stock of the Albany Bridge Company, $500,000, was subscribed for a few weeks since.

.... An English coachman lost a large sum bet on Palmer's acquittal, and committed suicide in consequence.

.... Miss Mary E. Worinley, author of "Anabel" and "My Cousin Veronica," was lately married at Newport, R. I.

.... Madame Ristori is 150,000 francs the richer for acting three months in the great city of Paris.

.... Lady Byron, the widow of the great poet, has purchased the late Samuel Rogers's house in London.

.... The story that Adelaide Phillips had been thrown from her horse and injured, was a sheer fabrication.

.... Mr. Samuel Elliot is the new professor of literature and history in Trinity College, Hartford, Ct.

The Maine State Agricultural Society will hold their fair at Waterville, October 28, 29, 30 and 31.

.... The late inundations in France are estimated to have rendered 40,000 of the inhabitants homeless.

.... Arabia is still in a state of insurrection, refusing to recognize longer the authority of the Sultan.

.... About a million and a half of dollars are spent annually in fire-crackers for the fourth of July.

.... Leaves composted with brine-salted lime make an admirable manure for fruit trees.

.... The Smithsonian Institute has a surplus of over $125,000 ordered to be invested in State stocks.

.... The cholera has begun to show itself in Northern Russia. It is feared that it will extend far and wide.

THE FINE ARTS.

No one should embark on the career of an artist—and by that term we do not include the professor of the plastic arts alone, but of music and architecture, as well as painting and sculpture—without being thoroughly satisfied of his vocation. For, in all of the fine arts, mediocrity is fatal. It is not enough that a young man can draw accurately a head, a figure or a flower, or model in clay a limb or an animal, or write a melody that does not wound the ear by incorrectness; he may do thus much, and yet evince only mechanical skill. But does he feel that inspiration which Carl Maria Von Weber, the great German composer, explained in a striking passage in his works? He said that "a beautiful landscape, a brilliant sunset or sunrise, a forest scene, everything, in short, he witnessed, presented itself to his soul in a musical form in concert or discord. Whatever he perceived resolved itself into music, and thus became truly impressive to his soul." It always struck us that this passage contained the key to the mystery of inspiration. Such a perceptive faculty must be inborn; it may be cultivated, but cannot be created or supplied by any process or assiduity.

So with the painter. When he recalls the description of a striking historical scene, that scene must take actual shape before him; he must see, not vaguely, but distinctly, figures, expressions, costumes, groupings, blended in a harmonious whole. To express those conceptions, he must have had long practice in drawing and coloring; his memory must be a rich treasury of rare facts, and then he will be able to work out with certainty the visions of his mind's eye. Even in portrait painting—which Sir Joshua Reynolds thought he could teach to any boy of moderate capacity—there is the widest difference between the mechanical copy of features, in which no fault of proportion can be perceived, and the radiant speaking head through whose eyes the soul of the original is reflected back upon the spectator. The merely mechanical copyist of objects of nature, like the mere mechanical arranger of musical notes, may, in a low condition of public taste, enjoy a temporary success; but his name will never live, it will never be inscribed with those of the Angelos, the Raphaels, the Claudes, the Titians, the Mozarts, the Haydus and the Von Webers.

The student of the fine arts, then, must start with undoubted genius, and he must toil for years, like the humblest mortal, in the accumulation of his material, in the storing of his armory with weapons. Afterwards the production of masterpieces is an unconscious effort. "The definition of genius," says Hazlitt, "is that it acts unconsciously; and those who have produced immortal works, have done so without knowing how or why. The greatest power operates unseen, and executes its appointed task with as little ostentation as difficulty. Whatever is done best, is done from the natural bent and disposition of the mind. It is only where our incapacity begins that we begin to feel the obstacles, and to set an undue value on our triumph over them. Corregio, Michael Angelo, Rembrandt, did what they did without premeditation or effort; their works came from their minds as a natural birth. If you had asked them why they adopted this or that style, they would have answered because they could not help it, and because they knew of no other." * * * "It is not known that Corregio ever saw a picture of any great master. He lived and died obscurely in an obscure village. We have few of his works, but they are all perfect. What truth, what grace, what angelic sweetness are there! Not one line or tone that is not divinely soft or exquisitely fair; the painter's mind rejecting, by a natural process, all that is discordant, coarse or unpleasing. The whole is an emanation of pure thought. The work grew under his hand as if of itself, and came out without a flaw, like the diamond from the rock. He knew not what he did, and looked at each modest grace as it stole from the canvass with anxious wonder."

INDIAN CHARACTER.—Capt. Marcy, who, with Capt. McLellan, U. S. A., explored the Red River, in 1852, says of the Indians:—"They are, perhaps, as arrant freebooters as can be found upon the face of the earth; and they regard stealing from strangers as perfectly legitimate and honorable, and that man who has been most successful in this is the most highly honored by his tribe. Indeed, a young man who has not made one or more of these expeditions into Mexico is held in but little repute. In evidence of this, I was told by an old chief of the Northern Camanches, called Is-an-keep, that he was the father of four sons, who, he said, were as fine young men as could be found; that they were a great source of comfort to him in his old age, and could steal more horses than any other young men in his band."

THE COAL TRADE.—The coal trade of Pennsylvania bids fair to eclipse that of the entire world. New fields are almost weekly being discovered, and new mines worked. The northern counties of Pennsylvania will ere long develop a startling amount of mineral wealth. All the hills teem with coal and iron.

GABRIEL RAVEL.—This admirable gymnast and pantomimist is going to leave the stage definitively. He took a final leave a few years ago, went to France, impaired his fortune by speculation, and returned to the stage to make up his losses. He has done so, and now makes his final bow.

MARINE DISASTERS.—During the first six months of the present year, the aggregate amount of property injured or destroyed at sea was nearly sixteen millions of dollars!

HOME AGAIN.—Among recent visitors from California, was Francis Tukey, Esq., so well known for years as our city marshal.

LOSSES BY FIRE.—The losses by fire in the United States for the last six months were nearly six millions.

AN AMERICAN BELLE IN CHINA.

Every one knows how degraded is the position of females in China. A young American merchant lately took his youthful wife with him to Hong-Kong, where the couple were visited by a wealthy mandarin. The latter regarded the lady attentively and apparently with admiration. When she at length left the apartment, he said to the husband in his imperfect English, or "broken China," "Was you give for that wify wif years?"

"O," replied the husband, laughing at the singular error of his visitor, "two thousand dollars."

This our merchant thought would appear to the Chinese rather a high figure; but he was mistaken.

"Well," said the mandarin, taking out his book with an air of business, "apose you give her to me, I give you five thousand dollars."

It is difficult to say whether the young merchant was amazed or amused, but the grave air of the Chinaman convinced him that he was in earnest, and he was compelled, therefore, to refuse the offer with as much placidity as he could assume. The mandarin, however, was pressing, and went as high as 7000 dollars. The merchant, who had no previous notice of the value of the commodity he had taken out with him, was compelled at length to declare that American men never sold their wives after they once came into their possession, an assertion which the Chinaman was slow to believe. The merchant afterwards had a hearty laugh with his young wife, when he told her that he had just discovered her full value, as the mandarin had offered him 7000 dollars for her.

A CURIOUS BIRD.—Bailey, in his dictionary, an English work of the last century, says of the Baltimore oriole, that "being looked upon by one that has the yellow jaundice, cures the person and kills the bird." The same authority also gives the following accurate and veracious description of the humming bird. "The Humming Bird, which makes a Noise like the Whirlwind, though it be no bigger than a fly; it feeds on Dew, has an admirable Beauty of Feathers, a Scent as sweet as that of Ambergris." A very valuable work for reference, certainly—particularly on scientific subjects.

EDITIONS.—They are the daily chronicles of the world—writers and compilers of history, geography, politics, law, religion, incidents of every-day life, of war, peace, crime, agriculture, manufactures, commerce, literature and love.

FAST.—Flora Temple, the mare that beat Chicago Jack on the Centreville Course, L. I., lately, is thought to be the fastest trotter in the world.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. Mr. Stone, Mr. Samuel H. Woodcock to Miss Elizabeth A. Barker; by Rev. Mr. Smith, Mr. Homer Coffin to Miss Ellen McQuinn; by Rev. Mr. Twombly, Mr. Thomas P. Sawyer, of Sedgwick, Me., to Miss Susan Choate; by Rev. Mr. Blake, Mr. Benjamin Boach to Miss Margaret Pollock; by Rev. Mr. Adams, of Worcester, Dr. H. G. Brigham to Miss Harrietta Mason. At Dorchester, by Rev. Mr. Wood, Mr. James B. Wood to Miss Ellen S. Oldham. At Cambridge, by Rev. Mr. Hoppin, Mr. Charles Hall to Miss Frances Georgiana Neal. At Brookline, by Rev. Dr. Stone, Dr. J. W. Phelps to Miss Agnes Rebecca Durt. At Melrose, by Rev. Mr. Dennis, Mr. John Baldwin, of Chicago, to Miss Rebecca Fairbanks. At Lynn, by Rev. Mr. Smith, Mr. Ira Worcester to Miss Susan A. Caldwell. At Salem, by Rev. Mr. Mills, Mr. Samuel S. Willey to Miss Ann Donahoe. At Quincy, by Rev. Mr. Clark, Mr. Joseph W. Lombard to Miss Eliza A. Bunbar. At Marblehead, by Rev. Mr. Paul R. Barnard, Mr. William D. Cloutman to Miss Ellen M. Hammond. At Beverly, by Rev. Mr. Ordway, Mr. Albert E. Eaton to Miss S. Melissa Perry, of Boston. At Newburyport, by Rev. Mr. Pike, Mr. Joseph Eldridge to Miss Louisa Sanderson. At Plymouth, by Rev. Dr. Kendall, Mr. Kimball W. Stetson, of Kingston, to Miss Elizabeth T. Pratt, of Carver.

DEATHS.

In this city, Mr. Joshua Brewster, 62; Mr. Reed Taft, 71; Miss Mary Lock, 32; Mrs. Mary E. Hodson, 79; Widow Jane Black, 68; Mr. Samuel Newcomb, 69; Mr. Charles H. Hayes, 25. At Charlestown, Mr. William Belcher, 76; Mrs. Eliza A., wife of Isaac Blanchard, Esq., 59. At Jamaica Plain, Miss Sarah B. Barnard, 22. At Cambridge, Miss Susan D. Stone, 23; Mrs. Margaret Jennings, 68. At Somerville, Miss Nancy A. Sawyer, of Boston, 49. At South Malden, Mr. William Thompson, 59. At Dedham, Mrs. Sally E. Worthington, 65. At Methuen, Mrs. Anna A. Morse, 22. At Haverhill, Widow Hannah E. Clark, 71; Mrs. Mary A. Sargent. At Lynn, Mrs. Margaret Cleary, 32; Mr. Elbridge Follett, 20; Miss Della Joyce, 19; Mrs. Eliza B. Newhall, 54; Miss Anna B. Lewis, 28; Mrs. Lydia Appleton, 68; Mrs. Adeline Stephens, 16. At Salem, Mr. George Sarge, 62. At Gloucester, Mr. John Dennis, 39. At Newburyport, Miss Mary Jane Hall, 45; Mr. Theodore Dorrill, 45; Widow Elizabeth T. Moody, 81. At Newbury, Miss Adeline Donahoe, 42. At Worcester, Mr. Reuben B. Hayward, 44; Mr. Norman W. Chase, 37. At Fall River, Mr. Gardner L. Colt, 43. At Nantucket, Widow Temperance Green, 58. At New Marlborough, Mr. Josiah Harmon, a revolutionary pensioner, 98. At Concord, N. H., Mrs. Lydia Elliot, 103. At Auburn, Dea. Nathanael Knowlton, a soldier of the Revolution, 95.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL
DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION.

A Record of the beautiful and useful in Art.

This paper presents in the most elegant and available form, a weekly literary melange of notable events of the day. Its columns are devoted to original tales, sketches and poems, by the best American authors, and the cream of the domestic and foreign news; the whole well spiced with wit and humor. Each paper is beautifully illustrated, with numerous accurate engravings, by eminent artists, of notable objects, current events in all parts of the world, and of men and manners, altogether making a paper entirely original in this country. Its pages contain views of every populous city in the known world, of all buildings of note in the eastern or western hemisphere, of all the principal ships and steamers of the navy and merchant service, with fine and accurate portraits of every noted character in the world, both male and female.

TERMS.—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year, $3 00
4 subscribers, " " 10 00
10 " " 20 00

Any person sending no sixteen subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the seventeenth copy gratis.

* One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, when taken together by one person, one year, for $4.

Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU, CORNER OF TREMONT AND BROADWAY STS., BOSTON.

WHOLESALE AGENTS.—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Welch, 116 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; A. C. Bagley, 162 Vine Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Rays, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Woodward, corner of 4th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Huggins, Louisville, Kentucky; Trubner & Co., 12 Paternoster Row, London, general agents for Europe.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

NO.

BY MRS. M. W. CURTIS.

This no is a resolute word!
That 'tis oftentimes right to say;
When the voice of the tempter is heard,
Say no! as thou turnest away.

This no is a resolute word,
And oftentimes wrong to say—
When the heart with emotion is stirred
For the needy, O turn not away.

Say no to the follies of youth,
And no to the errors of age;
But yes, to the teachings of truth—
That ought all our moments engage.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE WIFE'S STRATAGEM.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

THE room in which William Armitage sat was a perfect specimen of a bachelor's den. Books, articles of clothing, pictures, riding saddles and guns were distributed around without regard to order, and the whole room was impregnated with cigar smoke. A noble-looking dog was lying on a crimson sofa, on which the marks of his paws were plainly to be seen. A handsome mirror was broken in fragments, and a splendid lamp had shared the same fate, leaving traces of oil on the rich but soiled carpet, while the whole establishment evinced painfully the want of a woman's taste and love of order.

In a large arm-chair, before which was a table where stood coffee and toast, was the owner of this apartment. He was about thirty-three years old, with a fine figure and intellectual face, and bore an ease and suavity of manner that made him universally courted.

William Armitage was an only son. His mother—a really excellent, well-meaning woman, had committed one fault, growing out of her love for her son and her want of judgment. Having no other object on which to bestow her loving cares, she had centred them all on him; waiting on him like an infant, and pampering his appetite with dainties of her own composition.

"Whatever you do, William," said Mrs. Armitage, one day, when the vexed question of her son's future wife had arisen for discussion, "mind and get a wife that knows how to cook. That is the most important part to look out for. I have no patience with the reading misses of the present day. Let them learn to make a pudding."

Such words from a mother whom he loved, were not without their effect on his mind. He was intellectual enough himself—had talents—could talk well—but he was unfortunate enough to have formed his ideas of woman from a few specimens of an unfavorable kind for the exercise of his judgment. He happened to know a few really pleasing women who were not at all intellectual, and a few very talented ladies who were careless in their persons and households. So he stamped the whole sex with these two stereotyped labels—forgetting that what is really good and beautiful does not wear its estimated value pinned to it like dry goods; and that ladies sometimes disdain to throw their pearls before those whom they perceive are incapable of testing their worth.

He was just thirty when his mother died, and he removed to chambers of his own. He preferred this mode of life, because he could not bear to place another woman at the table where his mother had so long presided over his comfort. But he was growing weary of his freedom. He missed the attentive eye that saw and the active hand that remedied all his discomforts, and he began to pine once more for a well-regulated home.

And on this morning he was talking with Clement Linscott, on the subject of marriage; a welcome theme to Clement, for he had long hoped to see his sister Agnes the wife of his friend William, and joyfully responded to his wish of being introduced to her. William had, on several occasions, heard Clement praise his sister's housewifely qualities, and he had expatiated very largely on her perfect health, which was another grand theme on which William had talked. He would have no pale, sickly, sentimental or learned wife. She should be strong, active and healthy—all excellent things, it is true, and very desirable in man or woman. He found Agnes Linscott all this, nay, more—for she was very pretty. He married her, and taking her to a luxurious country seat, just far enough from his business to be pleasant, he surrounded her with all the elegances and comforts he so much liked for his own gratification.

His wife justified her brother's praises. She was eminently housewifely; and her health and beauty were all that he could ask. It was his delight to take home with him gentlemen whose own establishments would not permit them to take such a liberty—to bring them unexpectedly to his table, and to show to them how perfect was his wife's order and management—to point out the exquisite dishes which no hand but her own could touch, and to let them see how carefully she ministered to his tastes.

This was all very pleasant, unquestionably, to a man like Armitage. But, by-and-by, there was a change in that perfect household. Agnes became a mother, and the care of three young children, two of them twins, made inroads upon her health and strength, that left little for her usual attention to William's comfort. He bore it very bravely at first, for the new state of paternity was very pleasant to him. But the rosy hue of health had gone from the cheek of his wife, and she moped and sighed at the state of her household, and the necessity that existed for cares which she could no longer bestow. She was not formed to love children. She could not bear the disarrangement they must inevitably create in a pattern house like hers—and having no other resource, her life settled into a condition of joyless monotony.

And what was her husband's life? He went to town every morning before either wife or children arose—took his dinner at a hotel, because he could no longer command those exquisitely cooked dishes which she had once superintended—returned to find his children asleep, and Agnes lounging on the sofa. He was kind and good, and pitied her greatly, but he had no balm to offer her which could heal her. He sat by her, reading the books which were sealed fountains to her, longing to impart the pleasure which they gave him, but knowing that she could not receive it.

And on her part, it was very hard to see him prefer those tiresome books to her; and it was not long before the querulousness of sickness showed itself in her whenever he sat down to read. What could he do? That which was very natural under the circumstances. He tired of the monotony of his home. The cheeks and lips of poor Agnes grew sharper—her voice acquired a shrill tone—the children grew troublesome, and his neighbor, Mr. Crawford, gradually prevailed on him to make his house a frequent stopping-place in the city, instead of going out every night to his home.

Here he found society that his mind had been craving the last two years. Crawford delighted in drawing around him intellectual people, and appreciated those gifts in others which assimilated mostly to his own. Not less so was Mrs. Crawford. She was a rare blending of the best and most desirable qualities of woman. As a wife and mother she was all that could be asked—as a housewife, she was practical without being finical—as a companion, she was interesting, without being pedantic or a blue stocking. Her conversation, while it reached and embellished the highest points of literary taste, and touched skilfully upon matters of art and science, could still adapt itself to the lowest capacity, to children, and was equally the delight of the old, to whom she showed no attention and deference which was pleasant to witness. Her husband's eye turned towards her with a loving glance, mixed ever with admiration of her talents and goodness.

To William Armitage she was especially drawn from a similarity of taste. She knew little of his history—did not even know if he was married, or if she had ever heard, had forgotten it—and his frequent visits to her house had given her the idea that he was not. Had she suspected that in the next town there was a pale, faded cheek that was growing paler by his absence, she would not have rested until she had seen it grow brighter—but to her, Armitage was a being united by no ties to any other.

Accident betrayed the fact, however, and then she took her stand. That night she gave a pleasant party, at which she had collected a large number of intelligent and delightful people. She was in high spirits and entertained them nobly. She sang and played with spirit, and she talked even better. At a late hour she led her guests to a room where refreshments had been prepared, the quality of which showed that she was not deficient there; and, in short, she performed the various duties of a hostess with due regard to each and to the company she was entertaining. This night William Armitage was really sad.

"My poor Agnes!" he said to himself; "had she possessed half the qualities of this woman, she would not turn away from books that would so cheer her hours of sickness."

He forgot that he purposely avoided a woman of talent—that he had chosen Agnes for the beauty that had faded by this illness—for the health which had decayed—for the household skill that she was not able to practise now—but never for the taste and intellect that would have made these losses bearable, and thrown around her sick couch the charm of a cultivated mind, and the appreciation of her husband's learning and talents.

Stung by William's growing indifference, Agnes started from her couch one morning, after his departure to town, surveyed herself in the glass—noted her altered appearance, and came to the opinion at once, that if she could but regain her health, she should regain her husband's affection.

She would go to town—she would consult the old family physician—she would make an effort to get well. There was no carriage at home, for her husband had driven to town that morning. He might have asked her to go with him this bright, sunny day; but he had never asked her to ride out with him. Well, the hourly coach could take her, and in that she made her journey to Dr. Livingston's house.

To him she detailed all her sufferings; she kept nothing back—not even what she thought of her husband's growing indifference to her, and she begged him, with tears in her eyes, to do something to restore her lost health. Dr. Livingston was a kind, sensible and judicious man. He saw plainly how matters stood, and he pledged himself to mend them if he could. He prescribed for her, and made it a point that she should come to town every morning for a fortnight. This, he thought, would give her exercise and occupy her time. He would give her no medicine unless she came for her daily dose, which after all was the simplest tonic. His prescription worked well. Every day there was an added strength—an added color—but she did not let her husband see it yet. When he came home she still occupied her sofa, and no word was spoken of her daily visit to town.

The fortnight elapsed, and Agnes was decidedly better. Every day, with the medicine, the doctor had given her something pleasant to read, of which he had asked her opinion the next morning. Unconsciously, she had taken an interest in subjects of which she had thought so little before that they were perfectly new to her, and she began to converse earnestly with her old friend upon them all.

"Now, my little lady," said the doctor, one morning, "I remember that you used to sing well. Bring all your old songs up here, and practise singing with Lucy. It will strengthen your lungs. Remember, this is a part of the cure!"

She did so, and was surprised that she could sing so well; for not a note had she sung since her marriage. Lucy Livingston, the doctor's eldest daughter, was called in to aid her father in the work of curing Mrs. Armitage. Lucy drove her friend in the doctor's carriage, and several times enticed her into a horseback ride, avoiding those localities where they might meet Mr. Armitage. Lucy's brother accompanied them—a youth of fifteen—and a school friend of Edwin's joined them, making a sufficient escort.

Mr. Armitage, in his pursuits of business and pleasure, knew little of these proceedings. Agnes was lying on her couch every evening, with shaded eyes, according to the doctor's commands. "I want you to burst at once upon his sight, renovated and dazzling," said he. "It will not do for him to see the change gradually. It must astonish, to be effectual."

And Agnes woke to new hope and renewed life. Her children became a source of pleasure indescribable. From their fresh, young life, she borrowed health and energy. She spent several hours each day in playing with and caressing them, walking about the fields and lanes, and gathering strength from every footstep she planted there. Two hours she devoted to reading; two to singing—for her lungs, the doctor said, but he had another motive. Three hours of the morning she gave to her visit to town and its incidentals—riding with Lucy, driving and conversing pleasantly. At the end of a month Lucy was to go out with her to her country home. She did so; and the first night of her visit was a memorable one, for it introduced Mrs. Armitage to her husband. He had lost sight of his wife for some time; or, thought of her only as a feeble woman, unable to minister to his intellectual life or his love of good eating, which in him were strangely blended.

When he arrived that evening, he found the sofa empty. He heard the sound of music in the drawing-room, and, going up softly, he saw, through a crevice of the door, Lucy Livingston seated at the piano, and by her side, a lady in a white dress, who resembled Agnes as he first knew her. The three merry children were playing about the floor, and the room wore a bright and cheerful look, in place of its usual darkness. He looked again. Was it Agnes, with that brilliant color, and that clear, musical voice, and that unusual dress? He stepped in softly and threw his arm around her as she stood. She turned, and a bright, warm blush came over her cheek, while he welcomed Lucy. He was obliged to release Agnes to the children who were clamoring for her to come and play with them; and for the first time he saw her engage in her children's sports. Everything he saw mystified him. He almost thought he had entered some other house than his own. In fact, his coming there at that early hour was wonderful; and he began to think that he was dreaming. He could not sufficiently admire his wife or her singing, and he made her sing again and again.

The next morning, Lucy Livingston asked him to ride with her for an hour. When he looked from the window he saw that the man had brought round three horses, and he threw open the window and asked him why he did so.

"Shure it's the mistress rides every day," said the man.

And indeed, there stood Agnes in her habit, waiting to mount her spirited poney, which she managed very skilfully. As they rode slowly under the shade of some trees, he said to Agnes:

"Read me this riddle, for I truly cannot guess it."

"I will do so, William," she answered. "I saw you through my closed hands, one morning, as I lay on the sofa, and your look was so dissatisfied that it stung me to the quick. I was really ill, but I resolved to take a decisive step. I would get well, or die—I sinfully perhaps thought. I would not see that look again if I could help it. I had heard you praise Mrs. Crawford, and I noticed that you praised her as much for her health and beauty and buoyant spirits, as you did for her intellectual attainments. I thought, 'I cannot have the latter, but I will do what I can to obtain the former. I cannot live without my husband's heart.'"

She then proceeded to tell him of her scheme, and the doctor's assistance. Mr. Armitage was delighted—but he blamed himself.

"And I left you, poor thing, here alone day after day for business, and night after night to hear Amy Crawford sing, without knowing that I had a singing bird at home. Believe me, Agnes, I am truly sorry for all the pain I have caused you, and my life will be too short to repay you for what you have suffered for my unpardonable neglect." He kept his word.

CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY.

Encouraged by the unprecedented success which this popular monthly has met with, and the rapidly with which it has increased its circulation, the proprietor has resolved to make it still more worthy of the patronage of the public. That this admirable work is a MIRACLE OF CARELESSNESS, is admitted by every one, containing, as it does, one hundred pages of reading matter in each number, and forming two volumes a year of six hundred pages each, or twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for ONE DOLLAR.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY is printed with new type, upon fine white paper, and its matter is carefully compiled and arranged by the hands of the editor and proprietor, who has been known to the public as connected with the Boston press for nearly fifteen years. Its pages contain

NEWS, TALES, POEMS, STORIES OF THE SEA, SKETCHES, MISCELLANY, ADVENTURES, BIOGRAPHIES, WIT AND HUMOR, from the best and most popular writers in the country. It is also spiced with a record of the notable events of the times, of peace and war, of discoveries and improvements occurring in either hemisphere, forming an agreeable companion for a leisure moment or hour, anywhere, at home or abroad, each number being complete in itself.

No sectarian subjects are admitted into its pages: there are enough controversial publications, each devoted to its peculiar sect or clique. This work is intended for THE MILLION, north or south, east or west, and is filled to the brim each month with choice, popular and graphic miscellany, just such as any father, brother or friend would place in the hands of a family circle. It is in all its departments, fresh and original, and, what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive a copy gratis.

Sample copies sent when desired.
M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor.
Corner of Tremont and Bromfield Sts., Boston, Mass.

SPEARING THE NARWHAL.

This picture represents an Esquimaux, in his curious pointed canoe, spearing narwhal. Alone on the wild ocean, managing his double-bladed paddle with one hand, and his harpoon in the other, riding over the fish, he is preparing boldly to give him his death-wound. The narwhal inhabits the dreary realms of the polar ocean. Its general form resembles that of the porpoise; it has, however, no teeth, properly so called, but two ivory tusks or spears, implanted in the intermaxillary bone, but of which the right remains usually rudimentary and concealed during life. The left tusk, on the contrary, attains to the length of from five to seven or eight and sometimes ten feet in length, and projects from the snout in a right line with the body, tapering gradually to a point, with a spiral twist, rope-like, through its whole extent, where, by an oversight, the tusks have been transposed. In its structure and growth, this tusk resembles that of the elephant, being hollow at its base or root, and solid at its extremity. Formerly these horns or tusks were looked upon to be the horns of the fabulous land unicorn, and therefore they were valued as an inestimable curiosity, and sold excessively dear, till the Greenland fishery was set on foot, when they became more common and their real nature known. The use assigned to the tusk of the narwhal by Crantz, viz., that of uprooting marine vegetables on which to feed, is altogether a supposition. As the male only has this instrument developed, or generally the male, the female must be reduced to sad difficulties in the procuring of food; but in truth the position of the tusk renders such a use as is here attributed to it impossible. Moreover the narwhal does not subsist on marine fuci or algæ, but on soft animal matter, as mollusks and fish. Capt. Scoresby found the remains of entle-fish in the stomachs of several which were opened by him, and similar remains were also found in the stomach of one driven ashore near Boston. In general form the narwhal resembles the porpoise, but the head is small and blunt; the mouth is small and not capable of much extension; the under lip is wedge-shaped; the eyes are placed in a line with the opening of the mouth, at the distance of thirteen or fourteen inches from the snout, and of small size, being about an inch in diameter. The spiracle or blow-hole is a single orifice of a semi-circular form, on the top of the head, directly over the eyes. The fins or flippers are about fourteen or fifteen inches long, and from six to eight broad, their situation on the sides being at one-fifth of its length from the snout. The breadth of the tail is from fifteen to twenty inches. There is no dorsal fin, but a sharp ridge down the centre of the back. At an early age, the narwhal is blackish gray on the back; the sides are almost white, with spots of a dark line, shown in the engraving. The narwhal is fleet and ferocious; and when it is irritated, a combat with it is rather a formidable and dangerous affair.

SPEARING THE NARWHAL.

THE YOUNG ARTIST.

The picture before us places us in the centre of the studio of a Spanish painter of the 17th century. The light, artistically arranged, falls upon an interesting group. It streams down broadly on a canvass, before which sits a youth of sixteen or eighteen, his palette and brushes in his left hand, in his right that skilful pencil which, guided by a true inspiration, is tracing, in glowing colors, the sainted features of a Holy Mother and Child. So absorbed is the young artist that he has not heard the approach of footsteps. No shadow falling on his canvass, tells him that the master, whose judgment he fears and whose criticism he deprecates, is standing there, hushing to silence with a gesture the students that crowd around him, and gazing with wonder and admiration on the performance of his pupils. A broad-brimmed hat and plume shade his thoughtful brow. He gazes intently at the canvass, and gazing there he sees a glorious future expanding in perspective before the young painter whose hand has first moved under his guidance, but who is now animated by that divine spirit which no teaching can impart. A moment more, and the reverential hush of that group will be broken. The master will no longer be able to suppress his approbation. He will address to the young painter those words of encouragement which will dwell forever in his memory, and which in after years no praise or honorable award will equal in their effect.

THE YOUNG ARTIST.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { CORNER OF TREMONT
AND BROMFIELD STS.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 9, 1856.

$3.00 PER ANNUM. } VOL. XI., No. 6.—WHOLE No. 266.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

ENTRANCE TO THE ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

The sketch before us, drawn expressly for the Pictorial by Mr. Eyttinge, a very clever young artist of New York, has all the fidelity of a daguerreotype, and that life and spirit which the daguerreotype process cannot, of course, convey. The scene is the entrance to that splendid hotel—the St. Nicholas—pertly depicted under the pseudonym of the St. Bobolink in an English sketch of American hotel life we read recently. In sketching the outside features of this grand caravanserai, we shall say nothing of the architectural splendors of its facade, of the luxury and elegance and taste of its interior saloons and chambers, of its sumptuous tables and careful attendance, these being features perfectly well known. We have to do at present with the vestibule, the proscenium as it were, flanked by the establishment of Phalon, the prince of hairdressers, on one side, and that of Genin, the prince of batters, on the other. What variety and expression we note in the dresses, attitudes and grouping of the almost speaking figures in the doorway, who are uttering their comments on the passers-by! Here is the bouquet-vender offering his cornet of flowers to a rather inappreciative crowd. The over-dressed female with the parasol will sweep by him in the amplitude of silk and crinoline, without deigning to notice him. The lady with the child has already passed. The pile of baggage and the carriage betoken a departure for the railroad cars or steamboat. A stately Turk, half European by his costume, but distinguished by the fez, paces on, smoking a cigar. An itinerant organ-grinder, and organ-grinders abound in New York, moves along heaving under the weight of his instrument, surmounted by the indispensable monkey, and accompanied by the child that plays the tambourine. A staid Quaker and his daughter contrast with the fashionably dressed people near them—with the gentleman caressing his moustache, and the trussed up top behind him. In front of Phalon's is an individual economizing time by devouring the newspaper as he walks. The whole scene is life-like and characteristic. In its variety and glitter it is the type of New York as it is—changed immeasurably from the days of Walter the Doubter, William the Testy, and Peter the Headstrong, the governors of the Dutch colony, immortalized by Diedrich Knickerbocker. Nearly all the principal streets have each their distinct character, but Broadway, in which our scene lies, is the epitome and résumé of New York. Through this great thoroughfare pour continuously the representatives of all the classes of this most cosmopolitan of cities. This is the common ground of the Irish laborer and the American belle—the old fogey and the young American—the titled traveller and the untitled resident—the steady, portly gentleman who has retired on his demi-million, and the thin and nervous individual who hurries to his place of business because he has or hopes to make his million. Rich and poor, gentle and simple, grave and gay, find the common path. As with the people, so with the buildings. Here is a rickety, tumble-down relic of old times—there a stately mansion. Here a splendid Gothic church rears its sculptured steeple high in air; there a theatre attracts attention by its huge lamps and huger show bills. Such is New York.

ENTRANCE TO THE ST NICHOLAS HOTEL, BROADWAY, NEW YORK

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

THE GIPSEY'S SECRET:

—OR—

THE LEAGUE OF GUILT.

A STORY OF HIGH AND HUMBLE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE CONTRABANDIST."

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER XVI.

THE BIRD IS FREE.

The sound of the retreating footsteps died away, and Eleanor listened with a sinking heart. Lucy Elmore's cheeks were crimson—her indignation at its height.

"And Harry Longworth has failed, after all," she said. "It is too bad. I could cry, Miss Eleanor! What shall we do now?"

"Indeed, Lucy, I hardly know," answered Miss Ashby, with a troubled countenance. "We are prisoners in earnest, it seems, with even a warder at the door."

"Yes—that is the worst part of the matter," said Lucy; "for now no one can come this way without being seen; and though I know Harry and the rest will not yield without another trial, it will be of just no use in the world; for that knave Hawkins will give the alarm; he will not let us escape, you may be sure. So there is no telling how long we may be forced to stay here. How long do you suppose it will be, Miss Eleanor?"

"Until I promise to marry Mr. Briancourt, or make my escape, Lucy," answered Miss Ashby.

"Then, dear Miss Eleanor, if we cannot get away, I hope you will choose to stay here forever, rather than marry him," returned Lucy, earnestly. "And I am sure I will gladly stay with you."

"Indeed, I should prefer to stay," said Miss Ashby. "I will not wed him, if they never release me, Lucy. But I am sorry they have imprisoned you also; for though, I confess, your presence is a comfort to me, it is too hard to deprive you of your liberty for my sake."

"O, do not say a word about that—do not say a word about that," said Lucy, gently; "for, indeed, Miss Eleanor, I should be a thousand times more unhappy if you were here alone and I could not see you, and had no way of setting you free, either. I do not care about the being shut up, for myself, but it is wicked that you should be."

Suddenly, approaching footsteps were heard, and Eleanor started from the seat she had taken, laying her hand silently on Lucy's arm. Both listened. The footsteps came nearer. They were those of Sir Edward and some other person. Eleanor and Lucy heard him pause and exchange some words with the man, Hawkins, who was stationed in the corridor. Then he approached the door; the fastenings were withdrawn, and he threw it open.

He stood there in the doorway, with one of the under-servants behind him. He just glanced at his niece and her maid, and then turning, spoke to the domestic, who entered, set down on a table a small tray, spread with the breakfast of the new made prisoners, and departed. Eleanor and Lucy stood regarding these motions in perfect silence.

As soon as the servant was gone, Sir Edward stepped into the apartment, closing the door partly, and still holding the handle. He looked colder—sterner than ever.

"Miss Ashby," he said, freezingly, "I have come hither to let you know that, for the present, your meals will be served to you in your own apartment, where you will remain, until you feel disposed to obey my commands."

"If, by your commands," returned Eleanor, "you have reference, as I suppose, to that respecting my union with Mr. Briancourt, I have only to say that I shall adhere to the resolution which I have already expressed concerning it."

"Then you will stay here until you have ceased to adhere to it!" said Sir Edward, harshly, and growing very pale.

Miss Ashby's cheek flushed with distress and agitation, that she tried hard to conceal under a calm demeanor and with steady tones, as she replied:

"I will not stay here if I can escape, sir, which, he assured, I shall endeavor to do; but however long I may be obliged to remain, my determination with regard to the union into which you would force me will continue unchanged. And the longer my imprisonment, the greater will become my detestation of Morley Briancourt. You may tell him so."

The baronet frowned heavily.

"We shall see!" he uttered, in an angry voice. "You will either consent to receive him as your husband within three days, or, at the expiration of that time, your consent will no longer be considered necessary. As for you," he addressed Lucy, "you will also remain here with your mistress. You will neither of you find it so easy a thing to escape as, perhaps, you imagined it last night. Be careful when you express your inclinations the next time, that no one hears you." And going out, he fastened the door securely on the outside.

"What will they do, I wonder?—drag me to the altar by force?" said Miss Ashby, mentally. It was not improbable that they would do such a thing. He had said that, at the expiration of three days, her consent would no longer be considered necessary. It meant that she would be married without it. In three days! It was a short time.

"Lucy," she said, turning to her maid, with the unconscious tears standing in her eyes,—"Lucy, where could I find a place of refuge, safe from discovery, if I should escape from here? For if I can find means to leave Ashby ere these three days are at an end, I will do it. I will seek out some shelter where I may be free from these tyrannical persecutions."

"O, I am sure you would be safe at Briarfield, dear Miss Eleanor," answered Lucy. "They are your best friends. They would only too gladly take you away from here; and they would never let Sir Edward know where you were."

Miss Ashby stood silent for a moment, with her eyes cast down, in earnest thought, and an expression of troubled meditation upon her face.

"No, no—not there," she murmured, presently,—"not there!" And a rosy tinge dawned upon her pale cheek.

"Why?" said Lucy Elmore, earnestly. "I am sure you would be safe there; and I know there is not one of them who would not be happy to keep you away from that odious Mr. Briancourt. They all dislike him."

"No, Lucy—I should not go there," repeated Miss Ashby, hastily, but gently. "And, indeed, I do not well know why I am thinking of going anywhere; for it is not at all probable that I shall get free from this place," she added. "Out in the corridor is Hawkins, to keep guard lest any one should attempt to release us again; and yonder," she pointed from the window to the lawn, "sits Will Humphries, beneath that old oak, with a watchful eye upon our casements, that we may have no means of communication with any one that way."

"Ay—the insolent knave!" said Lucy Elmore, indignantly. "He is fit for such an office. He has done nothing but meddle, and watch, and spy upon your concerns, Miss Eleanor, ever since he has been here; sometimes from his own inclination, and sometimes from his master's orders, and often from both. I am sure if there had been any one except the servants who was not in league with young Mr. Briancourt, that saucy Will Humphries would have been whipped out of Ashby long ago. All the people in the kitchen know how his master sets him to watch when you go and come, and how long you stay, and where you go; and not a word or a token passes from Briarfield hither that Will Humphries's master and Sir Edward do not know it."

"I know—I know!" said Eleanor Ashby, bitterly, while a burning blush rose to her cheek. She turned away, and the hot tears rushed to her eyes.

Meanwhile, below stairs, in the library, Sir Edward, Mr. Briancourt and Morley were shut up in secret conclave, discussing the subject of Eleanor's rebellion, and the wisdom of the way fixed upon to put it down. Sir Edward had promised, if, in three days, she did not yield, to wait no longer, but force her to obedience. And it was no difficult matter, if there were none to interfere. They knew it. Poor Eleanor—poor Eleanor Ashby! A thousand times, with her brave and resolute spirit, she might declare that they should never make her, while living, the bride of Morley Briancourt, though they dragged her to the altar by force. Little she knew of her own weakness, in the scale with their cunning. Let but the third day go by, and her fate, if she escaped not, was sealed.

The people in the servants' hall, too, were tumultuously discussing the matter of Miss Ashby's imprisonment. A spirit of rebellious indignation prevailed among them. The ineffectual attempt of Harry Longworth to release Miss Ashby and Lucy, had influenced them still more against Sir Edward. They were all there, talking of the master, excepting the respective valets of the baronet and Morley Briancourt, who had been set to keep guard over the prisoners, being the only ones in the house whom Sir Edward could have bribed to do it. They were looked upon, consequently, with contemptuous disgust; and the scullion whom Sir Edward employed to carry up to Miss Ashby and Lucy their meals was in disgrace among the rest.

Harry Longworth was the centre of the assemblage. He had a deeper interest, even than any of the others in gaining the release of Miss Ashby and Lucy; for, over and above his warm-hearted zeal in the cause of Miss Eleanor, his "young missis" (as he and all the rest called her, notwithstanding she was not the mistress of Ashby), he was Lucy Elmore's lover, and they all acknowledged his right to the greatest share of sympathy of any of them. It was a sore point with him, too, that Mr. Briancourt's valet should be empowered to keep guard against the escape of the prisoners; for it was well known that Will Humphries aspired to the favor of pretty Lucy Elmore, and was triumphant in the post he now occupied, for he was in some part repaying the grudge he owed to Harry Longworth, her accepted lover. Harry, accordingly, was consulted by the rest in various plans for the release of Miss Ashby and Lucy; but none of them seemed practicable, and the poor fellow was at his wit's end between trouble for them and indignation at Sir Edward's mode of treating them.

So passed the day; and Eleanor and her maid remained in duress still. Their dinner and tea was brought up, Sir Edward himself accompanying the servant, as before, but merely for the sake of seeing that they made no attempt to bribe her; for he departed without a word, directly after the maid had set the things down.

Night came and passed, and Eleanor, unclosing her eyes to the dawn, realized, with even greater dread and anxiety than the day before, the unhappiness of her situation. Yet, repressing as far as she could, every outward evidence of her concern and distress, she encouraged Lucy, by her example, to cheerfulness; for the poor girl was in sad trouble for her mistress. And this second day passed like the other, to bring another night, that was this time a night of watching for Eleanor; for she could not close her eyes, and while Lucy slept, she kept a silent vigil.

Morley Briancourt experienced a feeling of triumphant security, meanwhile, in the nature of the plan adopted to bring his fair bride-elect to reason, as well as to prevent her from escaping his hands. These three days, passed by Eleanor in captivity, he spent in sauntering dreamily from room to room, walking in the park, whence, unseen, he could watch her casement, or in secret conferences with his father. He waited for a message from Eleanor, signifying her surrender; but he had prepared himself to look for unyielding resistance, as well; and in either case he felt that she was equally in his power. He sent a tenderly-worded epistle to her, beseeching her to relent. She returned it unopened. The circumstance augured unfavorably for his suit, certainly; but it did not make much difference to him.

The third day came to Eleanor in her captivity, and though she strove hard to hide her feelings, it was not difficult to see that this suspense and confinement were making her ill. There was an odd, strange hush pervading the old mansion. The servants went silently about their work as usual, but not a foot-fall but was muffled—not a voice that spoke above a murmur. It was like the utter stillness that reigns before a tempest. Morley Briancourt felt it. He became uneasy beneath its ominous influence. He wandered about restlessly.

That day was a wretched one to Eleanor. Morning passed, and noon, and her agitation became most intense. She could not control it longer.

"O, Lucy, Lucy, what will become of me!" she uttered once, clasping her hands with a gesture of despair, while her pale lips grew paler still, and the tears filled those bright eyes, late so smiling. "What is to become of me?" she repeated. "O, if I were only safe from here!"

Poor Lucy was distressed. Bitterly she wept for her mistress; but tears were of no avail.

Slowly the hours passed. At the usual time, their dinner was brought. Sir Edward had not entered the room since his first visit, always remaining outside; but now he sent the servant away, and came in.

"Well, Eleanor," he said, in a cold, harsh voice, "the time is fast expiring. Do you consent to receive Morley Briancourt for your husband?"

"No!" uttered Eleanor, sternly and reproachfully, glancing at her hard-hearted uncle, and then turning away to hide the tears that would rush down her cheeks.

"It is well. We will see whose will is the most powerful." And without another word, he went out, fastening the door outside as usual.

Eleanor sank into a seat, and buried her face in her hands. Lucy was alarmed at seeing her mistress thus give way.

"Dear Miss Eleanor," she said, anxiously, her eyes brimming with tears,—"dear Miss Eleanor, don't look so despairing, I beg of you! You don't seem like yourself a bit—and you so merry and light-hearted always, and so brave! You are as white as a sheet, too, and no wonder, for you have eaten nothing since yesterday. Come, do eat something, or I am sure you will faint away, and then what shall we do!"

As she spoke, she took from the tray a small plate, on which lay two small snowy rolls of bread, and brought it to her mistress.

"No, no—I do not want it, Lucy; I could not eat it," said Eleanor, languidly motioning her to take it away.

"O, do now, Miss Eleanor! you will surely faint away if you don't," urged Lucy, affectionately. "Come—you look so white—do now."

To please her, Eleanor took one of the rolls, but her fingers trembled as she broke it open, and the tears, blinded and choked her.

"O, Lucy, I cannot—cannot eat!" she uttered. And putting it back, she turned away, threw herself upon a couch, and hid her face in the pillows, her whole frame quivering with emotion.

But hardly had she done so, when a half-suppressed exclamation of astonishment from Lucy roused her again.

"See—see, Miss Eleanor!" she cried. "What is this?"

And Eleanor sprang from her couch, to behold, lying on the plate, where it had fallen from the roll she had broken, a folded paper.

"What, indeed?" she echoed, a flush of hope crimsoning her cheeks. With unsteady fingers she opened it, and found the following communication:

"FAIR MISTRESS ELEANOR,—Be ready, with your maid and whatsoever you may need to take with you, to leave your prison as the turret clock strikes nine. Your gaoler will be absent, and the way free. Harry Longworth will be at your door. A place of safety is provided. PEQUIN THE DWARF."

"O, can it be true, Miss Eleanor,—can it be true?" said Lucy, clasping her hands with delight, as Miss Ashby read the words aloud. "Then you are to be rescued after all! and Harry—"

"Hush—hush, dear Lucy; you will be overheard," said Miss Ashby, tremulously, as, almost, bewildered, she slowly re-read the note, not daring, at first, to believe it real. But it was real; it promised her escape; it was signed "Pequin the dwarf." A glow of happiness overspread her face, as, springing from the seat she had taken, she hid the note in her dress. "Yes, yes—it is true! I shall escape, Lucy, and you are to go with me," she uttered, in subdued but joyful tones. "It is only an hour hence; it will be soon. O, Pequin, my faithful friend, how little I thought of you! How well you watch over me!"

"O, Miss Eleanor, who would ever have thought it!" whispered the delighted Lucy. "It seems just like a romance—doesn't it? or magic, least-ways? But who is this Mr. Pequin? and how did he manage to get that billet into the cook's bread, I wonder?"

"O, he is a friend of mine, Lucy," said Miss Ashby, hurriedly,—"a friend on whom I depended too little in the hour of need. But do not stop to think of the how and wherefore of this matter; we shall know all soon. He is somewhere in disguise about the place, I dare say, watching us. Let us hasten to prepare ourselves."

And together the mistress and maid commenced gathering into a parcel a few garments to take with them, while their hearts beat tumultuously, and they trembled with joyful excitement.

It was quite dark in the corridor leading to Miss Ashby's rooms, for it ran along the west side of the house; and the moon, then at its full, had but just risen. Matthew Hawkins was pacing back and forth, a silent sentinel, wishing very much, it must be confessed, for a candle to read by, during his lonely watches. But that was beyond his reach; for the scullion, when she brought his dinner, had failed to provide him with some, and it was as much as his situation was worth, he knew, to go after them, and leave his post vacant. So he contented himself with walking up and down before Miss Ashby's door, and varying the exercise by leaning out of the windows along the wall where he was, and looking down upon the great park, stretching out in silent shadow below.

Suddenly, the far-off echo of a strange, shrill laugh came faintly to his ears. He listened to hear it again, so peculiar was the sound, wondering when it could come, and by whom it was uttered. He had not long to wait. A second time he heard it, as wild, as shrill, but as faint and distant as before. It seemed to him—for Hawkins had a tolerably sharp ear—that it came from the court-yard on the northeast, which was flanked by the two great wings of the mansion, and probably came from some one of the servants; and yet, as Hawkins reflected, he remembered no such voice as that among the servants at Ashby.

Now, curiosity is a failing which has been ascribed particularly to women, from a time that no one can remember; but for all that, men will sometimes be curious, too, which was the case, in this instance, with Matthew Hawkins, and the longer he thought of that strange laugh, the more curious he became concerning it. And presently, urged on by the malicious little spirit, he walked softly down the corridor a little way, to listen nearer.

While he stood thus, with head inclined in the direction from which the sound had come, his glance was caught by something tumbling about in a strange manner down in the park, for he was standing close by an open window. This object, in its turn, attracted his attention; truth to say, that was precisely what it was trying to do, and it succeeded. It seemed to be a human figure, making various strange gestures; and he leaned out from the window to look at it. A moment after he had done so, that odd laugh struck his ear again, seeming to proceed from the very object he was watching, and directly after it darted away, and around the north wing, so that he lost sight of it.

"Odd!" muttered Hawkins. "I wonder what it is? I think I'll see. Master swore he'd discharge me if I left this west corridor, or went even a dozen yards from that door. But it isn't a bit likely that Miss Eleanor'll know I'm gone, or he either; so here goes." And the worthy Hawkins, swallowing the bait held out, glided with the softness of a cat down the gallery, and around the corner, to the windows overlooking the court-yard.

Looking out here, he could see that a number of the servants were gathered together in the court below, and that they had in their midst something that seemed to interest them greatly, though what it was he was unable to discover, without reaching out over the stone sill, which was so broad and projected so far out as to hide from view the object of attraction, and if he should reach over, he would be seen—a fact which might get to Sir Edward's ears, and then Hawkins would get warning. He stood considering, wondering what they had to please them down there, and whether the strange little object which he had seen had anything to do with the matter, feeling the malicious spirit of curiosity urging him harder than ever to find out.

Suddenly, as he stood there, the people all disappeared; they had gone in with their attraction, whatever it was, to the servants' hall. A moment, and up from the back stairs, leading from the kitchen up to the north wing, where the servants' rooms were, ran two of the maids, giggling and out of breath. Hawkins shrank back.

"La me, Polly," said one of them, whom he recognized as the housemaid, "did you ever see the like of it in all your born days?"

"No, indeed," says Polly; "the curiousest thing! Who'd ever think a body could do sich things? My sakes alive, he can't be like other mortals, nohow, I'm sure!"

"O, he's a magician, Polly,—a magician!" responds Patty. "He can do anything he likes, he can. And the best's to come yet; so we must be quick, that we mayn't miss it. The luckiest thing that he came here—wasn't it? We don't often see sights like them. La, Polly, I shouldn't be astonished if he just took your handkerchief and shook it a little, and give it back to you with heaps of sovereigns in it; for money's nothing at all to people of that kind; they give it away."

Off went the maids into the north wing; and quick as thought, Hawkins slipped back into the corridor he had come from, thinking it the luckiest thing in the world that he had escaped observation, yet with his mind full of what he had heard.

In a moment, back came Polly and Patty, and the former ran directly down stairs as fast as she could go; but Patty managed to step on her dress, as she was following, and stumble when within a few feet of the stairs. Now Patty was an extremely pretty as well as a very coquettish girl; and Matthew Hawkins was not at all averse to her. So instead of leaving her to pick herself up, as he would have done if it had been the fat cook, he very gallantly sprang forward to help her.

"La now, Matthew, is that you?" she said, with an affected simper. "Why, I hadn't the least idea any one was up here. I thought everybody was down stairs a-seeing that queer little magician. Why, he's no higher than that," with her hand about three feet from the floor, "and he's doing such wonderful things! You ought to see him."

Hawkins's eyes sparkled. He had always been known to have a passion for feats of jugglery.

"Why, my dear," he said, "really I should like, of all things, to go, but then you know master says as how I must stay here; and orders must be obeyed."

"Well, so you ought, I suppose, if master tells you so," said Patty, reflectively; "but then it wouldn't do a mite of harm for you just to step down a few minutes, and he'd never know it in the world. You never see such things as this magician does. Come, it's a pity as you should lose it. Just step down the stairs, and you can stand somewhere along by the door there, where nobody'll see you, and I'm sure I'll never tell master of you. And he can't find it out any other way, for he's away off in the library with Mr. Briancourt and Mr. Morley."

"Tempting persuasion! It was more than Hawkins could resist. Down stairs he went with Patty, along the corridor below, and stopped at the door of the great hall where the magician was performing such feats as fascinated the servants, the greatest feat being one of which only one or two of those present besides himself was aware.

The little juggler cast a lightning glance towards the door as Patty entered, and an almost imperceptible smile curved her pretty lip and the dark lashes drooped over her laughing eyes as she saw that he recognized the success of his scheme. In a moment, Hawkins was as deep as the rest in the fascination of the magician's feats; and no one seemed to notice that, at the moment he entered, Harry Longworth silently withdrew through a small door at the other end of the apartment. At the same time, the door at the foot of the stairs leading up to the west gallery was closed by some invisible hand without attracting unnecessary attention.

And at that moment, the great clock tolled the hour of nine. While down the great staircase from the northeast gallery into the great hall, and through the court, sped silently and unseen three muffled figures. Away across the park, under the shadow of the trees, they glided to the distant highway; and the bird was free!

CHAPTER XVII.

THE SECURE RETREAT.

THE moon had but just risen, and her light had not yet begun to silver the slumbering glades of Ashby Park, when the silent figures of Eleanor and her attendant stole out beneath the trees, and glided along noiselessly and unperceived in their friendly shadow. Without a single word, they sped across to the confines of the park, where, at the gates, a carriage stood waiting. In this, Miss Ashby and Lucy were quickly placed; Harry Longworth sprang up outside, and they were borne away from the dangerous neighborhood they were in as fast as the two fresh and active horses could carry them.

"Free—free at last!" was Eleanor's glad and grateful ejaculation, and her heart throbbed with almost painful violence, as the uncertainty, and suspense, and excitement of the last few hours fled away, and the sense of liberty was hers again. She sank back in the carriage, unnerved and exhausted, yet with emotions of tumultuous gladness filling her breast; while Lucy drew a sigh eloquent of joyful relief.

"O, Miss Eleanor, it don't seem real!" she said, in a subdued voice.

And it scarcely seemed so to Miss Ashby. These three long and weary days of imprisonment, her unexpected deliverance, and this moonlight flitting wore all the aspect of a dream. But it was no dream. She was free at last, and felt herself in safe though invisible hands; for she knew that Pequin would do his utmost to secure her from the danger from which he had rescued her, and she did not doubt his power to do it. He had become bound to her by gratitude and affection; and he had both the means and the ability to serve her to a greater extent than many would have guessed.

The first flush of glad excitement at her escape was passed, and now she grew calmer. She thought of those she had left. Were they exulting in the security of their prize? They would know nothing of its escape until the morning, for she felt that Pequin's art was consummate, and that he would guard against an untimely discovery. And then she thought of Mary and Hugh Latimer. What would they say when they heard of her flight? Who would tell them of its cause? What would be their distress—their grief?

She was glad, happy, exultant, when she first left Ashby walls behind her. Now, as she thought of almost the only friend she had on earth, left thus in ignorance of her fate, she grew sad. And with these reflections, a sense of her own loneliness impressed her with emotions of inexpressible mournfulness. Fleeing thus from danger and wrong, at midnight, protected only by menials!

The tears filled her eyes, and glided slowly down her cheek. Looking up, she beheld Briarfield Park, with its dark woods and peaceful glades silvered by the moonbeams, that grew brighter every moment; and there, rising upon its wooded slope, was the hall. She bent forward, her heart beating sadly. "Happy—happy Briarfield!" she murmured. "O how are your peaceful inmates to be envied!"

She could not but weep, thinking of the happy dwellers in that peaceful home, and contrasting their position with her own. She brushed away the warm tears that filled her eyes. She could not see for them, and she must keep Briarfield in sight as long as might be, for who could tell when she would behold it again?

There were lights in the lower rooms—lights warm and pleasant, shining out into the park, and blending with the summer moonbeams. She knew that Aunt Dorothea, and Hugh, and Mary were sitting there. She could see them, in fancy, gathered about Mary's table, engaged in their various occupations. Were they thinking of her? Did Mary look up sometimes from her sewing, or Aunt Dorothea from her embroidery, to say, "I wonder how is Eleanor to-night?" And Hugh—did he suspend his sketching or his reading for one single moment, to make some response, or lean his handsome head thoughtfully upon his hand, as her name was mentioned?

An indescribable feeling of loneliness weighed upon her heart. She sank back in the carriage again, the tears once more stealing, unchecked this time, from beneath her drooping lids. And the carriage rolled on. Poor Lucy, wearied out with excitement and want of rest, had fallen asleep in the corner, with her head leaning against the cushions; but repose was impossible to her mistress, until the end of her journey was reached. Eleanor had received, in a few necessarily hasty words from Harry Longworth, ere they left the house at Ashby, some imperfect idea of her destination, which Pequin had prepared for her. It was a place some twenty miles from Ashby, but where, she could not exactly tell. They had passed half the distance before it was eleven o'clock, and it was probable that a little after midnight they would arrive at the end of the way. They stopped once to change horses at an inn, and then continued the route at still greater speed than before.

The midnight moon shone broad and clear over the quiet country landscape, when the carriage stopped at length at the head of a leafy lane, leading up to the door of a farmhouse, half-concealed from the road that ran past it, at a distance of some twenty or thirty yards, by its bowing trees and vines. Eleanor could see a light gleaming through the branches, as they drew up before the entrance of the lane, and a door was heard to open.

"This is the place, Miss Eleanor," said Harry Longworth, opening the door of the carriage,—"this is the place, and a safer one I don't think you could find. You will be secure from trouble here till such a time as there is no more need for concealment."

"May my good fortune grant it, Harry!" said Miss Ashby, warmly; "and—but what is this? who has preceded us here?"

"Who, indeed?" echoed Harry and Lucy, simultaneously, as they beheld, for the first time, a dark horse tied beneath the drooping branches of a willow, just within the entrance of the lane.

"Eleanor Ashby's servant," answered a sweet though somewhat melancholy voice that she recognized with an involuntary pause of astonishment; and that instant, to the utter surprise of them all, a well-known figure passed swiftly down the lane, and stood before them in the shape of Pequin the dwarf! He untied the horse from the tree, and sprang to the saddle.

"Pequin, my friend—my deliverer!" uttered Eleanor, impulsively, springing to his side, and putting her fair hand in his; "how shall I ever thank you for this service?"

"Pequin's happiness is in serving Eleanor Ashby," uttered the dwarf, in those musical tones that she liked so well to hear. "His happiness is in serving Eleanor Ashby. You owe him no thanks, sweet Eleanor, but he has not forgotten the gratitude he owes you. Go in yonder, dear lady; it is your refuge from much present and future danger. Harry Longworth," and with a smile lighting up his pale but delicate features, he turned to the young man,—"Harry Longworth, I say, you little thought that the magician would finish out his games and get here before you!"

"Little, indeed, sir," answered Harry. "And yet I do not know why I should be surprised at anything you may do, after the feats I saw you perform to-night."

"O, there was no magic in my getting hither," laughed the dwarf, good-humoredly, "no magic, Harry Longworth, but that you might have practised yourself, with a horse like mine, even though you had started an hour later, as I did. But go up yonder—go up yonder, Harry, with your mistress, and pretty Lucy here, and I will wait for you, and bear you company back. Good night, Eleanor Ashby, and all happiness be yours. I leave you in trusty hands, and the shelter you find here will be at your service so long as you may require it. Do not hasten to leave it, I charge you; for you cannot remain too long or too securely hidden from those who would wrong you. And now, good-night again, sweet Eleanor." And he bent down and kissed the fair hand he held, ere he released it.

"Good-night, my kind friend, and let my gratitude go with you," uttered Miss Ashby, warmly and with heartfelt earnestness.

Then, with Lucy and Harry Longworth, she went up the lane to the door of the farmhouse. There were two persons waiting there to receive them. In a moment they entered. The dwarf breathed a dreary sigh. "Poor Eleanor Ashby!" he muttered. Directly, Harry Longworth came back, and mounted the box, and in a short time both he and his companion had vanished along the moonlit road.

Meanwhile, Miss Ashby and her maid were standing within the farmhouse. As we have said, two persons were waiting there to receive them: an old man and his wife—an honest and kindly-looking pair, and the sole inmates of this secluded dwelling. They welcomed Eleanor and Lucy quietly and kindly. They had been looking for them since nightfall, they said. They had been prepared to receive their guests; and merely obeying the orders they had received, proceeded to make them comfortable, and asked no questions. A light repast was ready, of which Eleanor partook sparingly; for her mind was not yet calm, and her excitement prevented her from feeling the need of food, though she had eaten scarcely nothing since the previous day. And as soon as Lucy had taken some refreshment, the good dame showed them their apartments—a pleasant and neatly-furnished chamber for Miss Ashby, with a smaller one adjoining, and opening from it, for Lucy. The rooms and their arrangements were simple, neat and plain. They contrasted strikingly with those which had been hers at Ashby, in point of richness and elegance; but Eleanor looked about upon them with a feeling of indescribable gladness. The very contrast was a happiness; for was not this humble farmhouse a safe and happy refuge? and had not her late abode grown a place of dread to her? It had been her prison-house. "And I am safe here—I am safe here—safe!" she said to herself, with bowed head and clasped hands. They were all the words she could utter. Her heart was filled with them. She was out of Morley Briancourt's power.

The feelings of melancholy which had temporarily depressed her during the drive, were banished now. Then she had been too painfully sensible of her lonely situation, homeless and almost friendless as she was, fleeing secretly at midnight from the dangers that surrounded her. Now she banished those sad thoughts. She would only remember that she was safe, and hope for happier days. And so she laid her head on her pillow for the first time in her new abode.

CHAPTER XVIII.

CONSTERNATION OF THE TRIO.

It was morning at Ashby. At the usual hour, the household was stirring; but the same stillness prevailed throughout its precincts, as had been for the last three days. Sir Edward and his guests assembled together, at a little before seven, in the library. Breakfast had been laid in the adjoining apartment an hour or two earlier than the accustomed time, according to the order of the baronet; but it remained neglected. The three gentlemen seemed to have other business on hand. They remained for some fifteen or twenty minutes conferring together in the library. Sir Edward appeared to be slightly agitated, and was perceptibly paler than usual; yet there was desperate resolve in his face. His was the agitation of a man on the brink of ruin; the resolve which alone, as he knows, is able to save him from destruction, yet cannot hide from him the danger he is in.

Morley Briancourt was flushed and restless. He paced the room from side to side, and looked frequently at his watch. His father alone, of them all, betrayed not the slightest sign of any inward apprehension or disturbance; but though easy, graceful and self-possessed as ever, he was more subdued than usual. A brief conversation took place between them, and then Sir Edward went up stairs. A few moments elapsed, while Morley Briancourt continued to pace the floor of the apartment with restless agitation, and his father stood with folded arms gazing from a window.

Suddenly, a bell was heard to ring with startling violence. Again and again it was rung, peal upon peal; and Morley Briancourt and his father, with an involuntary exclamation, hastened out into the hall and up the great staircase to the hall above, whence the sound proceeded, and where they encountered some of the servants hurrying up from the back staircase towards Miss Ashby's rooms. All proceeded hastily thither; Morley Briancourt grown suddenly very pale, and struck with some indefinable fear—of, he hardly knew what.

The doors of Eleanor's apartment were flung wide open, directly through, from one to the other; and there, just at the threshold, stood Sir Edward Ashby, white and trembling, a picture of rage and despair.

"Ashby, what is it?" uttered Victor Briancourt, in an agitated tone; while Morley was unable to articulate a word, for the truth flashed upon him.

"She's gone, Victor,—she's gone; she is not here! Eleanor has vanished!" were the baronet's almost unintelligible words, broken by excitement and uttered in trembling, passionate, despairing tones.

"Gone!" echoed Morley Briancourt, in a hoarse voice, with the red flush rising to his brow, as he sprang impulsively towards the door, and paused there, silent and motionless; for it was too true.

"Where is Hawkins? Who let her out? Send my valet to me!" exclaimed Sir Edward Ashby, almost frantic at the escape of his ward; for now what was to become of him? He was in the power of Victor Briancourt. He turned madly to the servants. "Who dared to release her, I say?" he repeated, with a white cheek and clenched hand.

Not a soul answered. Those who stood there had been, until this moment, utterly ignorant of Miss Ashby's escape. The few who were privy to the affair, knowing well the meaning of the violent summons of Sir Edward, had taken care to keep away.

"Where is Hawkins?" asked Mr. Briancourt and Morley together. "How is it that he is not here?"

"I sent him away before I entered the room," answered the baronet, "thinking not of this discovery. He is answerable for her escape. I was a dolt to trust him! But I will see into it. Let every one of you," addressing the gaping servants, "assemble together directly in the library, and your fellows with you; and hark ye! see that Hawkins is there, also. I will know who did this!"

And the servants did as they were bidden.

"Hold! What is this?" cried Morley Briancourt, suddenly catching sight of a folded paper lying on the table.

It was directed to Sir Edward Ashby. In an instant the baronet had received and opened it; but his eyes wandered over it in vain. He was too fearfully excited to comprehend a single word. He gave it to Mr. Briancourt.

"Read it—read it, Victor," he said; "I cannot!" And he hid his face in his hands, with a bitter and hollow groan.

Mr. Briancourt read its contents aloud.

"I trust," they ran, "to be far away from Ashby, and from the reach of your tyranny, when you read this. Do not seek for me, for the search would be in vain. And do not cast the blame of my escape on those who are innocent. That escape is effected through the means of one whom you have never seen. Do not punish the servants. Twelve hours lie between my release and its discovery. I am free. Farewell!"

ELEANOR ASHBY.

"Twelve hours!" groaned the baronet, in anguish.

"Twelve hours!" echoed Morley Briancourt, setting his teeth with despairing fury.

"Sir Edward—Morley, there is but one way to treat this case," said the elder Briancourt, decisively. "We must discover what we can from the servants concerning her flight—for depend upon it, there are not many of them in ignorance of its means or manner,—and then set out in search of her."

"It is well. I will order the horses to be brought round," said the baronet, starting to move away, as he spoke. "But where shall we seek her?" he asked, pausing. He spoke in a tone of wretchedness, patting his hand, with a bewildered air, to his brow. "Where, but at Briarfield?" ejaculated Morley Briancourt, passionately,—where, but at Briarfield, with— He broke off short, with compressed lips and clenched hands, and a brow as black as a thunder-cloud.

"Ay—at Briarfield," echoed Sir Edward Ashby, frowningly. "Fool that I have been to suffer her going there so often!" He dashed his hand against his forehead with impotent passion. "Come, Morley—Victor, hasten!" he uttered, and strode down the gallery.

The servants were gathered together in the library for examination—all, even to Harry Longworth, but Hawkins, and he was missing. A second summons was sent by Sir Edward; but the bearer could not find him. A hasty search was instituted. In vain; he was nowhere visible. The inference of Sir Edward and his companions was, that he had connived at her escape. There was no further doubt of it. From the rest, no satisfaction could be gained. Not a word was said relative to the entertainment of the little juggler the night before, or of Hawkins's absence from his post; for but very few were aware of the latter circumstance, and they had warned all the rest to be silent in regard to the former. No one seemed to know anything concerning Miss Ashby's escape. Sir Edward dismissed them; and, baffled and enraged, sallied forth, threw himself upon his horse, and dashed across the park, with Morley Briancourt, towards Briarfield.

Both maintained an unbroken silence during their ride. Sir Edward was ghostly pale, and evidently terribly agitated; while his companion, on the contrary, betrayed by a flushed brow and an angry eye the storm that raged in his breast. Morley Briancourt's rage was deadly. He had imagined his prize to be so safe—so secure; and to have it thus slip from his grasp at last, it was too much. The thought of Hugh Latimer, too, maddened him still more; for his jealousy of him knew no bounds; and so fully and completely did it occupy his heart that his first conviction pointed out his rival and his family as the means of her escape, and their home as the place of her shelter.

Half an hour had not elapsed, from the time of their departure from Ashby, when they entered the park gates of Briarfield, and kept on their rapid way until the hall was reached, and they dismounted at the door.

Miss Latimer was not a little surprised, while seated quietly at breakfast with her aunt, to hear from a servant that Sir Edward Ashby was in the drawing-room, and desired to see either herself or her brother. He had never entered Briarfield gates before. What was his errand now? A sudden thought alarmed her. She had not seen Eleanor for three days. Could she be ill? Perhaps this was why Sir Edward had come. She hastened, her heart throbbing with fear, to meet her guest.

To her astonishment, she beheld Morley Briancourt with him. The coldest and haughtiest of salutations met her from them, and Sir Edward immediately announced to Miss Latimer the object of his visit. Still greater grew her astonishment—and now it was mingled with the most intense anxiety—on learning that Eleanor had disappeared from Ashby Place, though under what circumstances, Sir Edward was careful not to say; but Miss Latimer suspected, and with only too painful feelings, that it was to escape from a home grown unhappy. She was not prepared, however, for the abrupt question which accompanied the information, whether Miss Ashby was at Briarfield—a question that was hardly so much one as an assertion, either, and given with a manner that perplexed first, then startled and touched Mary Latimer, with feelings almost of indignation.

"I have not seen Miss Ashby," she answered, coldly, "for more than three days, as, I believe, I told you before."

"She is not here, then?" persisted Sir Edward, striving hard to suppress the tempestuous feelings that agitated him; while Morley Briancourt stood by, silent, dark, immovable, yet burning with furious impatience, as he listened to the baronet's questions and Miss Latimer's freezing answers.

"Miss Ashby is not at Briarfield," was the courteous yet chilling response.

Sir Edward rose, setting his teeth hard for a moment; while a darker frown momentarily blackened Morley Briancourt's brow.

"You say that Mr. Latimer is not at home," said the baronet, after a moment's pause. "May I ask, then—" He stopped short, his voice trembling with the inward storm.

Mary Latimer also rose, her clear cheek alternately flushing and paling.

"Sir Edward," she said, in as steady a voice as she could command, "my brother went yesterday morning to visit his lawyer at Merton. I am every instant expecting his return. If you have business with him, I must request—"

"Your pardon, Miss Latimer; I have no business with him," answered the baronet, hastily, and with trembling tones; for he had the utmost difficulty in suppressing the mingled rage and agony that he felt. "I wish you a very good morning." And he withdrew, followed by Morley Briancourt, who merely bowed with a dark and haughty air to Miss Latimer.

Sir Edward Ashby and his companion had failed.

It was not fifteen minutes after they had departed, when Hugh Latimer rode up to the hall door, and dismounting and leaving his horse to the groom who was approaching, with a rapid, springing step, entered the house. The light morning wind had blown back the beautiful dark hair from his fine brow, and kindled a clearer light in his dark eyes. He looked, if possible, handsomer—nobler than ever; and yet there was a quiet seriousness in his countenance, habitual to it of late, that took the place of the graceful animation natural to his usual air.

Mary met him in the hall. He cast his arm affectionately about her, and bent to kiss her.

"My dear sister," he said, anxiously, noticing her troubled expression with alarm,—my dear sister, what has occurred to distress you?"

"O, Hugh," she answered, with the tears springing to her eyes, "Eleanor has disappeared from Ashby. She has gone. They cannot find her anywhere!"

He turned pale as death.

"Mary—impossible!" he ejaculated. "Who told you so? When did you hear it?"

She told him, as clearly as her agitation would allow.

He paced the hall back and forth with an anxious face.

"Mary, depend upon it," he said, presently, in a troubled tone, "it is the tormenting impertinence of Morley Briancourt that has been the means of driving her away, perhaps the harsh threats of her uncle as well. For no other cause would she have fled from her home, and thus secretly, too,—without even a word to you. She must have been driven to despair. But where is she? where shall we find her? O, Mary!"

Suddenly the bell at the side door was rung. Mary advanced to open it, and beheld there, when she had done so, Mrs. Millett, the housekeeper from Ashby.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

BURIED TREASURES.

A company of English gentlemen has proposed to the Roman government to turn the current of the Tiber from its bed near the city, with the understanding that the company should retain possession of whatever treasures it might discover in the old channel. It is believed that many treasures of art have in ages past been buried beneath the waters of the Tiber, and that a search for them would prove successful both in a pecuniary and in an antiquarian point of view. A correspondent of the New York Observer expresses the opinion that sculptures more perfect, and perhaps more beautiful than any of the ancient works of art now seen in Rome, lie embedded in groups beneath the stream. "Agostino Chigi, the famous banker at the time of Leo X., once gave a splendid entertainment to the pope and his cardinals, at which the dishes were all of precious metals. It is said that the dishes were all thrown into the Tiber by order of the rich banker, in order that no less illustrious guest might ever use them. The sacred vessels brought from Jerusalem by Titus, among them the golden candlesticks, are reported to have been lost from the Milvian bridge, and if so, are still lying there." The present government of Rome suffers nothing belonging to ancient art to pass from her territory, and we do not think it probable that a foreign company it will grant permission to make the desired investigation.—Manchester Olio.

LITTLE ISAAC NEWTON.

He had not been long at school before he exhibited a taste for mechanical inventions. With the aid of little saws, hammers, hatchets and tools of all sorts, he was constantly occupied during his play hours in the construction of models of known machines and amusing contrivances. The most important pieces of mechanism which he thus constructed, were a windmill, a water-clock, and carriage to be moved by the person who sat in it. When a windmill was in the course of being erected near Grantham, on the way to Gunnerby, Sir Isaac frequently watched the operation of the edge of the mechanism, and he completed a working model, of which, Dr. Sturdy says, was "as clean and curious a piece of workmanship as the original." This model was frequently placed upon the top of the house in which he lived at Grantham, and was put in motion by the action of the wind upon its sails. In calm weather, however, another mechanical agent was required; and for this purpose a mouse was put in requisition, which went by the name of the miller. The mouse was supposed to act upon something like a tread-wheel when attempting to reach some corn placed above it; or, it was placed within a wheel, and, by pulling a string tied to its tail, it went forward "by way of resistance," and thus turned the mill.—Sir David Brewster.

A TRAITOR REBUKED.

At a dinner-party of sixteen guests, recently given in St. Petersburg, expressions unfavorable to the emperor were made use of. A complete report of all that took place, with the names of the host and the fifteen guests, and the expressions used, was forwarded to the empress-mother in an anonymous letter, which was communicated to the emperor, who sent for the giver of the party, and asked for the names of all the guests assembled on the occasion. This list of names included sixteen guests; and that name among them that had not been found among the fifteen named in the denunciation was, of course, that of the anonymous writer. This latter, a colonel in the guards, was sent for, and the emperor addressed him as follows:—"You seem to have an inclination, as well as some talent, for service in the police-force or the gendarmerie; if you like to enter it you can, but the guards is not the place for you. If you prefer to leave the service altogether, you shall find your conge ready for you." The giver of the party came off with only a few words of reproof and warning from the emperor.—Freeman's Journal.

THE LOVE OF CHILDREN.

Tell me not of the trim, precisely-arranged homes where there are no children; "where," as the good Germans have it, "the fly-traps always hang straight on the wall." Tell me not of the never-disturbed nights and days, of the tranquil, unanxious hearts where children are not. I care not for these things. God sends children for another purpose than merely to keep up the race—to enlarge our hearts, to make us unselfish, and full of kindly sympathies and affections; to give our souls higher aims, and to call out all our faculties to extended enterprise and exertion; to bring round our fireside bright faces and happy smiles, and loving, tender hearts. My soul blesses the Great Father every day, that he has gladdened the earth with little children.—Mary Howitt.

BANKS OF NEWFOUNDLAND.—FISHING FOR COD.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND COD FISHERY.

The first picture on this page represents a fleet of large fishing vessels on the banks of Newfoundland, fishing for cod. The crews are not visible, being sheltered by the sails rigged along the sides, but they are not idle for all that, as the number of lines dropped into the water testify. The second cut, with the brig stern on, has a sectional view of the water, for the purpose of showing the length of line paid out in the deep sea fishing. A school of fishes are playing round the bait, and some of them, victims of their greediness, will soon be flapping their last on the deck of the brig. The third engraving, with the sloop boat broadside on, exhibits the style of left hand corner of the picture. The first thing which strikes a stranger in Newfoundland is the abundance of what are called the fish-flakes and stages, together with the wooden wharves and the great dark red storerooms. The fish-flakes are a rude platform constructed of slender poles, with a matting of sticks and boughs for the reception of the fish. The stages are more strongly built than the flakes, and are generally in the shape of a small pier jutting out into the water, consisting of a platform of poles laid closely together side by side, and nailed

DEEP SEA-FISHING.

COD-FISHING ON SHOAL GROUND.

craft and the manner of catching cod on shoal ground. The man in the bow is just unhooking a fine specimen. The fourth engraving shows a party of men pulling the seine to shore, a mode of taking the fish employed where the water is quite shallow. In the last engraving we have a fishing station with a wharf and storeroom. The "fish-flakes," frames on which the fish are dried, are shown in the down to a strong framework that is supported by stout posts and shores. They are frequently the only landing-places in the harbor. The central part of the stage is roofed over either with boards or boughs, and here the operations of splitting and salting the fish generally take place. The whole labor of preparing the fish is managed with much skill and dexterity.

CATCHING COD WITH THE SEINE.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)
FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE.

BY SARAH A. NOWELL.

They hid the thundering cannons cease
 To tell war's dreadful story—
 The battle's o'er—the song of peace
 Succeeds the notes of glory.

O, thick upon the bloody plain,
 Lies many a fallen brother,
 And sons whose dear lips ne'er again
 Can greet the tearful mother.

And husbands, whose protecting arm
 And love, so kindly heeded,
 Can never shield again from harm,
 The wife forever parted.

But where is she who closed their eyes—
 That maiden brave and noble?
 Who soothed them with her sympathies
 In that dark hour of trouble?

O, gentle Florence! on thy head
 Full many a benediction
 Shall rest, when thinking of the dead
 In hours of deep affliction.

And when thy latest breath shall fail—
 To earth thy last look given—
 The name of Florence Nightingale
 Shall echo up to heaven!

From the maimed soldier's grateful heart
 The prayer shall rise forever,
 And, in his deepest thoughts, thy care
 Shall be forgotten never!

Sweet Florence! such a fame as thine
 Shall dearer live in story,
 Than all the names that brightly shine
 In war's brief tale of glory.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)
THE FORGERY.

BY RICHARD CRANSHAW.

UPON her knees, with the old man's arm twined fondly about her neck, while his fingers play nervously with her soft curls, and seeking with her glad blue eyes to catch his wandering gaze, kneels Archibald Preston's daughter. The firelight dances on the walls, and close-drawn curtains shut out the gathering darkness slowly dropping upon country and on town. The working world has ceased to labor, and peaceful home firesides replace the turmoil and traffic of the day. From anvil and loom the sounds of busy toil have ceased, and the dim humming of vast machinery is pleasantly superseded in the toiler's ear, by the merry singing of the fireside kettle. Pale brows no longer pore blindly over huge ledgers, and forth from barn and hayfield the tired laborer bends his homeward pathway.

But upon the countenance of Archibald Preston grave thoughts have marked their impress, and the season of rest but leaves more time for their painful sway over his mind. The light of home will not drive off these gathering shadows—the glad smiles of Lucille, his daughter, do not dispel their gloom. She has essayed to please him with the music of some of his favorite old ballads, and, as she rises from the instrument, drops herself at the old man's feet, and with her pretty head resting on his knee, looks up in his face and wonders at these fits of sadness which have of late so often come over him, and which are now clouding his countenance and looking forth from his vacantly gazing eye.

"Father, what is it makes you look so careworn and sad? Your hand trembles, too, as you pass it gently over my forehead, as though some painful thoughts were busy in your mind. Tell me of them, father; I may not be able, child as I am, to aid or assist, but surely I can sympathize with the sorrows of my father—of my only parent?"

Again was the trembling hand passed softly over that fair young brow, and now the wandering eyes looked for the first time, sadly down upon the bright ones at his knee. He seemed as if scarce knowing how to break the communication that he wished to make, and dim their lustre with the recital. His daughter, as she looked up at him, thought he seemed a very feeble old man, with less of resolution than he even usually possessed in times past. With an effort he at length broke the silence.

"Lucille, my own dear child, listen to me. It is a story of real life which I have to relate to you. Draw close up beside me while I tell it—close up."

He appeared for a moment to forget how to begin, or what it was he was about to say.

"Yes, father!"

This recalled him, and he began again.

"Some years ago, I knew a merchant in business like myself, who had, at the time of which I speak, two children—a daughter and a son. He was possessed of a sufficiency to keep these children in competence, but knowing full well the dangers of a life of idleness, determined to place his son in some active business. In his own counting-room he felt that he would not meet with the necessary discipline, and so placed him with one he thought a friend—for they had frequently done business together—and who promised to bestow all the care and attention in his power upon his son.

"Time went on. The youth approached manhood. The father looked fondly towards the day when his son should take his own place in the business to which he himself had devoted his energies in his younger lifetime. The son appeared all that a father could wish, and seemed uncontaminated by the youthful indiscretions and excesses common to others situated as he was."

The old man paused, and stifled a heavy sigh as it arose from his heart.

"Yes, father—I am listening."

"The will of Providence had chosen that this father's hopes should be blasted, and the bright visions he had built in the dim future should dissolve into the air that formed them. God willed that death should lay its finger upon the young man's brow, and that the heart which beat in all the hopefulness of ripening manhood, should suddenly grow still and cold forever. He had said it, and 'His will be done.'"

And he bowed his white head reverently as he spoke.

"There is a tear upon your cheek, father—this son—"

"Be patient yet for a while. A heavy grief this to that father's mind, but O, not so deep as one yet in store for him. Better—ten thousand times better—that the hope and pride of that man should be thus laid beneath the church-yard mound, than that he should have lived on to bring shame and disgrace upon those who had ushered him into the world. Better that he should have died before his feeble footsteps first essayed to walk alone, than grow up into manhood and have the finger of scorn pointed at him as he passed along. After he died, it was found out that he had committed forgery."

A fearful shudder passed through his frame as he uttered the last word, and his daughter saw that his lips moved convulsively while his countenance became ghastly pale. She listened—terror-stricken at, she scarcely knew what.

"Forger! yes, that's the terrible name! The name that was to bring down the gray hairs of his fond, doting father with sorrow to the grave! The name which was to stamp upon his innocent sister's cheek the blush of burning shame, and cause her to shrink from the rude gaze of the scornful world, which knew her now but as the sister of a felon! But one way was left to avoid this fearful consequence. The forgery was executed in the name of the employer of the youth, and he alone possessed the fatal evidence of the crime. But one way left—but this too dreadful almost to think of. It was, that the sister—don't tremble, darling—the sister should consent to give her hand in marriage to this man who held the proof of the brother's guilt."

"When this was proposed to the father, his first impulse was to dash to the ground the man who could thus coolly barter the price of peace of mind for, perhaps, the life-long misery of a beloved daughter. But this fiend, in measured, mocking accents showed him how he could use the damning testimony for his destruction, and that of his child, and showed him how powerless he really was. He would have cast aside all thoughts of his position and standing as a prosperous merchant and sought refuge in a foreign land, but all his attempts were baffled by his persecutor, who threatened discovery upon the instant, should he persist in attempting to escape the doom which hung over him. There was nothing, alas! for it but to submit to the destiny written out by the hand of fate. He gave a reluctant, heart-wrung consent, and then, indeed, he felt that his cup of misery was filled even to the brim."

He buried his face in his hands, and sobbed aloud. His daughter could not even attempt to soothe him, her own heart was beating too wildly with the sickening terror of what she felt was coming.

"The time allowed before this man should claim his bride flew swiftly—O, how swiftly—by, and as the hour approached, this heart-broken father knew not how to break the dreadful tidings to her. His brow grew each day more furrowed with the intensity of sorrowful thought—his step each hour still feebler, more with grief than age, though this, too, was growing on apace. Winter was the old man's hair and more bent his form as the time passed on, and the secret was yet undivulged."

His arm was twined still closer about her trembling figure, and this alone kept her from sinking with the unknown terror which pervaded her, and falling prostrate down beside his feet.

"Shall I stop here, or does the story affect my child too greatly for her further listening?"

He had to bend down his head until the gray hairs mingled with the soft golden ones, before he could catch the whisper from her lips.

"No—no—go on—I shall be better presently."

"How can I go on? My God! this is a fearful task!"

The big drops of perspiration stood upon his furrowed brow, and as they rolled down upon his cheeks, mingled with the tears that flowed from his eyes.

"How can I finish this recital of a tale too true—too horribly true? It must be told though, sooner or later, and now—now is the time, or never. This man, this merchant—call yourself, darling—is no other, as you must have guessed ere this, than—myself. This son, who lies cold and dead in the grave, and whose sin has brought so great a punishment with it, was your brother Edward. The arbiter of our fate is John Freecroft, and the innocent victim is my poor, poor child, who now is gathered close up to her wretched father's bosom. The story is told, my own Lucille—my darling—my loved one!"

And as he gathered her up to his breast from the ground whereon she had sunk, she uttered one cry of anguish, and then lay quite motionless and still in her aged father's arms.

A man with heavy, beetling eyebrows, and a low, swart forehead, on which bad passions have marked their traces, and in whose eye the gleam of cunning is perceptible, as it glances furtively hither and thither; a man of low figure and shrivelled limbs, and with a face seldom lifted to look its interlocutor standily in the face; and this is John Freecroft, who holds the destiny of Archibald Preston and his daughter within his hard and unrelenting grasp.

He is engaged in examining a number of different papers, taken from a box strongly bound with iron clasps, and as the faint glare of the solitary candle on the table falls upon each, his face becomes still more repulsive in its yellow ugliness. Muttering over to himself sundry interjections expressive of pleasurable emotions or the reverse, he takes out paper after paper from the box, unfolds it, reads it over, and then carefully replaces it from whence he has taken it.

"Yes, yes," said he, as if continuing a conversation which had hitherto been held confidentially with some familiar demon in his own breast, "they have not seen the light for some time, nor will they again until such time as each has its particular duty to fulfil. I was surely intended by nature for a lawyer, not a merchant, for this head," patting it with his hard, bony hand, "is too subtle for the mere brokerage and commissions the dealing in which is my only apparent occupation. Ugh! ugh! ugh!"

And he laughed one of his harsh, dry laughs as he let his fancy wander thus pleasantly about.

"But this is not business."

And again he began rummaging within the iron-clasped box, drawing forth paper after paper, and commenting thereon, as each one met his view. Amongst others he drew forth a small-sized document, and as he held it up and read it by the faint light, he laughed again, harsher and drier than ever. He read it aloud.

BOSTON, MARCH 6, 18—

Messrs. Steadwell & Blunt: Please pay to the order of Edward Preston, the sum of one thousand dollars on demand.

$1000 00. [Signed] JOHN FREECROFT.

"Now, who would think to look upon that bit of scrawled paper, that there was so great an amount of good or evil depending upon it? Ha, ha, ha. John Freecroft, you are a long-headed man, but all you ever did in the way of keen chicanery was mere child's play compared to this! I gain, as well as the possession of a good round sum with her, one of Boston's proudest beauties for a wife, and by the simple sitting myself down and tracing with a pen these same few characters which bear so vast a signification. Forgery! It's a little word, but what a dictionary of meaning is in its sound! To think mankind should be such fools! I scribble off a line upon a piece of paper, sign it with my own name, present it to the eyes of a father, telling him it is the work of his son—laid quietly enough in the ground—and forthwith I have but to make my own terms that it may never see the light. Faith! I should be sorry if it were, for other eyes might prove somewhat sharper than those of the old dotard. And he thought I was his friend! why so I am—after a fashion! Do I not honor his family by uniting myself with it? Ha, ha, ha! the ugly bugbear whom children call after in the street, he is to be the husband of dainty Lucille Preston! He will bear off the prize from a host of young and handsome competitors, and perhaps they won't open their eyes a trifle at the lady's peculiar taste! O, but it's a good joke—a rare good joke!"

And again he laughed his hideous laugh, but suddenly stopped and looked cautiously around.

"Ha! I thought I heard a noise! Could it have been that hateful young dog, Natterby?"

He made a spring towards the door of a sort of closet opening from the office, and holding the candle aloft in his hand, looked in. Upon the floor was laid a rude couch, composed of straw covered with old clothes and a spare dirty blanket, and stretched out upon this was the motionless figure of a lad of not more than eight or nine years, to judge from his looks, but in reality much older. Little and pinched and thin from the bringing up of a life of poverty, was the office boy, Mat Natterby; and here it was when the hard labor of the day was ended, that he was grudgingly allowed the luxury of going to bed, and forgetting in sleep the brutality of John Freecroft, who usually made him the recipient of his freaks of vexation and ill-humor.

Approaching, he laid his hand upon the boy's breast, to discover by its beating whether he were moved by any waking emotion, or were in reality as sound asleep as he appeared. The test seemed satisfactory, for he soon after left him, after making a feint of bestowing a parting kick at him as he lay in unconsciousness before him. John Freecroft must have somebody to hate—this friendless lad served the purpose admirably. He quitted the place and closing the door, Mat Natterby was once more left in darkness. The papers were replaced in the iron-clasped box, and this in its turn securely locked in his private desk, and John Freecroft, after depositing the keys of both receptacles in his pocket, turned and left the office, locking the door after him.

Slowly and cautiously, as soon as he was gone, the door of the boy's sleeping room opened, and a shock head of hair from under which peered two cunning eyes, looked forth into the darkness. The door was held ajar for a moment, as he listened to the sound of his master's retreating footsteps, and to assure himself of being quite alone, and then Mat Natterby stepped into the office and after lighting a candle which he brought out from a cupboard, proceeded to seat himself upon a high stool and commune with himself somewhat in this wise:

"So, you old rascal, I've got you at last, and now if I don't pay you up for some of the kicks and cuffs and starvings I've had from you, my name is not Matthew Natterby! I always knew you for a downright old scoundrel, but I didn't know the half of it! Why, there's enough in that box to send you to the State's prison for the remainder of your ugly life, you old shrivelled up reprobate! And so you'll marry Miss Preston, will you?—the kind young lady who came to see mother and the baby that winter when we were all without money or food or fire, and who meant me kindly I know when she got her father to recommend me to this situation where I am. Of course it's no fault of her's that it's no better than it is, for when Mr. Edward was alive, of whom this master of mine has been lying so confidently, he and old Mr. Preston used to do business together. He thinks me almost a fool—well, he shall have a chance to find out whether he's right or not."

And as he spoke, the lad drew from his pocket a bunch of old rusty keys and proceeded to try the lock of the desk with them. One of them unlocked it, and he then, with a grin of delight, drew forth the box containing the suppressed evidence of Edward Preston's forgery.

"Now if I can only open this, I can take the paper out, and replace the box, and ten to one he'll never suspect its being opened until too late for his schemes. No—none appear to fit, ah, this one ought to—yes! hurrah! it turns—and here's the very paper itself! Now then," said he, as he carefully replaced the box in the desk after seeing it safely relocked, "as soon as young Mr. Barrington comes in the morning, I'll tell him all and with his help we'll see whether the old rip will have it any longer his own way!"

And as he spoke he turned the key in the desk and locked it, at the same time heaving a sigh of intense gratification at his success, and then betook himself with a quiet grin on his youthful countenance, back to his miserable bed to brood over the events of the coming morning, and ever and anon to shake his lean fist in the dark at some airy phantom of his imagination.

And now indeed upon the eve of his wedding day, John Freecroft had a sword hanging over his head of whose existence he dreamed not, and it was held by no less a personage than his despised office boy—Mat Natterby—the poverty-stricken, the kicked and the abused slave of his bidding.

Back once again to Archibald Preston and his daughter.

"There, father, it is past. I am ready to make this trial—I am ready to be led to the altar by this man, if, in so doing, I do but save you one moment of pain, my own dear father."

"God bless thee, darling, and forgive me if in what I am about to do, I am playing with the happiness of the only being left me to love upon earth. But to think of the world pointing at us as we go by, as stained and contaminated—to think of old familiar faces turning aside from us as we pass along the street—it is too terrible even to contemplate!"

And so the preparations for the strange marriage went on, and the day arrived. John Freecroft, arrayed gorgeously in what he probably considered the extremity of taste, but which, in truth, made him look, if possible, uglier than ever, rode down to the office, and there leaving word with his head clerk that he should probably be absent for a few days, directed his carriage towards the house of his intended bride.

He is ushered into the drawing room, in which a few near friends of the family are assembled, and there finds poor Lucille looking as little like a happy bride as he himself resembled the generally received idea of a pleasant-faced bridegroom. The simple white of her dress accords dismally with the deadly pallor of her cheek, and to look at the faces of all present, it would seem more like a funeral than a wedding party.

A distant relative of Milesian extraction is present, who has answered the invitation with the full determination of enjoying himself, but has by degrees found that good spirits are entirely out of place, and gradually works himself into a state of comical pugnacity, as he looks with a puzzled countenance from one to another of the assembled party. His bewilderment increases as John Freecroft makes his appearance, and when he sees the visible shudder with which his young relation receives her intended husband, the whole of his spleen is directed to the little, ugly bridegroom, and he has a strong inclination to take him up in his stalwart arms and without farther parley to pitch him headlong from the window.

But John Freecroft is happily ignorant of what is passing in his mind, and stooping over her delicate hand and imprinting thereon a salute, he proceeds to lead the almost fainting Lucille towards the man of God waiting to commence the office of the marriage ceremony.

"And if any man shall know of any just cause or impediment why these two persons be not joined together in the holy bonds of matrimony, he shall speak now, or else forever after hold his peace!"

They stood hand in hand together before the minister—the old man supporting his trembling child, and the various members of the family gathered round in respectful silence. The Irish relation standing near the shrivelled up figure of the bridegroom, towered above him with anything but a pleased aspect, and looked beside him like a giant bending over an ugly little dwarf, whom it was his intention to swallow at a mouthful the moment the conclusion of the ceremony should leave him at liberty so to do. By the door a group of family servants stood and looked on in wonder at their young and beloved mistress who was throwing herself away upon such an unsightly miscreant. There was a pause of a second's duration as the minister made the customary adjuration.

"There is both cause and impediment why this marriage should proceed no further!"

The sound of the unexpected voice came from the group of servants at the door. All eyes were instantly turned in the direction whence it came, and wonder was depicted upon every face as Henry Barrington stalked calmly into the room.

"What does my clerk here? I command you, sir, to leave the room you have entered so abruptly, and another time I shall demand from you an explanation of this insolence!"

"You shall have it now, sir."

Then turning to the company he continued:

"Ladies and gentlemen, I am really sorry to occasion this disturbance, but when you know the villainy of this man, you will, I am sure, forgive me for preventing the commission of a great wrong."

"Will somebody have the kindness to send for an officer, and have this madman arrested!"

"One moment," said Henry—"come in, Mat!"

Enter Mat, bearing in his hands the box. The moment the astonished eyes of John Freecroft caught sight of its well-known iron clasps, he uttered a loud yell of rage, and made a spring towards the boy to tear it from him. The Milesian relative, conceiving this to be an admirable opportunity for his interference, caught him by the coat-collar ere he could fulfil his intention, and, holding him at arm's length, thus addressed him:

"Now then, ye ugly little yellow cockchafer, you'll just compose yourself for a while till we get at the bottom of this matter. Go on with your story, young man."

"I hold in my hand a paper purporting to be a forgery committed by your son, sir," addressing Archibald Preston, "but which is neither more nor less than a base fabrication of that man there," pointing to John Freecroft, who made a struggle to free himself from his enemy, who merely noticed it by giving him such a shake as a mother would bestow on a refractory infant. "There stands the real culprit. Your dead son is as innocent of an attempt to forge that man's name as is a child unborn. Look at him now—see how his yellow cheek blanches, and how his vile frame trembles. Is that the look of an innocent man?"

"A trick—a vile trick! for what purpose done I know not. Give me up that box—my property."

"Will ye be quiet, ye little devil?" said the Irishman.

"Not until one or two other documents have seen the light."

And as he spoke Henry was about to draw forth the rest of the papers, when the baffled villain felt himself completely in his power and screamed out to him to desist.

"I will confess all—that I did write that pretended forgery, but do not for pity's sake reveal the remainder of those papers."

"It is too late—your villainy has recoiled upon your own head. The disposal of them no longer rests with me. The law will decide whether you are guilty or innocent of various charges of fraud and cheating, the proofs of which are contained in that box. Officer, you may now do your duty—I have finished mine."

And as he spoke a hard-featured man walked with a business-like manner into the room, and proceeded to relieve the Irish relative of his charge. That gentleman could not forbear giving John Freecroft a parting shake that made his teeth chatter as he took his leave of him. He addressed him a word or two before he went.

"There ye are, ye little villain, and I hope you'll be pleased with your quarters, for you'll find it rather difficult to scrape up a friend willing to go bail for your ugly carcass. You'll not sleep quite so elegantly as you expected, but let me tell you for a parting word—it's a dale too good for ye as it is. So take the good wishes of all present that they may live to see your hanging day, and begone!"

He was gone, and a happier group was assembled than there had certainly promised to be on the morning of that eventful day. In reward for the great service rendered by Mat Natterby, the poor office lad, he was placed in an excellent situation in Mr. Preston's office, and there he soon gave promise of growing up, with proper care, into a fine man. And in reward for the exertions by which Henry Barrington had distinguished himself, there was found in time but one way to repay it. It was bestowed by the delicate hand of sweet Lucille Preston herself, and was neither more nor less, in short, than the privilege of calling that same little hand his own.

MEDICAL USE OF SALT.

In many cases of disordered stomach, a teaspoonful of salt is a certain cure. In the violent internal aching, termed colic, add a teaspoonful of salt to a pint of cold water; drink it and go to bed; it is one of the speediest remedies known. The same will revive a person who seems almost dead from receiving a heavy fall. In an apoplectic fit, no time should be lost in pouring down salt and water, if sufficient sensibility remain to admit of swallowing; if not, the head must be sponged with cold water until the senses return, when salt will completely restore the patient from his lethargy. In a fit, the feet should be placed in warm water, with mustard added, and the legs briskly rubbed, all bandages removed from the neck, and a cool apartment procured, if possible. In many cases of severe bleeding at the lungs, and when other remedies failed, Dr. Rush found that two teaspoonfuls of salt completely stayed the blood. In case of a bite from a mad dog, wash the part with strong brine for an hour, and then bind on some salt with a rag. In toothache, warm salt and water held to the part, and renewed two or three times, will relieve it in most cases. If the gums are affected, wash the mouth with brine. If the teeth be covered with tartar, wash them twice a day with salt and water.—Medical Journal.

MUSICAL JEALOUSY.

A singular incident in natural history occurred lately at Chester, England. A thrush in a happy state of freedom was trilling its notes in the orchard below the walls, near the "wishing steps," when its music excited similar efforts from a caged bird of the same species, which was suspended in front of one of the adjacent houses. These feathered songsters persevered in raising their melodies to higher and higher efforts, as if in earnest rivalry; when suddenly the bird among the trees darted from its perch upon the wicker cage of its competitor, broke the bars, entered it, and commenced an assault upon the musical captive; the owner of which, hearing the unusual noise, came out, took the aggressor prisoner, and sold it into bondage. The ill-tempered thrush had therefore paid the penalty of sacrificing its freedom to its jealousy. This anecdote is a fact, and not written as it might seem to be, for the purpose of pointing a moral against musical jealousies among human vocalists.—Dunfries Herald.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE UNKNOWN ARTIST.

AN INCIDENT IN THE LIFE OF RUBENS.

BY E. K. SMITH.

ONE day, Rubens, while strolling through the environs of Madrid, entered a convent whose rules were exceedingly severe, and remarked, not without surprise, over the poor and humble altar of the monastery, a picture that disclosed the most wonderful talent. This picture represented the head of a monk. Rubens called his pupils, and showed them the painting; all shared in his admiration.

"Who could have been the author of this work?" demanded Van Dyke, the favorite pupil of Rubens.

"There was a name written at the bottom of the picture, but it has been carefully effaced," replied Van Shulden.

Rubens sent for the friar, saying that he wished to speak with him. When the old monk came slowly up the aisle, he asked him the name of the artist who had won his admiration.

"The painter is no longer in this world."

"Dead!" cried Rubens. "Dead! and up to this time no one has known him, no one has mentioned with admiration his name, which will be immortal, his name that will surpass mine! And yet," added the artist, with a noble pride, "and yet, my father, I am Peter Paul Rubens." At this name, the pale visage of the friar was animated with a sudden glow. His eyes sparkled, and he fastened his gaze upon Rubens with an expression of more than mere curiosity; but this exaltation lasted but a moment. The monk dropped his eyes, crossed upon his breast his arms, that in a moment of enthusiasm he had raised toward heaven, and repeated:

"The painter is no longer in this world."

"His name, my father, his name, that I may make it known to the universe; that I may give him the glory that is his due."

Rubens and Van Dyke, Jordaens and Van Shulden, his pupils, I might almost say his rivals, surrounded the venerable friar, suppleating him to instantly disclose the name of the artist.

The monk trembled; a cold sweat ran down from his forehead upon his emaciated cheeks, and his lips contracted convulsively, as if about to reveal the mystery that he alone knew.

"His name! his name!" repeated Rubens.

The monk made a solemn gesture with his hand.

"Listen to me," said he; "you have misunderstood me; I told you that the painter of that picture was no longer in this world; but I never told you that he was dead."

"He lives! He lives! O, let us know him! Let us know him!"

"He has renounced the things of this world; he is in a cloister; he is a monk."

"Monk! my father! monk! O, tell me in what convent, for he must leave it. When God marks a man with such talents, this man must not be allowed to live in solitude. God has given him a sublime mission—he must accomplish it. Tell me the cloister where he is concealed; I will go and take him from it, and show him the glory that awaits him. If he refuses, I will cause him to be ordered by our holy father the pope to re-enter the world, and again take up his brushes. The pope loves me, my father! the pope will listen to my entreaty."

"I will neither tell you his name, nor the cloister where he is concealed," replied the monk, in a resolute tone.

"The pope will command you," replied the exasperated Rubens.

"Listen to me," said the monk, "listen to me, in the name of Heaven. Think you that this man, before leaving the world, before renouncing fortune and glory, had not striven against a similar resolution? Think you that he has not experienced bitter deceptions, cruel griefs, that have finally taught him," said he, smiting his breast, "that all below is vanity? Leave him to die in the asylum that he has found against the world and its despair. Your efforts will accomplish nothing. It is a temptation, in which he will come out victoriously," he continued, making the sign of the cross; "for God will not take from him his aid; God who, in his mercy, has deigned to call him to himself, will not thrust him away from his presence."

"But, my father, it is immortality he renounces."

"Immortality is nothing in comparison with eternity." And the monk pulled his hood over his face, and changed the subject of discourse in a manner that prevented Rubens from touching on that point again.

The celebrated Fleming left the cloister with his brilliant group of pupils, and all returned silently and sadly to Madrid. The friar re-entered his cell, threw himself upon his knees upon the bundle of straw that served him for a bed, and prayed fervently. Then collecting his brushes, his colors and palette that lay in the corner, he threw them into the river that flowed so gently beneath his window. For some time he looked mournfully at the water that bore away his precious burden. When they had finally disappeared, he renewed his orisons upon the straw before the wooden crucifix.

THE RING OF POLYCRATES.

A vine-dresser of Albano, near Rome, is said to have found in a vineyard the ring of Polycrates. This treasure, the history of which is familiar to all readers of Schiller's ballads, was brought to Rome after the death of Polycrates, 522 years before the birth of Christ; it was seen also by Pliny, and mentioned by him. The Emperor Augustus placed it in a gold case, and deposited it for safety in the Temple of Concord. The stone of the ring is of considerable size, and oblong form. The engraving on it, by Theodorus of Samos, the son of Talicles, is of extraordinary fineness and beauty. It represents a lyre with three bees flying about; below, on the right, a dolphin; on the left, the head of a bull. The name of the engraver is inscribed in Greek characters. The upper surface of the stone is slightly concave, not highly polished, and one corner broken.—Athenæum.

WHITE MOUNTAINS, N. H.

At this season of the year when thousands of the pilgrims of nature are going forth from the crowded cities and climbing to the high places of the earth, when a large tide of pleasure travel sets towards the mountain regions of New Hampshire, we have deemed that a series of illustrations of points of interest in their scenery connected with descriptive sketches, would not prove unacceptable to the public. The White Mountains of New Hampshire are among the most impressive works of nature on this continent, and he would be dull indeed who cannot feel the influence of these gigantic scenes. It is vain for those who are unacquainted with mountain scenery to doubt its influence. We have been told that magnitude is nothing; beauty everything. This is not our creed. Besides, may they not meet together? One of these unbelievers once said: "Show me a mountain of any height you please, and I will imagine it ten times higher; then what becomes of your title of a hill?" This is a mistake. Allowing that he could so far stretch his imagination, the object would be entirely changed. He may spread his canvass larger, but how is he to fill up the picture? As well it might be said: "Show me the most beautiful rose, and I will make it poor by imagining a flower far more beautiful." The flower, then, cannot be a rose. But is magnitude nothing? Had the colossal Jupiter of Phidias been diminished to a pigmy's stature, would it have been considered one of the wonders of the world? Suppose you had a model of St. Paul's, complete in all its parts, but small enough to lie within the palm of your hand, and would you compare it to its massive prototype? The model, indeed, may exhibit the same architectural skill, but will want majesty; and cannot be, like all stupendous works of art, an evidence of power. In the same manner do these mighty works of nature speak aloud of omnipotence.

CARRIAGE ROAD, MOUNT WASHINGTON.

idity of Gray enhanced his enjoyment of it. "In our little journey up the Grande Chartreuse," he writes, to his friend West. "I do not remember to have gone ten paces without an exclamation that there was no restraining." And again: "You have death perpetually before your eyes; only so far removed, as to compose the mind without frightening it." When in the North of England, speaking of a catarrh, he says: "I stayed there, not without shuddering, a quarter of an hour, and thought my trouble richly paid; as the impression will last for life." Indeed that thrilling emotion felt in the midst of awful and appalling objects, while, at the same time, we are undisturbed by fears of a personal nature, is the highest mental pleasure, received immediately through the senses, of which we are capable. But without further discussion of this question, let us at once refer to our first illustration, the summit of Mt. Washington, showing the new carriage road, with the omnibuses ascending and descending, the building now erecting on the summit to take the place of the "Summit" and "Tiptop" houses, together with the dome of the observatory which it is proposed to erect should the national government furnish the aid which has been solicited. Mount Washington is the monarch of the White Mountains. "They crowned him long ago." Various measurements of its height have been made from time to time, but modern science has now accurately determined its height to be 6285 feet above the level of the sea. The heights of the other peaks are as follows: Mount Adams, 5790 feet; Jefferson, 5710 feet; Madison, 5361 feet; Monroe, 5349; Clay, 5011; Franklin, 4850; Pleasant, 4715; Clinton, 4200. The carriage road to the summit of Mount Washington is a gigantic enterprise, carried through with extraordinary energy and skill. The charter to construct this road was granted by the New Hampshire legislature, in July, 1853, with a capital of $50,000. The surveys were immediately commenced under the direction of Mr. Robert E. Ricker. The engineering has been most thoroughly performed both as to grade and expense. At the same time, the most magnificent points of observation are obtained along the whole line. The last mile of the road has been made to entirely encircle the upper cone of the mountain, while at the same time the regular ascending grade continues to the level plateau on the top, 6285 feet above the level of the ocean. The road commences at the Glen House, at the north-easterly base of Mount Washington, seven miles from the Gorham (N. H.) station on the Atlantic and St. Lawrence Railroad from Portland to Montreal. It is eight and a quarter miles in length. It is sixteen feet in clear width between the ditching and the outer angle of the roadway or protection wall. The outside is raised one foot higher than the inside, giving it an inward slope toward the mountain of three-quarters of an inch to one foot. This prevents washing of the road bed, an ample ditch being constructed on the inside, with sluices under the road sufficient for the drainage of rain or snow freshets. The grade in no place exceeds a rise of one foot in seven, the average being one in nine and a half. The construction is after the manner of the best English macadamized roads, there being from four to eight inches of fine broken stone on the entire surface. The grade is said to be lighter than Napoleon's road over the Alps. There are no tunnels and heavy masonry arches like that, however, and the cost is consequently much less per mile. In all places where there is a dangerous precipitancy, a heavy protection wall is built on the outer side of the roadway, three feet thick, by tenace. Nor is it one mountain's height alone, but where they "each on others throng," together with their grand accompaniments, which affect the mind so intensely: the fearful precipice, the overhanging rocks, now dimly seen through a passing vapor, or hidden for a while behind some sweeping cloud; the roar of many waters, contrasted with the quiet, silvery lake below; then the variety, the harmony of form and color, from the valley to the topmost crag, where you may chance to see "Jove's harness-bearing bird," between two parted clouds, returning to his native citadel. The beauty of gently sloping meadows, of "tall trees with leaves apparelled," of every flower that blooms, is as evanescent as it is fresh, vivid and luxuriant: they are more mortal than ourselves, the modern fair ones of the day, and decay and death await them on the morrow. But the unchanged, the everlasting rocks, the ruins, they may be, of a former world, these are God's antiquities, the emblems of eternity! The soul is bowed down before them, and our imaginations are carried back, ay, even to a date before the creation of man! The defective vision and advanced age of Dr. Johnson are, in our mind, ample apologies for the want of enthusiasm in his "Tour to the Hebrides;" notwithstanding he happened to say that the finest prospect in the world was the one up Fleet Street. Even had he been younger, and with every sense complete, he might have felt the inefficiency of language, and forborne to make the effort, as beyond his grasp. Here the poet himself is baffled. Such grandeur will form, will elevate his genius, but must not be the subject of his muse. The worst poems Burns ever wrote are those in which he attempts, as an eye-witness, to describe certain situations in the Highlands. Gray knew better; his letters show how true a feeling he had for these scenes, and that was enough for the world, while the remembrance of them was enough for himself, without vainly darning to do more. Terror, according to Burke, is "the ruling principle," "the common stock of everything that is sublime;" and the natural timing now erecting on the summit to take the place of the "Summit" and "Tiptop" houses, together with the dome of the observatory which it is proposed to erect should the national government furnish the aid which has been solicited. Mount Washington is the monarch of the White Mountains. "They crowned him long ago." Various measurements of its height have been two and one-half in height. The work was begun in August, 1854. It could only be commenced at one point—the base of the mountain—the constructors being obliged to construct it as they progressed, in order to convey, by teams, their provisions, tools, etc. Any other course would have greatly increased the cost of construction, as these materials would have had to be carried on men's backs, it being impossible to get a horse along the line over the rocks. Eight covered omnibuses, two baggage wagons and two light open wagons, built by Messrs. Downing & Sons, of Concord, New Hampshire, are employed on the road. The omnibuses are very ingeniously constructed. Externally, as our engraving shows, they resemble our city omnibuses. They are designed each for twelve passengers, with a single seat outside for the driver. The seats are black walnut arm-chairs; they have cane bottoms with stuffed cushions, and are so placed that the passengers neither face the horses nor each other, but will sit at an angle of forty-five degrees to the side of the omnibus, giving a free view on either side of the road. Each seat is numbered, and tickets will be sold to passengers accordingly. There are six windows of plate glass on either side, one for each passenger. The safety of passengers is fully provided for by a new application of brakes, moved with a wheel by the driver's foot, and the "set" upon the wheels is regulated by a ratchet, or clip, fitting into the shaft of the wheel or brake. To insure still greater safety in descending the mountain, the application of the brake is placed within reach of each passenger by a strap and ring lying on the bottom of the vehicle, by the use of which any one can instantly block the wheels and arrest its motion. The carriage body is so arranged by screws that either end can be elevated or depressed so as to have the floor at all times on a level. For example, in ascending the hind end is raised eight or ten inches, while in descending, the forward end is similarly elevated. The eight large omnibuses are constructed of the best ash timber. The axles are of wrought iron, and the bodies are placed on platform springs of the best steel. The linings are of elegant "mosquette," and the exterior panels are embellished with views of mountain scenery. Each vehicle weighs about 1500 pounds, and in ascending will be drawn by four powerful horses, while only two will be used in descending. The line of telegraph wires shown in the picture is designed to connect with the line now in operation from Portland to Montreal, and extending thence to all parts of the United States and Canada. The president of the

ALPINE HOUSE, GORHAM, N. H.

DIXVILLE NOTCH.

SUMMIT HOUSE, MOUNT WASHINGTON.

of some eighty feet. "The water, however, does not come down in an unbroken sheet, but steps from shelf to shelf, flinging showers of diamond dust on the impending foliage, until finally it takes a long jump into a deep basin with a ringing noise, as if expressive of satisfaction that it has got down into a district where it can pursue its rejoicing course with greater ease. Such is the central portion of the cascade. Over other projections of the cliff, which are clothed with richly shaded green mosses, the impulsive stream occasionally shoots in glassy threads, tortuous in their descent as the roots of some giant tree, a liquid baobab. Hemlock and fir and the ever tremulous birch, content for a footing in every seam and fissure of the contiguous crags, grouped and scattered among their projections in a manner that delights an artist, and over all, frowns Mount Washington, strongly in contrast with the brilliant play of the cascade and the varied and lively green of the adjacent forests."

The view of Mounts Washington, Jefferson and Adams, painting their bold outlines against the sky (forming the seventh in our series), is a distant view, sketched at Gilead, Me. It gives an excellent idea of their contour. The Berlin Falls, in our last engraving, are about six miles from the "Alpine House," Gorham. Here the whole volume of the Androscoggin is poured through a rocky defile scarcely more than fifty feet in width, descending in the space of a hundred yards nearly twice as many feet. From the wooden foot-bridge thrown across the fall, you obtain a fine view of the cataract and of the river above and below. The bridge consists merely of two logs thrown from the shore to the rocky island, with a broad platform laid upon them. "When about to be put up, it was a wonder to some how the logs could be extended road, D. O. Macomber, Esq., has established his reputation by the admirable and thorough manner in which he has managed its affairs from the outset. Another engraving on the previous page represents the "Summit House," erected by two thorough-going Yankees, Messrs. J. S. Hall and L. M. Rosebrook, in 1852. The structure is of heavy stones, blasted with powder from the mighty pyramid on which it stands. It is 24 by 64 feet, secured to its foundation by cement and heavy iron bolts, while the roof is tightened by four strong cables. The "Tip-top House," on the blackest top crag of Mount Washington, was erected by Samuel F. Spaulding & Co. Both these houses, together with the summit and a large portion of the mountain, are now owned by the Mount Washington Road Company, and the houses will be kept by the superintendent of the road, Mr. C. H. V. Caris. The structure depicted in our first engraving is designed to supersede these buildings. The White Mountains are reached from Boston via the Boston, Concord and Montreal Railroad, or from Portland, via the great international railroad between Portland and Montreal. The Atlantic and St. Lawrence Railroad commences at Portland, Me. By this route the excursionist is set down at Gorham, New Hampshire. An engraving on this page presents us with a view of Portland, the Atlantic terminus, as seen from Cape Elizabeth Hill, looking northwest. Portland is a very interesting city, and the tourist from the South may well linger here a short time before pushing on to the White Mountains or to Canada. Its population is about 25,000; and it is increasing very rapidly. The scenery in and about Portland is very attractive. The second cut on our first page exhibits a correct view of the "Alpine House," Gorham, New Hampshire, 91 miles from Portland, and 201 miles from Montreal. It is a noble edifice, three stories in height, and 100 feet front by 50 feet in width, with an ell of about the same dimensions. It stands on a table land closed up by mountains on all sides. In the rear of the house is the Androscoggin River. The view of Mounts Madison, Adams and Jefferson, given in the eighth engraving of our series, is obtained from Randolph Hill, about three miles from the "Alpine House," on the road to Lancaster. In the quiet of evening, when the lower portion of the landscape is in shadow, these gigantic masses loom upon the deep blue sky, giving the beholder a deep impression of their magnitude and grandeur. The Dixville Notch, some miles to the east of the White Mountains, and shown in the third engraving on our first page, is a singularly wild mountain pass, with precipitous sides and fantastic craggy pinnacles. A tolerable road winds through this gorge. The "Crystal Cascade," depicted on our last page, is much visited by artists and lovers of nature. It is about a hundred rods to the right of the road which now connects the great routes of travel east and west of the mountains, and about three miles from the "Glen House." The stream which feeds it rises among the heights of Mount Washington, and after winding its way through unexplored glens and forests, here finds an issue through a rent in a ragged bluff, and pours down a rocky descent across the chasm, but the mystery was soon solved. The person who had the matter in hand threw a couple of birch poles across the dizzy gulf, and by direction his two sons, mere lads, ran over on them, trusting to the momentum gained in a start from a point some distance back to steady them in the seemingly perilous adventure, and by their assistance, with the superior power exerted from the shore, the structure was soon got into place. From the vicinity of these falls a fine distant view of the White Mountains is obtained. The lake and mountain region of New Hampshire covers a broad area in the northern region of the State, varying from one hundred miles in length to sixty-five in breadth. There are three principal points of interest embraced in this region. First, Lakes Winnepiscogee, Squam and Ossipee, and other smaller sheets of water, with "Gunstock," "Coppel Crown," "Red Hill," and other mountains; secondly, the White Mountains proper, which are from seventy to ninety miles further north, with the Sandwich, Ossipee, Chocoma and other celebrated mountains intervening; and thirdly, the Franconia mountains, lying on the west side of the area, and twenty or thirty miles distant from the White Mountains proper. The Boston, Concord and Montreal Railroad conveys the traveller directly to the most interesting scenery. Many persons prefer leaving the cars at the "Wiers," on Lake Winnepiscogee, and crossing the lake by steamer. It would require volumes properly to describe the White Mountains and the adjacent region—and volumes have been written on the subject. Among recent publications, Dr. Ball's account of his perilous wandering among the mountains last fall, is very interesting. But we consider it indispensable for the tourist who wishes to be well posted up in this romantic region, to purchase "Incidents of White Mountain Scenery," a handsome illustrated duodecimo volume, by Benjamin G. Willey, published by

VIEW OF PORTLAND.

MOUNTS WASHINGTON, JEFFERSON AND ADAMS.

WHITE MOUNTAINS, FROM RANDOLPH HILL

CRYSTAL CASCADE.

Nathaniel Noyes, No. 11 Cornhill, in this city. Mr. Noyes has also published another very useful work, entitled "Historical Relics of the White Mountains." These two contain all the information requisite—local guides must supply the rest. The following passage is extracted from the former work. "The White Mountains embrace the whole group of mountains in northern New Hampshire, extending forty miles from north to south, and about the same distance from east to west. The term has sometimes been applied exclusively to the central cluster, including the six or seven highest peaks, and very properly, though in its comprehensive sense we think it should embrace the extended group. Mount Blane and Mount Jura constitute not the whole of the Alps, neither do Washington and Monroe, the White Mountains. Clustering round their central height, like children of one large family, no merely arbitrary division should ever separate them. These mountains are the highest land east of the Mississippi River, and, in clear weather, are deserved before any other land by vessels approaching our eastern coast; but by reason of their white appearance, are frequently mistaken for clouds. They are visible on the land at the distance of eighty miles on the south and south-east sides. They appear higher when viewed from the northeast, and it is said they are seen from the neighborhood of Chamblee and Quebec. The Indian name of these mountains, according to Belknap, is Agiocochook. President Alden states that they were known to some of the more eastern tribes of Indians by the name Waumuckemethna; Waumbeket, signifying white, and methna, mountains. And still other tribes gave them the appellation Kan Ran Vngary, the continued likeness of a gull. All these names, we see, have the same general meaning, and refer to the white appearance of the mountains. "During nine or ten months the mountains exhibit more or less of that bright appearance, from which they are denominated white. In the spring, when the snow is partly dissolved, they appear of a pale blue, streaked with white; and after it is wholly gone, at the distance of sixty miles, they are altogether of the same pale blue, nearly approaching a sky color; while, at the same time, viewed at the distance of eight miles or less, they appear of the proper color of the rock. Light, fleecy clouds, floating about their summits, give them the same whitish hue as snow. These vast and irregular heights, being copiously replenished with water, exhibit a great variety of beautiful cascades; some of which fall in a perpendicular sheet or spout; others are winding and sloping; others spread and form a basin in the rock, and then gush in a cataract over its edge. A poetic fancy may find full gratification amidst these wild and rugged scenes, if its ardor be not checked by the fatigue of the approach. Almost everything in nature, which can be supposed capable of inspiring ideas of the sublime and beautiful, is here realized. Old mountains, stupendous elevations, rolling clouds, impending rocks, verdant woods and the roaring torrent, all conspire to enrapture."

BERLIN FALLS.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

CLOUD-PICTURES.

BY SOLANTAR.

The clouds are a glorious canvass,
A canvass all brightsome and fair,
On which the warm sunbeams trace ever
Sweet pictures suspended in air;
The heavens are the frames that enclose them,
And God is their hanger on high;
He draped them with glorious fringes,
And hung them above in the sky.

They are sweeter than any "old master,"
Their colors more vivid and bright;
On high they're suspended forever,
Ne'er hidden from out of our sight;
O, blessed be God, for the beauty
Of pictures so lovely and fair,
Which he hangeth up in the heavens—
Cloud-pictures suspended in air!

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

"TIME SETS ALL THINGS RIGHT."

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

SARAH BAYLEY sat reading a letter—not a pink, nor a blue, nor a canary-colored note, written with a crow's quill, perfumed with violet, and sealed with blue and gold sealing wax; but a large, handsome sheet filled with good, legible, clear writing, and apparently very interesting to the fair reader. During the process of reading it, Sarah's eyes had more than once suffused with tears, and still oftener her beautiful mouth had been wreathed in smiles; while once or twice she had burst into positive laughter, clear and musical as a fairy chim.

Her cousin Daniel Bayley sat opposite. He marked the quick changes on her countenance, and his curiosity was roused to see what brought them there. He admired his cousin very much, and spent more time in her morning room than would have been excusable in any one but a relation. He wanted her to show him the letter, remarking that it was beautifully written.

"If I could be persuaded that it was not a breach of trust, I would certainly let you see it," said Sarah. "Isabel Kingsley does certainly write a beautiful letter, as indeed, why shouldn't she? She does everything well."

"You increase my desire to see this letter, Sarah; and as to the breach of trust, provided that the sheet you hold in your hand contains no secret, there is no more harm in my seeing it, than there would be in sitting here and hearing your friend converse with you. I presume she would have no objections to me as a listener, if she talks as well as you say she writes."

"But I shall have to tell her some day that I allowed you to read it, and perhaps she would not forgive me."

"Why do you tell her, then?"

"Because, cousin Daniel, you know that it is a weakness of mine always to be confessing. I cannot rest until I have confessed to a friend every thought of my heart, every word I have said of them, every deed I have done with reference to them; and I do not doubt if I should let you see this, my next letter to Isabel will contain a full account of my breach of trust."

"Nonsense, Sarah! I am bound to read that letter; so hand it over!" And he possessed himself of the treasure, while Sarah gave it up half reluctantly, rather than it should be torn in the struggle to retain it.

"He read it hastily, then more carefully, and a third time he read it aloud to Sarah, dwelling upon the words and turning their meaning over and over."

"You are giving more importance to a lady's letter than they usually obtain," said Sarah. "It is the fashion of gentlemen to deery them, to ridicule or denounce them."

"Not such letters as this, Sarah; not letters that show the writer to have a kindly woman's heart, and a clear, active brain to balance it. I would like to see the writer of this letter. I fancy that I can see her without the aid of visual organs. Let me describe what I think she is, Sarah, and you shall tell me if I am right or wrong in the ideal I have formed of her."

"Silly fellow!—as if you could describe a person by reading a letter! That will do to go with your nonsense of spiritual affinities, and all that sort of thing."

"Well, try me, cousin Sarah. In the first place, this Miss Kingsley is intellectual."

"Anybody could tell that by her letter, as well as you. Of course she is."

"Then she is handsome."

"Well—yes, with one exception, she is."

"Bravo! I get along wonderfully. She is very neat."

"To a fault."

"I knew that I was right there. She has an elegant taste, and dresses beautifully."

"I grant that, too."

"Of course; I know what I am describing. She has abundant, wavy hair."

"None finer in the world, Daniel."

"Beautiful teeth."

"Yes, white and even, and rather small."

"Eyes 'darkly, deeply, beautifully blue.'"

"Her eyes are not so perfect as the rest of her face, I will tell you candidly, cousin Daniel."

"Ah, you may think so. You will never see one woman who will allow perfection in another."

"I shall have my revenge for that sneer, I do assure your lordship. 'Time at last sets all things right,' and I believe it, because Byron says so. All but one—no, there is one thing that you cannot guess, and which I sincerely think can never be made just right—but to punish you, I will not tell you what that is."

"What a malignant creature you are, Sarah."

"No, not malignant exactly; but perhaps a little retributive in my wishes. Have you got through with my friend Isabel?"

"Did I say that she has a most queenly air, and is very finely formed?"

"No, but if you had, you would not have exceeded truth. She lays claim to all that."

"She is an orphan."

"How do you know that?"

"Because I plainly see, by the perfect independence of her letter, that she has no one to govern or restrain her, and yet that she is as fearful of doing or speaking wrong, as if she were constantly restrained by a parent's authority. Now there is one point which I cannot guess at all, and that is her age."

"Really! does not your black art extend to that?"

"No, I must be indebted to you for that information."

"No, you won't. I never betray secrets; and you defined a breach of trust just now so strongly, that I should not dare to tell you."

"Never mind; that is not so very important, so long as there are so many things to balance it. Still, I would not like her to be very old, if I am to marry her."

"You marry her, cousin Daniel! Why, you do not mean so?"

"I do, if she suits me. I tell you what, Sarah, I have been drifting about the world long enough; and I begin to think that a man is thought very little of in society, until he establishes himself in a home of his own. Seriously, I like that part of the Bible where it is said, 'God setteth the solitary in families'; and as a poor old bachelor must necessarily be one of the solitary, I care not how soon I may be set."

Sarah Bayley's lip quivered, but Daniel did not see it, for she quickly recovered herself, and left him to peruse the letter once more, while she passed out into the garden. She had a struggle while there with her heart, in which she came off conqueror.

Why had not Daniel Bayley ever thought of marrying his cousin Sarah? Simply because she was his cousin, and he had almost thought her a sister. He never thought how very dear he was to her heart; how far above the love of any relative, however near, was the sentiment that she felt for him; how far beyond the love of his sisters was hers. She had loved him from her childhood when he was already a man, rude in speech to others, but kind and gentle to her. She had "kept his sayings in her heart," when he was absent for long years. Her welcome when he returned home, if not so boisterous as that of his sisters, was more deep; and she never knew what it was to bestow a passing thought upon any other. Daniel's sisters, with whom she had been brought up from her orphaned infancy, laughingly called her an old maid; and, in their unthinking mirth, had often coupled her name with that of her bachelor brother. But they never suspected how very dear he was to her, nor how nearly they touched her heart when they spoke of him thus.

All was over now then! Daniel had determined to marry, and he had no thought of her, of course; she had so dreaded that he should be separated in any way from her. It had been so pleasant to wait on him—to do a thousand little offices for him, that Maria and Emeline never thought of doing, and which he ever seemed to expect from her hand, only too willing to be thus employed. And now her heart was to be thrown back upon itself, lonely and desolate. It would cost her a great deal she thought to hide all that she should suffer; but she determined to brave it out, and let no one suspect that she was a repining, disappointed being. Indeed, she would try to rejoice in Isabel's happiness, if Daniel could love her. Sarah knew of one impediment to his love, she thought, but she would not have named it for the world, lest he might think she was jealous of her friend; she would not meanly deprive Isabel of the chance of his loving her.

She did not see Daniel much that day; but when she did, he was full of words about her friend, seeming really to think that he was giving Sarah a great pleasure. He did not know that she was trying to attain tranquillity enough to answer him without tears, and his words flowed on about Miss Kingsley.

"I would go and see her," he said, "but it is impossible at this stage of my business to leave it for an hour; and I fear much that I shall be obliged to go out in the next steamer—but I shall write to her, and ask her correspondence. I shall expect Barton the day before the steamer sails, and then it will be too late to profit by his coming. It is very provoking, but I do not see any remedy."

Barton, his head clerk, did not arrive until the very day of sailing. It was Sarah's hand, however, that had prepared everything for his comfort; she had packed his clothes, arranged the papers which Barton was to do, and had made all things straight for his going. Maria and Emeline laughed at her for her pains, but she went on quietly, satisfied that he would like all that she did.

The moment came for him to depart. He kissed his sisters affectionately, and looked round for Sarah. Twice she was called before she could make her eyes presentable. Daniel did not notice it, but as he bade her good-by, he charged her to plead his cause with Miss Kingsley. She thrust off his hand from her arm, and ran out of the room. The last moment was up that he could stay, and he soon forgot that there was anything strange in his cousin's behaviour; for in a very short time he was on board the steamer, and on his way to Europe.

Previous to his departure, he wrote to Miss Kingsley, and told her in what way a part of her character and life had been revealed to him. He described himself, his own virtues and failings, his admiration of a noble woman, his indifference to mere personal beauty, his utter disregard of wealth. He would not ask her to answer this letter, but should he write her again, he would earnestly entreat her to answer him.

Miss Kingsley received the letter on the day after the steamer sailed, and her surprise at the unexpected contents was extreme. She had heard Sarah speak of her cousin, but had never seen him; and her first impulse was to blame Sarah severely for showing her letter. A few moments told her how foolish this feeling would be towards her friend, and she read the letter again carefully. It bore the impress of a good heart, and a correct appreciation of what is due to woman. It appealed to her best feelings, and it told her plainly and honestly how well such a man could love one who should carry out his ideal of female excellence. With this she was obliged, therefore, to be satisfied for the present—for the writer was far beyond her reach, and had bound her not to answer it until she should hear from him again.

To say that Isabel Kingsley was not pleased would be false. It was the first time she had been an object of love. It was through Sarah's partiality for her she thought that it had come about, and of course Sarah had told him all; she believed that he was fully apprised of all her perfections and imperfections. Standing before her glass that night, she wept as she looked at the unfortunate eye that was shown to her shuddering gaze. It was a hopeless case, for wealth had been poured out like water to relieve or even to ameliorate its condition, and to no avail. Would the honest love which spoke out in every line of the letter which she held in her hand, stand proof against this terrible misfortune?

During the seven or eight weeks in which she waited for a letter, she saw Sarah only once. Only a brief word or two was said in reference to Daniel, for Sarah felt too deeply, and Isabel too conscious, for conversation respecting it. Sarah felt that she had not carried out Daniel's injunction; but she thought it was hard enough to part with all her cherished dreams, to give up all that had made her happiness, without being called upon to beg another's acceptance of it. That was the feather too much; and even Sarah, good as she was, could not submit to that martyrdom of herself.

The letter arrived in due season—a letter which Isabel felt bound to answer, and which she did answer, with all the splendid diction and beauty of expression that had so satisfied the fastidious Daniel Bayley in perusing her letter to his cousin. Now the letters came thick and fast. A regular communication was established, and became more and more lover-like on both sides; sometimes Isabel would feel that the first sight of her might disenchant her lover, but the subject was too painful to dwell upon, and she willingly dismissed it. A little frankness on her part with Sarah—an inquiry how much he knew of her personal appearance—would have set all right; but an indescribable sense of personal deformity haunted the poor girl, and the present was too delicious to her loving heart to give up for an uncertain future.

Sarah, on the other hand, believed that Isabel would disclose everything, and she set herself to the task of rooting from her heart all the affection which she felt for her cousin, and the brave and true-hearted girl strove long and well. If Daniel could be happier with another, she argued, surely she ought to rejoice in his happiness; and although she now believed that she could never trust again, yet she earnestly endeavored to fix her mind upon her other duties, and to forget, if possible, that she had ever suffered it to wander.

At length Daniel Bayley was expected home. Isabel's heart was in a fever of expectation, of love, and of dread—of love, for truly and earnestly had she learned, from the noble and manly sentiments expressed in his letters, to feel that she could not be parted from that dear hope; of dread, lest one unfortunate circumstance of which he had no knowledge, but which ever weighed upon her mind, should come between her and her happiness.

Sarah had neither hope nor dread; she had resigned all thoughts of her cousin, except as a friend; and if she sometimes sighed at the prospect of seeing another his wife, she still believed that she could better resign him to Isabel than to a stranger.

He came, and the moment he could command his time, he started for Overton. Sarah's hands assisted him to get ready for the journey; Sarah's lips bade him godspeed. If she went to her own room to weep, no one knew it, for when she came forth, there was a smile of peace on her countenance.

She was sitting, on the third day of Daniel's absence, at a window that overlooked the garden. It was midsummer, and the twilight dews came down gratefully on the parched earth, and brought calm and serenity upon human hearts. She was thinking of the absent, and imagining that Isabel was spending this hour with her cousin. A touch upon her shoulder, and she looked up to see Daniel. A change had come over his noble countenance since he went, full of hope and expectation, to meet Isabel Kingsley. He looked wan and subdued, and his air and manner were altered. Sarah guessed, but dared not give utterance to her thought.

"Why did you not tell me, cousin Sarah?" said he, after a pause.

"I answered all your questions, Daniel. Am I to be blamed, because I left you to test the truth of the ideal beauty with which you invested Isabel Kingsley? How did I know that the purity of her character, her intellectual attainments, her winning manners, would not compensate to you for one unfortunate defect, for which she is not responsible, and for which she has suffered a thousand fold more than you can imagine?"

"Had I known of it before, Sarah, it is barely possible that I might have been reconciled—and yet I hardly think it would have been the case. You know how much value I attach to beautiful eyes. They are the indices of the soul. You cannot conceive how it pains me at this stage of our pleasant intercourse, when my whole stay abroad has been brightened and cheered by letters from Isabel, to break up the dream I had cherished of a happy home when I returned."

"And why not?"

"Why not? Ask yourself, Sarah. Could you love a being, however lovely otherwise, whose beauty was marred by such a defect?"

"I think I could."

"No, Sarah, you mistake your strength of mind. At any rate, I have no such strength. Not all Miss Kingsley's wealth, nor her otherwise faultless beauty, could reconcile me to the fact that she has never hinted that I might be shocked at the horrible obliquity of that eye. Heavens! it haunts me yet!"

"Daniel Bayley, for shame! You are not worthy of Isabel!"

"I grant it; and she is not worthy of me. One moment was enough to disenchant me. I did not even to speak to her."

"Do you mean so?"

"I do. Miss Kingsley was absent at a large party; she did not return until late, and of course it would have been presumption to approach her then. In the morning she was pointed out to me by a gentleman, who volunteered to introduce me. She stood with her back towards me. Her perfect figure, her well-chosen morning costume, her beautiful hair, were all seen at a glance as I entered; but a mirror before which she stood gave me back that eye, and shocked, miserable, and half-fainting (don't laugh at me, Sarah!) I left the room, and without a moment's delay, I came away."

"And this is your conduct to my noble-hearted friend?"

"I own it; but there was cause. I was deceived."

"You were indeed, my poor cousin—and yet how could she tell you?"

"Sarah, tell me, would you have done as Isabel has done?"

"I have never been placed under like circumstances."

"But I know you would not. You love truth too well."

"I do love truth, Daniel; but it would be hard to give you—I mean it would be hard to give any one up in the way she must have done. It is so pleasant to be beloved!"

"Sarah!"

"Well, cousin?"

"You shall not call me cousin! What a blind, senseless fool I have been not to see before what I see in those beautiful eyes this moment! You love me, Sarah! I see it in those quivering lips, and those beautiful eyes, that never looked so sweet to me until I saw Isabel Kingsley's. And believe me, I always loved you; but your quiet, sisterly conduct towards me made me think that it could not be. And then you were so interested for your friend, too—so willing to give me up! Such disinterested friendship ought to meet its reward. Sarah, you shall marry me!"

"Vain fellow! do you think I would condescend to accept the second place in any man's heart?"

"First, Sarah!—first! I loved you years before I thought of Isabel. But how could I think that the quiet little girl who moved about our household, performing the duties of a sister, and never looking or speaking aught but kind and sisterly words—how could I think that she could love me as I wished?"

Ah, Sarah, how will you resist this appeal? The most exacting friendship could not—ought not to require this second sacrifice. It would have been too much to expect of poor human nature—too much to expect of woman's loving heart, had she not responded truly to his words of affectionate tenderness.

Poor, poor Isabel! We can only hope for thee, that some beautiful soul, whose outward eye is darkened, but whose inner eye can estimate thy many perfections, may one day be led to thee by that mysterious providence which "brings forth that unexpected hour," that unites hearts together in bonds of love;—of love, in which the outward is but a shadow, and not the reality. "Time sets all things right."

FRANKNESS.

Frankness is supposed to be a common virtue. It is most uncommon. It is indeed an extraordinary thing. It requires truth, simplicity, love and genuine goodness. Men speak plainly when they do speak, but they are not open and free. Many speak truths very plainly when angry; many speak pleasant truths frankly. But few there are whose souls are so balanced in an atmosphere of love that they speak whatever needs to be said, to each and to all, plainly, gently, fully. The dearest friends live together for years without daring to speak things which they know, and which each party knows that the other knows. Parents live with a reserve years long toward their children. Children carry untouched, unsyllabled, thoughts and feelings that take hold of their very being. Friends meet and part day by day—friends so true that they would almost die for each other, or, what is harder than this, who are willing to live for each other—and never speak of things that each knows is passing in the other's mind. It is very strange to see people come up in conversation to topics that, by a tacit freemasonry, are sacred, and without word or look one glides past on one side, and the other on the other side, and meet beyond, going down the common channel again. Was there ever a thoughtful, sensitive person, that dared to be open, transparent, frank? But, however this may be, there can be no doubt that Christian people are not frank enough for each other's good. If men knew how to speak the truth in love, how rich might one become. A man might stand then in the focus of the wisdom of all his friends. But, refusing to let their lights shine, men now grope in the partial light of their own wisdom, disempowered by self-love.—New York Independent.

MAGNIFICENT CYPRESS.

In the gardens of Chepultepec, near Mexico, the first object that strikes the eye is the magnificent cypress, called the Cypress of Montezuma. It had attained its full growth when that monarch was on the throne (1520), so that it must now be at least four hundred years old; yet it still retains all the vigor of youthful vegetation. The trunk is forty-one feet in circumference, yet the height is so majestic as to make even this enormous mass appear slender. At Santa Marie de Tula, in Oaxaca, is a cypress ninety-three and a half feet in circumference, which does not yet show the slightest symptom of decay.—Saturday Gazette.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

SPENSER'S "FAERY QUEEN."

ITS FIRST RECITAL.

BY JOHN D. PRESCOTT.

It was late one lovely summer evening when a weary traveller reached the summit of one of the long ranges of hills, so frequent in the south of Ireland. Before him, almost as far as the eye could reach, extended a wild moorland, bounded on all sides by blue ranges of mountains, like the one on which he stood. The parting sunbeams, reposing on the distant hills, reflected their varied and gorgeous light from the stained windows of an ancient fortalice, perched fantastically on a craggy eminence, almost in the middle of the moor. At its base glided a placid stream, which meandering through the wild plain, lost itself among the adjacent hills, while far beyond a beautiful lake received the sun's adieu on its glassy surface. The whole scene, expressive of deep repose, was inexpressibly soothing to the jaded spirits of the traveller. As he descended into the plain, the beauties of the place were more forcibly impressed upon him. Around the castle, hemlocks and filberts and laurels blended their foliage with the broader leaves of numerous other trees, enclosing a little world of solitude. Every little tuft of earth hanging loosely on the rocks, was garnished with flowers of the most various and brilliant hues, whilst the untrilled bosom of the pure stream sent back to the eye of the beholder the reflected images of the beauties that encompassed him. The massive rocks which formed the mouldering turrets of the castle, were time-worn and moss-grown, and here and there were seen the tendrils of the ivy, or the hardy evergreens, which had thrust their roots within the clefts, and drawing thence their slender sustenance, had expanded into shady trees, or more humble shrubs.

The sun had now disappeared, but the twilight still lingered in this green retreat as if reluctant to part with so much beauty, or cloud it in the shades of night. Hastily approaching the castle, though stopping for a time to note the charming scene, the stranger knocked loudly at the gates. His summons was answered by a hungry looking porter, who conducted him through a long hall to a spacious library, in the midst of which, enveloped in books and papers, sat the poet Spenser, studiously occupied in deciphering a manuscript by the fading twilight.

"Master Spenser," said the new-comer, to attract his attention. "Sir Walter Raleigh, I bid thee hearty welcome to my solitary Kilcolman," said the poet, his eyes glistening with pleasure, as he rose from his seat, and extended his hand with heartfelt cordiality.

After exchanging their affectionate greetings, they sat down together and beguiled the long hours of evening in telling their mutual experience, and recounting the various fortunes that had attended them. Raleigh delighted Spenser with his voyages, adventures, and his imminent perils on land and sea; while Spenser told of his solitary occupations in his lonely retreat—how he had beautified and adorned the bleak moor, and christened it with the poetical name Armulla Dale; how he was about to court his muse under the wide-spreading branches of a noble oak, which bordered on the fair Mulla. To this spot Spenser asked his guest to accompany him on the morrow, and "listen to some poor rhymes he had just completed."

The knight joyfully consented, at the same time begging his indulgence to a little ditty of his own:

"So piped they on until they both were weary,
By change of turns, each making other merry."

And Night had long drawn his sable curtains, ere they parted and retired to rest.

Arising with the sun on the following day, they slowly pursued their delightful walk,

"Amongst the cool shade
Of the green alders by the Mulla's shore," beguiling the time in pleasant conversation, or in contemplating the loveliness of nature around them. Now their walk took them among the forest trees, and the vistas formed by their graceful stems gave partial glimpses of the "melodious Mulla's" rippling waters, glistening in the morning sun. Now they emerged into open shades, varying in breadth, sometimes so small that the entwining boughs of the trees made darkness over their heads, and then enlarging to let in gleams of sunlight, and anon opening yet wider into little dewy meadows, on which the sunbeams lay in glistening silence.

Proceeding through scenes like these, they came to a glade where the forest trees were more widely separated from each other than usual, and where the ground beneath, cleared of coppice and underwood, was clothed with a carpet of the softest and most lovely verdure, screened from the scorching heat of the sun by the guarded branches of a huge oak. Close by this grassy knoll murmured the winding Mulla, and over its curling waves the knight skipped a few pebbles, while his friend was arranging his manuscripts. They then disposed themselves for their morning diversion; Raleigh reclining his graceful length upon the green sward, and resting his head upon his arm, and Spenser sitting erect against the massive trunk of the oak which his verse has rendered immortal.

The various effects produced by the brilliant light upon the fresh wet leaves of the trees, their knotty boughs and slender trunks, the checkered shadows on the velvet lawn, the picturesque attitudes of the two friends, and the placid surface of the meandering stream, reflecting on its crystal bosom, might have drawn the attention of a poet or a painter.

Spenser now began with the most graceful elocution the recitation of his poem. At first he read in a modest tone the low music of the babbling water accompanying the melodious lines, and adding to their beauty, but soon, inspired with the spirit of his verse he infused into his recitation all the pathos of his romantic nature.

Raleigh was at first attentive, then interested, then absorbed, and then fired with enthusiasm. The adventures of Una and the Red Cross Knight aroused all that was chivalrous within him. The perils and obstacles which beset their progress, just suited his adventurous spirit, while the ardent devotion and filial piety of Una captivated his lively imagination. He often burst forth into involuntary expressions of delight, and as his friend read off the concluding lines of the first book, he exclaimed:

"If thou gettest not that published, Spenser, thou'rt the veriest fool that ever wrote verse."

"Think'at thou it worthy?" asked Spenser, dubiously.

"Ay do I," replied the other; "it containeth a philosophy worthy of master Bacon; it evinceth a skill in human nature that would make Will Shakespeare blush; it breatheth forth a spirit of chivalry that poor Sydney might have envied; and it hath a prettiness of rhyme, a speciality of description, and a rareness of conceit which hath been equalled by none, and I say to thee again, if thou gettest it not published, thou'rt the veriest ass that ever rhymed a couplet!"

The poet was overwhelmed at the encomiums bestowed by Raleigh on his simple muse. He looked thoughtfully on the grass, as the idea of publication was suggested, but merely observing that the rest might not please the fancy of his friend so well, he proceeded to recount the exploits of Sir Gurfan.

Long after noon sat Colin Clout on that verdant hillock, tuning his oaten pipe to strains which charmed the senses of his enraptured auditor, and the sun was fast sinking in the west, ere the beautiful Amoret was safely rescued from the giant's power by the heroic exploits of Britomart. As the poet finished, he folded his manuscripts, and placing them to the bosom of his doublet, produced from an adjacent coppice a small white skiff, his face the while wearing evident marks of pleasure, as he listened to his friend's extravagant expressions of delight.

A long and interesting conversation ensued, as they slowly rowed up the cool and peaceful stream, sheltered from the sun by the fresh green boughs of the overhanging trees. Raleigh strongly urged his friend to accompany him to England, and read his poem at court. He painted the fascinations of the queen in the most lively colors, ascribing to her a long catalogue of virtues, moral and intellectual. Spenser's modesty struggled long with his desire for a name, and his innate sense of merit, but the rhetoric of Raleigh, which no one could use more skillfully, finally prevailed, and ere they had reached Kilcolman Castle, he had complied with all his wishes.

After partaking of some slight repast, they soon retired to rest to prepare themselves for the fatiguing duties of the morrow—the one to dream of fauns, and faeries, of knights, and dragons, and dungeons, and giants, and tiltings at tournaments to win the smiles of fair ladies; and the other, with golden visions of a brilliant future, with dreams of court favor, and noble aspirations for an immortal fame.

Arising early on the following morning, Spenser bade an affectionate adieu to his lonely home, and proceeded on his eventful journey to the court of Elizabeth. There he read the Faery Queen a second time. He poured out at the feet of his sovereign a strain of the most delicate adulation that ever genius breathed into the ears of royalty; which made courtiers sigh for their fallen fame, and the rarest wits of England blush at their insignificance. He adorned her virtues with the most precious gems of his rich imagination, and clothed her simplest acts in all the romance which his chivalric fancy suggested.

But the sweet pipings of Colin Clout were not confined to a romantic court, and posterity, as well as the maiden queen, has cause to thank the providence which brought Sir Walter Raleigh to the lonely moorlands of Armulla Dale.

We are born to trouble; and we may depend upon it whilst we live in this world we shall have it, though with intermissions: that is, in whatever state we are, we shall find a mixture of good and evil; and therefore the true way to contentment is to know how to receive these certain vicissitudes of life,—the returns of good and evil, so as neither to be exalted by the one, nor overthrown by the other, but to bear ourselves toward everything which happens with such ease and indifference of mind, as to hazard as little as may be.—Seneca.

CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY.

Encouraged by the unprecedented success which this popular monthly has met with, and the rapidly with which it has increased its circulation, the proprietor has resolved to make it still more worthy of the patronage of the public. That this admirable work is a WORTHY OF PATRONAGE, is admitted by every one, containing, as it does, one hundred pages of reading matter in each number, and forming two volumes a year of six hundred pages each, or twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for ONE DOLLAR.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY is printed with new type, upon fine white paper, and its matter is carefully compiled and arranged by the hands of the editor and proprietor, who has been known to the public as connected with the Boston press for nearly fifteen years. Its pages contain

NEWS, TALES, POEMS, STORIES OF THE SEA, SKETCHES, MISCELLANEOUS ADVERTISEMENTS, BIOGRAPHIES, WIT AND HUMOR, from the best and most popular writers in the country. It is also speed with a record of the notable events of the times, of peace and war, of discoveries and improvements occurring in either hemisphere, forming an agreeable companion for a leisure moment or hour, anywhere, at home or abroad, each number being complete in itself.

No sectarian subjects are admitted into its pages: there are enough controversial publications, each devoted to its peculiar sect or clique. This work is intended for THE MILLION, north or south, east or west, and is fitted to the brain each month with choice, popular and graphic miscellany, just such as any father, brother or friend would place in the hands of a family circle. It is in all its departments, fresh and original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year, or any person sending us right subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive a copy gratis.

Sample copies sent when desired.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor.
Corner of Tremont and Bromfield Sts., Boston, Mass.

REV. THOMAS STARR KING.

As the portrait of this eloquent and popular preacher indicates, he is still quite a young man, though in the zenith of an honorable fame. He is a son of the late Rev. Thomas F. King, who married Miss Susan Starr, both of New York city, where the subject of our sketch was born, December 17, 1824. During his youth, his father removed to Charlestown, Mass., to take the pastoral care of a church, and here young King went through a course of study preparatory to his entering college. This last project, however, was frustrated by the death of his father. But while discharging the duties of a public school teacher, and, afterwards, clerk in the navy-yard at Charlestown, he pursued an extensive course of study, theological and classical, and probably made more rapid progress from the intensity of his desire for self-culture than if he had received the advantages of a collegiate institution. "Nothing is impossible to him who wills." So rapid, indeed, was his progress, that, in September, 1846, at the early age of twenty-one, he was ordained the pastor of his father's parish in Charlestown, as the immediate successor of Rev. E. H. Chapin. On the 17th of December, 1848, he married Miss Julia M. Wiggins, of East Boston, and, in the same month, was installed as the successor of Rev. David Fosdick (resigned) in the pastoral charge of the Hollis Street Church in this city. As a preacher, Mr. King is one of the most popular divines of the day. Earnest, sincere, zealous, setting forth the truths of the gospel and the principles of a high morality with rare eloquence, he secures without an effort the undivided attention of his auditory. But he does not resemble the divine satirized by Crabbe:

"A pious youth, who thinks his Sunday's task
As much as man or God himself can ask."

His parochial duties during the week occupy a large portion of his time, and yet by a systematic employment of his hours, he is enabled to answer the calls of friendship and of society at large. He is also a contributor to various leading periodicals, and his written style is as remarkable for its purity, vigor and finish, as his oratory is for fine originality and point. He has delivered orations and addresses on various occasions, and always with brilliant success. A contemporary writer, in Loring's "Hundred Boston Orators," says: "Mr. King's peculiarities of mind and style are characterized by fluency, grace, sweetness and vigor. His intellect appears to have no obstructions to its movement. Confusion of thought, partial grasp of manner, feeble hold upon language, have no place in his clear, decisive mind; and the result is a remarkable felicity of expression, in which the thought is clothed in its appropriate form without any appearance of effort. With great facility, sureness and swiftness of perception, and powers of combination capable of instant action on what is perceived, he seems to comprehend a subject at a glance, to dispose its various topics in their right relations with equal readiness, and to unfold it in sermon, lecture, or oration, with the lucid vigor and splendor of one to whom apt words and significant images are 'nimble servants.' The metaphysical and imaginative tendencies of his mind meet and cohere and work together in his ordinary mental action, and he therefore touches no subject which he does not both analyze and adorn. To talents thus active, penetrating and brilliant, he adds solid acquirements in theology, philosophy, history and general literature, and a largeness of view and sobriety of judgment, unlikely to be caught in any of the cants, or entangled in any of the crotchets of the day. As a public speaker, he happily combines elegance with energy, and is exceedingly popular." As an illustration of the manner in which he clothes with beauty the current topics of the day, and as a specimen of the fertility of his imagery, we select a passage from his discourse at the Railroad Jubilee in this city, in September, 1851. "After the mercantile heart had devised and secured those iron tracks and flying trains, God took them for his purposes. Without paying any tax for the privilege, he uses them to quicken the activity of men; to send energy and vitality where before were silence and barrenness; to multiply cities and villages, studded with churches, dotted with schools, and filled with happy homes and huddling souls; to increase wealth which shall partially be devoted to his service and kingdom, and all along their banks to make the wilderness blossom as the rose. Without any vote of permission from legislatures and officials—even while the cars are loaded with profitable freight and paying passengers, and the groaning engines are earning the necessary interest,—Providence sends, without charge, its cargoes of good sentiment and brotherly feeling; disbursts the culture of the city to the simplicity of the hamlet, and brings back the strength and virtue of the village and mountain to the wasting faculties of the metropolis; and fastens to every steam shuttle, that flies back and forth, and hither and thither, an invisible thread of fraternal influence which, entwining seashore and hill country, mart and grainfield, forge and factory, wharf and mine, slowly prepares society to realize, one day, the Saviour's prayer, 'that they may all be one.' The beneficent genius of the age keeps his special and invisible express, laden with packages of providential blessings, upon every train that runs through our communities; and it seems, as the cars fly along the avenues which selfish traffic has created, that the villages which are everywhere threaded like beads along the iron wires, are, to use the language of another, 'counted off by the spirit of our age as so many pater-nosters upon its rosary, in its swift worship of gratitude for the dawn of the age of peace.'" How truly he says, elsewhere, of the Father of our country:—"Washington could not have been less removed from our country than when he died. His spirit rose to greater influence than it had when housed in a mortal frame. It passed into the finer robe of literature and history, and has become a guest in every house. The statesman and the patriot go to him now for counsel, and, as he speaks to them through their reverent meditations, no mixture of earthly passions alloys the wisdom he imparts. His name is invoked to soften the asperities of party conflict when they threaten the welfare of the nation; his grave sheds an effluence of patriotic zeal and faith in heavenly help; and his character, by its simple sublimity and strength, teaches the eyes of American childhood what grandeur there is in virtue, and what glory swaths the patriot's name."

REV. THOMAS STARR KING.

ASCENT OF MONT BLANC.

The picture on this page exhibits a scene the contemplation of which alone is enough to shake the nerves of a timid person. Yet it is no exaggeration of the difficulties attending the ascent of Mont Blanc. The travellers in the group are tied together by ropes which the guides hold at each end. To fall on the slippery and overhanging verge of the cliff, would be sure destruction. Such a casualty has happened more than once in these terrific passes. The travellers always proceed when they reach the regions of snow in single file and tied together, because there are numerous pitfalls opening into deep gulfs, into which a man is liable suddenly to sink. But these perils do not withhold the adventurous spirit from daring them. To stand on the summit of Mont Blanc is an achievement that compensates for great suffering and great danger. Even the hardships have their charms in retrospect. The escapes are in interest in proportion to the danger encountered. Held to the guides by ropes, trying each step among narrow crevices and openings concealed by snow, clinging with arms and knees to ice in motion, walking to narrow and uncertain bridges between dark chasms, crossing by frail ice-bridges unfathomable depths, retracing painfully-taken steps, sometimes scaling a precipice, sometimes let down a wall of ice, slipping to the verge of a yawning abyss, missing your foothold and with difficulty recovering it,—all these things, terrific to anticipate and to encounter, become, when they have conducted to the achievement of a fixed purpose, subjects of even pleasing retrospect; and the traveller who has once climbed to the summit of the "monarch of mountains," is never weary of reviewing his experience. Its grandeur ever calls forth the most powerful emotions of awe and sublimity from the soul.

MODE OF ASCENDING MONT BLANC.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL.

THE CHEAPEST WEEKLY PAPER IN THE WORLD.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

BALTIMORE FEMALE COLLEGE.

The establishment of female colleges is an evidence of the refinement and progress of the age, and is peculiar to our country. Many are now in successful operation, in which ladies enjoy the advantages of a full collegiate course of study, with the privilege of regular graduation, and the benefits derived from the exercises of literary societies, etc. One of the most flourishing of these is the Baltimore Female College, an institution under the charge of Professor N. C. Brooks, A. M. This seminary of learning was created a college proper by the legislature of Maryland, in the December session, 1849, with authority to confer degrees, and endowed with the rights and privileges of the most favored female institutions. It embraces two departments, the collegiate and preparatory. The course of study in each is three years, designated by as many different classes. The president is assisted in the duties of instruction by eleven professors and teachers of various branches. The sixth annual commencement took place in the new assembly room, Baltimore, June 27, before a brilliant assemblage of ladies and gentlemen, by whom the exercises of the evening were highly appreciated. Degrees were conferred and medals awarded on this occasion. The Parthenian Society of this institution publish a handsome literary monthly, entitled the "Parthenian," conducted with great ability. At a late meeting of this society, Miss Sarah T. Potter, of Virginia, presiding, the ladies voted the silver medal of their institution to Rev. Albert Barnes, D.D., Washington Irving, Professor Sparks, Professor Henry, of the Smithsonian Institute, Professor Spencer F. Baird, W. Gilmore Simms, Mrs. Lydia H. Sigourney, N. P. Willis and George P. Morris, Esqs. The college is very fortunate in its president. Mr. Brooks is a finished classical scholar and critic, and a large portion of his life has been devoted to teaching. He thus brought to his present sphere every pre-requisite, and his success has been commensurate with his exertions. Beloved and respected by his pupils, he exerts an influence over their minds and hearts, which develops their faculties to the fullest extent.

THE GOLD FRIEND.—The demand for this extremely interesting story in The Flag of our Union, has exceeded even that for "The Greek Adventurer." This is highly gratifying to us, as it evinces the fact that we fully meet the public taste in our liberal endeavors to please. We shall continue these excellent novellettes, from the best pens in the country.

A PROPOSITION.—A French Catholic priest has published a pamphlet in Paris, in which he suggests that the pope shall remove to Jerusalem, and there preside over the Christian Church. We think, however, the pope will prefer the eternal city as a residence.

SPLINTERS.

.... The cry of "mad dog" is coming up again. Many honest animals are put to death on suspicion of mania.

.... Two ingots of gold were lately taken out of McCulloch's mines, North Carolina, which weighed 450 dwts.

.... Every face is beautiful which habitually beams upon ours with genial smiles of affection.

.... Freeman Hunt is preparing for the press a sort of commercial history of American cities. It will be valuable.

.... There is plenty of room in the mind, if people only think of furnishing its apartments.

.... John C. Breckinridge, the 'democratic vice presidential candidate, has purchased an island in Lake Superior.

.... The ancient Greeks buried their dead in jars. We wonder if this is the origin of "family jars."

.... The North British Review thinks the poor man's tobacco ensures the peacefulness of his home.

.... The condition of woman is one of the measurements of the progress of nations—America is an example.

.... Lord Elgin at a Portland dinner toasted "America's greatest poet, Samuel Longfellow!"

.... Lamartine styles M. Desplace, his voluntary agent in this country, his "other self"—his halved heart.

.... There are over five hundred applications for admission into that noble institution, the New York Free Academy.

.... James Lee, of New York, is the gentleman through whose exertions the Washington monument in Union Square exists.

.... Nanendorf, a watchmaker in the hands of the Rotterdam police, pretends to be the lost dauphin of France.

.... A fashionable dry goods dealer in Philadelphia advertises a lace scarf worth 1500 dollars.

.... A full-sized real cashmere sells in Paris or London for five hundred to five thousand dollars. Think of it.

.... The Franciscan monks are about erecting a monastery at Allegany, Cattaraugus county, New York.

.... Mrs. Lydia Elliott, of Concord, New Hampshire, died, lately, at the age of 103 years, 4 months, 25 days.

.... The steamer Aquila lately arrived in Lake Michigan from the Mississippi River—an event in northwestern history.

.... Don't drive your horses fast during the dog-days. Their sufferings, remember, are unspeakable.

.... It is predicted that Philadelphia and Baltimore will once again be the outlets of western trade.

.... Dr. Deck thinks the 500,000,000 of embalmed Egyptians in the Nile mummy pits would make good printing paper.

OUR EIGHTY-FIRST YEAR.

On the 5th day of last month we (that is the United States) entered on our eighty-first year—an advanced period in the life of an individual, a mere starting-point in the life of a nation. We are literally just beginning. There are men living among us who look back through the whole period between '76 and '56, and trace the course of empire from the start. If, even to us representatives of Young America, our growth and expansion seem marvellous, what must it seem to those old men whose memories embrace the entire period? We were then, in the inception of our career, a struggling, scattered band of borderers clinging to the skirts of the Atlantic, with but comparatively a foothold on the continent. The great inner wealth of the land in which God's providence has placed us was then undeveloped. The colonists were few and far between. Machinery had but partially come to the aid of manual labor. Communication between scattered colonies and even individuals was difficult, tedious and expensive. As a necessary consequence, there was but a limited exchange of thought and sentiment. But a common danger produced a common union. A community of feeling on the question of servitude or independence enabled the scattered colonies to baffle, in a long and bloody war, the proudest power on the face of the globe. It built up navies out of nothing; it created generals more skilled than the best which European schools could furnish, and armies of recruits more intrepid in the justice of their cause, than the trained veterans that foreign gold brought into the field.

At last the foreign war ceased—the savage within our borders was driven back howling into the wilderness. Agriculture, relieved from an exhausting drain, clothed our fields with golden harvests. Commerce, no longer shrinking from the enmity of man, spread her white sails, and gathered in every quarter of the globe her golden fruits. The pioneer marched resolutely inland with his axe and rifle; the school and the church rose simultaneously; the hum of machinery was heard in towns that rapidly grew up into cities. Schools grew into academies—academies into colleges. The fame of the nation went abroad. Another war with the parent country only added to the lustre of our reputation. More recently a war on the same continent still further illustrated our glory, and gave us another State on the Pacific, large and rich enough for an empire in itself—and now we stand before the world, accomplished in arts and arms, rich in land, rich in gold, richer yet in the character of our brave men and our fair women, a confederation of thirty-one States, each sovereign, yet bound together with links of adamant, forming one compact, invulnerable mass.

How insignificant, in view of the great triumphs and glories of our career, appear the feuds, and discords and strife which have now and then, here and there, ruffled the mighty stream of empire in its flow. How utterly insignificant they seem, compared to the mighty and radical convulsions of the old world during the same. Do we doubt of the success of this great experiment? As well, to borrow an illustration of the Rev. Mr. Withington, might we, as we gazed on one of the mighty streams of the South, the broad and impetuous La Plata, doubt of its waters reaching the oceans to which they are tending in their irresistible sweep. Let the enemies of our country make the most of our local dissensions—let foreigners predict that our political fabric is tottering to its fall—we Americans know that it is as firmly set as the Rocky Mountains on their everlasting base. We know that power and independence now and forever is the fortunate destiny of this most fortunate of nations.

PAPERS.

In the library of the British Museum may be seen a book printed in the Low Dutch, containing upwards of sixty specimens of paper, made of different articles, the result of one man's experiments as early as 1772. In the manufacture of paper almost every species of tough fibrous vegetables and even animal substances have at one time or another, been employed. The roots of trees, their bark, the vine of hops, the tendrils of the vine, the stalks of the nettle, the common thistle, the stem of the hollyhock, the sugarcane, cabbage stalks, wood shavings, saw-dust, hay, straw, willow, and the like, have all been used, says Herring, in his work on modern and ancient paper-making, in the manufacture of paper.

HIGH LIFE.—A Russian princess with an unpronounceable name, has been sentenced to twenty years' hard labor in Siberia, for aiding and abetting in the murder of her husband. Her son, who was an accomplice, has been deprived of his rank and compelled to serve as a common soldier in the army.

THE VITRIOL MAN.—The vitriol man, or a vitriol man, has made his appearance in Havana, ruining ladies' dresses at the church, concert and opera. Sometimes he "draws it mild," merely throwing red pepper in the eyes of ladies and gentlemen. "Insane, but harmless," we presume.

MOUNT AUBURN.—A delightful resort in the summer is this beautiful city of the dead. No one is unimproved by stepping aside sometimes from the dusty, noisy track of life, and musing on high and holy things among the graves of the departed.

HOR CAKE.—Several of the European governments are giving their attention to the manufacture of hor cake for the benefit of their subjects. Before a great while, many of them, perhaps, will find that all their cake is dough.

"EX-SANTA FE."—The renowned George Wilkins Kendall, of the N. O. Picayune, was at last accounts building a saw and grist mill at New Braunfels, Texas. He has run a good many saws in his day.

MUSIC FOR THE MILLION.

A cute Yankee genius in Worcester has succeeded in changing the scream of the steam whistle into the music of the spheres, and the new invention has been successfully applied to one of the locomotives on the Worcester and Nashua Railroad. Now, instead of the ear-piercing strains that heralded the rolling thunder of the train, we shall listen to such dulcet melodies as those with which Orpheus lulled the vigilance of Cerberus when he went to seek his wife in a region hotter than the tropics. Instead of a midnight yell, "murdering sleep," like Macbeth in Mr. William Shakespeare's play of that name, we shall hear "Oft in the still night, When slumber's chain hath bound me." To announce the approach of the train, the music will start up "See the conquering hero comes!" When a sable African is discovered on the track, the warning will be given in the shape of "Out of the way, old Dan Tucker!" When a cow is overtaken and prematurely turned into beef, her dying ear will be soothed with the suggestive music of "Still so gently o'er me stealing." When a train rushes out of the station-house, without giving a breathless lady time to get on board, we shall hear "The girl I left behind me." When the weather is fair, of course the engine will play "Sparkling and bright;" and when the reverse happens to be the case, "Lord roared the dreadful thunder." Of course the engineer must be a man of exquisite musical taste and good judgment, and the machine supplied with a full repertory of airs. We should suggest that on the fourth of July, it play "Hail Columbia" and "The Star Spangled Banner," so that the passengers might sing those patriotic and stirring odes—only we are afraid that the accompaniment might prove a little too heavy for the voices. Who shall say, after this invention, that we are not a musical people; or that machinery has not been brought to the very verge of perfection? We have no doubt that in time we shall have mechanical orchestras and automaton prima donnas on the high pressure principle, and then a tea-kettle will enable every family to boil its own music.

FRIENDLY.—The peace address from the citizens of Manchester, England, to the citizens of the United States, is a ponderous document with 31,641 signatures. We should like to shake every one of the hands that signed it.

THE ARMY WORM.—Of course the army worm has committed great ravages among the corn and cotton crops in the Southwest, for the speculators say so—and they are all—all honorable men.

THE IRON ROAD.—The Dutch are covering the north of Holland with a perfect maze of railways. They captured it long ago.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. Dr. Stow, J. P. Skinner, Esq., of Windsor, Vt., to Miss Sarah C. Hall; by Rev. Mr. Barry, Mr. Anthony F. Ham to Miss Caroline B. Haskell; by Rev. Mr. Miner, Mr. Charles Roby to Miss Mary A. Coffin; by Rev. Dr. Adams, Mr. Joseph Tillagham to Miss Amelia Maria Odiorne; by Rev. Mr. Streeter, Mr. Amos G. Osgood to Miss Kate Amanda Cutter, both of Charleston.—At Roxbury, by Rev. Dr. Putnam, Mr. B. Frank Clements to Miss Charissa Story, of Essex.—At Chelsea, by Rev. Mr. Copp, Mr. James Porter to Mrs. Elizabeth Bery, both of Easton.—At Stoughton, by Rev. Mr. Dennis, Mr. Charles R. Hill to Miss Margaret A. Drake.—At Lynn, by Rev. Mr. Smith, Mr. Charles Jackson to Miss Hannah M. Rogers.—At Salem, by Rev. Dr. Thompson, Mr. William B. Knight to Miss Mary R. Blaney, both of Middlesex.—At Kingston, by Rev. Mr. Bowen, Mr. Thomas H. Burgess to Miss Mary C. Marden, both of Newburyport.—At Lowell, by Rev. Mr. Dabmar, Mr. George W. Stearns to Miss Harriet S. Twiss.—At Newburyport, by Rev. Dr. Dimmock, Mr. Nathaniel W. Tarbox to Miss Elizabeth B. Meader.—At Tannett, by Rev. Mr. Blake, Mr. Alexander McKinley to Miss Mary W. Ward.—At Andover, by George Foster, Esq., Mr. Hamilton L. Moulton to Miss Frances J. Abbott, both of North Andover. Also, by the same, Mr. James Hill to Miss Jane Lund.—At Nantucket, by Rev. Mr. Hopper, Mr. Allen B. Fuller to Miss Hannah M. Fitzgerald.—At Providence, R. I., by Rev. Mr. Stone, Mr. Joseph W. Hadfield to Miss Margaret Thompson.

DEATHS.

In this city, John Rayner, Esq., 77; Mr. Edmond Wallston, 58; Mrs. Sarah Dudley; Mr. Nathaniel Sylvester, 69; Miss Nancy H. Foster, 76.—At Charleston, Mrs. Hannah C. Hittellston, 58.—At Brookline, Miss Sarah Elliot Perkins, 62.—At North Chelsea, Capt. Philip Eaton, 76.—At Needham, Mr. Oliver Hudson, of Boston, 59.—At Waltham, Mr. Charles H. Frederick, 32.—At Salem, Miss Caroline A. Hilt, 20; Widow Mary Bott, 68.—At Newburyport, Mrs. Abigail Kilborn, 85; Mr. Nathan Prior, 40; Mrs. Sarah Waterhouse, 65.—At Braintree, Miss Alma A. Richardson, 23.—At Plymouth, Mr. William King, 72; Mrs. Esther S. Beckman, 45; Miss Louisa Burbank, 16; Widow Jerusha Belter, 86; Mr. Paul M. Cannon, 41.—At New Bedford, Mr. Nathaniel J. Antour, 29; Mrs. Susan H. Pierce, 30; Mrs. Ann P. Robinson, 34; Mr. Isaac Moore, 81.—At Ware, Mr. Penial Bacon, 84.—At Middleborough, Miss Abby Sullivan, 24; Mr. Ezekiel Turner, 87; Mr. Jason Wilbur, 66.—At Attleboro, Mr. Isaac Bailey, 42.—At Pittsfield, Dea. Levi Bradford, 62.—At North Adams, Mrs. Ann Britton, 22.—At North Bectet, Mr. Anubah Ames, 82.—At Northampton, Miss Mary Ann Wood, 66.—At Easthampton, Widow Philena C. Clark, 66.—At Caroline Smith, 42.—At Orange, Mr. Peter Cheney, 67.—At Westboro, Mr. Noyes Bryant, 74.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION.

A Record of the beautiful and useful in Art.

This paper presents in the most elegant and available form, a weekly literary mélange of notable events of the day. Its columns are devoted to original tales, sketches and poems, by the best AMERICAN authors, and the cream of the domestic and foreign news; the whole well spiced with wit and humor. Each paper is beautifully illustrated with numerous accurate engravings, by eminent artists, of notable objects, current events in all parts of the world, and of men and manners, altogether making a paper entirely original in this country. Its pages contain views of every populous city in the known world, of all buildings of note in the eastern or western hemisphere, of all the principal ships and steamers of the navy and merchant service, with fine and accurate portraits of every notable character in the world, both male and female.

TERMS.—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year, $3 00
4 subscribers, " " 10 00
10 " " " 20 00

Any person sending us sixteen subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the seventeenth copy gratis.

* One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, when taken together by one person, one year, for $4.

Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU,

CORNER OF TREMONT AND BROMFIELD STS., BOSTON.

WHOLESALE AGENTS.—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Winch, 116 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Fifth Street, Baltimore; A. C. Bagley, 102 Vine Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Roys, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Woodward, corner of 4th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Ringgold, Louisville, Kentucky; Trubner & Co., 12 Paternoster Row, London, general agents for Europe.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE AWAKENING.

BY ELLEN ALICE MORIARTY.

Ah! yesternight in visions blest
I wandered in the land ideal,
Unconscious that my lot was cast
Amid the shadows of the real.
For o'er my heart a blight had passed,
And ebbed the hope it fondly cherished,
That bloomed in life's bleak waste the last,
For peace and joy had early perished—
Alas! how early perished.

Methought you walked beside me there,
Through paths adorned with summer's glory,
And mid the song of bird and breeze,
You whispered love's enchanting story;
But ere my faltering voice declared
How long you had my heart in keeping,
The clouds of waking darkened all,
I woke, alas, to bitter weeping—
Ah me, to bitter weeping.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

LIFE'S CHANGES.

BY ANNIE CLAIR.

THERE was a marriage festival in one of the princely mansions that reared its proud dome on — Square. Carriage after carriage rolled up to the door of that palace home, and the sound of music and mirth was borne on the evening air; while the loiterers in the vicinity would never for a moment imagine there was aught but joy and happiness within. Gaze for a moment at the fair bride, as she passes the richly draped window, leaning on the arm of the stately bridegroom, who looks with pride on the queenly form at his side. How well she becomes the diamonds that flash from brow and arm, and seem striving to rival the lustre of her dark eyes. Watch her as she walks with proud, unflinching step to the man who is about to pronounce the marriage ceremony. Can you read the expression of that almost matchless countenance? Is it that of love and trust in one for whom she is to forsake all others, if need be, and cling to him alone?—is it in a thrill of love and happiness that she walks up to the marriage altar?—or is it pride and triumph that gleam in every feature of her fair face as the marriage vow was uttered? In that hour, before the altar, her heart beat calmly on with a full, measured pulse; that heart had, in a former day, trembled like a rosebud upon its slender stem when stirred by the evening breeze, at one glance from Clarence Tracy's eyes.

The marriage ceremony is ended; the bridegroom and the bride receive the congratulations of their friends, and ere the solemn benediction is scarce over, ascend the carriage steps, and are borne away to their elegant home, which almost surpasses the one the lady has left.

The world said Mabel Wentworth was beautiful, and her pride almost exceeded her beauty—she had loved once, truly and intensely, and came near sacrificing her pride to that love, by wedding the poor but gifted Clarence Tracy. But he had no money; and when the stern father commanded his daughter to wed the wealthy foreigner, she obeyed—and a loving, beating heart was sold for gold; and in a not far distant apartment one deeply stricken and desolate was sadly dreaming of "the days that were," while before him was many a rose-tinted note, which caused the blood to rush to the cheek and brow, and his dark eye to beam with proud determination. He hears the rattling of the carriage-wheels which accompany the bride to her new home, and pass so near his own poor apartment; but he hears them as though he heard them not, and his mind wanders back to the time when he had first met the daughter of the millionaire in his own village home, and ignorant of her rank and wealth, had sought and won her hand. Already had he ascended the first rolls in the ladder of fame; already had he made a commencement towards accumulating the much-coveted ore, and at each step forward he rejoiced, as it brought him so much nearer Mabel Wentworth.

But there was a "change came over the spirit of his dreams," for scarce five days had elapsed since the tidings had reached him that she was about to be led to the altar by a wealthier suitor. It was with unwavering eye and earless tone, that he replied to the friend who communicated the tidings; and that friend little knew the anguish his words caused, as Clarence turned away and sought his own lodgings, to think and to act—yes, to think and act for the future.

Pale and tearful, a young girl enters her humble apartment in a cheerless boarding-house, in an unfashionable and unhealthy part of the city. She was poorly clad, for her garments were much worn; but notwithstanding she was an interesting child (for she was scarce more than a child), with light, sunshiny hair, and dark eyes, that one could see from their troubled look, were tremulous with extreme sensibility. Is it wrong to murmur at her hard lot, and cast perchance a glance of envy at the cheerful and comfortable dwellings opposite? It was easy to see that in that gloomy attic destitution and want are no strangers; that sorrow had long pillowed an aching head. All day long had this lonely and sensitive creature wandered forth in the busy, bustling city in search of employment. But none would trust one of her tender years, and wearied with repeated disappointments, she again returned to her lodgings; she was met by her landlady, who informed her that she must immediately pay the sum due for board, or depart that very night. It was all in vain that the heart-broken one besought her to hear a little longer; that she had parted one by one with every article which she possessed, until nothing remained for which she could obtain the most trifling sum.

Thine is a hard and sorrowful lot, and no wonder the question sometimes arises, why a wise and kind Father thus afflicts his children;—why some are revelling in wealth and luxuries, while others are suffering for the very necessities of life. These things will all be understood when we go to his house of many mansions; therefore toil on, weary seamstress, in love and faith in Him, and thy award awaits thee—if not here, in heaven. Life for thee may not have many soft and pleasant pathways, where flowers are ever springing beneath thy footsteps, and clouds may sometimes hover thick and dark above, obscuring the sun of happiness. But never mind; for He seeth the end from the beginning, and ever knoweth all is well.

Mabel Hamilton once more sought the presence of her landlady. But all pleading was in vain; she took her rudely by the arm and thrust her out of the dark room into the still darker night. A few stars were gleaming with a pale, sickly hue through the dark clouds that were shooting athwart the city, and the poor girl gazed upon them with a sad, thoughtful look, which expressed no hope in the future. Alone in a large city, without home or friends, whither should she go? Onward, still onward, she bends her weary feet, without knowing whither they tend; she stops not until she is beyond the precincts of the city. She sinks on the steps of an imposing-looking mansion, and leaning against its pillars, seems lost in one overwhelming thought of utter wretchedness; and then again a vision of childhood's earlier days comes over her, and she is the idol of loving parents, though all this is remembered as a half-forgotten dream.

The opening of the door recalls her to herself, and the words addressed her cause a new pang to spring up in her already desolate heart. The master of the house steps forward with a sharp rebuke to his servant for his impertinence, and addresses the stranger kindly.

"Where is your home? Tell me, and my servant shall conduct you there."

An involuntary glance upward was the only reply; but Mr. Tracy understood it all, and taking her kindly by the hand, exclaimed: "Yes, my poor child, you have a home there; never forget it." And he led her forward, and placed her in his own arm-chair opposite the fire that was burning brightly in the open grate.

Mr. Tracy is called a cold, proud man, but he gazes on the face before him with no slight interest. The deep hazel eye, on whose lids a tear is trembling, the bright auburn hair that is clustering around the mournful face, the graceful form, the finely cut lip, all remind him of one who many years previous he had folded to his bosom, while the loved one had confessed that life would be a joyless blank separated from one to whom she had given her heart's best affections.

And she had said the truth—time had proved it so; for all the sweet blossoms of her life had withered and been crushed beneath the footsteps of gold; all the happiness of her life was swept away, as it seemed, forever, when Mabel Wentworth became the wife of Woodbury Delmore, who, instead of inheriting a valuable and extensive estate in England, proved to be a profligate adventurer; and after spending his wife's portion, and persuading his stepfather to sign notes to a large amount, all of which were spent at the gaming-table, he fled from the country, leaving a family that had been reared in luxury reduced almost to extreme poverty.

But Clarence Tracy knew nothing of all this; he only knew that Delmore took his bride to a house of almost princely splendor, that she was surrounded by the exclusives of a great city, who would never recognize one with prospects neither of wealth nor influence. And so he strove to forget; and he went away from his native city, where he remained until honors crowded thickly around him, and he had gained that which would place him (in the eyes of the time-serving ones who bowed the knee to Mammon) on an equality with one he had once truly loved.

But on his return to his early home he did not seek to learn the fate of Mabel; he knew that they had left the city, and though he was courted by the circle of which she was once the brightest ornament, her name was though it never had been—an almost forgotten sound by those who once knew her best, and professed to love and flatter the most. Many thoughts and memories crowd upon the rich and great man's mind, as he sits silently musing, while the eyes of the poor girl are cast sadly down in a half dreamy reverie. Suddenly she arises, and a half-smothered sigh sounds from her lips, as she moves toward the door. Mr. Tracy reached out his hand, while a kind smile was on his fine, manly face:

"Where would you go, my poor child? It is nearly midnight." And he glanced at the French timepiece over the fireplace.

"Alas, I do not know! I have no home! What will become of me?"

"You must remain here to-night, and my housekeeper shall conduct you to an apartment, and afterwards we will see what is best for you; but first tell me your name."

"Mabel Hamilton."

Mabel Hamilton! Mabel! O, how that name penetrates every recess of his heart; and then those eyes, her hair, form, everything—everything but the proud and queenly bearing, were so like his Mabel—once his. But no, it could not be! It was foolishness, weakness, to think of that poor child of want in connection with the pampered and proud lady he had known. What could they have been to each other? Nothing; it was merely a chimera of his excited imagination. But then the name was the same. But what of that? There were hundreds of Mabels in the world! He retired for the night, angry with himself to think memory of the past had the power of affecting him so much.

"And you are sure, Mabel, dearest Mabel, that it is not gratitude that induces you to give your consent to become the wife of one more than twice your age? I would know if love alone influences you in this event; otherwise, it is a cruel sacrifice, and will be productive of a life of misery. Be true to yourself, and true to me, for I have once been cruelly deceived; and if the chains that are to bind us will not be happily worn, speak the word, and you shall again be free."

The deep, expressive eye, but a moment before beaming with happiness, fell beneath the gaze fixed upon her own, and a tear trembled on the long eyelashes and fell.

"I am answered. You are free, Mabel! I was too hasty in giving way to the thought that youth and beauty like yours could be happy as the wife of one old enough to be your parent. Forgive me, and I will speak of love no more."

He arose to leave the room; he gave one glance at Mabel as he was about to close the door—and O, the unutterable look of sadness that met his eye. He returned to her side.

"Speak, Mabel. Will you not tell me why this unhappiness? I will no longer persecute you with attentions which are disagreeable to you. And now will you not place confidence in one who has been your guardian for three years?"

"My guardian, parent, friend—yes, more than parent or friend—all the world to me, what would have become of me but for your kindness? I, who came to you a poor homeless wanderer—I can never repay you; but a whole lifetime of gratitude and esteem are at your service."

"Gratitude and esteem, but canst not love?"

"And more than all, love—the first, the only love this heart ever knew."

He pressed her lips to his own, while he exclaimed:

"Mine now and forever! But why that look of anguish but a moment since on your fair brow?"

"I thought perhaps that you had come to the conclusion that the poor creature you befriended was unworthy the gifted and talented man whom all admire; and thought it very natural you might regret the past, and wish that I, too, might prefer it had been otherwise."

"And does the little skeptic still doubt?"

"No longer."

HOW THEY WOO IN ROYAL LIFE.

The recent visit of the Empress Dowager of Russia to Berlin has recalled many anecdotes connected with her early life. A letter from Berlin gives the following account of the young princess's engagement to the Grand Duke Nicholas, in 1816: The Princess Charlotte was given to understand by her parents that if the grand duke, during his stay at Berlin, should take a fancy to her, they would have no objection to her returning the penchant. The time originally fixed for the grand duke's stay had come, and he was seated at supper on his last evening next to the Princess Charlotte, when he abruptly told her that he must leave Berlin the next day. He hoped to surprise her into some demonstration of feeling on the occasion, but her maidenly pride withheld her from making more than some very say-nothing remark in acknowledgment. The grand duke therefore assumed another plan of operations; knowing that, however little the eyes of the company might be actually fixed on him and his fair neighbor, they were, nevertheless, the objects of general observation, he commenced telling her, but in an apparently embarrassed manner, and playing with a ring of his the while, that he had devoted himself during his short stay there to making himself acquainted with her character and disposition, etc., and that he had found in her every quality that he believed best calculated to make him happy in wedded life, etc.; but as they two were at that moment the objects of scrutiny to many present, he would not press her for any reply to his overtures, but if it were agreeable to her that he should prolong his stay at her father's court, she would perhaps have the goodness to take up the ring he had in his hand. This ring he then, apparently while playing with the two objects, thrust into the roll of bread lying on the table before him, and went on, seemingly in all song froid, with his supper. With an equal appearance of unconcern, the princess presently put out her hand and took up the roll, as if mistaking it for her own bread, and unnoticed by the company withdrew the ring and put it on her own hand. The rest requires no narration.—Baltimore Sun.

KERRY, IRELAND.

The mountains, the glens, the capes stretching far into the Atlantic, the crags on which the eagles build, the rivulets brawling down rocky passes, the lakes overhung by groves in which the wild deer find covert, attract every summer crowd of wanderers sated with the business and pleasures of great cities. The beauties of that country are, indeed, too often hidden in the mist and rain which the west wind brings up from the boundless ocean. But on the rare days when the sun shines out in all its glory, the landscape has a freshness and warmth of coloring seldom found in our latitude. The myrtle loves the soil. The arbutus thrives better than even on the sunny shores of Calabria. The turf is of a livelier hue than elsewhere, the hills glow with a purple, the varnish of the holly and ivy is more glossy, the berries of a brighter red peep through the foliage of a brighter green. But during the greater part of the seventeenth century this paradise was as little known as Spitzbergen or Greenland. If ever it was mentioned, it was mentioned as a horrible desert, a chaos of bogs, thickets, and precipices, where the she-wolf still littered, and where some half-naked savages, who could not speak a word of English, made themselves burrows in the mud, and lived on roots and sour milk.—Macaulay's History.

THE CAMEL.

According to the testimony of naturalists, the camel is fond of music, and has a very correct idea of time. One writer says that when the conductor wishes them to perform extraordinary journeys, instead of chastising, he encourages them with a song, and that, although they had stopped, and refused to proceed any further, they then went cheerfully on, and much quicker than a horse, when pushed by the spur. It is also stated by Tavernier and Chardin, that they proceed quicker or slower, according to the cadence of the song—and that in the same manner, when the conductors want an extraordinary journey to be performed, they know the tones which the camels love best to hear, and relieve each other by singing alternately.—Boston Courier.

Who does the best his circumstance allows,
Does well, acts nobly—angels could no more.—Young.

EDITORIAL MEXCHANGE.

One half of all who are born die before they reach 17 years of age. — The Vatican, at Rome, is an immense pile of buildings. Its extreme length through the apartments, and not duplicating a single room, is 79,000 feet, or nearly fourteen English miles. It has 4000 rooms, and 200 flights of stairs. — At Genoa every attorney takes an oath not to undertake any cause he does not think just. — A musket ball may be fired through a pane of glass, making a hole the size of the ball, without cracking the glass; if the glass be suspended by a thread, it will make no difference, and the thread will not even vibrate. — So inefficient is the public school system in Washington, that there are now upwards of one thousand children waiting for admission. — In the palace of San Souci, Frederick the Great's room is preserved as he left it, with his uniform, clothes, books, pens and paper, all unmoved—while the clock, which by a strange coincidence, stopped at the moment of his death, still points the hand to twenty minutes past two. — A book has been published in London with the singular title, "What shall we have for dinner?" — A door lock is much more easily picked with the key in the lock on the inside. This is a hint to those who are liable to be visited by burglars. — Wives are advertised for now as regular as most other commodities—at least, in the good city of New York. — In Russia they do not put sugar into their cups in the ordinary way, but they either hold a lump between their teeth, and sip the tea through it, or else they hold it in their hand, and nibble off a bit now and then, as they drink their tea. — Have you planted a vine? If you have not, go do it. In a few years you shall eat the fruit thereof, and bless the day when you planted it. — The English have so extended the culture of cotton in India, that that country has become a formidable competitor to America, there being imported in 1855 from India to England 165,000,000 pounds against 661,529,922 pounds from the United States—or nearly one-fourth as much. — Hackish—an extract of Indian hemp, is eaten like opium by the Hindoos, and produces a drunkenness which makes minutes seem like hours in length. — Who is an Esquire? Every man in this truly republican country, is entitled to the title of Esquire, who occasionally wears a black coat. — Lt. Governor Harly, of Kentucky, has sunk into hopeless mental imbecility. — The witty Talleyrand—that prince of deceivers and diplomatists—once replied to a lady who was making some dull disquisitions on the necessity of clearness in the use of terms, "Language, madam, is an instrument for concealing our thoughts." — In France it costs something to speak one's mind. A man was lately condemned to two years imprisonment for having spoken disrespectfully of the Empress Eugénie. — America has furnished more gold and silver—double the amount—than Europe, Africa, and Australia put together, and only $20,000,000 less than Asia has furnished since the beginning of the world. — There were about 3600 troops arrived in Canada during the month of June. — We see it stated that William V. Wallace, the famous composer, who has been residing abroad for some time past, was on the eve of returning to this country. We are pained to learn that his intense application has rendered him totally blind. — The army worm is said to be committing sad ravages upon the corn and cotton crops in several counties in Mississippi. — On the 4th ult. the free school system was for the first time introduced into Charleston, S. C.—the first free school being opened on that day with unusual demonstrations. — There is not an American paper of any character taken at Puebla, in Mexico—a wealthy city, containing about 60,000 inhabitants. It was accounted by good judges at Puebla that during the disturbance of the peace there, in consequence of the counter revolution—from its incipency to its finality—through robberies, assassinations and the casualties of war—full three thousand persons lost their lives. — Several ministers in Troy have resolved to deliver but one sermon each Sabbath during the hot weather. — The costly display of bridal presents at numerous weddings in New York for a few years back, have been hired from extensive jewellers for a reasonable amount.

BRICKS.—A paper on the manufacture of bricks was recently read before the English Society of Art, and the importance of the trade to the country was illustrated by the following statement: "The quantity of bricks made per annum in England is estimated at 1,800,000,000; Manchester alone making 130,000,000, London averaging about the same. Taking bricks at the low average of three tons per 1000, the annual weight would be 5,400,000 tons, and the capital employed 2,000,000 pounds sterling, or nearly ten million of dollars.

WOMAN'S WAYS.—Recent English papers report that two wealthy ladies, Misses Ann and Elizabeth Sherwood, of Sheffield, have just been liberated, by the intervention of their friends, after fourteen years' imprisonment for contempt of the court of chancery. They continued in prison fourteen years rather than produce an unimportant document in their possession.

CONTEMPORARY CRITICISM.—When Paradise Lost was published, the celebrated Waller wrote this passage—"The old blind schoolmaster, John Milton, hath published a tedious poem on the fall of man; if its length be not considered as merit, it hath no other."

MEMORABLE DAYS.—Sheridan died July 7th, Edmund Burke died July 8th, General Taylor died July 9th, Columbus was born July 10th. The duel between Hamilton and Burr occurred July 11th.

THE PLYMOUTH MONUMENT.—The legislature of Connecticut has appropriated three thousand dollars in aid of the Pilgrim Monument at Plymouth.

Wayside Gatherings.

Edward L. Davenport and Mrs. Charles Howard are to be Mr. Burton's leading people next season.

A Boston lampmaker recently found a swarm of bees in one of the street lamps. He took the lamp home and lived them.

The "States" have been put in direct communication with Canada by a submarine cable, recently laid across the St. Lawrence River.

The Mormons have decided not to urge the admission of Utah into the Union until after the presidential election, believing the present opposition to be only for party effect.

A man was recently convicted in Clarke county, Kentucky, of stealing two plugs of tobacco, and sentenced to two years' confinement in the penitentiary.

The city of New York owns real estate to the amount of $12,684,769 90, and notwithstanding this large property, the city expended last year nearly $24,000 for rents.

A gentleman who has just returned from a tour through Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana and Illinois, states, from his personal observations, that apples will be abundant throughout this region.

It is rumored in London that Charles Keen is to be knighted, thus proving, according to the Sun, that his frequent visits to Victoria's private theatricals have been knight-errands.

Hon. Henry L. Ellsworth, who, some time ago, presided over the Patent Office at Washington, has nearly 4000 acres planted in corn this year, on his little farm in Lafayette, Indiana.

A brass propeller for U. S. steamer Rosamke was cast at Richmond, Va., lately, weighing 27,000 pounds, and said to be 1000 pounds larger than any other composition casting ever made in the United States.

The commissioners of the New York land office have resolved to sell all the public lands in the counties of Herkimer, Essex, Hamilton and Warren. The minimum price is fixed at twenty-five cents per acre.

The Swedish minister at Washington, Mr. Sjöberg, has been recalled, to be appointed chief in the cabinet of the crown prince. This step is regarded as a good sign for the future policy of the new prince regent.

A few days since, Daniel Linden, aged 16, shot and mortally wounded a boy of the same age, named John Boyle, in a quarrel about a girl! Both were going to school at Paris, in Eastern Illinois.

Nine of the principal merchants of St. Petersburg, Odessa and Moscow have just been authorized by the czar to open branches of their houses in Paris, London, Vienna, Marseilles, Constantinople, Naples, New York, Lisbon and Rio Janeiro.

The Albany Times states that a pistol has been invented in that city which will fire ninety times per minute, carry a ball forty yards further than any pistol now in use, and that it is also much lighter and in every respect superior to Colt's celebrated pistols.

Alexander II., of Russia, wears the same sword that Napoleon wore at the battle of Marengo, in 1800, and which the Emperor Nicholas bought in 1850, just half a century after that eventful and bloody battle, for the enormous sum of thirty-two thousand dollars!

A piece called Tiberius has been in rehearsal at the Gaite, Paris. In it were represented scenes of the Roman circus, and animals trained "to kill" martyrs without hurting them were introduced. The government has forbidden the representation, although it has passed the censorship.

The Russian government is turning attention to its American territory. An expedition is fitting out at Hamburg by a Russian American company, to sail next month for the Russian American territory. The expedition is of the nature of a new colony, numbering five hundred, including artificers of all kinds.

By the recent survey of the field of Braddock's defeat, made by Mr. Bancroft and his party, it was found that the topography did not agree with the maps usually published, and Mr. Bancroft at once commissioned Mr. Latrobe, the distinguished engineer, to prepare a correct map of the ground at this important scene.

The Albany Argus states that there is a much greater frog business done in this country than is generally supposed, and that it is not entirely for the benefit of Frenchmen. One man is constantly engaged in buying up frogs for the New York market, where they command a high price.

Among the recent deaths in Philadelphia, is that of Mrs. Maria Campbell, wife of Alexander Campbell. She was the second daughter of the late Alexander James Dallas, and the sister of the present American minister in Great Britain. She was, during the administration of James Madison, greatly admired in the highest circles of society in Washington city.

The annual report of the postmaster general of Canada states that 1293 post offices were in active operation on the 31st of March, 1856. During the year, 1165 miles of new post routes were added to the establishment; over six million letters passed through the post; the receipts amounted to $368,166, and the expenditures $487,850, showing a deficiency of $119,684.

A monument is to be erected in Paris to Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette. The prefect of the city lately submitted the plan of it to the emperor, who, on returning it, said to him, "Tell the Municipal Council that I assume for myself the task of reviewing and correcting the plan for this monument, for I am resolved that my name shall be attached to this work of expiation."

A Chinaman named Yung Kiang Nga, from Shanghai, received the sacrament of adult baptism, in the Church of the Ascension, New York, lately. He is about eighteen years of age, and very intelligent. He has been studying for a year past, and his present wish and intention is to dedicate himself to the missionary work among his countrymen, and he is pursuing his studies with that view.

The records of the Inquisition in Spain show that for three hundred and twenty-seven years, from 1481 to 1808, 34,658 souls were "dismissed to the flames of hell, after their accursed bodies had been burned to ashes at the stake;" 18,049 persons were burned in effigy, and 288,214 were condemned to prison and the galleys—a punishment involving, perhaps, greater misery than that of suffering at the stake.

Hats for men were invented at Paris by a Swiss, in 1404. They were first manufactured at London by Spaniards in 1510. Before that time, both men and women in England commonly wore close knit woollen caps. E. Daniel relates that when Charles II. made his public entry into Rouen, in 1449, he had on a hat lined with red velvet, and surmounted with a plume or tuft of feathers. He adds, that it is from this entry, or at least under his reign, that the use of hats and caps is to be dated, which henceforward began to take the place of the chaparons and hoods that had been worn before in France.

Foreign Items.

The potato crop has proved a complete failure throughout Portugal.

Giovanni Rugges, lately tried in Florence for reading and circulating the Bible, has been acquitted.

The bell brought from Sebastopol, which the French emperor has given to Notre Dame, has arrived at the cathedral.

The town of Kara had been surrendered to the Turks, and the Turkish troops had evacuated the fortress of Belout Kaleh.

The Archbishop of Lyons has issued a mandate, in which he attributes the inundations to the violation in his diocese of the law of the church respecting the observance of the Sabbath!

The Russian government has given orders for reducing the personnel of the Finland fleet. A ukase orders that the colors of the disbanded militia shall be hung up in the cathedrals of the empire.

The Turkish ambassador's fiat to the Queen of England, at which Mr. Dallas and family were present, is described as exceeding in splendor that of any foreign minister's private entertainment.

The Russian commandant in the Crimea peremptorily forbids any land travellers passing southwards from Perekop. This strict injunction will probably be maintained until the 70,000 Russians have rebuilt Sebastopol.

The injury done to the crops by the late inundations in France is estimated at 150,000,000 francs, of which 30,000,000 francs are referable to the millinery trees for silk-worms. In that amount are not included the damage done to houses, the loss in cattle, utensils, etc., or the injury done to railroads.

Sands of Gold.

.... Wrong is but falsehood put in practice.—Penn.

.... There is nothing on earth divine beside humanity.—Melancthon.

.... An ingenious mind feels in unmerited praise the bitterest reproach.—Boswell.

.... Well-regulated minds may be satisfied with a small portion of happiness; none can be happy with a small portion of content.—Brooke.

.... In honest truth, a name given to a man is no better than a skin given to him; what is not natively his own falls off and comes to nothing.—Landor.

.... Where necessity ends, curiosity begins; and no sooner are we supplied with everything that nature can demand, than we sit down to contrive artificial appetites.—Johnson.

.... To discover a truth and to separate it from a falsehood is surely an occupation worthy of the best intellect, and not at all unworthy of the best heart.—Landor.

.... Easiness of disposition conciliates bad and good alike; it draws affections to it, and relaxes enmities; but that same easiness renders us too often negligent of our graver duties.—Blake.

.... Serious thoughts are folded up, heisted, and unlooked-at; lighter, like dust, settle all about the chamber. The promise to think seriously dismisses and closes the door on the thought.—Landor.

.... Truth is a point; the subtlest and finest; harder than adamant; never to be broken, worn away, or blunted. Its only bad quality is, that it is sure to hurt those who touch it; and likely to draw blood, perhaps the life-blood, of those who press earnestly upon it.—Landor.

Joker's Budget.

"Women," said a shopkeeper, "were invented to buy shilling calicoes."

"Shoot folly as she flies—Pope," was set up by a stupid printer, "Shoot Polly as she flies—Pop."

Pompey says he once worked for a man who raised his wages so high that he could only reach them once in two years.

Some one says of a certain congregation, that "they pray on their knees Sunday, and on their neighbors the rest of the week."

A paper, giving an account of Toulouse, says, "It is a large town, containing upwards of 60,000 inhabitants built entirely of brick."

A "camp follower," at a late regimental parade, excused the irregularity of his gait, by saying that he was trying to march after two tunes.

The gentleman, so often spoken of in novels, who riveted people with his gaze, has now obtained permanent employment at a boiler manufactory.

Jones, Jr., says that his neighbor has a very nervous, eccentric dog, that displays a fondness for midnight vocal exercise, and desires to know a remedy. For quieting the nerves of a dog, we know nothing equal to strychnine.

"Mother sent me," said a little girl to a neighbor, "to ask you to come and take tea with her this evening."—"Did she say at what time, my dear?"—"No, ma'am; she only said she would ask you, and then the thing would be off her mind—that was all she said."

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

An elegant, moral and refined Miscellaneous Family Journal, devoted to polite literature, wit and humor, prose and poetic gems, and original tales, written expressly for the paper. In politics, and on all pertinent questions, it is strictly neutral; therefore making it emphatically A PAPER FOR THE MILLION, and a welcome visitor to the home circle.

It contains the foreign and domestic news of the day, so condensed as to present the greatest possible amount of intelligence. No advertisements are admitted to the paper, thus offering the entire sheet, which is of the MAXIMUM size, for the instruction and amusement of the general reader. An unrivalled copy of contributors are regularly exposed, and every department is under the most finished and perfect system that experience can suggest, forming an original paper, the present circulation of which far exceeds that of any other weekly paper in the Union, with the exception of "BALLOU'S PICTORIAL."

Sample copies sent when desired.

TERMS—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year.....	$2 00
4 subscribers, " ".....	7 00
10 " " " ".....	15 00

Any person sending us sixteen subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the seventeenth copy gratis.

One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, $4 per annum. Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU, Corner of Tremont and Bromfield Sts., Boston, Mass.

WHOLESALE AGENTS.—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Wine, 115 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; A. C. Bagley, 102 Vine Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Roys, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Woodward, corner 4th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Ringgold, Louisville, Ky.; Wallace, Austin & Boel, 25 Clark Street, Chicago, Illinois.

CHURCH ARCHITECTURE.

The churches and cathedrals of the old world embrace some of the finest specimens of architecture extant. In the stormy times when most of the countries of Europe were exposed to disturbances and various disasters, the monasteries and convents were not the most secure homes for those that dwelt there, but various arts and sciences found refuge within their walls. Literature, painting, mosaic work and architecture were all cultivated to a greater or less degree by the cloistered monks. There is ample proof in the annals, histories and chronicles of early writers, that when a religious order required a new church or convent, it was a very common thing for the bishop, friar or abbot to make out the architectural design himself, and for the monks to execute the work under his direction; so that church building became almost a part of monastic studies. Each religious order spread itself into the different countries of Europe, its members taking with them the usages, the arts, and the skill of which they were the fountain head. The monks, too, in the various affairs of their houses, travelled singly, or in pairs, from country to country, to keep up the links of communication between the different houses of the order. "As there existed no inns to receive them, they reposed in the other convents on their road; and at a period of total want of general communication in other departments, the different religious communities were very minutely and rapidly informed of each other's affairs. Hence, not only the peculiar style of architecture of the chief edifices of each order served as a model to that of others belonging to it, however distant, but any change of taste or fashion in the former soon made its way to, and was adopted by, all the others." Church building being regarded as a religious duty, the architects and masons employed in it were looked upon as being superior to most other workmen. The inhabitants of Como, in the north of Italy, obtained celebrity for their skill in these matters, inasmuch that the appellation "Magistri Comacini," or "Masters from Como," became generic to all those of the profession. It is asserted that the "free and accepted masons" were established under the Lombard kings, and that they built an immense number of churches in Italy at a time when the other countries of Europe were badly supplied with churches and builders. The Freemasons, or church builders, became a highly privileged body, and many persons were desirous of joining them. Some of the builders at Rome, and others as far off as Constantinople, did so, and by degrees some of the natives of France, Germany, Belgium and England were admitted members of the fraternity. It appears that ecclesiastics were especially anxious for this honor or privilege; abbots, prelates, bishops and monks being ranked among the free and accepted masons. Thus the twofold chain of events led to the same result: the refuge which the arts found among the religious orders induced the monks to become architects and builders, while the sanction of a church building guild by the pope, led to a general uniformity in the mode of proceeding. The missionaries and the masons went hand in hand. At a parish in Suffolk, England, during the reign of Henry VI., a contract was entered into between the townspeople and the Freemasons employed in building a new church, in which it was agreed that every man should be provided with a pair of white leather gloves and an apron, and that a lodge, properly tiled, should be erected at the expense of the parish, wherein to hold their meetings. It is believed that the style of the churches was mainly determined by the builders themselves, and not by those who were to pay for them; and as these builders, in every country, had a close mutual connection, a strong family resemblance became observable in the churches built about the same time. There seems furthermore, reason to believe that whosoever and by whomsoever the general vertical character of the Gothic architecture was established, the discovery or invention was so intimately connected with the church-building guild, as to be diffused throughout the western countries of Europe very speedily. As the unity of plan among them was such that there was scope for each man to take up that particular department that his taste or skill qualified him to practise, there probably arose some who studied especially those mechanical principles of building, or the ratio and mode of arrangement between support and pressure; for it is impossible to believe that the wonderful examples of equilibrium exhibited in many European cathedrals could have been produced without a close investigation of such principles. And yet we know of no one who could have done this, but the members of some such fraternity as the one now under notice. Europe had very little science in it, according to the modern acceptation of the term, in those times; and the utter absence of documents, plans, sections or calculations relating to church architecture, strengthens the opinion that it was in the hands of a fraternity who kept their proceedings secret. The above view is not a certainty, by any means, but it accounts for several features of European church architecture which have hitherto been a sort of mystery—such as the uniformity of a style or taste throughout the continent in the churches built at the same time, and the unapproachable beauty of church architecture at a time when other arts were languishing, and the world was immersed in intellectual darkness. As illustrations of church architecture, we present, first, a very fine engraving of the famous cathedral at Toledo, one of the greatest objects of interest in that fine old Spanish city. It is not certainly in the severest taste, but like many other irregular buildings it is exceedingly picturesque. The numerous buttresses, pinnacles and curtains, the elaborately finished windows, the dome, the magnificent portal, the curious, tall tower, arrest the eye of the observer, and when the sunlight falls upon it, bringing out its salient points and causing sharp shadows to fall from its angles, the impression is very striking. This cathedral is the metropolitan church of Spain, and was founded as far back as the year 587. It is 404 feet in length, and 204 feet in width; the tower is of great height. It was formerly celebrated for the splendid collection of sacred paintings it contained, embracing many from the rapid and felicitous pencil of Luca Giordano, but most of these have been removed. Its former wealth in gold, silver and jewels was almost incalculable; but a greater part of this has been applied to secular purposes, and it is now shorn of its ancient interior splendor. We turn next to the exterior of the cathedral of Messina, a Gothic structure, erected by the Normans soon after their conquest of Sicily. The square tower at the angle of the building is a portion of the edifice. The façade of the church is very similar to the general style of the Catholic churches erected by the Spanish settlers in Mexico. There is a large central portal and two side entrances. Although there is some elaborate carving about the doorway, the whole exterior has a blank, gloomy and forbidding aspect. A religious procession is seen moving into the cathedral, and in front of some of the market women are kneeling out of respect to the ceremony. But in the left hand corner is a group apparently indifferent and engaged in their own concerns. The interior of the cathedral, however, shown in our next engraving, is very rich and striking, though rather incongruous in its details. The Roman, and not the Gothic, architecture is seen throughout. A street scene in Messina closes our series. In the distance is seen the citadel. The houses are quite irregular, but nearly all of them have balconies.

CATHEDRAL AT TOLEDO.

INTERIOR OF THE CATHEDRAL AT MESSINA.

EXTERIOR OF CATHEDRAL AT MESSINA.

STREET ARCHITECTURE OF MESSINA.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { CORNER OF TREMONT
AND BROMFIELD STS.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 16, 1856.

$3.00 PER ANNUM. | VOL. XI., No. 7.—WHOLE No. 267.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

JOHN C. FREMONT.

In the engraving below we present a correct likeness of Col. John C. Fremont, the presidential candidate of the Republican party, drawn for us by Rowse, from a photograph by Brady of New York. The scene on the left, representing mining in California, and that on the right, showing Fremont and his party threading the defile of the Sierra Nevada, are appropriate accessories to the portrait of the bold adventurer. John Charles Fremont is a native of South Carolina, in which State he was born in the year 1813. His father was a French immigrant and his mother a native of Virginia. The former died when the subject of our sketch was but four years of age, and it was owing to the exertions of his mother that he received an excellent education. At seventeen, he graduated at Charleston College, and after spending some time as a teacher of mathematics, he fairly commenced his career as a civil engineer. In the latter capacity he was an assistant to Nicolet in his survey of the upper Mississippi. In 1842, holding then a lieutenant's commission in the Topographical Engineers, with a handful of men collected on the Missouri frontier, he explored the south pass of the Rocky Mountains, through which the tide of overland immigration now pours into California. His scientific observations made on this expedition were of great value, and embodied in an able report printed by the Senate. He next went on an exploring expedition to Oregon territory, leaving the frontier of Missouri in May, 1843, scaling the Rocky Mountains at a point south of the south pass, and reaching Fort Vancouver in November of the same year. With only twenty-five companions he now turned his face again towards the Rocky Mountains, and through much hardship and trial, explored upper California, and established the geography of the western part of our continent. After an absence of sixteen months, he returned to Washington and wrote out a history of his expedition. In 1845 he was again on his way to the Pacific, and explored the Asiatic slope of the North American continent. He was engaged in active service during the Mexican war, as a lieutenant-colonel of mounted riflemen, which commission he was deprived of by the sentence of a court-martial. President Polk offered to restore his commission, but he declined accepting it. True to his innate love of adventure, and of scientific observation, he started again for the far west, his object being to survey the route for a great road from the Mississippi to San Francisco. He took the trail with thirty-three men, including many of his old mountain companions, and 130 mules. On the Sierra San Juan all his mules and a third of his men perished in the rigors of more than a Russian winter, and Fremont arrived at San Francisco, stripped of everything but life. His expedition was refitted by men who had confidence in his success, and he started again through the country of the Apaches, and in 100 days from Santa Fe stood on the banks of the Sacramento. Fremont was the first U. S. Senator from California. In addition to the expeditions noted above, he traversed the deserts of the great west once more in the dead of winter, his object being to demonstrate that the central route for a Pacific railroad was feasible for winter travel. Some years ago Col. Fremont married a daughter of Col. Thomas H. Benton. Through out his life Col. Fremont has been distinguished chiefly by devotion to science and a love of adventure amounting to a passion. No perils, no difficulties seem to have daunted his courageous spirit, and, more fortunate than many men of daring and determination, success has crowned undertakings that a romance writer would hardly venture to sketch out for his hero in a work of fiction. In fact his life reads more like romance than a record of reality.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE GIPSEY'S SECRET:

—OR—

THE LEAGUE OF GUILT.

A STORY OF HIGH AND HUMBLE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE CONTRABANDIST."

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER XIX.

A RESCUE!

QUIETLY and uneventfully the days glided on with Eleanor Ashby at the farmhouse. The silent solitude reigning about her new home was utterly unbroken. The little brown dwelling nestled down in its verdant nook, a solitary thing; with the rich wooded landscape of meadow, copse and glade, slumbering in green, luxuriant summer stillness on every hand, and the lazy, golden summer sunshine filled the blue air with a dreamy influence all day. Soundless and monotonous, the days crept on.

From morning till night, Eleanor beheld no face save those of the old farmer and his wife, and Lucy. Her occupations consisted in reading, sewing and meditating. She spent the long summer days immured closely in the house, scarcely ever stepping foot without the door. For at first, with her mind still under the influence of the fear and trouble she had so recently endured, and an uneasy dread ever agitating her, from moment to moment, of Morley Briancourt discovering her locality, and suddenly making his appearance at some unwary instant, she had possessed no wish to leave her seclusion for a moment.

But gradually as day succeeded day, and no token from the outer world came to disturb her tranquillity, with fresh alarms for her own fate, she became re-assured; and now the dreamy monotony of this existence began to have its effect upon her. She resolved to venture forth from her retirement.

It was a pleasant change from the secluded days she had passed, to find herself once more in the open air; in the green meadows, with the silent golden sunshine about her, the cool, free air kissing her cheek, and the heavy fragrance of summer blossoms floating everywhere about her, as their odor-laden petals gleamed up from the tufted moss; beneath the shadow of the woodlands, clustering here and there over the rich landscape, or sitting by some willow-shaded spring, gushing clear and cool from the rifted rock.

Many a happy yet saddened reverie was hers, as she held these solitary hours of communion with nature, when, with the forgotten book falling neglected from her grasp, with the careless wind fluttering idly in its leaves, her hands lying clasped on her knee, and her fair head bowed in thought, she went back to dwell on some of the happiest moments she had ever known.

Once more she wandered with Mary Latimer through the old woods at Briarfield; or sat beside her in the pleasant morning-room, grown so familiar and so dear for the memory of the friendly faces wont to meet with her there; again she sat at Mary's side, with Mary's arm about her, while good Aunt Dorothea busied herself with her knitting-needles close by, and Hugh, Mary's brother Hugh, talked with them, or read to them. And again the sound of those musical, earnest tones lingered in her ear; and once more she met the full, dark, eloquent eyes of the reader, raised for a moment to her own, as they had been so many times, with a glance that thrilled her through.

And now her heart would throb with a quickened pulsation, and her cheek grow warm, at the memory of these things. She would not dwell on them. She would rise and turn away from their influence. And yet, in her solitude, these thoughts became dearer, tenderer, more precious every day; while the time passed on, and she was yet divided from those to whom her heart turned so earnestly.

A fortnight passed in this manner. She was in safety and in peace. The object of her removal thither—to secure her from the united machinations of her uncle and his guests—was gained. But she wished ardently for the appearance of some one of the few whom she could call her friends, to enliven her solitude. She saw no one, however. The Latimers must be ignorant of her whereabouts, even if they had heard of her flight; and neither Pequin nor Harry Longworth came. Perhaps it was because Morley Briancourt was on the watch, and they dared not come hither for fear of being traced.

And what did the Latimers think, all this time, of her disappearance? Where would they think she was? Would they guess the cause of her flight? Would they be uneasy concerning her? She thought whether Pequin would not let them know, that they might be assured of her safety. Whether, in case he should fail to do so, Harry Longworth would not do it himself.

But she remained, day after day, in uncertainty of these things. She went every day, now, either alone, or with Lucy for a companion, and sometimes extended her walks for three or four miles, in one direction or another, without meeting a single person. Once in a while she passed some rustic farmer, or a group of hay-makers, or a rosy-cheeked milkmaid, perhaps, driving her cows to pasture; but oftener, during the entire length of her ramble, she met no one.

Her favorite resort was to the banks of a pretty stream, flowing through grove, and meadow, and dell, whose quiet waters sheltered the shining trout, and whose mossy banks were beautiful with the wild violet, purpling the emerald turf.

One day, at a greater distance from the farmhouse than she had ever before ventured on, she found herself, while following the windings of the stream, in the vicinity of a small yet elegant mansion of plain brick, but presenting a handsome and pleasing exterior, and half concealed by the trees embowering the slope on which it stood, through whose twining foliage broke the flash and glitter of the sunlight on its large windows. Through the trees, two persons moved along down towards the edge of the stream. They came in full sight, presently: two ladies, walking slowly, and engaged in conversation. The one rather elderly, handsomely yet plainly dressed; with a tall yet graceful form, and of ample proportions; a countenance of pleasing and kindly expression, and fine though large features.

The second, a younger lady, of evidently some two or three-and-twenty years. She was not nearly so tall as her companion, but yet of a graceful height; with a fine and elegantly proportioned figure, and pleasing carriage. Her complexion was fair and clear, her features well cut and regular, but their expression, at once gentle and kindly, had something of thoughtful sadness in it,—an expression the more plainly read in her large, beautiful hazel eyes, shaded by their heavy silken lashes, which, like her finely-arched eyebrows and her hair, were of a very dark, soft brown—so dark as almost to be taken for black.

As they passed, she raised those beautiful eyes, for a moment, with a gentle, serious, attentive glance, to Miss Ashby's face, and then passed on; but it was evident that she directed the attention of her companion to Eleanor, for directly the elder lady turned, and glanced, too, towards Miss Ashby. They went on slowly together; and Eleanor, who was also walking slowly, and could not pass them without hastening, and yet disliked to follow so near behind them, soon turned and took her way homeward.

Her thoughts lingered, as she walked on, with the sweet yet melancholy countenance she had seen, and which, though she had beheld it but for an instant, had made a deep impression on her. She was deeply interested by it. She wondered who the young lady could be, and asked herself what could be the cause of so sad an expression, evidently habitual as it was, on the countenance of one so young.

The following morning, she went out as usual, and was now accompanied by Lucy. As usual, she bent her steps along the course of the stream. Engaged in thought, she spoke but seldom during their walk; and Lucy, too, was silent and meditative, thinking, it is not at all unlikely, of Harry Longworth, and wishing very naturally to see him again.

They continued their way, until Eleanor found herself within less than a quarter of a mile of the house which had yesterday attracted her attention, and perceived, at the same moment, that the two ladies whom she before encountered were slowly approaching her. They met and passed, the young lady lifting her eyes to Eleanor's countenance again, as the day before, with that same thoughtful, serious glance which Miss Ashby remembered so well.

"What a pretty young lady, Miss Eleanor,—did you mind?" said Lucy, attracted, like her mistress, by that lovely countenance,—"what a pretty young lady! And yet she looks a bit sad, somehow. They must belong about here somewhere, I should think. They have only their parasols."

"They live up yonder, probably," answered Miss Ashby; "in the house on the slope: a pretty one—is it not, Lucy?"

"Yes, indeed, Miss Eleanor. I wonder what their names are?"

This, of course, Eleanor was unable to tell. She walked on with Lucy, both thinking of the two strangers.

They had proceeded some distance from the house on the slope, when, suddenly, both perceived a little boy, further on, running along the bank of the stream. He had come almost up to them, when, going too near the edge, he lost his balance, and, with a cry, fell over into the water.

Lucy uttered a scream, and stood perfectly still, too frightened to stir hand or foot. But Eleanor, though her alarm was quite as great, did not lose her presence of mind; and running instantly forward to the spot, sprang unhesitatingly from the bank.

The boy had just sunk, and now, as he rose for the first time, gasping for breath, Eleanor caught him by the arm, attempting, at the same time, to get hold of a willow branch that drooped over the water. But she was too far from the bank to reach it; and the frightened child, clinging to her dress, and gasping still, impeded her efforts. Her clothes, too, grew heavy with the water that had completely filled them. A hot flash of fear ran through her.

"Do not touch me, little boy,—do not touch me!" she said, rapidly. "I will hold you up." And she tried to unclasp his clinging hands.

But he clung the closer, too terrified to comprehend her. She could not remove his hands, and her garments grew heavier with the water. She felt herself sinking, lower and lower, and the water was very deep here.

Lucy, meanwhile, screaming louder than before, and almost distracted with fear, ran towards the water, and then, wringing her hands, ran back again, calling in distress to the two ladies she had seen, who, attracted by her cries, were hastening up.

And Eleanor, her strength gone, her motions shackled with the weight she bore, her head whirling, and the water singing in her ears, sank, with her burden, out of sight.

It was as one groping in thick darkness, with a dull and feeble glimmer of light just struggling, a long, long way off, through the gloom. A sensation of agony unspeakable—the wrestling of life with death. The light grew clearer; it came more near. The anguish passed away; and Eleanor opened her eyes. All was dim and indistinct about her at first; she could see nothing plainly. A faint, confused murmur was audible; but she could make nothing of it.

Presently her faculties became stronger. She saw and heard with a greater degree of distinctness. She became conscious that she was lying in a bed, in a strange room; that three or four persons were gathered about her, all looking at her.

One was a gentleman dressed in black, standing just by the pillow, on the right. On the other side, were two ladies, whose faces Eleanor remembered faintly; especially the younger one, with its melancholy sweetness of expression, disturbed with an air of anxious concern now, as was also that of her elder companion. But as her eyes rested on them, with a glance of recognition, a glow of pleasure lighted up the countenance of each; and the subdued exclamation, "She is safe!" uttered in a grateful tone, reached her ear. Then she saw Lucy—her own maid, Lucy,—leaning over the foot of the bed, with an earnest expression of delight and relief beaming over her tearful countenance. Eleanor had a faint idea of what it all meant; but she was too weak to think at present. She was too weak to move or speak.

She was conscious of being slightly raised up, and of drinking something that was offered her. Presently the objects about her grew indistinct once more; the faces of her attendants faded away, and she slept.

It was morning when she woke again; and now, though she was by no means strong yet, the extreme weakness she had felt was gone. Her mind was tolerably clear and collected. She was lying in a small and elegantly appointed chamber, with abundant evidences of wealth and taste scattered on every side. Beautiful pictures adorned the pale rose-tinted walls, whose cornices were richly wrought and gilded; costly draperies of silk and lace softened the morning light, as it entered the apartment; clusters of fresh roses seemed to have been scattered over the white ground of the velvet carpet; the chairs, the dressing-table, and the couch on which she lay, were all of rare and curiously-carved wood, beautifully inlaid; bouquets of wax-like exotics breathed the softest fragrance around her, from porcelain vases near; and amid the rosy twilight falling through the room, gleamed one or two exquisite marble statues from their distant niches.

As she moved, the soft rustle of the silken counterpane seemed to warn a vigilant ear of her waking; for a slight sound was heard beyond the foot of the couch, and directly the beautiful stranger of Miss Ashby's interest appeared at her side. And now Eleanor knew that she was in the house on the slope.

The young lady took Eleanor's hand gently in her own, bending over her with an air of kindly interest.

"How do you feel this morning?" she asked.

"Pretty well, I thank you," answered Eleanor, with a faint smile, "though not quite so strong as I could wish. But that is natural, I suppose. How long have I been lying here?"

"Nearly twenty-four hours."

"So long? It seems scarcely five minutes since I sank—"

"Then you remember?" said the young lady. "But I forget Dr. Morrison's injunctions. I must not allow you to talk yet. You must lie very still for awhile."

"Nay—answer me one question," said Miss Ashby, pleadingly. "Was that poor little boy saved? and who rescued us?"

"Now you have asked two, instead of one," answered the young lady, with a smile, and a tone of gentle chiding. "But I will not vex you with fruitless wondering. The child is safe, and my aunt's gardener rescued you. Now you have talked quite enough, and must be quiet indeed, or Doctor Morrison will scold us both."

She smoothed back Eleanor's hair under the delicate laced cap with a gentle, caressing touch, arranged the clothes about her, and then sat down by the bedside, in an easy chair, with a book.

And Eleanor, with pleased and passive obedience, lay still, quietly regarding the lovely white-robed form and sweet, serious face of her beautiful visitant, as she sat, with her graceful head resting upon her hand, her eyes fixed upon the open page in her lap, and her countenance turned partially aside, so that its fine, clear profile was charmingly defined to Miss Ashby's view.

CHAPTER XX.

AMONG FRIENDS.

"WELL, now, my dear young lady," said Dr. Morrison, to his patient, "I think, if you promise to keep yourself very quiet indeed, you may go down stairs awhile. But mind—you must take care of the conditions. However, Lady Mayhew will look out for that, I dare say."

"Indeed I shall, Dr. Morrison," said Lady Mayhew, kindly. "But are you quite sure she is strong enough to go down so soon? Because I am very much afraid she is weaker than she thinks, and will be trying her strength too far."

"Indeed—indeed, dear madam," interposed Eleanor, "I am quite strong enough. Your kind nursing has almost entirely restored me. You are very good to be so anxious, so careful on my account; but pleasant as it is, I must not permit myself to trespass too long on your kindness."

"Now, my dear, no another word on that score," returned the lady, shaking her head with laughing decision, "for really I will not have it. If Dr. Morrison is perfectly certain that it won't do you the least harm in the world, I will let you out of prison; but you may count on being brought back at nine this evening. I shall not let you sit up a minute later."

"And rest assured, young lady, she will have her way," joined in the good-humored physician, laughingly nodding his head. "However, there's one thing in it—I'm tolerably confident of never losing a patient through imprudence, when Lady Mayhew's a hand in the case; for if I don't look sharp enough after them, she helps me. Well, good day, my dear,—good day. I hope to see you looking quite bright to-morrow. Good day, my dear madam. Give my respects to Miss Caroline, if you please." And he was bustling away again.

"O, but, doctor, you are going to dine with us—aren't you?" said Lady Mayhew.

"He will?—that is good news. It is a thousand pities I can't stay; but really, I have a most troublesome number of patients this week. Some other day I shall be most happy to do myself the honor. Well, remember me affectionately to Edward, Lady Mayhew. He's a good boy—a good boy; wish there were more like him." And away went the doctor. The next moment, his chaise was heard, driving rapidly away from the door.

"Come, now you may get ready to go down, dear," said Lady Mayhew, kindly. "I will call your maid, and when you are quite prepared, you shall have my arm. But who is coming now?" as the sound of a horse's feet rapidly approached the house. "O, Edward, to be sure!" looking from a window. "That is really very pleasant. I had no idea he was coming till later."

At that moment, Caroline Ashburton entered hastily. She had been dressing.

"Aunt, Edward has come, I see. Had you not—are you going down? I have come to help Miss Ashby. I heard Dr. Morrison say to Grayson just now that she was to be down stairs this morning."

"Well, Caroline, if you will take my place," said Lady Mayhew, "and mind not to let Miss Ashby get too fatigued in dressing."

"I will be quite careful, aunt."

Eleanor had been finding, with some consternation, within the last ten minutes, that she was about to encounter another stranger—whom, she was uncertain. She wished she had not attempted to leave her apartment.

"You will think me very changeable-minded," she said, laughing and blushing, as she laid her hand on Lady Mayhew's arm; "but—I did not know—I thought you were to be alone this evening. Perhaps—had I not better—"

She was sensible as she spoke, of a sudden and silent pressure of the hand from Miss Ashburton, who immediately turned away to the dressing-table; while Lady Mayhew returned, directly, with a kind smile:

"O, my dear, you will not mind Edward; he is my son. I forgot to tell you that we had a message an hour or two ago that he was coming home; he sent it just in advance. And I forgot, too," she added, taking both of Eleanor's hands in her own, and kissing her cheek warmly, "or, rather, had no time to tell you while Dr. Morrison was here, that I have this afternoon discovered you to be the daughter of some dear old friends of mine—Sir James and Lady Eleanor Ashby."

"O, then you knew my parents?" said Miss Ashby, earnestly, while Miss Ashburton turned towards them with an air of thoughtful interest, and leaned on the back of Eleanor's chair—"then you know my parents?"

"Yes, indeed, very well," answered Lady Mayhew, "and I will tell you all about it to-morrow; but just now, I must run down and see Edward, who, I dare say, is waiting for me in the drawing-room. You and Caroline will join us there as soon as possible. Here comes your maid, my dear." And as Lucy Elmore entered, Lady Mayhew took her departure.

"I am glad," said Miss Ashburton, gently, pressing Eleanor's hand,—"I am glad to learn this—that my aunt and your parents were friends; for it brings us nearer together—does it not?" She bent and pressed her lips to Miss Ashby's brow.

"Yes." And even as Eleanor smiled, and returned the caress, she grew grave, and her eyes filled with tears. "But does it not seem strange to you that the child of Sir James Ashby should be forced to seek for shelter in a peasant's cottage? You have, doubtless, wondered how it should be, that she whom you protected and cared for should be found, with her attendant, and not another friend far or near, in that strange place; and I have explained nothing—you have asked nothing. But you must know something of my circumstances, soon, from my own lips."

"You will not think it strange—will you," returned Miss Ashburton, "if I tell you that I believe I have partly divined their nature already? And our interest has been increased thereby in you. But come; Lucy is waiting. To-morrow, if you like, you shall tell me what you please. And though I do not wish to appear curious, I confess that I am not unwilling to learn more concerning you than I have yet known, while I am sure my aunt has taken so deep an interest in you, that she will be only too glad of your confidence, to serve you and care for you, if you are in trouble, as she would on any child."

"A thousand thanks for your sympathy—for your kindness; both are more welcome to me than I can tell you," said Eleanor, pressing her hand. "To-morrow, then, I will tell you something of my troubles. I am only too glad to find myself among friends to whom I may confide them."

She submitted herself now to the hands of Lucy, whose smiling eyes testified no less plainly than her words the pleasure she felt in seeing her mistress able to go about once more. And there was something besides to account for Lucy's smiles, as Eleanor shortly learned; for while she was dressing her, she informed her that she had seen Harry Longworth, and that she had a note for Miss Eleanor from Pequin, which she gave her during the momentary absence of Miss Ashburton from the apartment. She said Harry had come to the farm in the lane that morning, just while she happened to be over there, and that he was dressed in the disguise of a countryman, that he might not be recognized, for fear Morley Briancourt should trace him.

Eleanor broke the seal of the communication, the contents of which, though brief, were sufficiently important to give her some uneasiness. They read as follows:

"Let Eleanor beware whither she goes abroad, and how far; for there are those seeking for her whom she has once escaped from, and who are leaving no stone unturned that may discover to them her hiding-place. Be wary, or the hawk will pounce upon the dove, despite the vigilance of Pequin."

A flash of pain ran from head to foot as Eleanor finished reading. She leaned her head upon her hand for a moment in troubled reflection. She was so far away from the scene of her late trials, and had imagined herself so well out of Morley Briancourt's reach, and now to be so suddenly warned of possibly impending danger, and by Pequin, too,—what was she to do?

The entrance of Miss Ashburton aroused her. She put the note away, resolving to dismiss the matter until to-morrow. Together they descended to the drawing-room. Eleanor observed that Miss Ashburton paused for a moment before entering, and seemed to be slightly agitated, for her hand trembled in that of her companion, and the color rapidly flushed and faded in her cheek. Eleanor was startled.

"You are ill," she said, with some alarm.

"No, no," answered Miss Ashburton, gently, as she hastily endeavored to recover herself,—"no, thank you, I am quite well." Then quickly pressing Eleanor's hand, she added: "I am so glad you did not insist on remaining up stairs this evening."

Why? What was it that she shrank from—that made Eleanor, the stranger-guest, a protection?

They passed in together, to meet Lady Mayhew and her son, a handsome and graceful young man, of some five or six-and-twenty years, with a clear, fine, noble countenance, of striking and impassioned beauty, a slight yet splendid figure, and a manner at once frank and modest, that cast an indescribable charm over every action and every word of his.

His eyes were directed toward the door, and rested directly on Miss Ashburton and Eleanor, as they entered. A flash of pleasure illumined his beautiful countenance. He rose and came forward, accompanied by his mother. He took both Miss Ashburton's hands in his own, calling her "dear cousin," while his glance, seeking hers, beamed with an ardent and unconcealed affection. But she scarcely raised her eyes to his face; a faint, almost forced smile wavered on her lip for a single instant, then faded; her fair hands slid from his affectionate clasp, and she glided by him, the old look of melancholy drooping sadly enough over that sweet yet now almost mournful countenance.

An expression of quick and acute disappointment settled upon his fine features, that had scarce time to be dissipated, ere, with his mother's introduction, he turned to greet Eleanor. Lady Mayhew now led Miss Ashby to her own sofa, where she ensconced her comfortably in a corner, with her fan, her smelling-bottle and her footstool, declaring she should not let her stir till dinner, lest she should fatigue herself; and enlisting Edward in her service, to amuse her to the best of his ability, for she had been very ill, and was only just recovering; to which he smilingly assented, while his mother proceeded to arrange the curtains near Eleanor, which let in the light too strongly. Miss Ashby laughingly protested against being treated as an invalid, and called upon Caroline Ashburton to take her part. But Lady Mayhew good-naturedly insisted on having her own way; and Miss Ashburton hastened to take side with her aunt, declaring that Eleanor was not entirely well yet, and must submit to be petted for awhile. She accordingly commenced devoting herself to Eleanor's amusement, keeping by her side through the entire evening, and acquitting herself of her office very much to her aunt's satisfaction.

But Eleanor detected in her manner, when neither Lady Mayhew nor her son could have done so, an undercurrent of distressed and agitated feeling that sought for concealment. A disturbance of mind such as she had witnessed when they paused at the drawing-room door on entering; and her hand, as it touched Eleanor's once, was icy cold. But she was calm and quiet outwardly, and through the gentle demeanor she usually wore, and the habitual seriousness of her sad and beautiful countenance, no disquieting emotion was visible to others except Eleanor.

Edward Mayhew's glance rested on her face more than once, with an expression of tenderness and anxiety, during the evening; but it was not to meet hers. She scarcely once looked at him; and although joining fully in the general topics of conversation, she seldom addressed herself directly to her cousin, and not one word could he find occasion to speak with her, except in the bearing of Lady Mayhew and their guest.

They broke up at an early hour, Lady Mayhew alleging that her fair guest was already fatigued, and that Edward must be weary with his ride that day.

Miss Ashburton went to the table in the hall to light her bedroom candle; while her aunt went on some errand to the house-keeper for a moment; and instantly Edward Mayhew hastened to his cousin's side, as if to assist her. But he lingered there a moment, and his hand closed gently upon hers, as with his glance resting tenderly and reproachfully upon her face, he murmured some almost inaudible words, that seemed to elide her for her reserve. Her cheek grew slightly paler while she listened; but she answered him calmly, and took her candle from him, with a kind and quiet good night. A shadow of inexpressible sorrow stole into his clear, frank eyes. He bent and pressed to his lips, with lingering affection, the fair, small hand that he still retained; then released it silently, and let her depart. She was white as death when she turned to Eleanor again. A look of suppressed suffering, of patiently-borne anguish, was stamped upon her marble-like features.

Eleanor was awaiting her; she rose to meet her, and with a response to Edward Mayhew, who turned to bid her good night, she accompanied Miss Ashburton from the room. They were met by Lady Mayhew in the hall, who kissed them each affectionately, and hoped Eleanor would rest well. She evidently remarked the paleness of her niece, for she looked at her for a moment with a serious and disturbed countenance, and then embracing her with maternal tenderness, kissed her again, silently, and more warmly than before.

She went in without speaking again, and Miss Ashburton and Eleanor proceeded up stairs. Miss Ashburton bade her companion good night at the door of her apartment, and pressing her hand, turned hastily away; but Eleanor saw, as she did so, that her downcast eyes were heavy with tears.

CHAPTER XXI.

A CONFIDENTIAL AVOWAL.

LADY MAYHEW had been for more than an hour in Eleanor's dressing-room, indulging in reminiscences of Eleanor's mother and father, whom she had known in Scotland something more than twenty years before, both before and after her own marriage; and Eleanor listened with the deepest interest, with Caroline Ashburton, who, somewhat paler this morning than usual, and even more quiet, though quite calm, sat beside her, leaning upon the dressing-table, with her head resting on her hand.

"Yes—clearly did I love your mother, Eleanor," said Lady Mayhew, with the tears glistening in her pleasant eyes; "and many a hour we spent together—Evelyn Cameron and I. We lived near each other, just away from Inverness,—she at her guardian's, for she was an orphan, poor thing; and I at my aunt's house, for I was an orphan, too. I was married first, to Sir Arthur Mayhew, an English gentleman; and two years after, your mother married Sir James Ashby; but she went away to England with him, while we stayed where we were; for my husband had decided to remain there for a year or two. Well, we corresponded occasionally, during the following year, your mother and I, and the year after that, and then the letters failed; for your mother became an invalid, and my poor husband was thrown from his horse, receiving injuries which laid him up for many and many a long month, and from which he never entirely recovered. So that, with my little Edward and the care of my husband, I had all I could do; and though it was a sad thing to think I could not go and see my poor friend Evelyn, I was forced to be content. It was only three years after her marriage, and little more than one after your birth, that I heard of her death. Poor Evelyn!"

The tears fell from the eyes of Lady Mayhew, and filled Eleanor's own. She went on directly:

"It was but a few months afterward when the announcement of the death of your father also reached me, and of the accession of his half-brother, Edward, to the title and estates, and that you were placed under your uncle's guardianship. Years passed away, and many a time I thought of Evelyn's child, and wished that I might behold her; but that was impossible, for I never could leave my husband's side. He could not bear me out of his sight a day.

"It is more than two years now since he died. As soon as my estates were settled up, which was some two months ago, I came, with Edward and Caroline (who was left to my care eight years ago, on the death of her mother, my only sister), to England, where we made our home temporarily with Dr. Morrison's family, our only friends here. They were with us, the doctor and his wife, for some weeks out of every year, during my husband's illness, for they were old acquaintances of poor Arthur; so when we found ourselves under their roof, it seemed, with their familiar faces about us, indeed a home. I determined on taking up my abode here for some months. Dr. Morrison, who formerly resided at Oakham, had removed into this neighborhood not a great while since, and I found myself in the neighborhood of Ashby Place. I requested him to find for me a small estate to purchase. This one was fixed upon, and we came hither last week.

"I began now to busy myself with speculations concerning you, and I was wondering how soon I should find an opportunity of seeing you, when fortune threw you in my very path; and unrecognized as you were at first, what was my astonishment and pleasure to find suddenly who you were!"

She drew Eleanor to her breast, and kissed her fondly. With earnest, impulsive and grateful affection, Eleanor returned the caress; while Miss Ashburton, with silent but eloquent tenderness, also embraced her companion.

"How happy I am," said Eleanor, "in having found two such friends! And in this time of need, too." And her bright face grew troubled as the memory of her late trials rushed over her with full force again. She remained silent and agitated for a few moments; then looking suddenly up, with the tears filling her eyes, she said: "You thought it a singular circumstance, did you not, that Eleanor Ashby, instead of being under her guardian's roof, should be sheltered by that of a peasant?"

"I confess, it seemed to me somewhat perplexing," was Lady Mayhew's gentle reply; "but from several things your maid told me, I gathered something of your circumstances."

"Will you, then," said Eleanor, "tell me exactly how far you are acquainted with them? for I wish to confide to you with my own lips that which remains."

Lady Mayhew hesitated. She evidently shrank from an appearance of too great familiarity with Eleanor's private affairs.

"Nay—tell me," said Eleanor, gently; "for indeed," and her eyes filled with tears, "I am in no position to permit of feelings of false delicacy. You know a part; now you must know all. Tell me, therefore, without reserve, all that you thought or discovered concerning me from the beginning."

Lady Mayhew leaned her head upon her hand for a moment. Then she said:

"When you were first brought in by Thomas, we were too greatly alarmed about you to wonder whom you could be, or where you lived. After the first fright was over, and you had revived from the stupor in which you lay, and fell asleep, we began to make inquiries of your maid, who had been so terrified that she had thought of nothing but your danger. We learned then that you resided at a small farmhouse, some three miles distant. You may well believe we were perplexed at hearing that one of your appearance, and accompanied by a maid, could have your home in such a place. We offered to send some tidings of you to your friends; but Lucy turned quite pale, as if in alarm, and begged me not to; then adding, as if recollecting herself, 'O, I thought you meant her niece, madam; and he must not know where she is, for all the while.'

"In answer, I suppose, to the perplexity I unconsciously evinced, she uttered some hurried words, to the effect that the place at which you were staying was not your home; that you had no relatives there,—in short, that you were among strangers, and that your relatives must be kept in ignorance of your whereabouts. She paused a moment after she had said it, and then thinking, I dare say, that some further explanation was necessary, she added that—'And Lady Mayhew paused, evidently unwilling to continue.'

"Nay—go on—go on," said Miss Ashby, sadly, while the tears—mournful and bitter tears—rained over her cheeks. "It is hard, I know, for you to say and for me to hear, if I guess rightly what it is; but we must be plain in these explanations, cost what it will."

"My poor child," uttered Lady Mayhew, bending tenderly over her, "let me pause here. You may tell me, if you will."

"No, no; go on, I pray you," said Eleanor, sorrowfully. "See—I am quite calm now."

Lady Mayhew paused, with a compassionate glance, and then continued:

"She said that you had been treated with great cruelty by your family, and had fled to escape persecution."

"It is too true—it is too true!" sobbed Eleanor, burying her face in Lady Mayhew's shoulder; "and O, I have been so lonely—so helpless!"

She gave way to her emotion for a few moments; while Lady Mayhew, silently weeping herself, embraced her tenderly; and Miss Ashburton, brushing away the tears that were flowing from her own eyes, kissed Eleanor's hand, that clasped hers with convulsive feeling. Presently, Eleanor calmed herself, and at her request, Lady Mayhew continued:

"Lucy had not as yet mentioned your surname, calling you only 'Miss Eleanor'; and after these statements, delicacy forbade my seeking to discover it, unless you yourself should disclose it. The night passed, and you awoke, near noon that day, free from all danger. I had left Caroline in your room, and was preparing to drive over with Dr. Morrison and his wife, to visit one of his patients in the next town, when, as I was standing in the porch, ready to step into the carriage, Lucy passed through the hall, just behind me. The housekeeper encountered her, and asked her how you were. Lucy's answer caught my attention. She answered, 'O, Miss Ashby is much better, thank you; she is awake now.'

"I stood silent. Miss Ashby! Who, then, was my guest? The thought of Evelyn Ashby's daughter struck me, with the utterance of your name. Was it possible that it was she who was at that moment under my very roof? It could be no other. Beckoning Lucy instantly to me, I said to her, 'Is your mistress the daughter of the late Sir James Ashby, of Ashby Place?' She answered in the affirmative; and you may judge, my dear Eleanor, the nature of my feelings. My first impulse was to rush directly up to your room, but second thoughts restrained me. You did not yet know me, and it was no time for explanation until you should be further recovered. The doctor called me, and deciding to leave the matter till my return, I stepped into the carriage, and we drove away, not returning until afternoon. But ah, how I longed to embrace you! How sweet it is now, Eleanor, to behold the daughter of my old friend sitting beside me! I discover, every moment, in your face a thousand resemblances to your mother, that failed to strike me before I discovered your identity."

"My dear—dear friend," said Miss Ashby, "I am indeed happy in recognizing in you so warm a friend of my beloved mother. I have been deprived of her. It is sweet to behold one who loved her so well."

"Then let me, in some measure, supply the place left vacant by her loss. Let me be to you a mother in your troubles and your loneliness, my Eleanor."

"O, how welcome is your kindness to me!" returned Miss Ashby. "How can I ever thank you for your warm interest in me? But let me, at least, confide to you something of my history. Your goodness claims my utmost confidence. Yet I fear that, after giving me, with so much patience, your own explanations, you will scarcely care to listen to it at present."

Lady Mayhew, however, assured her of her desire to hear it; and Eleanor, with her arm encircling the waist of Miss Ashburton, and one hand clasped in that of her aunt, proceeded to give them a slight sketch of her life, and the circumstances which had combined to place her in her present position. Lady Mayhew listened attentively, and with sympathizing interest, while she commenced the recital.

She had not proceeded far, when, up from the grounds below, they heard the voice of Edward Mayhew calling his cousin. But Miss Ashburton did not move. Eleanor paused as he called a second time, and just then she caught sight of him, down under the trees by the stream, going towards the summer-house. Turning her eyes to Miss Ashburton's face, she saw that she, too, beheld him. She was sitting with her head leaning on her left hand, her arm resting on the dressing-table; and while her fixed glance dwelt on the figure of her cousin through the window, a strange and ashy paleness overspread her face. She turned slightly aside, as she felt Eleanor's eyes resting on her. Lady Mayhew's countenance betrayed trouble and perplexity.

"Let him wait—let him wait awhile," said Miss Ashburton, in a low and agitated voice. "I will go down presently. Go on, Eleanor."

Eleanor continued her recital, but now hastening with it as much as possible; for a slight trembling of the slender form beside her more than once alarmed her. She could feel the shudder, for her arm was thrown partly about her companion's waist. Yet she shrank from seeming to remark or comprehend this emotion, which Miss Ashburton evidently strove to conceal; and much as she wished to defer her story, felt that it would only betray her sense of that emotion, if she should do so.

She hastened, therefore, to the end, that she might the sooner relieve Miss Ashburton, and allow her to go to her own apartment. She made her story as brief as possible, and in a short time it was finished.

"My dear Eleanor, you have indeed been sorely persecuted," said Lady Mayhew, embracing her tenderly. "I do not need, I think, to assure you how deeply—how affectionately I sympathize with you. O, my child, how fortunate it is that, at this most dangerous time, you have been thrown in my way! Your strange protector, this dwarf, who thus befriends you, has indeed done you good service in securing a shelter from the cruelty that pursued you; but let me render what additional aid lies in my power. You say this Morley Briancourt is seeking for you?—that you have been warned of the danger that may still await you if he discovers your hiding-place? You shall remain where you are, then, in my care. I will not let you return to a situation which, however remote, may be still unsafe. I will take care that this cruel uncle of yours knows nothing concerning you, henceforth. Caroline, we will save her from them, dearest."

Miss Ashburton's head was bowed upon the table. She raised herself, and put her hand in that of Eleanor. A paler hue spread over her ashy countenance, as she said:

"Yes—yes; the ends of iniquity will be defeated. You will be saved. Call me, also, your friend, Eleanor Ashby, and let me, too, help you."

She kissed Eleanor's forehead with solemn tenderness, and rose from her seat. But she had scarcely moved a single pace, ere her steps wavered, and she caught by the table. Turning her eyes, with a dying glance, towards Lady Mayhew, she murmured faintly, "Aunt!" Both Lady Mayhew and Eleanor were springing to her side; it was only in time to receive her lifeless form, as she fell fainting into their arms.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE STRANGE VISITANT.

THE sudden swoon into which Caroline Ashburton had fallen, considerably alarmed Lady Mayhew.

"She is so unused to such things," she said, to Eleanor, "though never very strong."

The usual restoratives were quickly applied, and in a short time Miss Ashburton revived. Directly as she recovered herself, she requested to be led to her own apartment, and there, saying that she wished to be entirely alone, dismissed every one, and locked her door. Lady Mayhew returned to Eleanor, with a serious face.

"I never knew Caroline to faint, except once, before," she said, "and that was when she was visiting the Morrises, at Oakham, seven or eight years ago. The doctor and his wife returned at evening, from a brief journey they had made that day, to find her lying insensible upon the drawing-room floor, where it seemed she must have fallen immediately on entering from the garden, for her hat and shawl had not been removed. The domestics said she had been out walking. But that is the only time, I think, until now, that she has ever fainted since she has been with me—eleven years, now."

"Eleven years?—she became an orphan, then, at the age of thirteen?" observed Eleanor, inquiringly.

"Exactly—thirteen, poor child!" answered Lady Mayhew; "and she is four-and-twenty now."

"You must have learned, in all this time, to love her as you would your own child."

"Indeed, I have; you are right, my dear Eleanor. Never could a daughter be more dear to me than Caroline. She is not less noble and amiable than she is beautiful; and one scarcely knows which to love the most—the loveliness of her mind, or the grace of that winning countenance to which it imparts so indescribable a charm. O, Eleanor, would indeed that she might be my daughter!" Lady Mayhew sighed deeply.

"You wish it, then?" said Eleanor.

"Ah, wish it?—yes! And Edward—I may tell you, Eleanor; Edward loves his cousin—loves her hopelessly; for she denies him encouragement. The slightest word or look of his, betraying to her the feelings that he is too unhappy to repress, seems to give her pain. She turns from the affection he offers her, yet it is with a sorrow—a melancholy that I cannot comprehend. As a child, she was ever cheerful and happy hearted, and was so for a long time after she first became an inmate of my household. For some years past, however, her manner has been marked by a gentle seriousness, an appearance of subdued quiet, that has caused me some concern, since it seems unnatural in one so young. I have endeavored in vain to dissipate it, for at times—indeed, it often assumes the character of actual depression. Since the discovery of my son's attachment, this depression has increased a thousand-fold. The knowledge of this affection, as it gradually opened to her, seemed to strike her with unhappiness. I remember the first time she heard of it from his lips. She came to me, whither these flowers you hold, and with a look that was agony itself, she threw herself at my feet and buried her face in my lap, refusing all my attempts to raise her. That night, I heard her pacing her room from hour to hour. She never closed her eyes to rest. Watching and in sorrow, the dawn found her there. Since that time she has worn an air of melancholy that seldom leaves her; that has the most sorrowful signification for Edward; for it tells him that his attachment is a hopeless one."

Eleanor listened; seriously—attentively—with feelings of the deepest sympathy and compassion.

"Why is it, I wonder," she said, half musingly, during the silence that followed Lady Mayhew's words, "why is it that she manifests such excessive emotion, at the discovery of no affection which, if she cannot reciprocate, must naturally move her less than this seems to have done?"

"It is beyond my power of comprehension," uttered Lady Mayhew, slightly shaking her head, "except she does, indeed, return his affection—as your words would seem to suggest, and as I myself, I confess, have this moment begun to think possible. But is it possible? Can she return his affection, and yet refuse to reward it? There is, as she is aware, not the slightest obstacle to their union. She is assured of the happiness it would afford me to welcome her as my son's wife and my daughter. How, then, if she loves, can she refuse him?"

Eleanor was silent. She had said to herself, the night before: "Caroline loves her cousin." Now, she hardly knew what to think; and yet that first impression would return. They went down stairs together, and in the hall encountered Edward, who, after a moment's conversation, asked his mother where Caroline was.

Lady Mayhew informed him that she was not quite well, and would not be visible for some hours, she believed. He lingered a moment, looked somewhat disappointed, and then went out again. Lady Mayhew sighed, and accompanied Eleanor to the library.

"My dear," said she, as they entered there, "living, as you have done, I find, so near to a certain place called Briarfield—"

"Briarfield?" echoed Eleanor, involuntarily, with a slight blush; then she hastily added: "I really beg your pardon—pray proceed."

Lady Mayhew smiled.

"I was only about to say, my dear, that you must be acquainted, I think, with a family of the name of Latimer—some people whom I admire very much, and to whom I was introduced, through Dr. Morrison, last week. They reside at Briarfield, some fifteen miles from here."

It happened that Eleanor had, for some reason, refrained from the mention of Hugh and Mary, during her recital to Lady Mayhew. Now, she repaired the omission by acknowledging the friendship existing between them. Lady Mayhew was much pleased.

"I like the family exceedingly," she said. "Miss Latimer is certainly a lovely girl. Her aunt I find one of the most attractive women of my acquaintance, and Mr. Latimer, the brother, is such an one as I would recommend to the warmest regards of my son, as a friend and companion. And, by-the-way, my dear Eleanor," she added, "they are coming over this week, so you will, if you choose, have an opportunity of seeing them."

Coming over! The suggestion of this unlooked-for happiness filled Eleanor with delight for a moment. Then, as the thought of Hugh presented itself apart from that of his sister and aunt, a blush of embarrassment, timidity—of almost pain, and yet something strangely sweeter than pain—mantled in her pretty cheek. She shrank from meeting Hugh Latimer now.

Lady Mayhew regarded Eleanor, unobserved, with a curious glance, for a few seconds. Then an almost imperceptible smile dimpled her handsome mouth.

"My dear," she said, presently, "do you think they are aware of your being here?"

"Indeed, dear madam, I can hardly tell what to think," answered Eleanor. "It may be that my dwarf friend Pequín has told them—or perhaps Harry Longworth; but otherwise I do not see how they would gain information."

"If they do not know, their surprise will be all the pleasanter."

Their conversation was interrupted by the return of Edward Mayhew, and it soon flowed into other channels; but it was indifferently supported. Edward, though courteous and agreeable, as was his wont, yet found his thoughts often wandering away to his cousin. Eleanor, on her part, was thinking both of the recital which Lady Mayhew had given her this morning—one which interested though it did not surprise her, since she had already guessed the attachment of Edward for Caroline; and of those at Briarfield; thinking, for the fiftieth time, what must be their surprise on learning the fact of her sudden flight from Ashby, and whether the cause had become known to them.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

ANCIENT RUINS IN CALIFORNIA.

Elisha Hughes, a resident of Santa Clara, California, writing to the Scientific American, under the date of May, 1856, says: "He recently had an opportunity of examining some ancient ruins, lately discovered, about six miles east of Santa Cruz. They were nearly buried up in a sand-hill. He also found twenty-three chimneys, with their tops peering above ground. These chimneys are round, and vary in diameter from four to twelve inches. They are made of sandstone, and were filled up with loose red sand. The stones of which they are built are cut circular, and cemented together; stamping on the hill, it emitted a hollow sound, indicating vaulted chambers below. A tunnel is now being run in under the hill; at first it was attempted to sink a deep shaft, but the sand came in too fast upon the miners. Who built these structures no one can imagine. They appear to be thousands of years old. A large yellow pine tree was growing on the top of the hill. The number of years required for the sand to cover up these houses and form the hill, before the seed of this large tree germinated, could not be less than two thousand years.—Boston Ledger."

BETCHUANA WAGON LEADER.

SKETCHES IN AFRICA.

We present on this page a series of spirited sketches, depicting types of the people of the southern part of Africa. All that relates to this great continent is interesting. A cloud of mystery has brooded over Africa from remote ages. Its whole interior is a region almost unexplored by the white man. Civilization has dwelt upon its borders and obtained a certain foothold here and there, but the greater portion of the continent is given up to barbarism and darkness. In the close vicinity of the settlements wild beasts yet roam in alarming numbers. The lion makes his prey of the dark child of the forest; huge serpents trail their noisome length among the underbrush. Over vast tracts of land herds of elephants roam at will. Strange birds and strange animals people the solitudes. But a little way has the veil been lifted which hides the interior of this great continent. Our sketches, however, deal with a portion that is pretty well known—the Cape of Good Hope. Bartholomew Diaz discovered the extremest southerly point of Africa in 1493, but was unable to effect a landing on account of the fury of the sea—hence he gave it the name of Cabo dos Tormentos—the Cape of Storms. John II. of Portugal changed the title to Cabo de Boa Esperanza—Cape of Good Hope. It was first doubled by Vasco de Gama, a Portuguese navigator. The Portuguese, however, never effected a permanent settlement here. It remained for the Dutch, whose long voyages rendered it necessary for them to establish a convenient watering place for their ships, to colonize the cape. This they did in about the middle of the 17th century. They gave the cape settlement almost its present limits, by reducing the Hottentots to slavery or driving them beyond the mountains. The natives of Southern Africa may be divided into two distinct families, the Hottentots, and the Betchuanas, Beuchuanas or Bushuanas, to whom the Caffres are related. A specimen, perhaps not a very pleasing one—of the Beuchuana family, forms the subject of our first picture, the "Beuchuana wagon leader." But if nature has not been very kind to these people in the matter of physiognomy, she has made amends by giving them good figures. The Beuchuanas are not so tall as the Kaffirs, but their forms are more elegant. Their skin is of a brown tint, between the shining black of the negro and the yellow color of the Hottentots. They surpass the Kaffirs in civilization and the arts of life. Though under the government of separate chiefs, who are often at war with each other, these tribes are united by language, manners and customs. They are inquisitive and intelligent, have no settled occupation, yet are always active. They live principally on the curds of milk and the produce of the chase, exhibiting both adroitness and daring in the pursuit of game. They rarely kill cattle, and exhibit a most singular repugnance to fish. Their dress is made of the skins of wild animals captured in the chase. They are fond of ornaments, and men as well as women wear rings and bracelets of ivory and brass. Some of their towns are large. In 1821, Campbell estimated the population of Kurechuanee at 16,000. The houses are neat and airy, and generally built of a circular form. They manufacture their own weapons, possessing great skill in tempering iron. Their offensive and defensive arms consist of a hasoppy (javelin), which they throw with great precision, and use in lion hunting a shield and a club. Polygamy is practised among them, and the wife is the slave and the drudge of the husband. The delicate attentions which, in civilized communities the ruler sex pay to the fairer, are utterly unknown among them. When a young man, who meditates matrimony, has collected a dozen oxen, he exchanges his cattle for his first wife, and immediately sets her to work to build a house. She fells the trees, shapes the timber and constructs their abode. This being accomplished, she is set to work to build a stable. Marriage with her is the commencement of a very busy life, for she has now to perform the in-door and out-door work—to attend to the cattle and to cultivate the fields. Domestic duties and agricultural pursuits are too ignoble employments for the aristocratic male. War and hunting only are worthy to occupy his time. As soon as he can afford it, the Beuchuana buys a second wife, who, in like manner, must build a house and stable, and cultivate a garden.

AMAKOSA FINGOE MAN.

CAPE WAGONER TAKING SNUFF.

Honesty, loyalty and courage are the virtues they chiefly venerate. They have an idea of a soul, and believe in an invisible Lord of nature, the sovereign Dispenser of good and evil, whom they call Mourimo. They divide the year into thirteen lunar months, and distinguish the planets from the fixed stars. Christianity has been introduced among them by missionaries, and with it some degree of civilization. To the Hottentot family belong the Bojesmans, or Bushmen, the Koranas and the Namaquas. The first European colonists on the cape found them filthy and indolent, and treated them as if they were beasts, but the Moravian missionaries developed in them capabilities for some degree of civilization. They were found not to be radically deficient in ingenuity and industry. They are of medium height, very thin, with high cheek bones, thick lips, small, half closed eyes, woolly hair and a wild expression. They dress in sheepskins. Their villages are called knobs, and are a circular cluster of beehive shaped huts woven by women. The Kaffirs or Caffres are a handsome and vigorous race, naturally peaceable, but capable of fighting savagely, as their recent wars with the English, who have permanently occupied the Cape of Good Hope since 1806, amply testify. The Beuchuana wagon leader, alluded to before, and sketched from life, is of a tribe, the remnant of what was once a very powerful and warlike nation, similar to the Fingoes bordering upon Natal; but, consequent upon internal wars and intrigues of neighboring clans, were almost decimated; the few that remain have chiefly taken up their abode in the colony. The men, as well as the women, are employed as wagon leaders (forelopers), herds, and other menial occupations. Their inanity of character, simplicity of manners, and inoffensive career, place them in the scale of commiseration amongst the colonists. They proved themselves faithful and valiant soldiers during the last war, and worthy of the trust imposed upon them. Their clothing, like that of the Fingoes, consists of a sheepskin knoss, and a red woolen night-cap, procured from a trader for a few horns or a hide. Their only offensive weapon is a knob kerrie, or stick with a round knob at one end, which they can hurl with great precision, and bring a rider to the ground whilst galloping away. Another engraving on this page is a full length of another African wagon leader, in a half European costume. He is refreshing himself with a pinch of snuff, but instead of applying it to his nostrils, fills his mouth with it. The African love of finery is displayed in the inordinate quantity of plumage with which he has decorated his hat. We could not find room in our engraving for all of his whipstock, which is of cane pole and is of prodigious length—and no wonder, for a glance at a heavily loaded "Cape wagon," with its interminable train of oxen winding their way across a vast plain at the base of the mountains, shows the necessity of a long lash to keep the animals in order. A Fingoe woman with her dress of sheepskin, and an Amakosa Fingoe man, with necklace and ear-ring, complete this series of illustrations. The Amakosa Fingoe man belongs to a tribe rescued by the British troops from the bondage of the Kaffirs, in the war of 1834—35. They have ever since enjoyed perfect tranquillity and freedom, in districts allotted to them within the pale of British dominion. The history and condition of this people excited very great interest. It appears that "Fingoe" is not their natural appellation, but a reproachful epithet, denoting extreme poverty and misery—a person having no claim to justice, mercy, or even life. They are the remnants of eight powerful nations, which have been destroyed or driven out of their country by the destructive wars carried on amongst the natives of the interior. These nations being broken up and dispersed in the surrounding country, many of the people who escaped fled from time to time to the westward, and thus came into collision with the Amakosa Kaffirs, but principally with the tribes of Hintz. Here they were received by that chief as entirely dependent on his mercy and generosity, and were suffered to exist on the tenure of the most abject slavery. This state of bondage at last became intolerable, and its victims embraced the opportunity afforded by the British invasion of Kaffir-land to throw off the yoke and seek protection from the English. This persecuted tribe have demonstrated their gratitude for the protection which was granted to them, in every possible manner. Crime is scarcely ever heard of among them; the men make excellent herdsmen, and the women good house servants and nurses; they are alike active, willing and faithful. Their costume is similar to the Kaffirs.

FINGOE WOMAN.

KAFFIR WOMAN.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE MAKER AND MASTER OF LIFE.

BY CALE DUNN.

In the season of sorrow
There came unto me,
As gentle a being
As ever may be;
And this was the song that she caroled for me:
"When trouble hath driven all joy from thy breast,
Look to heaven, and pray for its hallowed rest."

In the season of gladness
There came unto me,
As loving a being
As ever may be;
And this was the song that she warbled for me:
"When gladness reigns queen o'er thy peace-favored breast, Remember that He alone makes thee so blest."

In the season of sickness
There came unto me,
As smiling a being
As ever may be;
And this was the song that she warbled for me:
"When sickness afflicts with its agonies rife, Remember that He is the Master of life."

In every season
There comes unto me,
As holy a being
As ever may be;
And ever thus—ever thus sings she to me:
"Remember thy God in every strife,
For he is the Maker and Master of life."

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE COQUETTE:

—OR—

PERSEVERANCE REWARDED.

BY HENRY HACKETT.

In one of the rural towns in the State of Maine, there resided a man by the name of Simon Middlebury. Mr. Middlebury had been married over thirty years, and had been blessed with twelve children. He had given them what education the advantages of the place afforded, which were few compared with those of the present day. The young hopefuls made commendable improvement under their limited means, with the exception of his son Walter, who could not, or would not, keep up with the rest of the children in their studies. Scolding and whipping did no good. Walter contrived, term after term, to be the same dull, stupid scholar. If he could play truant, or spend the day in roaming through the woods or about the ponds, with his fishing-rod or gun, he was in his element. In this way Walter grew up till he was fifteen years of age. The boys would call him lazy bug, beetle bug, weezle bug, and numerous other kinds of bugs, till sometimes poor Walter did not know whether he was Walter Middlebury or somebody else.

Among the girls at school he was the object of all their merry games and jokes, and not unfrequently he would march proudly home by the side of some roguish girl, to the great amusement of her companions behind. Of the number who thus amused themselves at his expense, was Lizzie Weston, a black-eyed, rosy-cheeked girl of sixteen. Now, Lizzie was a kind, generous, good-hearted girl, but did many things which her better feelings told her she ought not to do. But she was the light and life of her gay companions, and while with them she was queen over all.

On one of the occasions referred to, Lizzie was the last one whom Walter escorted home. As they were walking leisurely along, Lizzie became quite sedate, and commenced talking with Walter in a very sober and meditative way, all of which he listened to with the greatest attention. At length she said:

"Why do you think that all the girls are so attentive to you, Walter?"

"Because, I suppose, they like me," said Walter, laughing.

"No, that cannot be the reason," said Lizzie, "for if they liked you they would not make such sport of you, truly."

"Sport! Lizzie; who do you mean that makes sport of me?"

"Why, all of them."

"All; perhaps you may be mistaken," replied Walter, quite earnestly.

"Who do you except, Walter—Carry Lee?"

Though Lizzie meant nothing in earnest in this remark, she noticed by the sudden color which rose upon the face of Walter, that she had touched upon a matter that he had supposed was entirely unknown to any one save himself and Carry, and he said:

"Carry Lee?"

"Is it not so, Walter?"

"Is what not so?"

And Walter avoided the inquisitive look of his fair inquirer.

"Have not some of the girls who have so foolishly frolicked with you in our rambles, made you believe that they loved you? Has not Carry Lee told you that she loved you, and made you believe she was sincere in what she said?"

Walter had never dreamed there was such a thing in the human heart as deception, and never really knew what it was to be imposed upon. From his childhood he had scarcely for a day been from home, and in that little home-world everything was so real and matter-of-fact, that he received what little knowledge of human nature he possessed. He was at a loss, it is true, to understand why all the girls seemed so fond of him, but he was content that it was so.

Walter hung down his head, kicking the dirt with the toe of his shoe, without saying a word. Lizzie again repeated her query.

"Come, Walter, tell me truly. Am I not right?"

"Yes," said he, timidly.

Though Lizzie was suspicious that this was the case, she could not seriously suppose that any of the girls would carry the joke so far.

"I thought so," she at length replied, evidently surprised that her supposition was correct. "Now, Walter, tell me all about it, and I will not play naughty with you any more."

Lizzie had always been the foremost to plague and tease him, and he thought if he could win her over on his side, he should be accomplishing a great feat. An opportunity was now presented, and he embraced it. After some hesitation, he said:

"I promised not to tell."

"I suppose so," said Lizzie; "but to be frank with you, Walter, I'm afraid Carry is trying to make a fool of you, or in other words, that she is imposing upon you. What did she say?"

"She told me that she loved me dearly, and asked me if I wouldn't love her."

"Ah! when did she say this to you, Walter?"

"O, a month ago, or more."

"And has she told you since that she loved you?"

"Yes—lots of times."

"Did you believe her?"

"Yes."

"And do you love her?"

"Yes—very much."

"Now, Walter, suppose what she has told you is not true—that she has been hoaxing you all this while; should you love her then?"

"Love her? No! but you do not really think such a thing of her, do you?" said Walter, looking up very anxiously into Lizzie's face.

"I don't know, Walter; stranger things than that have happened, you know; and young girls as well as older people are up to their tricks sometimes."

"I know that, Lizzie; but Carry has told me so many times how much she loved me, that I cannot believe she does not really mean it. But I wish I knew, now that you doubt it."

"Well, Walter, I think I can put you in a way to test her sincerity. Are you willing to do as I advise you?"

"Yes, anything to convince me."

"Well, then," said Lizzie, "you know that at the great picnic which is coming off next month, all the young folks in the village intend going. Now, to-morrow, you ask Carry, privately, if she will be your companion on that occasion, and let me know what she says."

This was what Walter had been wishing to do ever since he heard there was to be a picnic. The party would have to ride several miles to the festive grounds, and to have Carry for a companion on such an occasion, was what he greatly desired. And that he might be in season, he very readily told Lizzie that he would do as she requested. If she accepted the invitation, he thought it would settle the matter at once in his favor.

The next day, as usual, Walter took his walk home from school with the young ladies. As Carry was entering the garden-gate to her home, Walter, as though wishing to pluck a rose from a bush in the garden, entered at the same time that Carry did. While he was looking about for one that was full-blown, Carry came up, and handed him a bud just opening into life, saying, at the same time:

"Here, Walter, is a bud that will soon be a full and beautiful rose—take it; it is illustrative of my love for you."

Walter received the gift, and, looking Carry earnestly in the face, said:

"You do love me, then?"

Carry noticed the earnestness and sincerity with which the question was asked, and she manifested some hesitancy in giving a decided answer; but she replied:

"Why, yes, to be sure I do; is it not a beautiful bud?"

"Yes, very beautiful," observed Walter; "but its promise of becoming still more beautiful and lovely is much greater, I think, than your love for me."

"Why so, Walter?" said Carry, not seeming to comprehend his meaning.

"Because, when I ask you if you really and truly love me, you reply, 'Yes, to be sure I do!' The rosebud will blossom—therefore the illustration is not a good one. I did not expect such an answer, Carry, after what you have so often told me."

And the tears stood in Walter's eyes.

"O, now don't be so foolish, Walter; you know that I love you."

And she took the bud and tastefully arranged it in the button-hole of his vest, telling him to wear it for her sake. Walter was almost persuaded to believe from this little incident that the suspicions which he a moment before entertained, were groundless. He therefore resumed his wonted cheerfulness, saying:

"I came to ask if you will accompany me to the great picnic next month?"

"O, yes, that will be delightful! Such a nice long ride and along such beautiful scenery. Now, I'm sure, Walter, you can doubt me no longer; and to give you a still stronger proof of my sincerity, I will invite you to call at our house to-morrow evening, when we will arrange the preliminaries of the excursion."

At that moment Carry found some convenient excuse for not being able to tarry longer. She hastily wished Walter good-by, and hopped away, singing merrily as she went. Walter left with a light heart; and as he wended his way homeward, he was truly happy in the thought that the one he really loved gave her love in return. On his way he met Lizzie, who had watched from her window his coming.

"Well, Walter, what did Carry say?"

"She said she would go," replied Walter.

"I suppose you talked of some other matters, Walter. You are sure now that Carry loves you?"

"Yes."

And in the fullness of his heart he revealed to her all his conversation with Carry, not even omitting the expression of "O, yes, to be sure I do."

"I hope, Walter, you will find her as true as she promises to be; but I fear otherwise. I shall await anxiously until your visit to-morrow evening. It is not curiosity alone that prompts me to be so much interested in this affair, but a real desire for your own welfare, Walter."

"Why, Walter, what in the world are you fixing up in your Sunday clothes for, I should like to know?" asked his mother, as he was preparing for his visit to Carry Lee's.

"Why, can't a fellow put on his own trousers when he wants to, I want to know?" responded Walter, very smartly.

"No, Walter, them trousers I made on purpose for you to go to meetin' in; and if you should tear or spile them, what will you do?"

"I don't know, mother; but I must wear them to night, spoil or no spoil—tear or no tear!"

"Why, Walter, my son, what is the matter with you? Where are you going?"

But Walter was too busy in adjusting his toilet to pay much heed to what his mother said; and he continued whistling to himself in a very happy way. In a few moments his little brother Ben, six years old, came running in, and seeing Walter dressed up in his best clothes, ran up to him and said:

"I know where you are going, Wall."

Walter considered small boys at that moment of but little consequence, and therefore did not deign to notice his brother.

"Where is he going, Benny?" asked his mother.

"He's going to see Carry Lee—I know he is, for I seed him talking at her yesterday down in her garden; and I sawed her give him a beautifuller rose, and stick it in his wristcoat."

Having delivered this speech, little Benny sat down on a cricket beside his mother, watching Walter very earnestly. His mother thought there must be some truth in what Ben said, and she walked up to Walter, and taking him by the arm, said, with a serious look:

"Walter!"

"Ma'am."

"Walter, my son."

"Well, mother."

"Is it true, what Benny has said?"

"Even so, mother."

"Why, my child, what has put such a thing into your crazy head. Depend upon it, that girl is making a fool of you."

But Walter would not listen a moment to what his mother was saying; and after having "fixed" himself in what he considered proper trim, started off on his evening's business. As he walked along he thought of the happiness that was in store for him, and he could not help thinking to himself that his love for Carry was fully reciprocated. Punctual at the time he arrived at Carry's house, and was received in the usual free and social manner by the family of Mr. Lee. They had always considered him as a very quiet boy, and rather inferior in mind to the other boys in the neighborhood, and therefore gave him greater liberties than they otherwise would. And as Carry had said nothing of the reason of his present call, they looked upon it as one of his usual visits, and laughed and joked with him as ever. An hour or two passed in this way without anything being said in relation to the picnic. In fact, Carry gave him no chance to broach the subject unless in the presence of the whole company, and this he did not wish to do.

At length he rose to depart, and as he was accompanied to the door by Carry and her sisters, he requested Carry to walk down to the garden gate with him, which she laughingly consented to do. They were walking slowly along when Walter said:

"Have you arranged all for the ride? Cannot we take your little sister Lucy with us in the chaise—she will be so delighted with the ride? I should very much like to have her go."

"The ride! why, Walter, you don't think of going to the great picnic, do you?"

"Think of going! Why, what do you mean, Carry? Did you not promise me yesterday that you would go with me?"

"Yes, Walter, I told you so, I believe, but I supposed you considered it all a joke."

"A joke, Carry; I cannot believe that you have been deceiving me; yet what am I to suppose when you told me as a suspicion crossed my mind that you were not sincere in your professions of love for me, that as a proof it was not so, you were delighted at the idea of accompanying me on the excursion?"

"Really, now," said Carry, stepping back, and assuming a very dignified and haughty manner, "I perceive you are getting quite serious about the matter. Why, I never for a moment thought of going with you!"

The thought of what Lizzie had told him, and the casual remark of his mother, flashed at once upon Walter's mind, and he was not therefore entirely unprepared for the conduct of Carry; and he instantly replied to her:

"And have all the professions of love that you have heretofore made for me, been nothing but a mere whim of yours? O, Carry, say that you love me."

And he advanced toward her, extending his hand; but she withdrew farther from him.

"Love you! If you have been silly enough to believe so, you are a greater dance than I ever took you to be. It may be that among the thousand things I have said to you in my thoughtless moments, I have told you so; but to really love you—a poor, dull dunce of a boy, would be the most ridiculous thing in the world! No, Mr. Walter, you must look elsewhere for your lady-love."

And she turned to go into the house, when Walter said:

"Miss Lee, I acknowledge that I have been silly enough to believe the words you spoke to me, were true—that you did love me; but it seems that I was deceived. I have also been dunce enough to love. I own, too, that because of this, I have suffered myself many times to be laughed at and jeered at in as severe a manner as you have now done; and I have as often resented those insults, because I believed you incapable of playing the hypocrite. But I regret it not; it is better that I should learn your true character now. You have artfully played the game—it remains to be seen who comes off winner. I am poor—I know it as well as you; and dull, and if you please, a dunce; but I am young, and you have taught me a lesson that I shall bring to profit by. At least, it has been a useful one, though severe. I envy not a heart like yours. I leave you, but not in anger: your baseness has overpowered that, and pity has taken its place."

Carry, whose back was turned upon Walter when he commenced addressing her, listened with no little surprise to the manner and style of language in which he addressed her. It was very different from that which she had been accustomed to hear from him; and she remained fixed to the spot, unchanged in attitude, and in such deep reverie that she was not aware, until looking up, that she was alone.

Walter, while on his way homeward, weighed well in his mind the events of the evening and the cause that led to them. He had heard from Carry words that mortified him, and yet he was disposed to acknowledge their truth; but while he did this, his resolution became more fixed that he would overcome them. His ambition was aroused. Carry Lee should see the day that the love of stupid Walter should not be scorned.

Hitherto the intellectual faculties of Walter had lain, as it were, dormant. It had been sufficient for him to play with the eddies and catch the froth on the stream of life; but there was an undercurrent; it needed the shock which his sensibilities had received to arouse into action the latent energies of which he was the unconscious possessor. An entire revolution in his manners was immediately commenced. The change was readily perceived by every one, and by none more wondered at than by the teacher of the district school. It was sometime before the girls could account for his refusing to accompany them as usual from school. Lizzie, however, had been made acquainted by Walter with the cause—but she kept the secret to herself. But the mystery was soon solved, and by Carry, too, in this wise.

Walter, on account of illness, had been excused from remaining in school till the close of the afternoon session. On his way home he sat down by the roadside to rest. He was overtaken by the young ladies, who commenced questioning him in regard to his recent change of conduct. Going up to him as he was walking slowly along, one of them said:

"Come, Mr. Walter, we insist upon it that you tell us why you have so neglected us of late. We all of us feel quite offended with you."

"I am very sorry," replied Walter, "if I have given you occasion for being offended with me. I am unconscious of having wronged you in any respect. I beg that you will tell me in what way I have given you offence."

"In not favoring us with your company home—we feel very much slighted."

Walter well comprehended the meaning of this remark, and noticed the ironical expression of the speaker, and he said:

"I should not think you would consider it much of a favor, or imagine yourselves in the least slighted by not being seen in company with a poor, dull dunce of a boy!"

This reply somewhat surprised them, but they were continuing their inquiries, when it was observed that Carry had left the company and was hurrying forward as fast as she could. The girls soon came up with her. They perceived at once that something unusual was the matter with her, so they demanded an explanation. Carry, rather than have it known that any secrecy existed between her and Walter, as the girls noticed there evidently was, revealed the whole matter to them. Although the estimation in which they had held Walter, and the manner in which they had treated him, was anything but flattering to him, they looked upon the conduct of Carry as most despicable, and she had the satisfaction of seeing that her acts of deception were justly appreciated by her companions, besides the mortification of knowing that the matter would be universally known, and she as universally laughed at and despised. Walter, ever afterward, was treated with respect and attention.

At the close of the term, Walter was taken from school, his father requiring his services on the farm, the elder boys having been apprenticed to trades. But the taste for knowledge which Walter had acquired, was none the less abated after his leaving school. He devoted what leisure time he had to study. His father, who had for some years been apprehensive that his son was wanting in mental capacities, perceived with delight the great change that had recently taken place, and he gave him all the time he possibly could, to prosecute his studies.

Five years had passed, and still Walter was found assisting his father. He had in this time fully redeemed the resolution he made when Carry Lee called him a dull dunce of a boy. By his own energies and industry he had made himself perfect master of all the branches of a common school education, and had made himself familiar with many of the languages. No opportunity, thus far, had presented itself for him to study navigation, a knowledge of which he very much desired to gain. He therefore addressed a letter to an uncle in Boston, asking his assistance in this branch of his studies. His uncle, who was extensively engaged in mercantile affairs, was pleased to learn that his nephew had been thus interested in acquiring an education, and lost no time in communicating with his brother, and urging him to encourage Walter; and as he had a "hard row to hoe," as he expressed himself to his brother, he offered to pay the tuition fee and other expenses of his son, if he could be spared to attend school for a while in the city.

In due course of time Walter arrived at his uncle's in Boston, and immediately entered upon his studies at school. His uncle found him to be possessed of superior abilities, and he soon became fond of his young protégé. He was, perhaps, at first a little rustic, withal, but this became gradually dispelled, and he alone among the most brilliant scholars in his class. His uncle spared no expense in giving him an education, and he had the satisfaction of seeing that his exertions were well repaid. Though he was not educated within the walls of a college, his indomitable perseverance which he had thus far exercised, and the increased facilities now placed at his command for pursuing his studies, placed him at the age of twenty-five in a position in the literary world where few of his years could excel him; and as he reviewed the past ten years of his life, he could not but wonder how in that time his position in life was changed. From the "dull dunce of a boy," he was conscious of having attained a respectable and honorable place in society; and the resolution he made on the memorable night that he invited Carry Lee to accompany him to the picnic, he felt as though he had faithfully fulfilled.

Mr. Middlebury, having watched with satisfaction the progress of his nephew thus far, felt an earnest desire for his future happiness and success in life. His business was pressing upon him, and his close confinement thereupon had impaired his health, and he saw the necessity of finding relief from the tedium of his business. His confidence in the integrity and ability of Walter was ample, and he therefore proposed to him that he would enter the store in the capacity of a clerk. This proposition was not at first seen in a favorable light. He had a higher ambition for a literary education than was here precluded; but when he thought what his uncle had done for him, and saw that he could never have become what he was without his kindly assistance, and as he witnessed his declining health on account of his incessant application to business, he could not refuse his dear uncle's request; and he cheerfully assented to it, and immediately entered upon the duties of his new office.

The proficiency that Walter made in business affairs soon relieved his uncle of much anxiety and labor, and he found that he could devote considerable time to travelling and other means for the improvement of his health.

Walter remained in his uncle's store two years; and in this time he had learned much in mercantile matters which was useful to him. Mr. Middlebury was quite an extensive owner in merchant and freighting vessels, and had invested large amounts in goods for exportation and importation. This business had for the last year been for the most part entrusted to Walter.

In the spring of 1847, two years after Walter had been in the employ of his uncle, Mr. Middlebury had just finished building the splendid ship Edward. The first voyage she was to make was to Peru. Her cargo was to consist of dry goods, provisions, and such other articles as were considered the most saleable, and was to receive in return such products of the place as might be thought the most valuable for the home trade. Mr. Middlebury had given unusual attention and care to the selection of his goods to be sent out in the Edward. He had two reasons for this. He was desirous that the first cargo should compare favorably with the beauty and splendor of his new ship; and he also wished that the one who was to superintend its sale should take a pride in offering such a cargo to purchasers; and for the superintendence of this important trust, he had selected in his own mind his nephew. As the time drew near for the sailing of the ship, he made known to Walter his intentions. Though it was an office which he much desired, Walter feared to assume the responsibility, and wished to be excused; but being strongly urged and encouraged by his uncle, he consented.

On the 15th of September, 1847, everything was in readiness. Walter had received the necessary instructions. The Edward was got under way, and with a fair breeze and amid the loud and hearty cheers of a multitude of spectators, she left the port of Boston, to risk the perils and dangers of the first voyage of ocean-life. She proved to be a ship of superior strength and speed; and after a voyage of a little more than three months she arrived with her crew and cargo safely at the port of Callao.

Walter's knowledge of the Spanish language enabled him at once to introduce himself to the traders of the place, and it was but the work of a few days before he had disposed of the cargo entrusted to him to good advantage, and had engaged for a return cargo the fine wool of the vicuñas (a sheep of the Andes), wines, sugar, bark, etc.

In the course of a few weeks the Edward was ready for the homeward voyage. While tarrying at Callao, Walter made the acquaintance of several officers of the merchant vessels who were trading at the ports on the Pacific. He was anxious to view the different places of interest on the coast, and if he could so arrange his business, he concluded to avail himself of one of the many invitations to visit those places after the clearance of the Edward. He made known his wishes to the captain, who favored his plans. Walter accordingly sent duplicates of his bills of sale and invoices to his uncle, in care of the captain, and also letters apprising him of his voyage up the Pacific, and promising a speedy return. After getting everything in readiness, the Edward weighed anchor and set sail with a fine westerly breeze for the port of Boston.

After the sailing of the Edward, Walter lost no time in making preparations for his voyage. By the politeness of the captain, he took passage in the brig Atilla, from Maine, which was to make a voyage to California before she returned home. This was a place Walter had long wished to visit; not that it contained any matter of peculiar interest, for, on the contrary, the place was, until the year previous, when the American flag was first raised by Commodore Sloat, in a very wretched state. But he had an ardent desire to visit a place so famous in history, which was discovered by the celebrated conqueror, Cortez, and said to have been visited by Sir Francis Drake, in 1578.

The Atilla arrived at San Francisco about the last of January, having disposed of her cargo at various ports on the way. During the voyage Walter had made the acquaintance of the officers; and with the captain and second mate, who were natives of Bangor, Maine, his acquaintance grew into the strongest friendship. He assisted the captain very materially in the disposal of his cargo, as he was well acquainted with the Spanish language and could better deal with the Indians and Spaniards in the traffic of goods.

Walter, together with some half dozen of the officers and crew of the brig, desirous of seeing that section of our newly acquired territory, and wishing to see some of the places of interest pointed out in such glowing style by Colonel Fremont, prepared themselves for a trip into the interior. In their journeyings they visited Captain Sutter's fort, and while there, information was received that Marshall, who was building a sawmill some fifty miles above, had discovered rich veins of gold. As may readily be imagined, the party, in company with Captain Sutter, immediately started for the mill, where they found that gold did exist in large quantities.

Here was a chance for Walter to try his luck; he therefore proposed to the captain and his other friends of the Atilla that they should remain a few days in that vicinity to prosecute gold digging. Two of the company therefore returned to the brig for a supply of provisions and the necessary conveniences for commencing operations. On their return they "prospected" for a short time, and finally stationed themselves about four miles below the mill, on the "American Fork," and it proved they were not unfortunate in the place they had chosen. From the time of the discovery of gold in California, in no section has the metal been found more abundant than on this stream. Governor Mason, in his official letters to government speaks of two men who took out from this plain $17,000 of gold in a few days.

Walter and his companions remained about two weeks, and during that time they had collected a large amount of the metal in lumps and dust, and conveyed it to the vessel.

The Atilla, having disposed of her cargo and reloaded with hides, etc., started on her return voyage. On her arrival at Panama, Walter entrusted his business to the captain, crossed the isthmus, took passage in the barque Ann at Gorgona for New Orleans, from whence he took passage in a packet ship for Boston, where he arrived about the first of May, before the arrival of the Edward. He narrated to his uncle the good success he met with in the disposal of the cargo of the Edward, and with what he had reloaded her. Mr. Middlebury was highly pleased with the result, and promised Walter that he should be well rewarded for his faithfulness and good judgment. Walter then gave him an account of his trip to California, and the result of his journey there; but his uncle, though having heard, by vague rumors, of the discovery of gold in that section of the country, gave but little credence to them, and he therefore advised his nephew not to count too largely upon the "heap" of dirt that he had dug there and foolishly brought away.

In about three weeks after Walter's return, the Edward arrived, safe and in good trim. By this voyage Mr. Middlebury realized a profit of ten thousand dollars; and for this extraordinary success he was indebted to his nephew's excellent management.

Walter had not been home since he left, many years before, and obtained leave of absence for a while to visit the old homestead. His appearance, both in deportment and conversation, contrasted with what it was when he left, very naturally caused no little surprise. Among his old acquaintances and schoolmates, none was more observant in noticing this change than Carry Lee; and she seemed very desirous to renew the acquaintance. But her frequent calls at his father's for this purpose, did not produce the desired effect. Walter invariably avoided her company when he could do so.

There was one, however, whose company Walter often sought. From the time he first left home, the many friendly counsels and good advice of Lizzie Weston became too strongly impressed on his memory to be forgotten, and he was happy that an opportunity was now presented when he could thank her with a grateful heart for what she had done for him.

One day, after Walter's return to Boston, Carry and Lizzie met. As may be expected, their conversation partook somewhat largely concerning Walter. Carry, wishing to ascertain the truth of the rumor of his engagement to Lizzie, asked her if it was so—if she really loved him. Lizzie, laughing, readily answered:

"Why, yes; to be sure I do!"

The effect of this reply was too plainly shown on Carry's face to pursue the inquiry farther, and the subject was at once dropped.

Walter is now a partner in one of the most successful mercantile firms in Boston. And in one of the pleasantest suburban towns of the city, surrounded by all the enjoyments of life, reside Walter and his own Lizzie Weston, happy and respected; while Carry is yet in the "market," deeply lamenting her youthful coquetry.

MESS-ROOM OF THE MARINES AT CHARLESTOWN NAVY YARD.

MARINE BARRACKS, CHARLESTOWN, MASS.

The engravings on this page were drawn for us expressly by Mr. Champney, and represent the interior and exterior of the Marine Barracks at Charlestown, Massachusetts. The command at this time consists of one lieutenant-colonel, two lieutenants, six sergeants, four corporals and seventy-five privates. The Charlestown post is considered to be a model military one in every respect. The exemplary conduct of the men is particularly noticeable. They enjoy all the privileges which can be extended to them, keeping in view their obligations to the public service. Only very rarely is it found necessary to have resort to punishment, and that of the mildest kind. The provisions furnished are abundant, and of the very best quality; and the system of messing is so conducted, that the "mess-room" affords all the comforts of a well-regulated boarding-house. Our first engraving exhibits the interior of the mess-room, with the men at dinner. The room is clean and neat, and furnished with substantial tables and benches. The cooking-stove and dresser on the right are indicative of good cheer. Probably there is no military service in the world in which the privates fare so well as in that of the United States. They are comfortably lodged, fed and clothed, and the officers they are required to obey are men of education and character. Having seen how their meals are served, let us next take a glance at their quarters for the night, which forms the subject of the second picture. The beds, it will be perceived, are iron frames, turning up to the wall on hinges, and thus occupying but little space when not in use. Above each man's bedstead on a shelf are his knapsack and other traps. In a part of this room is a gun-rack filled with muskets. A gallery runs round the apartment, and other beds are seen on the second story. A sergeant and some of the privates are grouped together in the apartment. The third picture of our series exhibits the barrack-yard and drill-ground—a spacious enclosure planted with trees, having the barracks running along one side of it. To the left a sentinel is seen mounting guard. The corps are drilling by squads, and are going through various manoeuvres, while a group of ladies and gentlemen on the right is watching their evolutions. Under the trees may be seen a small battery of guns. These guns, now performing silent duty on the parade-ground, have "done the state some service." Like many of the veterans under arms when our artist was sketching the picture, these guns were employed upon do good service when occasion calls. The various arrangements of the yard are characterized by skill and judicious management.

FLYING FISH.

Another gale, and the ship practising the polka. Son veiled for two days since we entered the tropic. As the captain and I were conversing just within the cabin door, something came flashing between us and dropped upon the floor—a flying fish allured by the lamp. Nearly killed by the blow, it died before a bucket of water to put it in could be drawn. Others came on board during the night. Such is the velocity of their motions, that a portion of their nose or scap is left wherever they strike; marks are numerous on the ship's sides. But for its wings, I should have taken the stranger for a mackerel. From the nose to the extremity of the tail is twelve inches; the longest side of each wing seven. The lower lobe of the tail, prolonged beyond the other no doubt, to facilitate the act of springing from the water. The wings, enlargements of pectoral fins, have their translucent membrane strengthened by rods or rays, which diverge with the expanding surface, and, still further to distribute their support, each one becomes split about half way up the wing, and the two branches, after spreading apart, become in like manner divided as they approach the margin. As we approach the flying fish latitude, flocks of from twenty to a hundred spring up as the ship ploughs in among them. They seem to take the air for pleasure, as well as to escape danger—groups and individuals being observed leaping and making short trips as in mere wantonness. They fly low, seldom mounting higher than six or eight feet; but they have the power to rise and fall with the heaving surface, and to change their direction laterally. While the greater part of a group goes off in a right line, individuals turn aside and pursue different courses, just like birds disturbed in a rice or wheat field. Sometimes you are ready to swear they are swallows skimming along for flies, so strongly do they, in certain lights, resemble them. When going in a direct line from you, their black backs are foreshortened and their wings in relief. In some positions the fluttering of these organs is distinctly visible, resembling trembling plates of mica. The distance they pass over varies with the impulse that rouses them. While some descend not far from you, others, more timid, dart far away. The ordinary flight of a group may be averaged at two hundred feet, but some proceed four or five times that distance. I have seen single fish pass over three hundred yards. 22d.—Air and ocean alike in temperature. I cannot detect the slightest change in the thermometer when plunged into the sea. Sea-birds fluttered round, and occasionally flying fish diverted us. In making off, some took to leeward, and others went directly against the wind; some kept along parallel with us, and were occasionally canted half over by the wind blowing against their sides. Examples of progress by successive bounds and of varying their course when in the air occurred. Each flock follows a leader, and when he changes the direction of flight, the rest conform to it. Everywhere they are darting out of and playing over the liquid furrows, obviously enjoying themselves as they spring from wave to wave. There is no watching them frisking over the green, uneven surface, without reverting to wrens and linnets in their native meads. Voice only is wanting to perfect the illusion; but, though terrestrial glades resounded with vocal melody, the ocean has no songsters.—Eubank's Brazil.

SLEEPING APARTMENT OF THE MARINES AT CHARLESTOWN NAVY YARD.

YARD OF THE MARINE BARRACKS, CHARLESTOWN NAVY YARD.

DUTCH VESSELS.

The engraving herewith presented, not only conveys a good idea of Dutch naval architecture, in the representation of the tub-built and clumsy vessels which they still build, but a pleasant notion of the quaint old city of Amsterdam, with its gabled houses, its pointed roofs, and little, antiquated windows. Though the Dutch still build some fine vessels, yet they are, generally, behind the age in naval architecture, and instead of originating models, seek them from other countries. We have seen some of their barques, built after American models, which could hardly be distinguished from Yankees. Yet the Dutch at one time made fair to be the masters of the sea. They pushed their adventurous voyages to the remotest quarters of the globe, and in the 17th century, their ships of war were a terror even to England. Every one remembers how boldly Admiral Van Tromp spread his canvass in the British Channel with a broom at his mast-head, thereby delicately intimating his intention of sweeping the British from the face of the ocean. But those days have gone by, and in maritime affairs the Dutch have been outstripped by many other nations. For the origin of naval architecture, we must go back to a very remote period of time. There is perhaps not a nation on the face of the earth ignorant of the mode of making a vessel capable of floating on the surface of the water—if we except some few tribes in the interior of a country. Nor can we tell, with any degree of clearness, which among the nations of early times had not such knowledge. Charnock, in his valuable "History of Marine Architecture," says: "It would be a fruitless attempt to investigate, not merely the first inventor of marine architecture, but even the country or quarter of the world from whence the science derived its birth or origin. The remote distance of time, aided by the hyperbolical fictions of poets and historians, renders the attempt absurd, and even ridiculous, because the result of the inquiry cannot produce any decisive determination. It may be conjectured that the active, inquisitive spirit of enterprise, constitutionally, as it were, implanted in our nature, displayed itself at one and the same time in a variety of quarters and districts; for the primitive ideas of men dispersed over the face of the globe, unconnected with each other, and totally ignorant even of each other's existence, appear in such perfect unison as to invention, that they extremely well warrant this supposition." Some of the earliest vessels, of which we have any account, were those constructed by the ancient Egyptians to navigate the Nile. They appear to have been small planks cut out of the Acanthia, or Egyptian thorn. These were not cut into lengths like planks, but into pieces nearly square, and measuring about three feet each way; they were lapped over each other like tiles, and fastened together by a number of wooden pins. This mode of construction was found sufficiently strong for the purpose to which it was applied, without the assistance of any internal frame or timber. The hull of the vessel being thus formed, a sufficient number of seats or benches for the accommodation of the rowers were added; and when the joints or seams were carefully caulked with the papyrus, so as carefully to exclude the water, the vessel became ready for immediate use. These vessels, however, were almost incapable of stemming the current, and were generally towed against it by persons on shore, unless the wind proved sufficiently strong or favorable for the proposed course to enable the sail to be substituted. It is a very probable conjecture that the first form of the boat or vessel in most countries was the raft—a collection of trees or logs rudely fastened together with ropes, formed most probably from the bark of the very trees which constituted the raft, or from some other coarse material. Experience would soon teach the navigators that they were deficient in the power of directing such a fabric, so as to be certain of reaching their destination in spite of winds and currents. To remedy this defect, a simple addition was contrived of thick planks thrust down into the water between the logs, and answering the purpose of a keel. Such was probably the precursor of the boat or ship of our day. The Alpha of shipbuilding was the raft; its Omega is the clipper. No nation has yet been able to rival those of American construction.

SCENE AT S. BOSTON BRIDGE.

The spirited local scene which forms the second engraving on this page, was drawn expressly for us by Mr. Chapin. It requires but little explanation. The fishing boats, laden with their scaly prey, have just hauled in, and the lucky fishermen are disposing of their wares to an eager crowd that throng upon the bridge. Fresh fish thus obtained are a cheap luxury. The fishing season commences in April and continues till October, the business being followed by professional fishermen. They go down the harbor and return with the tide. They no sooner make fast, than they are beset by a crowd of eager purchasers, and readily dispose of their cargo. The Irish population of South Boston avail themselves largely of this mode of supplying their tables, on account of cheapness, as good cod and haddock, fresh from the ocean, can be had for two, three and four cents apiece. The fish mostly caught are cod, haddock and flounders. Many persons doing business in Boston, and living in South Boston (mostly mechanics and laborers), on their return home at night, take home some of these fish. The scene on the arrival of the boats is really animating.

DUTCH VESSELS AT AMSTERDAM.

SCENE ON SOUTH BOSTON BRIDGE.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

I DREAM OF HAPPY HOURS.

BY ENNA LINDEN.

Last night I was a happy child,
And gambled o'er the lawn,
And revelled 'mong the fragrant flowers,
That open with the dawn;
I chased the light-winged butterfly,
Through hollow and o'er hill,
And rambled in the wild woods,
So shady and so still.

I plucked the ripe, red berry,
I sought the streamlet's brink,
And with a broad green leaflet
Dipped water up to drink;
I saw the brown and yellow frog,
And watched the spotted trout,
As from beneath the mossy hawk
He swiftly darted out.

I hunted for the robin's nest,
Within the dwarf pine tree,
And peeped with curious, eager eyes,
Her bright blue eggs to see.
I sought amid the fallen leaves,
The glossy acorn ball,
And wondered how the old oak tree
Could grow so large and tall.
I marvelled, if to other eyes
The earth so grand could seem;
Wakened, and, alas! to find
'Twas but an empty dream.

O, would I were a child again,
With happy, careless heart,
Untouched by sin or worldly care,
Or sorrow's painful smart;
Unburdened by the heavy load
It wearily doth bear,
That 'twould so willingly lie down
In death, if rest were there.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

A SUMMER WATERING PLACE.

BY W. C. GOODNOW.

DISGUSTED with faded flowers and fionned flirts at Saratoga, Newport and Rockaway, I, who (tell it not in Gath) already spy gray threads in my mustache and dispose my hair artistically to hide the deepening crow's-foot on my temple, having heard my friend Bitemely descend rapturously on the beauties and wild solitude of Scatuskyaskilleat Falls, entered the cars and left Babylon behind me, en route for Scatuskyaskilleat. After a two days' journey, I was stopped in the woods near dusk, where on a shingle was painted the one momentous word, Scatuskyaskilleat. All the falls visible were those made by my valise, as, having dropped from my hand, it rolled down stone after stone into a little hollow, where a little smoke rose from the little chimney of a little house. I followed my valise. "David!" cried a woman who darned a stocking on the doorstep, "here's a man!"

"Well, whateer if there be?" screamed a little shrill voice on the third octave of C.

"Spose he wants to be took in!" answered she.

"Good heavens! my good woman," I groaned, "I'm taken in enough now. I only want a lodging and a bowl of milk, as I presume this is your hotel."

"Swer it is," she replied; and now, "Dav'd," a little wizened man, with three spires of tow on the crown of his head, hustled through the door, gave the old lady a kick, and said in the former pitch of voice, "Walk in, stranger! darn it, walk in!"

Considering that the oath might be a local custom, equivalent to the ancient "Peace be with thee," I complied.

Introducing me to an apartment the size of a bathing-tub, my host said, "Here's your room, stranger, darn it is! and it's a room finished fourteen years ago come Wensdy fornit, or my name aint David Davis."

Remarking that it was a very good room, what there was of it, although like Foote's wine, rather little of its age, I asked the way to the falls.

"Falls? Whateer falls?"

"Guess he means where Charly tumbled down and caught her dress onter a hook," suggested Mrs. Davis.

No, I didn't mean that. I meant falls, waterfalls, cataract, cascade, none of which words were comprehended; but when I said river, brook, water—"O!" screamed David, raising his voice a key higher, "Charly! here!" and a fat girl about sixteen years old, with snarly hair clotted upon her dirty face by the combined forces of molasses and gravel, rolled into our presence.

"Show this feller the spring. Guess he wants to wash his face. Wall, 'tis rather dirty, and you wash yourn at the same time!"

After scrambling ten minutes through a brush-heap, I came where a barrel was sunk in the earth, and was filled by water that dripped, with a little splash, from the mouth of a spout projecting from a small heap of stones, and fell the space, by rule measurement, of one foot and two inches, with the immense volume of a teaspoonful at a time. Happiness is a rainbow, and the pursuit of it folly; but my pursuit of Scatuskyaskilleat was infinitely worse, for there was not even a rainbow to this truly wonderful and unique "fall," and inwardly cursing Bitemely, I turned away, leaving Charly at her ablution, and resought mine inn.

Notwithstanding the approaching shower, I am ashamed to say that I lost my way, and wandered round, through the untrodden byways of this desolate country for the space of half an hour; at last, down pattering came the big drops, and completed my wretchedness. The rain-storm had overtaken me, a leader of the ton, rusticating in the heart of the country for pleasure, forsooth. Linen was a rag, nankeen soaking, Leghorn dripping—where should the weary dove find rest?

On a slight eminence stood a shed, clapboarded and painted yellow, which was quite an improvement on the "hotel." Knocking at the door, open it flew, and introducing my request for a temporary covering, the housewife within really wished she "had a rambrilly for me," and bade me be seated; rather a difficult task, I found, as there were but two stools in the room, and both of these wanting in the necessary complement of legs. However, balancing a stick of wood upright on one end, I became established on the other and qualified to join the Ravels, by my efforts to preserve equilibrium.

I was determined to make the most of my opportunities for observing the varieties of housekeeping in Scatuskyaskilleat. Meanwhile the lady of the shed was tossing round the evening meal, with one or two broken pieces of crockery and some scanty viands spread on the bare table, one missing leg of which, like my own seat, was supplied by a stick. After inviting me to partake, which offer I declined, "Jake!" screamed she. Instantly through another door an old man shambled in, followed by a very ragged little girl, who, as she could not shove by him, tumbled in through a broken panel, at the same time another hopeful insinuated herself by a considerable struggle through an open window-pane. A half dozen more, plunging from all manner of intricacies, down the ladder from the loft, from closets, cellars, corners, and under the bed, ranged themselves with pushes and blows round the table.

"May the Lord bless this food!" said the old man, biting off a piece of cold potato, at the same time endeavoring with strange vibrations to sit on one of the two-legged stools, and using his forefinger as a butter-knife, he spread his bread with it.

"I say, Bill," muttered one of the archbishops, "lend me your knife."

"Esther's gort it," muttered Bill, with his mouth full.

"Esther, you pig, give it here."

"I won't," said Esther. At this the borrower gave her a kick, beneath the table, that sent her stumbling backwards, which she returned by throwing the knife with so true an aim as to land it fully in the piece of bread and butter he was thrusting into his mouth.

"I say, marm!" cried he, bursting into tears, "it's dorned mean if a feller can't eat his dinner over, without—" and running fiercely round to Esther, he was about to execute summary vengeance, when old Jake cried out, "Sal, there, part them young 'uns."

"Ha, ha, Jake! Let the little davyles fight!"

However, the "little davyles" had ended their contest by Esther's proving quite the boy's match, and the latter returning to his repast sufficiently crestfallen, while old Jake continued scooping out the butter with his crooked finger.

"Where's the beets, marm?" asked Esther.

"Law sakes, I forgot! I sot Assenath Ann a-watching them bile out in the shed. Assenath! Assenath Ann! Assenath Ann Frost!" she shouted.

A little imp with black elf-locks and an exceedingly dirty face (which latter seemed to be peculiar to this Scatuskyaskilleat atmosphere), answered the summons.

"Is them beets biled?"

"Biled? Yes."

"How'd you know they be?"

"Wy, to be sure they are. The water's all done biling and cold 'nour ago."

"Blockhead!" said Jake. "Bring 'em here. Sal, what yer got such mighty strong tea fur?" he asked, as Assenath Ann disappeared.

"Taint strong."

"For my part," continued Jake, oblivious to her reply, "I like my tea so strong 'twill hear up a egg, but I don't like it so strong a dog could walk over it and not slump through."

"Miss Chubbick lent me this. Might as well have strong tea as strong rum!" retorted Sal, just as little Assenath Ann returned with the beets hard as rocks. Jake, indignant at the insinuation, seized one and threw it at the conjugal head. Sal instantly tossed her boiling hot tea, cup and all, across the table into her partner's face. Jake, like a gallant husband as he was, returned the favor, at which, Sal, snatching the saucer, threw it behind the back-log. The children, early in the combat, took sides; one little "well-spring of joy" pulling his father's cue almost out of the paternal head, and another inserting her teeth into her mother's arm with all conceivable violence. Cup after cup flew into Sal's face, and not to be outdone, saucer after saucer went behind the back-log, till the table was completely bare, when with an overpowering crash, down went that useful article of furniture, hiding Jake beneath the ruins.

At this important juncture of affairs, the rain having abated, I made my adieu, and when at the foot of the hill, looking back on this miniature Sodom and Gomorrah, saw Sal thrusting old Jake head first, he vigorously kicking to the last, through a window broken for his exodus. This little experience taught me there were people beyond the Davises in Scatuskyaskilleat, and I did not wonder that they, par excellence, kept the hotel. After great difficulty, and when it was quite dusk, I re-entered their domicile. A bowl of milk stood on the table awaiting me, from which my hostess with her fingers picked one or two floating specks, that resembled an insect called by Virginians, chances—by scientific men, cimex lectularius—by heathen, bed-bugs. I need not say what became of the milk.

While I was repairing my loss of supper by a cigar, David entered my room.

"Don't do that, stranger," said he, "don't. It minds me of my carnal days—darn it does—afore I had religion."

In a short time I gathered from Mr. Davis's conversation, notwithstanding its semblance of profanity, that he now had religion. Far be it from me to treat lightly any sincere feeling, but I really met with this man, and he really thus hstrangued. "Darn, stranger!" he said, in his highest pitch of voice, "I was no whar without religion, darn I was!"

At nine o'clock mine host left me to such somnolence as the mosquitoes, etc. would allow; for if one mosquito danced one hornpipe on my benighted flesh that night, a million danced five hundred altogether. With the gray peep of dawn I rose and went out. Mr. Davis was endeavoring to administer corporal punishment to his wife Debby, who turned the tables and put him out door. In fact, I concluded that woman's rights were pretty well understood in S. She had just accomplished this triumphant feat, when I entered.

"Morning, stranger," she said. "Have to jump round spry, if yer going in the rail-cars, I swer. They come along pretty quick."

So saying, she took down an animal that strongly resembled a cat, but which she as strongly, and that was saying a good deal, averred was a rabbit. "This rabbit is pretty well smoked, I swer; hong in the chimbley this ten days. Orter be tender."

My olfactory nerves had already assured me of the fact.

While the good dame busied herself in sundry gastroonomic preparations, she was quite voluble. In the course of conversation I alluded to and complimented her upon her superior skill in the late contest between herself and husband. "Tbar 'tis again," she said, planting her fork upright in the table. "Didn't see nothing of the kind, did ye, stranger? I swer! I don't see whar folks say Dav'd and I quer'l fur, when Heaven knows we sint spoke fur a year!" Just at this moment the approaching cars gave a shrill whistle; I threw a bill on the table, left the alliterative Dav'd and Debby Davis, and if ever I set foot on Scatuskyaskilleat ground again, may I die of swamp fever, that's all.

It is mortifying to confess that I met my friend Bitemely in so vulgar a vehicle as an omnibus, shortly after. I meant to ent him. He was not to be cut. "Bit? eh?" said he, with a laugh and a nudge. Bit indeed! Never mind, my man! I've a pretty cousin coming from Maryland this summer, and we'll see who is "bit," then!

MEAT AND VEGETABLES.

In an elaborate paper by Dr. Londe, of the Imperial Academy of Medicine, Paris, recently read before its members, he lays it down as a fundamental principle in the philosophy of diet, that the use of fresh meat daily is necessary to the working classes, although he admits that persons leading a comparatively idle life may do very well on fish, poultry, and other lighter forms of nourishment. In support of his opinion he produces the following conclusive fact: In 1841, the Rouen Railway Co., of France, having conceded the making of their line to English engineers, the latter brought over a band of English laborers, who performed one-third more work daily than did the French. The latter were put upon a meat diet, similar to that of the English, and in a short time were able to accomplish the same amount of labor.—Scientific American.

NOTICES OF NEW PUBLICATIONS.

NARRATIVE OF THE EXPEDITION OF AN AMERICAN SQUADRON TO THE CHINA SEAS AND JAPAN, UNDER THE COMMAND OF COMMODORE PERRY, ETC. BY FRANCIS L. HAWKES, D.D., LL.D. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1856. 8vo.

Commodore Perry's expedition to China and Japan, in the years 1852, '53 and '54, was one of the most important ever undertaken by this government, and it is difficult to set too high a value on its probable results. The commander executed his difficult mission most admirably, and it was fitting that a record worthy of the enterprise should issue from the American press. From the ample material furnished by Com. Perry, Dr. Hawkes has compiled an excellent, interesting and detailed narrative; while the publishers have displayed the greatest liberality in illustrating the work by numerous engravings on wood and steel, after the designs of Mr. Heize, the accomplished artist of the expedition, whose ability we have already commented on, and by maps and charts beautifully drawn and engraved. We have now a complete picture of a strange empire and a strange people; their manners, customs, religion, policy and arts are depicted with fidelity, while the story of the cruise possesses all the interest of a romance. This splendid volume may be obtained of Redding & Co.

THE WANDERER. A Tale of Life's Vicissitudes. By the author of the "Watchman," "Old Doctor," "Lawyer's Story," etc. New York: E. D. Long, 121 Nassau Street. 12mo. pp. 377.

The reputation of the author of this story will cause it to be sought for with avidity, nor will any one be disappointed in its perusal. It is a picture of life in many phases and many sections of the world, crowded with character and replete with interest. The dialogue is spirited and natural, and the story is brought to a close in an ingenious and happy manner. We predict for this romance a run equal to that of the "Watchman."

LAYS OF ANCIENT ROME, ETC. BY THOMAS BABINGTON MACAULAY. Boston and Cambridge: James Munroe & Co. 1856. 12mo. pp. 181.

Though Macaulay's reputation will rest on his histories and essays, still, the "Lays of Ancient Rome," "Ivy" and the "Armada," all embraced in this elegant illustrated volume, show that, had he chosen, he might have won as proud a name in poetry as he has in prose. His "Battle of Ivy" will be remembered and quoted as long as the English language lasts.

THE MODERN STORY-TELLER. New York: G. P. Putnam & Co. 1856. 12mo. pp. 324.

A collection of capital stories, thirty or forty in number, most of which are out of print, and now collected for the first time. A capital book for summer reading. For sale by Shepard, Clark & Co.

HELEN LINCOLN. A Tale. By CARRIE CARPES. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1856. 12mo. pp. 208.

This modest title is given to a pleasant and interesting domestic story, indicating in its author an aptitude for narrative fiction. For sale by Redding & Co.

MEMOIRALS OF HIS TIME. BY HENRY COCKBURN. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1856. 12mo. pp. 442.

A work invaluable to the students of modern English history. It presents the reader with an inside view of the great political movements of the present century in Great Britain, with familiar sketches of the actors therein. It is not encumbered with dry discussion, but is enlivened by the introduction of many illustrative anecdotes. For sale by Redding & Co.

THE MARTINS OF CRO' MARTIN. BY CHARLES LEVER. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1856.

With all his exaggerations, Dr. Lever is one of the best novelists of the day; and these pictures of Irish character and life, united together by an interesting story, will be quite as popular, we venture to predict, as oven "Harry Lorrequer." For sale by Redding & Co.

THE HUMOROUS POETRY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE FROM CHAUCER TO SAKS. BY J. PARTON. New York: Mason Brothers 1856. 12mo. pp. 689.

With unwearied industry the editor of this work has ransacked the stores of English literature, rescued these gems of humor from oblivion, and arranged them with admirable taste. The work is a perfect treasury of classic fun, and cannot fail to be welcomed warmly by the nation, while it will not be unacceptable to those who are "nothing, if not critical." For sale by Sanborn, Carter & Bazu.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

ROYHOOD.

BY "RAY HUMBOLDT."

Black clouds have shut around, and night
With utter loneliness of darkness come
To blind and bar about the little light
That disappointment's sorrow left to roam
To my sick spirit. When hopes glowing bright,
All went to be the gilding stars of life,
Have set, what else may cheer the longing
Than a loved past?

There was a time when joy
Could call me all her own—
Love knew no base alloy,
Ambition knew not but his will should throne
The skies if he commanded, and alone
I would have sworn, in spite of every care,
A world to bear,
And so felt stronger for the promise—thrilled with joy
At the vast work before me, for—I was a boy!

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

DICK HARDY'S CHEST.

A STORY OF THE SEA.

BY RALPH TRYON.

"WELL," said my uncle, laying aside the evening paper, which he had been vainly endeavoring to read, "since you young barnacles are determined to stick to me until you get a bit of a yarn, I suppose I must gratify you. But do you think it just the thing, you cubs, to make me set aside this paper just as I have got fairly under weigh with it? If I had a bit of that clothes-line in your yard, I think I could treat you to something more to your good."

As I was one of the "cubs" addressed, and perfectly understood his humor, I said nothing, but quietly placed a spittoon near him, which always served as a signal to bring to light his old turtle-shell tobacco-box—and I even fancied I could tell the precise length of his tales, by the quantity of cavendish which, on such occasions, to use his own expression, "he stowed away in his larboard cheek."

"When I was little more than sixteen," he began, "after having safely weathered the whooping-cough, measles, chicken-pox and other dangerous points of childhood, I was brought up with a round turn by the sea-going fever; and although my father prescribed the rod and hard work freely, with many other mild remedies of pretty much the same nature for several months, yet I was pronounced incurable, and as soon as the arrangements could be made was packed off for sea. Determined I should have leisure to repent the trouble I had caused them all at home, he succeeded in shipping me for a voyage to the East Indies, hoping that long before my cruise was ended I should be heartily sick of everything that pertained to shipping."

"The ship was not quite ready for sea, for she was just off the stocks, having been built expressly for this trade. I was allowed, however, to go on board the next day, where the shipkeeper at once commenced my initiation into the drudgeries of shipboard. We had no Donald McKays then to knock out for us any of those fleet-footed clippers which are now so famous. But still she was a beauty, nautically speaking; and her young master, Dumaresq, as he thought of her sharp ends, long floor, breadth of beam, and heavy but graceful spars, had reason to be proud of having the command of a vessel that bid fair to rival in speed any ship from the States. I will pass over my dock experience, which was a tedious matter to me, and will not interest you."

"One day, as I was on the wharf assisting our second mate in receiving our ship stores, I saw a weather-beaten specimen of our calling approach the captain, who was conversing with an old sea-going friend of his, and respectfully touch his hat. He was neatly rigged out in a suit of fine broadcloth, with a heavy gold chain slung about his neck, and I noticed upon his tar-stained and sunburnt fingers several rings of considerable value; all this contrasted strangely with his rusty figure head, which bore the marks of long service rather than dissipation. He asked the captain if he had shipped all his hands, to which he replied that he had not."

"Ah, Dick," said the other master, "so you still net your own shipping-master, and steer clear of the landsharks?"

"I try to, sir."

"Well, my old scadog, if you and my friend Dumaresq do not agree, you know where my ship lays; and all I can say to you in that case is, choose for yourself in what capacity you will ship, and I shall be content."

"Thank you kindly, sir, but I have had a kind of an eye to this ship, even before she left the stocks, and have taken a fancy to go in her, that is, if the captain hasn't a mind to the contrary."

"After what my friend has said, I do not think we shall disagree," said our captain.

"Some further talk ensued, and on the next day he was duly shipped with wages several dollars a month higher than the going rate. After he left the wharf, Capt. Peters, the friend alluded to, said:

"You boys just engaged one of the best seamen in our merchant service—an eccentric fellow, or he would prefer the quarter-deck to the fore-castle; for I assure you that he is a capital officer when he sees fit to ship as such. He has also a snug property, which his prudent habits have helped to accumulate, and in almost every ship he sails takes a 'venture.' This Dick Hardy has great influence over the crew; but the only ill-temper he ever displays is when some thoughtless fellow scratches or mars his chest, which he always carries with him, and which he guards as carefully as he would a mistress. In fact, it becomes a by-word in every ship he sails, and anything that is not to be touched or meddled with, the sailors think they use a strong expression when they say, that it must be as 'sacred as Dick Hardy's chest.'

"When we were fairly to sea, and I had paid the usual tribute to Neptune and the fishes, and become able to balance myself on my pins, I sought to ingratiate myself into the notice of this singular man, whose favor I would have rather secured than the captain's. Besides, I had great curiosity to know the history of this strange chest, which was regarded by the crew as a mystery. My first efforts in this respect were only rewarded by an occasional 'Get out of the way, you lubber;' and this was about the only notice he took of me for some time."

"One day the mate, just to keep me employed, gave me some odd bits of cordage to splice together, but did not condescend to teach me the process. It was while I was toiling and fretting over this job, the marlinespike doing more execution in wounding my hand than in properly parting the strands, while the men were laughing at my perplexity without offering to help me, that Hardy came to my side, and placing his rough hand upon my shoulder, said:

"Bear up, my little hearty. Rome wasn't built in a day, and"—turning to some ordinary seamen who were making sport of me—"lubbers need not put on the airs of seamen who have only made one or two voyages at most."

"This silenced their jibes, and he kindly instructed me until I could splice as well as the best. From that day he assumed a sort of fatherly dictatorship over me, and taught me various kinds of knots and capstan embroidery. If he was exacting, he at least protected me from the ill usage of the men. One night, during the mid-watch, I ventured to allude to the chest, and desired to know its history. He looked thoughtful for a few moments, but at length, after having made me promise to be silent with the crew upon the subject, he consented."

"Now this chest was nearly five feet in length, and in shape nearly resembled the hull of a Dutch galliot. It was built of English oak, and secured on the outside by heavy bands of burnished copper, which Hardy kept as bright as a new penny. The bottom was convex, with rounded ends, while the sides fell in with a curve, making the top much less in breadth than the bottom. The wood-work was neatly varnished and water tight; in fact, it was a cumbersome yet curious affair, and Dick always made it a part of the conditions of his shipping, that he should be allowed to carry his chest."

"He cast his eye aloft to see that everything was snug—for the second mate being sick he had command of the watch—after which he reeled off as follows:

"When I was still a youngster, and had only made a few voyages, I shipped in a Baltimore built brig bound for the coast of Africa. I never like to revert to this cruise, for it was the first and last time I ever lent a hand to such business. We were armed like a privateer, and a precious cut-throat crew we had."

"The second mate was a Swede, who had spent all his days in smuggling and trading in Guinea live stock. He was every inch a sailor, but a rough customer to any delinquent from duty. He took a kind of fancy to me, and I am indebted to him for many useful lessons in seamanship. He was also very superstitious, and frequently told me that he had a presentiment that he would never see the end of this cruise."

"Our voyage was nearly up, when one day, while performing some duty aloft, by a careless movement his foot slipped and he fell heavily to the deck. We caught him up, stunned and bleeding, and carried him to his berth. When his senses began to come to him again, he complained of his leg, which was broken, and of suffering internal pain. We had no surgeon on board, but fished his damaged spar in the best manner we knew how. From the first he told us that this was his last voyage; and though thankful for our attentions, he persisted that it was no sort of use, for in a few days at most all he would require would be a couple of shot at his heels and a burial service."

"At his request the captain allowed me to devote a large portion of my time to him, and I did everything in my power to make him comfortable. Before he died he divided his kit among the crew, but to me he gave the empty chest, which he said was of more value than I had any idea of. He made me solemnly promise never to part with it until I was satisfied that I knew its full value; and further told me, that if I kept the chest and steered clear of liquor and landsharks, it would be my own fault if I was not a rich man."

"I was not particularly pleased with this gift, for I thought the Swede had greatly over-estimated its worth—besides, it was so bulky, that I hardly knew what to do with it; but when I thought more seriously upon his words, they made a deep impression upon my mind, and I became convinced that there was something in or about the chest that I had not discovered. So during my watches below I kept up a regular investigation, when I could steal a few moments free from the observation of my shipmates."

"One night, while our watch were snoring away at the rate of nine knots, we having all had a hard day's work, I again renewed the search, although as badly used up as the rest, for the mystery of this chest haunted me even in my dreams. This time I was in luck, and the meaning of the Swede's words was made very plain; for as I was passing my hand about on the inside, I touched unwittingly a secret spring. The false bottom flew up, and what I saw brought me up like a ship shivering in the wind, so great was my astonishment. 'I'll be hanged if I should have felt more surprised if I had dove into a nest of rattlesnakes.'

"This false bottom was about an inch thick, and the part exposed was wadded in order to prevent any sound of hollowness, if strange hands were meddling with it, and fitted so snug into its place, that to this day not so much as a sign of a seam can be traced. I carefully closed the lid till I made sure that my shipmates were all snoring soundly, and then proceeded to overhaul my discovery."

"Well, my hearty, what do you think I found there? Why, fashion upon fashion of the choicest silks, which, as I unfurled, let me into a nest of Spanish doubloons of more than one hundred in number! When I had told these over and over again, I forced back the bottom into place, secured the bolts, and rushed on deck in a perfect typhoon of excitement. It seemed to me all a beautiful dream which had faded into the salt mists around me."

"Again I plunged into the fore-castle to make sure that I had not been deluded with a vision; and when I became convinced that all was real, I sought the deck again, where I passed the night, watch in and out. I dared tell no one of my treasure, for my life would have been anything but safe if I had. You know that a man is easily got rid of at sea; and the simple report on the ship's books of 'lost overboard,' if it had a tongue, would in many cases, reel off a fearful yarn."

"But this is neither here nor there. I made the voyage, kept my secret, and when we landed our miserable, half-starved cargo of human niggers on the south side of Cuba, I slipped my cable, and cut clear of the disgusting trade. I found no difficulty in getting rid of the silks, from which I realized a very considerable sum. This was stowed away with the rest in my tight locker, and I began to consider myself quite rich. But instead of throwing my money away in strong drink and foolish fancies, I became ambitious to add to my store."

"In a few days I got a berth on board a brig at Havana bound for New York as second mate. I shipped on my own account a few hogheads of molasses, which upon arrival sold at handsome profit; and after placing the bulk of my money in safe hands, I again shipped for a long voyage. Year by year I have been adding to the amount ever since, until, thank Providence, I can look old age in the face without fear."

"This is why I take such good care of the old box; besides, I generally have stowed away in it more yellow boys than I care to have every crew know. Even at this blessed moment, I have one hundred sovereigns there well damaged in cotton, which I intend to operate with when we arrive."

"This is the story of Dick Hardy's chest," said my uncle, reaching out his hand for the paper, but after a moment's pause, added, "and the sequel will show that I owe my success in life indirectly to it. When I returned home, after stopping several weeks with my parents, I went to pass a few days with old Dick at his farm on the banks of the Penobscot. He had bought a beautiful yacht, and glorious times I had I assure you. His aged mother and married sister resided on the place, while his brother-in-law carried on the farm for him."

"As time passed on I began to aspire to the command of a ship; but having no relative to secure such interest for me, promotion looked rather squally and uncertain. I confided my trouble to Dick in a letter, who had left off going to sea, and received in reply intelligence that astounded me. He had purchased a quarter interest of a new barque at Portland in my name, which was waiting for me to take charge. Bless his kind old heart, he is still living, rich and respected; but if it had not been for him, your uncle doubts if he would now be in command of one of the saniciest clipper ships that floats."

RADISHES.

We are frequently taken to task for the war we have waged upon this worse than worthless vegetable. For fifteen years we have not permitted one to grow in our garden, or to disgrace our table, and we have found the advantage in pursuing this course, in the improved health of our family. Man is the only animal that will eat a radish, raw or cooked. The sagacious hog will starve before he will eat the poisonous trash. Crude radishes are the most indigestible food that can be taken into the human stomach, independent of the acid, poisonous substance they contain. "But they do not hurt me," exclaims one. "I can eat them with impunity, and with a relish." But, dear reader, do you not have the headache, or a bad breath? Have you no doctor's bills to pay? A radish eaten in the spring may cause a fever in the fall. If any one doubts the poisonous qualities of radishes, let him eat in thin slices three or four, and soak them in water for twelve hours, and then taste the water. Our word for it, they will never taste another radish. As a watchman upon the horticultural tower, we cannot commend the culture of a vegetable that we know to be injurious.—Sail of the South.

CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY.

Encouraged by the unprecedented success which this popular monthly has met with, and the rapidly with which it has increased its circulation, the proprietor has resolved to make it still more worthy of the patronage of the public. That this admirable work is a MIRACLE OF CHEAPNESS, is admitted by every one, containing, as it does, one hundred pages of reading matter in each number, and forming two volumes a year of six hundred pages each, or twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for ONE DOLLAR!

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY is printed with new type, upon fine white paper, and its matter is carefully compiled and arranged by the hands of the editor and proprietor, who has been known to the public as connected with the Boston press for nearly fifteen years. Its pages contain from the best and most popular writers in the country. It is also spiced with a record of the notable events of the times, of peace and war, of discoveries and improvements occurring in either hemisphere, forming an agreeable companion for a leisure moment or hour, anywhere, at home or abroad, each number being complete in itself.

NEWS, TALES, POEMS, STORIES OF THE SEA, SKETCHES, MISCELLANY, ADVENTURES, BIOGRAPHIES, WIT AND HUMOR.

No sectarian subjects are admitted into its pages; there are enough controversial publications, each devoted to its peculiar sect or clique. This work is intended for THE MILLION, north or south, east or west, and is filled to the brim each month with choice, popular and graphic miscellany, just such as any father, brother or friend would place in the hands of a family circle. It is in all its departments, fresh and original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year, or any person sending us right subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive a copy gratis.

☞ Sample copies sent when desired.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
Corner of Tremont and Bromfield Sts., Boston, Mass.

WILLIAM T. PORTER, ESQ.,

EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK "SPIRIT OF THE TIMES."

We present on this page an excellent likeness of William T. Porter, Esq., editor of the New York "Spirit of the Times," drawn expressly for our paper by Mr. Charles Barry, from an admirable photograph by Meade Brothers, New York. The subject of our sketch occupies a prominent position among American journalists, and his paper stands alone and unrivalled among its contemporaries. Its speciality consists in its devotion to the interests of American field-sports, to racing, hunting, fishing, and all sorts of manly outdoor exercises. It is also a record of the American stage, a liberal portion of its columns being devoted to theatricals. Field-sports and the drama abroad also receive due attention in the "Spirit." But it is not alone as a sporting speciality that it appeals to public patronage. It has from the outset maintained a classical literary reputation, numbering among its contributors some of the brightest names in American literature, while its correspondents hail from all parts of the world. As an editor, William T. Porter appears particularly adapted for the post he fills. We know not how his place could be supplied if it were vacated. The editor, like the poet, is born—not made. Neither the training of schools, nor the experience of the world would fit an individual for the editorial chair, if he did not possess those innate qualities, that tact and that instantaneous and intuitive perception which are required in the profession. Since the inauguration of the "Spirit," other journals on the same plan have been started, but they have all languished and failed from the lack of the peculiar talent requisite in their conductors. The subject of our sketch was born in Vermont, and received a good education, which he improved by assiduous self-culture. Of his brothers, the eldest, Dr. T. O. Porter, was a gentleman of rare literary attainment, and of vigorous intellect. Some ten or twelve years ago, in connection with N. P. Willis, he started in New York a weekly literary paper called the "Corsair," a journal of marked ability, and which would have met with great pecuniary success, had not its projectors at an early period abandoned their enterprise. Dr. Porter was a constant contributor to the "Spirit of the Times." He died a few years since, lamented by a very large circle of friends and acquaintances. Another brother, George, also a man of brilliant intellect and extraordinary ability, a polished, ready and sparkling writer, was, for some time, connected with the "Spirit." He left it for the "Picayune," and died in the city of New Orleans, some five years since. The youngest brother, Frank Porter, was formerly connected with the revenue service in New York, then a valued attaché to his brother William's paper, and finally, on the death of George Porter, for some time local reporter of the New Orleans Picayune. Failing health induced him to visit Europe, in the hope of recovery, but he came back to New Orleans, unimproved by his continental tour, and there died. The subject of our sketch, some thirty years ago, was foreman of a printing office in New York, and in that capacity, engaged as a compositor Horace Greeley, then a verdant country youth, seeking employment in the Empire City. It is about twenty-five years since Mr. Porter took charge of the "Spirit of the Times," established, if we remember right, by Mr. Charles J. B. Fisher, on the model of Bell's "Life in London." It is as the successful conductor of a brilliant American journal of a peculiar character that he is known to the world. In private life, Mr. Porter is endeared to a large circle of friends, by the possession of those amiable and gentlemanly qualities which never fail to command respect and affection. In spite of the exacting character of his duties, he always finds time to answer the calls of friendship, and to delight the social circle by his wit, humor and gaiety. Long may he live to preside over "the feast of reason and the flow of soul!"

MUSIC ON THE COMMON.

During the present season, our beautiful Common has been rendered doubly attractive, on fine evenings, by the performance of excellent music by our principal bands, which are not surpassed by those of any city in the Union. The practice was inaugurated many years ago, and after an interval, resumed some summers since. Our artist, Mr. Champney, has sketched the scene presented on the hill near the pond on one of these occasions. In the centre of the picture, among the trees, are the staging and the band. Grouped around the base, standing, or promenading, are representatives of all classes of our population. There are the Beacon Street millionaire and the Boston mechanic, the servant girl out on leave of absence with her beau, and the belle with her accepted, old gentlemen and young gentlemen, nursery maids with children in little hand-carriages, and schoolboys almost too frolicsome to attend to the music. Barring a little noise from the juveniles, which must be expected, the utmost order and decorum prevail, and there are unmistakable influences of the power of music in the hushed attention which enchains the multitude during the performance of some fine piece, and the rapturous applause that bursts forth at its close. The example of Boston has been imitated in some of the suburban settlements. Indeed the performance of music on summer evenings in public places has become quite common in our large towns, and we have no doubt that in a few years we shall rival Germany in this respect.

WM. T. PORTER, EDITOR OF THE "SPIRIT OF THE TIMES."

A ROUGE DETECTOR.

It was lately remarked that an exceedingly brilliant auditory, amongst which were many very elegantly-dressed ladies, attended, at Berlin, a lecture on chemistry, delivered by one of the most celebrated chemists of the age. After witnessing a number of beautiful experiments, and hearing of the marvels of science, a lady grew fatigued, and requested her husband to lead her from the hall.

"My love," said the gentleman, on reaching the landing-place outside, "wipe your cheek; there's a large blue spot upon it."

The lady, much surprised, turned to look at her reflection in the mirrored window of the shop they were passing, and was almost petrified to observe the rouge on her cheeks had become blue, in consequence of the chemical decomposition occasioned by the gas the professor had used in making his experiment. She quickly wiped her face, and stifled her vexation in the thought that she should find herself amply revenged upon the other ladies in the hall. In reality, the lecture closing at the moment, the audience began to disperse, and the gentleman and his wife almost burst with laughter at the sight of cheeks of yellow, blue, black, violet and other colors, which now made their appearance in the street. Some of the ladies who had manufactured for themselves ivory complexions, rosy cheeks, coral lips and ebony eyebrows, were so transformed that they would have excited the envy of the peacock. It is whispered that a lecture from the professor would produce similar effects in other cities besides Berlin.—Paris Letter.

A SERF'S LOVE.

Some years ago, a Russian nobleman was travelling on special business, in the interior of Russia. It was the beginning of winter, but the frost had set in early. His carriage rolled up to an inn, and he demanded a relay of horses to carry him on to the next station, where he intended to spend the night. The innkeeper entreated him not to proceed; for he said there was danger in travelling so late,—the wolves were out. But the nobleman thought the man merely wished to keep him as a guest; he said it was too early for wolves, and ordered the horses to be put to. He then drove off with his wife and his only daughter inside the carriage with him. On the box of the carriage was a serf, who had been born on the nobleman's estate, to whom he was much attached, and who loved his master as he loved his own life. They rolled over the hardened snow, and there seemed no signs of danger. The moon shed her pale light, and brought out into burnished silver the road on which they were going. At length the little girl said to her father: "What was that strange howling sound that I just heard?"

"O, nothing but the wind sighing through the forest trees," replied the father.

The child shut her eyes, and was quiet. But soon she said again: "Listen, father; it is not like the wind, I think."

The father listened; and far, far away, in the distances behind him, through the clear, cold, frosty air, he heard a noise which he too well knew the meaning of. He then put down the window, and spoke to his servant: "The wolves, I fear, are after us; make haste. Tell the man to drive faster, and get your pistols ready." The postilion drove faster. But the same mournful sound which the child had heard approached nearer and nearer. It was quite clear that a pack of wolves had scented them out. The nobleman tried to calm the anxious fears of his wife and child. At last the baying of the pack was distinctly heard. So he said to his servant: "When they come up with us, do you single out one, and fire, and I will single out another; and while the rest are devouring them, we shall get on."

As soon as he put down the window, he saw the pack in full cry behind, the large dog wolf at their head. Two shots were fired, and two of the wolves fell. The others instantly set upon them, and devoured them; and meanwhile the carriage gained ground. But the taste of blood only made them more furious, and they were soon up with the carriage again. Again two shots were fired, and two fell, and were devoured. But the carriage was speedily overtaken, and the post-house was yet far distant. The nobleman then ordered the postilion to loose one of his leaders, that they might gain a little time. This was done, and the poor horse plunged frantically into the forest and the wolves after him, and was soon torn to pieces. Then another horse was sent off, and shared the same fate. The carriage labored on as fast as it could with the two remaining horses; but the post-house was still distant. At length the servant said to the master: "I have served you ever since I was a child; I love you as well as my own self. Nothing now can save you but one thing. Let me save you. I ask you only to look after my wife and little ones." The nobleman remonstrated, but in vain. When the wolves next came up, the faithful servant threw himself against them. The panting horses galloped on with the carriage, and the gates of the post-house just closed in upon it, as the fearful pack were on the point of making the last fatal attack. But the travellers were safe! The next morning they went out, and saw the place where the faithful servant had been pulled down by the wolves. His bones only were there. And on the spot the nobleman erected a wooden pillar, on which is written, "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend." "But God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us."—Russian Sketches.

MUTUAL FORFEARANCE.

The house will be kept in turmoil where there is no toleration of each other's errors, no levity shown to failings, no meek submission to injuries, no soft answer to turn away wrath. If you lay a single stick of wood in the grate and apply fire to it, it will go out; put on another stick, and they will burn; and half a dozen, and you will have a blaze. There are other fires subject to the same condition. If one member of a family gets into a passion, and is left alone, he will cool down, and possibly be ashamed and repent. But oppose temper to temper, let one harsh answer be followed by another, and there will soon be a blaze which will envelop them all in its burning heat.—Hints for the Family.

PROMENADE CONCERTS ON BOSTON COMMON.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL.

THE CHEAPEST WEEKLY PAPER IN THE WORLD.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
FRANCIS A. DUBVAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

PEACE THE POLICY OF NATIONS.

This doctrine is, we believe, in spite of recent events, beginning to be recognized by the Christian nations of the earth. The Eastern war, with the grandeur and glory of its combats, awakened little or no enthusiasm among the nations whose military representatives won the greatest laurels on the battle-field. And with this feeling among the masses, of disinclination to war, and indifference to its lurid glories, governments will find it difficult to engage in hostilities from no better motive than national pride, regardless of what is right and what is wrong. The difficulties between Great Britain and this country, they transpired only a few years back, would certainly have produced a collision. It will not do to say that a consciousness of wrong on the part of Great Britain would have held back her hand. She has been accustomed to strike when her pride was wounded, without asking whether her cause was right or wrong, and relying on the blind patriotism of her gallant children for support. But the British government, like other enlightened governments, now see that they must present reasons to their people, as well as to their opponents, before rushing into strife. There is no lack of gallantry on the part of the British of to-day—they are as bold and heroic as were their forefathers who fought at Agincourt, or their fathers who charged at Waterloo. But only a sense of intolerable wrong will drive them to take up arms against a country whose sons boast of the same lineage and language, and whose interests are so closely interwoven, that a blow struck at one nation is felt throughout the other. The British, like ourselves, recognize the great truth that high-minded diplomacy is fully adequate to settle the differences of nations, while war rarely succeeds in fully accomplishing the same purpose.

EDUCATION.—The general diffusion of education in this country has often excited the admiration of foreigners. When Lord Morpeth visited Lowell, a few years ago, he happened to be in the mills on pay-day, when the operatives were signing the roll. "What! do your operatives write?" asked his lordship. "Certainly, sir," said the clerk, "all Americans write." "At this moment, a man stepped up and made his mark." "Ah!" said his lordship, with a smile, "I thought you said all wrote!"—"All Americans," replied the clerk; "that man was an Englishman."

PERFECTLY CLEAR.—"Fellow-citizens," said a Fourth of July orator, "I repeat the declaration, I do not believe there is a man, woman or child in this house, who has reached the age of fifty years, but what has felt this truth thundering through their brains centuries ago!"

SPLINTERS.

.... The diadem worn by the Empress Eugenie at her baby's christening cost three million dollars. Rather expensive dressing!

.... Bayard Taylor, not finding this climate cool enough, will pass the ensuing winter in Lapland.

.... We long to hear of the victories of the American racers, Lecompte, Prior and Prioresse on the English turf.

.... Louis Napoleon proposes to give the daughters of Louis Philippe 20,000 francs each as a marriage portion.

.... John Curden, in prison for forcibly abducting an heiress, will probably be elected to the English parliament.

.... A patent machine boot and shoe company is announced in London, with a capital of £120,000.

.... The performances of the large graduating class at Harvard College this year were of a high literary character.

.... Mr. Godard's horse endures his balloon ascensions like a very sensible, patient and courageous quadruped.

.... The French prince imperial wore a blue slip at his christening. There may be another slip before he becomes emperor.

.... The ceremonies at the laying of the corner-stone of the "Sailors' Snug Harbor" at Germantown, Quincy, were interesting.

.... The United States steamship Merrimac is now undergoing repairs in the dry dock, Charlestown navy yard.

.... Two of the wheel mills of the Hazard Powder Company lately exploded, injuring three men.

.... There are thirty captains, thirty-eight commanders and thirty-two lieutenants U. S. N. on leave or waiting orders.

.... Another old lady gone—Mrs. Elizabeth Green, of Natchez, aged one hundred and eight years.

.... A few days since, on the Buffalo Central Railroad, they ran a train of 220 cars loaded with flour.

.... They have had hotter weather than ourselves in Vienna, Austria—thermometer 104 degrees.

.... The Mobile and Ohio Railroad has been completed lately to Macon, (Miss.); distance, in round numbers, 200 miles.

.... A statue of Christ, cut out of a block of ivory, the work of the 11th century, has lately been found in Andalusia, Spain.

.... John Brougham has been quite successful in his management of the Bowery Theatre, New York.

.... A splendid service of plate was lately given by the stockholders of the Boston Theatre, to the manager's bride.

.... Count de Bombelles, the third husband of Maria Louisa, widow of Napoleon I., lately died in obscurity in France.

.... Harrison Millard, now in London, writes in warm terms of the transcendent abilities of Ristori, the tragedienne.

.... Mr. Marion, who ascended in a balloon from Poughkeepsie, New York, travelled 70 miles in an hour and a quarter.

HOW AUTHORS LIVE.

Authors are such curious beings, that many of the uninitiated have supposed that they existed in a different manner from mere mortals, either living, like chameleons, upon air, or feeding upon the nectar and ambrosia of the gods. Nothing can be more fallacious. Even the greatest geniuses must condescend to eat, and we can even fancy Shakespeare attacking a venison party with the relish of the veriest clodhopper in Stratford-upon-Avon. Hippocrates, in his "Treatise on Diet," asserts that all men are born with the same mental capacity, but that the differences observed in after life are entirely attributable to diet. Literary men, according to Celsus, have extraordinarily weak stomachs. Some authors have gained a notoriety for singularity in their appetites and diet.

Dr. Rhondelet, a writer on fishes, was immoderately fond of figs, and died of a snuffet produced by eating them to excess, in 1556. The celebrated Dr. Parr had a passion for "hot boiled lobsters." Pope was an epicure. All his lifetime Dr. Johnson had a passion for boiled mutton. "At my aunt Ford's," says he, "I ate so much of a boiled leg of mutton that she used to talk of it." Dryden's favorite dish was a chine of bacon. Lamb was enamored of roast pig. For more than twenty years Dr. George Furdye only ate one meal a day. His reason was, that if one meal a day was enough for a lion, it was enough for a man. To be sure, his single meal was a substantial one, consisting of a pound and a half of rump steak, half a broiled chicken, a plate of fish, a bottle of port, a quarter of a pint of brandy and a tankard of ale.

Baron Maseres, who lived till the age of ninety, used to go one day in every week without eating anything except a slice of dry toast, taken with a single cup of tea. Ariosto was so abstemious that he said he was a "fit person to have lived in the world when the food of mankind was acorns." Thomas Bryon, the author of a "Way to Wealth and Long Life," refrained from eating flesh. Shelley utterly despised the pleasures of the table. Sir Isaac Newton, when he wrote his "Principia," lived on a scanty allowance of bread, water and vegetables, believing that such a diet refined and cleared the intellectual faculties.

Byron nearly starved himself at times, but that was from fear of becoming unpoetically corpulent. Medwin described him as having "starved himself into an unnatural thinness." Many authors have disgraced themselves by intemperance in eating and drinking. Addison's recourse to the bottle as a cure for his taciturnity, finally induced intemperate habits. Goldsmith's usual beverage was a slight decoction of sassafras. Dr. Shaw, the naturalist, drank largely of green tea. Hayley's only stimulant was coffee. Milton used to take a pipe of tobacco and a glass of water just before going to bed. Sir Walter Scott, from whose works a very complete code for life and conduct might be obtained, said, that "greatness of any kind had no greater foe than drinking." And Swift remarks that temperance is a "necessary virtue to great men, since it is the parent of that ease and liberty which are necessary for the improvement of the mind, and which philosophy allows to be one of the greatest felicities of life."

But in old times, the question was not what authors should live upon, but whether they should live at all. Homer was a beggar; Plautus turned a mill; Terence was a slave; Othway died of hunger; Leo in the streets. The "Vicar of Wakefield" was sold for a trifle, to save its author from prison; Savage died in jail; Chatterton committed suicide, and John Keats died of a broken heart.

FISHING.—A great joke upon a greenhorn on a fishing party is to manage by hook or by crook to fasten a salt fish to his hook. This was done ages since by Cleopatra, when she and Mark Antony were fishing together. The Roman who lost the world for love of the "Serpent of the Nile," was much vexed at the trick, and it required extraordinary blandishments to bring back his good humor.

A LOSS.—Science has met with a great loss in the recent death of Professor John Locke, at Cincinnati. He was a native of Maine, and born at Fryeburg, February, 1792. His study of horology in connection with magnetism, led him to invent the famous magnetic clock, now in use at the national observatory in Washington.

THE OPERA.—Max Maretzek is indefatigable. He has leased the New York Academy of Music for three years, at $22,000 a year, and will open it soon with a splendid European company. It would be a great pity if such an enterprise should fail from lack of patronage.

FRIDAY.—Friday is one of the luckiest days in the American calendar. On it Columbus discovered America, the Mayflower landed, George Washington was born and Cornwallis surrendered—to say nothing of other auspicious events occurring that day.

FRANCE.—The people of France are made happy by the prospect of a generous harvest. There is no fear of revolution so long as people get enough to eat.

A MONSTER.—The mammoth steamer now building on the Thames, England, will require seven thousand tons of iron in her construction.

RAILROADS.—Alexander II. is about to cover his immense empire with a perfect network of railroads.

EXTRAVAGANCE.—The extravagant woman burns a wax candle in looking for a lucifer match.

WASHINGTON IN BOSTON.

The last time the father of his country was in Boston, was in 1790. He then passed through the street that now bears his name in its entire length, halting at the old State House, where every preparation had been made to receive him. Its west end was beautifully decorated, and a great multitude assembled at this point. The President was making the tour of the New England States, and, with his travelling companions, rode in a post-chaise drawn by four horses. But he entered the city on horseback, wearing his continental uniform, with his hat off, though the day was cold and one of our inhospitable northeast winds was blowing. He did not bow to the spectators as he passed, but sat on his horse with a calm and dignified air. Dismounting at the old State House, he was ushered into the western balcony, and a long procession defiled before him, whose salutations he courteously and gracefully acknowledged. A triumphal arch was erected across the street at that place, and a choir of singers was stationed there. When Washington came within hearing, he was saluted by the clear, powerful voice of Daniel Rea, who began the ode prepared for the occasion. The President remained in Boston a week, and partook of a public dinner given in his honor. He also dined with Governor Hancock, who then lived in great state in the house still standing in Beacon Street. He also visited the King's Chapel, to hear an oratorio, and then wore a suit of black. Those three places, the Chapel, the old State House, the Hancock house, with Faneuil Hall, are almost the only memorial buildings of the Washington era left standing in our city. From Boston Washington went to Portsmouth, and on the occasion of his departure, he displayed that punctuality for which he was so famous. He had given notice that he should depart at three o'clock in the morning, and accordingly started from the door of his lodging precisely at that hour. His escort, a little behind the times, as usual with large bodies that habitually move slow, arrived a little too late, but overtook the President by a forced march, so that he did not leave the town limits without receiving the honors due his rank and his person.

DOUBLE DEALING.—In Cincinnati, lately, a lady was detected in pocketing a package of gloves in a store. When charged with the theft, she burst into tears and tendered a $20 bill in payment. The merchant took but five dollars and gave her back the change. On counting the cash at night, that $20 bill was found to be a counterfeit.

CALIFORNIA WHEAT.—Mr. Coddell, of Sacramento, has raised in his garden, from seed obtained at Salt Lake City, a few stocks of wheat, each of which bears seven heads.

UNPARDONABLE.—To request a friend to keep cool with the thermometer at 95. It is adding fuel to flame.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. Dr. Gannett, Francis H. Krebs, M. D., to Miss Ellen Elizabeth Curtis; by Rev. Dr. Noyes, Mr. George Noyes to Miss Harriet L. Folger, both of Newburyport; by Rev. Dr. Stow, Mr. Samuel W. Holt to Miss Mary A. Johnson, both of Newburyport; by Rev. Mr. Miner, Mr. Albert T. Whiting to Miss H. Emma Warren; by Rev. Mr. Stone, Mr. Stephen G. Taylor to Miss Mary A. Cobb; by Rev. Dr. Kirk, Mr. David Simpson to Miss Maria Bell—At Melrose, by S. O. Dearborn, Esq., Jeremiah Martin, Esq. to Mrs. Eliza M. Grant—At Quincy, by Rev. Mr. Clark, Mr. George H. Cook to Miss Margaret E. Panton—At Lynn, by Rev. Mr. Smith, Mr. Joseph Rachelle to Miss Martha Jane Woodman; by Rev. Mr. Miller, Mr. Thomas J. Kimball to Miss Susan S. Clark—At Bangor, by Rev. Mr. Brigham, Mr. Samuel L. Green, to Miss Mary A. Worster, Mrs. Anna E. Flagg—At Salem, by Rev. Mr. Cole, Mr. Thomas Cole, of Chicago, Ill., to Miss Annie W. B. Ives—At Gloucester, by Rev. Mr. Parmenter, Mr. William H. Clark to Miss Elizabeth W. Marr—At Clinton, by Rev. Mr. Bowers, Mr. Thomas Fairweather to Miss Lillias Wright—At North Adams, by Rev. Mr. Sanford, Mr. Charles Ballou to Miss Emily Wilbur—At Springfield, by Rev. Mr. Ide, Mr. John L. Hildman to Miss Celia A. Parsons—At Fall River, by Rev. Mr. Brownson, Mr. William Wardlaw to Miss Ellen Birwell.

DEATHS.

In this city, Miss Charlotte B. Chittenden, 18; Mrs. Martha J. Tucker, 51—At Charlestown, Widow Elizabeth Leverett—At Cambridgeport, Mrs. Carolina E., wife of Mr. N. W. C. Jamieson, 34—At Dorchester, Mrs. Sarah B. Bird, 41—At Boston, Mrs. Susan Peck, 29—At North Chelsea, Mrs. Susan E. Ellis—At Waltham, Mrs. Celia Ann, wife of Rev. M. L. Bickford, 37—At East Lexington, Mr. William L. Smith, 52—At Hingham, Samuel Glover, Esq., 55—At Salem, Mr. Francis H. Lefavour, 43; Widow Mary Smith, 81—At Marblehead, Miss Mary O. Dodd, 23—At Danvers, Mrs. Nancy B. Batchelder, 83—At Beverly, Mr. Edward Stone, 74—At East Abington, Mr. George L. Thompson, 35—At Dedham, Mrs. Eliza Jane, wife of Mr. Benjamin Chandler, 34—At West Amesbury, Mrs. Abby A. Rogers, 31—At Worcester, Mrs. Mary E. Flagg, 21—At New Bedford, Mrs. Sarah C. Wadsworth, 31—At Plymouth, Mrs. Mary A., wife of Mr. Ebenezer Nickerson, 53—At East Freetown, Mr. Isaac Patterson, 22—At Dartmouth, Widow Lydia Winslow, 80—At South Dartmouth, Mrs. Sarah Nye Matthews, 35—At Springfield, Mrs. Harriet E. Childs, 38—At Edgartown, Mrs. Fanny S., wife of Rev. James M. Worcester, of Norwich, Conn., 28—At Holyoke, Mr. Hurlburt Parks, 28—At Conway, Mrs. Mary Billing, 85.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL
DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION.

A Record of the beautiful and useful in Art.

This paper presents in the most elegant and available form, a weekly literary melange of notable events of the day. Its columns are devoted to original tales, sketches and poems, by the best AMERICAN authors, and the cream of the domestic and foreign news; the whole well spiced with wit and humor. Each paper is beautifully illustrated with numerous accurate engravings, by eminent artists, of notable objects, current events in all parts of the world, and of most unusual scenes, also giving making-up experience in every country. Its pages contain views of every populous city in the known world, of all buildings of note in the eastern or western hemisphere, of all the principal ships and steamers of the navy at 1 merchant service, with fine and accurate portraits of every noted character in the world, both male and female.

TERMS—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year, $2 00
4 subscribers, " " 10 00
10 " " " 20 00

Any person sending us sixteen subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the recent copy gratis.

* One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, when taken together by one person, one year, for $4.

Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU,
CORNER OF TREMONT AND BRIMFIELD STS., BOSTON.

WHOLESALE AGENTS.—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Winch, 116 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; A. C. Bagley, 102 Vine Street, 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Roy, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; R. K. Woodward, corner of 4th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Ring, Louisville, Kentucky; Trubner & Co., 12 Paternoster Row, London, general agents for Europe.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

TO THE INVISIBLE ONE.

BY ZEPHYR.

There is a dream of early youth
That haunts my memory yet;
It is of thee, beloved one,
And yet we've never met.

I've lingered mid the festive throng
In mansion gay and cot;
I've watched thy coming footsteps long,
And yet I see thee not.

I've wandered in the pathless woods,
For there thou seem'st to be;
The murmuring rills, the pale wild flowers,
Seem all to speak of thee.

O, thou dost love, I know full well,
The quiet forest's shade,
And oft thy spirit wanders forth
Away o'er the flowery glade.

On the mossy brink of the limpid stream
That ripples soft and low,
A shadow form seems ever there—
Beloved, 'tis thine, I know.

And there comes a voice, a gentle voice,
And sweetly blends with mine;
It joins me in my happy song—
O, tell me is it thine?

There came a noble spirit near,
A heart all pure and free;
O, if the universe were mine,
'Twere nothing without thee.

There is a dream of later years,
That I can ne'er forget;
It is of thee, beloved one,
And yet, we've never met.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

TRAVELLING IN ASIA MINOR.

BY DR. J. V. C. SMITH.

Those who have not had either the pleasures or pains which belong to oriental travelling, have but an imperfect idea of the difficulties encountered in ranging over those far-off sections of the world where man first appeared, and from whence they are generally supposed to have migrated over the face of the globe.

While humanity is in the constant condition of progress in the modern countries of Europe, in Asia there is a stability of society almost as permanent as the geological features of the crust of the earth on which cities of ancient renown were located. Civilization commenced early in Asia, and having reached a culminating point some two thousand years ago, in particular sections, rapidly deteriorated to a low estate, in which the present races are found.

Two or three institutions peculiar to oriental life have been sustained through all the changes to which the people have been incident; and they are still, in fact, defying the combined influences of Christianity and example.

One of these is polygamy. Far back as authentic chronicles reach, this unnatural domestic system was in existence. Through the patriarchal ages it was recognized as a privilege, if not a right; and it has been invariably practised by every order of men who have had the occupancy of the land down to our times.

Another oriental feature is its religious tendency. They have always been worshippers of something. If ignorant of the true God, so strongly is the religious element developed, they have idols, heathen deities; and, lastly the crowning faith of Islamism, which was curiously contrived to meet the essential demands of their animal nature under the deception of ministering to the intellectual powers. While the Sidonians, Tyrians, and cognate kingdoms were worshipping Ashtaroth and Moloch, they were distinguished by their intolerance and bigotry. The Druses, the descendants of the Canaanites, whom the Jews could never dislodge from the fastnesses of their much loved Lebanon, are as tenacious of their mystic faith, as their energetic, bold, determined Phœnician ancestors.

Mohammedans, their neighbors, and the last governing race, are religious fanatics; and, if they dared, would exterminate those who presume to differ from their orthodox standard belief. The Jews were intolerant and would be so again, to the utter exclusion of all other denominations of worshippers, had they the power. It is the leading thought with individuals of different blood, that their views are right above all others, on divine subjects, and they would establish them if they could. In perambulating the Orient, it should be therefore remembered not to hold argument with any where a prospect of giving offence might be incurred.

A conversational knowledge of several languages qualifies a traveller to profit by what he sees and hears. If he can neither read nor speak any one besides his own vernacular, it is extremely difficult to acquire the very facts of which he is in pursuit. French and Italian, but the latter especially, are immensely important. Italians have penetrated Asia and Western Africa extensively. Despotism at home drives them off, and they wend their way to very distant points, and are very generally found in the service of pachas and local governors, wherever they can obtain the most for whatever they do—as interpreters, physicians, letter writers, etc. Italian is spoken where French is wholly unknown.

Arabic, of all others is the tongue, to ask questions in through out a large part of that great continent; and in Northern and North-western Africa, far above the third cataract of the Nile, no other language is essential. Arabic is easily acquired by many persons, but, as a general rule, it is hard to master. Children running indifferently among the people, converse fluently enough in it in about a year to express all their wants and emotions. It would be a needless waste of life for a person to study it thoroughly, as a scholar, because the literature of the language does not furnish sufficient worth a translation, or mental gratification to compensate for the trouble. Just enough of it, however, for buying food, inquiring the way, the news, and where objects worth investigating are to be found, including an acquaintance with the money, may be gathered in a few weeks.

Neither taverns, eating nor regularly organized sleeping houses are known to the Orientals. In the modern cities, where a caravan trade is carried on with distant towns and provinces, large, low, square buildings are seen, called caravansaries, for the express accommodation of travelling strangers. City caravansaries, ordinarily, are the pious gift of a defunct Mohammedan, who hoped to secure more privileges for these exhibitions of charity towards strangers, than they would otherwise have had in the mansions of the prophet. They have one large door, closed with a rickety gate. On entering, the centre is a hollow square, surrounded on all sides by the edifice. Small rooms open from the square, into which the stranger enters for repose, after securing his animals in the court. Neither bedding, furniture, light, water nor fire are provided. Vermin and filth put all other habitations at defiance. The traveller carries in his luggage, cooks as he can, sleeps if he dare to, and in the morning pays a small fee to the janitor, and resumes his journey.

On arriving at any point from whence a departure inland is prepared, provided the arrival is made by water, an Arab, Persian, Armenian or Turk, according to the country, must be sought out, who has horses or camels for hire. Enough are always ready to commence any jaunt. After agreeing upon the price by the day—and, hy-the-by, they drive sharp bargains—a stock of provisions is next to be purchased. A mattress for a bed, a blanket of a color not to offend by its appearance a few weeks after, to cover yourself over with, make very good cushions for the horrible saddles during the day.

Two travellers require as many as four horses, and five would not be too many. The same number of camels are necessary, if they are to be put in requisition. The owner goes with them as groom, to feed and otherwise take care of them. One horse carries bags or baskets slung at his side with the cooking apparatus and the standard articles of food. In making up a list of necessities to start with—if procurable, there should be salt, sugar, coffee, tea, hard bread, knives, spoons, forks, various kinds of dishes, which, for economy, should be of tin, because they are then both light and durable. Earthen ware would be worse than none. Articles above mentioned should be secured either in tin or wooden boxes. Prepared meats, hermetically sealed, are excellent. They are generally for sale at Cairo and Alexandria in Egypt; Sidon, Tyre and Jaffa in Palestine; and at Smyrna, Constantinople, Odessa, and everywhere in the ports of India, where they are sent by the manufacturers. The only drawback in regard to these prepared meats is their dearthness.

Another horse or camel, as the case may be, is laden with grain, barley or beans, purchased as they can be found on the way, to feed the caravan. Two others are expressly for riding by the travellers, and a fifth horse is a servant of all work, to be occasionally mounted by the owner or carry luggage.

In going from settlement to settlement, eggs, fowls, meats, milk and fruits are purchased as they can be had. If the jaunt is commenced in Egypt to go through the Levant to the Holy Land, to the forsaken city Petra, Mount Sinai—to the emerald mines—or on the Libyan desert to the temple of Jupiter, the Fahoom, and other notable places, water must be carried for daily use. Out of the country of the pyramids, water is generally found in abundance.

A custom of long standing is to start about four o'clock in the morning. If a tent is taken along, it imposes extra labor night and morning to set it up and take it down—besides the contingency of losing and breaking the pins inconveniently often. A kind of breakfast is taken—such as a bad cup of coffee, boiled eggs, etc.—if fire enough can be had to prepare them. While riding through the day, eating becomes a regular business. Each one is disposed to nibble whatever is most readily come-at-able. About four o'clock in the afternoon, the muleteer or sheik, or whoever goes to show the way, comes to a halt. The animals are unladen, fed, hampered by fetters, if horses, and made fast to a stake. Camels are bidden to lie down, when one foreleg is doubled upon itself, and hampered with a noose of rope to prevent it from being extended again until the following morning. They are then fed, lying down. If they get up, it is difficult to stray far on three legs. A good dinner is the next undertaking. Dishes are wiped—never very nicely washed, then smoking, and lastly journals and letters occupy the time till the weary sojourner requires rest. A paper lantern, which folds up compactly, and a good stock of matches and candles are indispensable, whether lodged under a tent, a caravansary, or the hut of a fellah.

This is the universal mode of travelling in the several countries of the fascinating Orient. It is certainly fascinating to the scholar and those having an antiquarian taste.

Lastly, there is one more necessary, not to be omitted, because it is the power that moves the caravan and commands personal service. It is money. Go where the traveller may, its potency is perfectly understood. By a letter of credit taken in Paris or London, the currency of the country may readily be had of the money changers. They are glad to obtain bills on those cities. This remark holds good in respect to commercial places. In departing inland from them, a supply must be carried to meet all expenses. Never pay more than one-third in advance for horses or camels, lest, having the cash, the fellow might leave you when least expected, in a dilemma. Make the remainder payable on reaching the point he stipulated to gain.

It is a safe provision to have a belt round the body with some fifty or sixty dollars in gold, to fall back upon in any emergency. French Napoleons, English sovereigns and Turkish twenty-piaster gold pieces pass everywhere in the East far above their par value, on account of their purity. Several times I had occasion to draw upon the concealed bank, when, without it, both myself and companion would have been exceedingly embarrassed.

Further, always carry as much as a quart of paras, or the smallest copper coin, for presents and backsheish. Pay the people to the utmost farthing agreed upon, and unless you then give them backsheish, meaning a present, over and above, the fat is in the fire, and irreconcilable difficulties would arise between parties.

A fowling-piece, or a small, compact rifle, with ammunition, is desirable, both for a show of what could be done in case of an emergency in some particular places, as well as for taking game. It is never advisable, however, in any misunderstanding with the people, to make a demonstration of what you could do, if you chose, with powder and bullets. To my apprehension, it is invariably safer and more prudent to be without guns or pistols of any sort, than to have them. I once cocked an old horse-pistol hanging at my saddle knob, to a group of brutal Arab boys in Samaria, who were stoning us from the top of a high bank above the narrow path we were passing over, single file. It was not loaded, nor would it have been cocked, had it been. However, they presumed it was, and their muscular vengeance was exercised accordingly, to our alarm.

No roads are traceable in any direction. There are paths, or trails, but in a shocking condition, as a general rule. Without a guide, it would be impossible to get through the interior at all. Even under the charge of practised leaders, they occasionally become puzzled, and we were obliged to retrace our steps for miles, and take a new departure.

Arab sheiks who go on these tours with travellers, as well as professed couriers in Syria, are very unwilling to allow you to stop for the examination of ruins. Be careful, therefore, to stipulate in the contract, which should be written, that as much time as may be satisfactory, shall be taken for inspections. Otherwise, a main object of voluntarily submitting to the hardships of oriental travelling, would be lost.

Writing materials and fine paper complete the catalogue, in connection with the preceding directions, of what is necessary and certainly convenient for making extensive explorations in the far-off Orient.

A RIDE ON AN ELEPHANT.

The rajah had kept his promise, and his big she-elephant had already arrived. She knelt, at the keeper's command, and a small ladder was placed against her side, that I might climb upon the pad, as I had been unable to borrow a howdah. I had a package of bread and cold roast beef, to serve me as a tiffin, but was careful to conceal it from the driver, otherwise himself and the elephant, with all her trappings, must have undergone purification on account of the unclean flesh. I took a reluctant leave of Mr. Keene, seated myself astride on the pad, with the driver before me on the elephant's neck, and we moved off. The driver was a Sikh, in a clean white and scarlet dress, and a narrow handkerchief bound around his head. His long, well-combed locks were anointed with butter, and, as his head was just under my nose, I was continually regaled with the unctuous odors. He carried a short iron spike, with which he occasionally punched the elephant's head, causing her to snort and throw up her trunk as she quickened her pace. I found the motion very much like that of a large dromedary, and by no means unpleasant or fatiguing. Though walking, she went at the rate of about five miles an hour. I noticed that the driver frequently spoke to her in a quiet, conversational tone, making remarks about the roads, and advising her how to proceed—all of which she seemed to understand perfectly, and obeyed without hesitation.—Bayard Taylor.

PUNCH ON HEADACHE.

The female headaches are innumerable, but they arise principally from vexation and disappointment. They may be divided into "nervous" and "sick" headaches. The nervous is irritable, and cannot bear being spoken to; the sick is despondent, or sulky, and bursts into tears at the least contradiction. When a lady cannot have her own way, a headache is the painful consequence. An unpopular visitor brought home accidentally to dinner, will produce an alarming attack of headache, and the symptoms that successively follow are instant loss of appetite, deafness, peevishness, hysteria, and finally a precipitate retreat to the bedroom. The poor servants feel the effects of the headache as much as any one, and do not stop in the room longer than they can help. These unfortunate headaches are very frequent about that time of the year when every one is, or is supposed to be, out of town, and do not cease until the patient has been carried to the sea-side for a change of air. The milder forms will vanish upon the application of a piece of jewelry; or if the forehead is wrapped up in a new shawl, it is astonishing with what rapidity the pain disappears. Sometimes a shifting of the scene is requisite, and thus a box at the opera has been known to produce an instantaneous cure, even when the headache in question has been of the most stanning description, and the opera played has been one of Verdi's!—Punch.

CURIOUS DIRECTIONS FOR A YOUNG LADY'S DRESS.—Let your earrings be attention, encircled by the pearls of refinement. Let the diamonds of your necklace be truth, and the chain of Christianity. Let your bracelets be charity, ornamented with the pearls of gentleness. Let your bosom-pin be modesty, set with compassion. Let your finger-rings be affection, set with the diamonds of industry. Let your girdle be simplicity, with a tassel of good humor. Let your garb be virtue—your drapery politeness. Let your shoes be wisdom, secured with the buckles of perseverance.—Troy Budget.

EDITORIAL MELANGE.

A piano forte has recently been manufactured in California, being the first made in the United States west of the Rocky Mountains. In the "Life of Wilberforce," is the following entry in his diary—"Went to hear Mr. Foster. Felt much devotion, and wondered at a man who fell asleep during the psalms. During the sermon went to sleep myself!"—The number of the inhabitants of a city is almost renewed every thirty years. The editor of the Norfolk American has heard of a bet, made a few days ago, which is something decidedly novel. Two politicians have bet each other a cord of wood—the loser to buy the wood, have it carried to the owner's house, saw it, and then take it in. The healthiest children are those born in the months of January, February and March. Mr. G. H. Davenport, of Farmington Falls, Me., on the 17th of June, pegged and soled 30 pairs of double soled men's shoes, in 12 hours and 35 minutes, and went to his meals. The pegs driven amount to 18,000. The time occupied upon a shoe averaged 13 minutes. There is a Chinese in San Francisco who was steward to Napoleon at St. Helena in 1815. He is engaged in importing from China, and in general merchandizing. The American Institute Fair will be held this year in the Crystal Palace, New York, commencing September 20th, and be continued until November 1st. The Institute pay $3000 for the use of the building. It is admirably adapted to the purpose, its vast dimensions enabling everything to be displayed to the greatest advantage. Eggs can be preserved any length of time if covered with two coats of mucilage of gum arabic. Life spent without any fixed aim, is compared by an old poet, to "throwing buckets into empty wells, and growing old in drawing nothing up." It is said that we possess in this country a larger number of effective cannon, of the latest construction, than all Europe combined. The U. S. government has twelve large depots for arms, besides two national armories which manufacture them. In these depots there are 142,000 stand of small arms, guns, pistols, carbines, exclusive of the number issued to the arsenals of the various States and the supply of the army. It is said that Indianapolis contains churches enough to comfortably seat its entire population. It is a singular fact that the report of a criminal trial is the best item of news that can be produced to sell a newspaper. During the Webster trial in this city, one or two of the papers nearly doubled their circulation. The fewest deaths take place in November, December and February. The Roman Empire in the zenith of its glory, did not contain more than three millions of square miles. The United States now covers more than this area, and is larger than Rome was when she was called the mistress of the world. Providence never deviates to form a hero, but with the purpose to scourge the world, was the saying of Gustavus Adolphus, himself a hero. Misers are like patent-leather boots—the longer they last the tighter they become. A slight solution of gum arabic, introduced into the eye, is said to be an excellent means of removing any dust or other substance that may get into that delicate organ. A gentleman complains in the advertising columns of the "Times"—"I have the most beautiful horse in England, but not the most beautiful lady. Your silence pains me deeply. I cannot forget you, M." The Lynchburg Virginian states that three hogheads of tobacco were sold in that city, a few days since, at the enormous average of sixty-four dollars and ninety-one cents per hundred—the best one bringing the unprecedented price of one hundred and fifty dollars! A church bell is one of the few good things that will bear being tolled frequently to the same folks.

A DOVE IN CHURCH.—During the communion service at one of our city churches, lately, a dove flew in at the window, and alighting on the pulpit, remained there quietly during the whole of the sacramental service. A similar incident furnished the theme for one of Charles Sprague's most beautiful effusions, the "Winged Worshipers."

A PREACHER A CENTURY OLD.—Elder Marshall, a colored man, 101 years old, a resident of Georgia, preached in one of the Baptist churches of New York city, recently. He is described as robust and hearty, weighing about two hundred pounds, and having a full-toned voice, and a manner far from disagreeable.

ANOTHER RELIC.—Amongst the presents brought from Rome to Paris, by Cardinal Patrizi, who was the Pope's representative at the christening of the royal babe Napoleon, is a relic said to be a piece of our Saviour's cradle, studded with diamonds. Our version of the Bible reads that he was cradled in a manger.

OHIO WINE CROP.—The vintage is 500,000 gallons. The quantity bottled by N. Longworth, of Cincinnati, this season, is 150,000 bottles, and with that added to his former stock, he has now in cellar full 300,000 bottles, mostly quarts, of which 20,000 are of Isabella.

AN EXPENSIVE MACHINE.—The silver-plated fire-engine, for the city of San Francisco, Cal., is now on exhibition at Hummman & Co.'s Works, Roxbury, costing $5000; the silver is worth $3000, and the other work cost $5000.

RETURNING HOME.—Boston machinists who spent their winters on the plantations in Cuba, are returning home, bringing with them an unusual amount of orders for machinery.

ART IN ROME.—There are said to be more artists now in Rome than before the revolution—there being 224 painters, 103 sculptors, and 144 engravers.

Wayside Gatherings.

There is a story of the discovery of wonderful gold deposits on a mountain at Santa Catalina, in Lower California.

T. Buchanan Read, the artist, has just married at Northampton, Mrs. Butler, the author of the "Old Farm," for his second wife.

The towns of Haverhill, Piermont, Oxford, Warren and Benton, N. H., have offered $500 in bounties to slayers of wolves, bears and wild cats.

An interesting trial of fire engines is to come off in New Haven this fall. The first prize is a new fire engine, in complete running order, worth fifteen hundred dollars—the victors to take her home with them.

Mr. E. P. Ransom, a school teacher in Newburyport, has received, and will accept, an invitation to become superintendent of schools in Springfield, Ohio.

Large quantities of Irish potatoes have sought a market in Chicago from New York this season, and the other day white beans were sold to go to Galena.

Respect for woman, says a Frenchman, requires us never to doubt a word of what she utters; self-respect requires us never to believe a word of what she says.

A fight between a black snake and a weasel at Rochester, N.Y., terminated in the triumph of the weasel, which caught the snake by the throat and killed it.

There are five candidates for the Presidency now in the field—Buchanan, Fremont, Fillmore, Stockton, and Gerritt Smith. This accommodates nearly every shade of politics.

A fine opera company will open this season at Niblo's early in September. It is a German enterprise, but Italian and French opera will also be given.

The Newark Advertiser states that a woman named Brown has been arrested in Camden for attempting to poison her husband with nux vomica. They had been but recently married.

The squirrels in Independence square, Philadelphia, had an indignation meeting recently, on the subject of torch-light processions, rockets, fire-crackers, and noise in general.

Joost Bobbly, of Union, N. J., died recently, from a singular disease, known as the closing of the stomach. He literally starved from the impossibility of getting food into his stomach.

The Norwegians are emigrating to this country in great numbers, and they are a desirable class of emigrants. There are eight Norwegian ships now on the ocean, with 1600 emigrants for the United States.

A bear belonging to a circus company escaped from his cage at Saratoga, and showed fight, when the keeper thrust an iron bar down his throat—ending the contest, and it is thought the life of the bear also.

A brass propeller for U. S. steamer Roanoke was cast at Richmond, Va., lately, weighing 27,000 pounds, and said to be 1000 pounds larger than any other composition casting ever made in the United States.

It is proposed to vote, this year, the sum of £10,000, as a contribution in respect of the revenue derived from the British Crown estates in the metropolis, towards the formation of a fund for the building of additional churches and parsonages in London.

Under the very appropriate caption "Love's Labor Lost," a New York paper mentions that a serenading party, the other night, after having played before a house nearly an hour, were politely informed by a watchman, that "Nobody lived there!"

A Philadelphia painter has introduced a new style of sign-painting which is novel and beautiful. The lettering and figures are done with pearl upon glass, and they are as richly ornamented as the fancy of the operator and the combination of colors can make them.

The Amherst Express tells of a dog belonging to Enos Williams of that town, who, seeing a shovel fall unobserved from his master's wagon, on the public road, watched over it for twenty-four hours, till his owner missing him, made search and recovered both dog and shovel.

A Costa-Rican railroad has been suggested by some English capitalists, who have made a contract for the construction of ten miles of it. It is to extend from San Jose, the capital, to the Pacific, and will be another highway to California and the western coast.

It is said that the steamer Lexington, which was burned in the Sound in 1837, had $18,000 on board, which has never been recovered. An effort is to be made to raise the treasure if possible. The wreck lies in ninety feet of water, and the specie is in an accessible place.

Catherine Alberti, a beggar and fortune-teller, died in Raleigh, N. C., a few weeks ago. On examining her effects $2600 in gold, notes and silver were found, together with evidence of her owning a plantation in Kentucky, and twenty shares of railroad stock. Around her body was a belt full of gold coin.

On the 28th ult., while a large party were busily discussing the merits of a sumptuous dinner at the Merchant's Hotel, St. Paul, Minnesota, the floor suddenly gave way, and the whole party, with the well-loaded table, made a rapid descent into the cellar. Fortunately no person was seriously injured.

On the 4th ult., a man named Jameson, leaped into the Scioto River, at Columbus, Ohio, from the National Road Bridge, a height of 33 feet, and swam ashore, when another individual, named Fielding Thomas, being slightly intoxicated, undertook the same feat, but falling upon his back, was killed by the shock.

A letter dated Antigua, W. I., June 18, states that the sugar making season was nearly over, and the yield had been most prolific. There had been sent to England and Belgium fully 39,000 hogheads, and 1400 hogheads molasses, and about the same quantity to the United States. The health of the island was good.

An old lady belonging to a distinguished aristocratic family, one of the members of which was one of the most eminent ministers of the Restoration, was recently tried by the Tribunal of Correctional Police, at Paris, for mendacity. It was proved that she had for a long time frequented churches, and especially the Madeleine, to beg.

French chemists are devoting themselves assiduously to discover, if possible, cheap and improved processes for obtaining aluminum, and it is thought that their efforts will be crowned with complete success. The celebrated chemists, MM. Rose and Deville, have recently effected some improvements in treating solutions of aluminum, but they are still troublesome and expensive.

The amount of property, in bank bills and gold, recovered from the safe of the American Express Company, sunk in Lake Erie, was $32,000. The paper, since drying, is as fresh and fair as when lost the signatures being plain and distinct. The bills of lading, which were also in the safe, says the Buffalo Commercial, show the writing upon them plainly, even to pencil marks.

Foreign Items.

The Sultan has made a magnificent present to Miss Nightingale. Ascot races have been very gay this year. The queen was present with her reputed son-in-law.

The total cost of the Russian war to Great Britain is now said to be twenty thousand lives and eighty million pounds sterling.

Herr Alhorn, the sculptor who executed the celebrated lion, modelled by Thorwaldsen, and carved out of the solid rock, at Lincerne, died lately at Constance.

The London Gazette contains an official notice, declaring Dr. Rae and his companions entitled to the reward of £10,000 offered to those who should first ascertain the fate of Sir John Franklin.

William Vincent Wallace, the composer, has become entirely blind through intense application, and has been impelled to abandon his profession, and place himself under the hands of the first optical surgeon in London.

A quantity of artins, coins, vases, etc., have been discovered on the island of Gotland, in the Baltic Sea. They are believed to have belonged to a noted pirate named Sarka, who died at the beginning of the eleventh century.

The Egyptian government having of late years opened up some rich quarries of Oriental alabaster, great quantities are now being sent to Italy for the purpose of making vases. The color of this alabaster is very beautiful, and it is very translucent.

John P. Groves, the young Boston violinist, who is in Europe completing his musical education, has advanced even beyond the warmest expectation of his friends. He is located at Brussels, and is under the instruction of Leonard, who is much interested in him. He is pronounced the best violinist in the conservatoire at Brussels.

Sands of Gold.

... Ferments of the worst kind succeed to perfect inaction.—Bishop Berkeley.

... There's not one wise man among twenty will praise himself.—Shakespeare.

... Wit will never make a man rich; but there are places where riches will always make a wit.—Johnson.

... When men grow virtuous in their old age, they only make a sacrifice to God of the devil's leavings.—Pope.

... The fawning courtier and the surly squire often mean the same thing—each his own interest.—Bishop Berkeley.

... Wisdom consists, not in seeing what is directly before us, but in discerning those things which may come to pass.—Terence.

... The stoical scheme of supplying our wants by lopping off our desires, is like cutting off our feet when we want shoes.—Smyth.

... It is usually seen, that the wiser men are about the things of this world, the less wise they are about the things of the next.—Gilson.

... He who tells a lie is not sensible how great a task he undertakes; for he must be forced to invent twenty more to maintain one.—Pope.

... Whoever is an imitator by nature, choice, or necessity, has nothing stable; the flexibility which affords this aptitude is inconsistent with strength.—Landor.

... If your friend is in want, don't carry him to the tavern, where you treat yourself as well as him, and entail a thirst and headache upon him next morning. Put something in his pocket.—Tom Brown.

Joker's Budget.

Put the strongest minded woman in a bonnet shop, and it will instantly turn her head!

"Hog or dog?—that's the question," as the fellow said when he sat down to a dish of fried sausages.

Some one says that the municipal arrangements are so strict in the Arctic regions, that Dr. Kane was kept from going farther by the North Pole-ice!

What a suspicious monster the man must have been who first invented a lock; but what a trusting creature the woman who first allowed a latch-key.

A correspondent of the Lewiston Falls Journal says, "I paid a short but very pleasant visit to a neighbor's cow yesterday." Wonder if he stopped to tea, and took cream!

Parson Gulbin says men lose much by being communicative in their matters of business. He says: "Always keep shady; if you see a sixpence on the ground, put your foot on it straight." The parson aims of the sort of people that are scarce now-a-days.

The writer of the following is envious as well as impatient:

Men seem to kiss among themselves,
And scarce will kiss a brother;
Women oft want to kiss so each,
They snack and kiss each other.

In chemistry, the best way to separate two bodies is to introduce a third. The same holds true in other departments. To increase the distance between a pair of lovers, all that's required is to let little Willie walk into the "back parlor," with a lighted candle in his hand.

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

An elegant, moral and refined Miscellaneous Family Journal, devoted to polite literature, wit and humor, prose and poetic gems, and original tales, written expressly for the paper. In politics, and on all sectarian questions, it is strictly neutral; therefore making it emphatically a PAPER FOR THE MILLION, and a welcome visitor to the home circle.

It contains the foreign and domestic news of the day, so condensed as to present the greatest possible amount of intelligence. No advertisements are admitted to the paper, thus offering the entire sheet, which is of the maximum size, for the instruction and amusement of the general reader. An unrivalled corps of contributors are regularly engaged, and every department is under the most finished and perfect system that experience can suggest, forming an original paper, the present circulation of which far exceeds that of any other weekly paper in the Union, with the exception of "BALLOU'S PICTORIAL."

Sample copies sent when desired.

TERMS—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year..... $2 00
4 subscribers, " "..... 7 00
10 " " "..... 15 00

Any person sending us sixteen subscribers at the last rate, shall receive this seventeenth copy gratis.

One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, $4 per annum. Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU, Corner of Tremont and Bromfield Sts., Boston, Mass.

WHOLESALE AGENTS—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Winch, 115 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; A. C. Bagley, 102 Vine Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Ross, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Woodward, corner 4th and Chestnut Sts., St. Louis; Samuel Ringgold, Louisville, Ky.; Wallace, Austin & Buck, 25 Clark Street, Chicago, Illinois.

RACHEL'S CHATEAU.

The pretty and unpretending little summer residence delineated in our engraving, is the property of Made-moiselle Rachel, the distinguished French tragic actress, and was purchased by her a short time before her departure for this country on that professional tour which commenced under such brilliant auspices, but terminated so disastrously, in consequence of the mismanagement of her brother, and of her own severe illness. Previous to that time she occupied a splendid residence in Paris, the interior of which was described by those who had the good fortune to visit it, as a marvel of magnificence and art. After purchasing the villa we have shown in our illustration, she broke up her city establishment, and sold at auction her choice furniture, and the numerous objects of art and bijouterie which had been presented to her during her career. These, as may be supposed, realized amounts far beyond their intrinsic value; so that what would have been a sacrifice in most cases, in hers proved a profitable speculation. Since her return to France she has occupied this elegant little chateau, which is planted around with trees, and situated a short distance from Paris, and which has been furnished by her in the same tasteful and recherche style as her former residence. The career of Rachel has been like the page of a romance. From a street ballad singer, wandering from cafe to cafe, and living on the precarious emoluments of an itinerant musician, she has come to be acknowledged as the greatest actress on the stage—we say the greatest, because we do not believe that the reputation of Ristori, her great Italian rival, rests upon a permanent basis.

Whatever might be the local fame of Ristori, we think it is beyond a doubt that her Paris reputation was manufactured for her by those leaders of the public taste who were worn out and exasperated by the caprices and ingratitude of one who was so long at once the idol and the tyrant of the Parisians. It was to mortify and outrage Rachel, that they vied with each other in showering praises on the fair Italian. But Rachel's reputation was not made in a day, and is quite too stable to be thus demolished. She has been crowned as the queen of the drama, not only by her own countrywomen, but by the critical audiences of St. Petersburg, of Vienna, and of London, and, lastly, by those of New York and Boston. No one who has not witnessed her impersonations can form any conception of her power. To those who have not seen her, the praises of her admirers seem hyperbolic; while those who have, feel that language is utterly inadequate to eulogize her sufficiently. Her merit is the greater, since her success is greatest in the cold, classic French drama of the past century, which, with all its beauty of language, its elegance and high finish, is devoid of life. Into these cold forms, however, Rachel, with the intensity of her nature, infused vitality, and created life where she found an inert mass. In Boston, where she met a most critical auditory, she won every heart literally earning the applause she received by the exercise of her wonderful genius. We fear from the latest accounts that she will never regain the health she has lost. At last accounts she had retired to a watering-place for rest.

RACHEL'S CHATEAU, NEAR PARIS.

VICTORIA, QUEEN OF ENGLAND.

QUEEN VICTORIA.

The large engraving on this page is an equestrian portrait of Queen Victoria, after a celebrated statue, noted not only for its intrinsic excellence, but for its faithful likeness of the queen of Great Britain. There was a peculiar fitness in the style of representation, the queen being an accomplished horsewoman, and frequently appearing in public mounted. Thus she lately reviewed the troops at Aldershot on horseback, and in a similar manner passed the review of the Irish militia previous to their disbandment. No sovereign who ever occupied the throne of England has been more popular than Queen Victoria. Unlike many female sovereigns of great countries, she has illustrated her rank by the exhibition of those domestic virtues which win our respect in private life, but are doubly attractive when affording an example in high station. She rules the hearts of our friends on the other side of the Atlantic less as a queen than as a wife and mother. To the loyalty and allegiance paid to the ruler of a mighty empire is added the homage which chivalrous natures pay to the high-minded and virtuous woman. Whatever may be the "divinity that doth hedge a king," and the enchantment that distance lends to the view, Queen Victoria has certainly never sought to inspire awe and reverence by entrenching herself within the narrow limits of rank. On the contrary, she appears frequently in public with no more parade than is consistent with her position. She goes frequently to the theatre, to concerts, and to other public places. During the late war with Russia, she manifested, on more than one occasion, her active sympathy with the brave officers and soldiers who had upheld the honor of the British flag, visiting the hospitals where the wounded lay, and honoring by her presence the return of the victorious legions. Her charities, too, have been great, and confined to no class or locality. The queen is well educated, and has an active and intelligent mind. Those who have had opportunities of conversing with her, say that she sustains herself well on whatever topic may be started, and that she is evidently conversant, not only with books, but with affairs and men. Alexandra Victoria, for these were her baptismal names, is the only child of the late Duke of Kent and of the Princess Louise Victoria, of Saxe-Coburg, who, at the date of her marriage with his royal highness, was a relic of the hereditary prince of Leiningen. She was born May 24, 1819, and is consequently now in her 38th year. Her general education was directed by the Duchess of Northumberland. The best masters were provided for her, and she became a proficient in language, in history, and in science, without precisely reaching, or even aiming at the distinction of a blue stocking. By the desire of William IV., the late Lord Melbourne familiarized her mind with the leading principles of constitutional government; and it was therefore not surprising that, finding that nobleman at the head of the administration when she came to the throne, January 20, 1837, she maintained him in that position. Her coronation took place June 28, 1838, with great pomp and splendor. February 10, 1840, she was married to Prince Albert, of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, and has a large family of children.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, [CORNER OF TREMONT
AND BROMFIELD STS.]

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 23, 1856.

$3.00 PER ANNUM. } VOL. XI., No. 8.—WHOLE No. 268.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

SIGNORINA FELICITA VESTVALL.

The portrait on this page, of the dashing and popular prima donna, Signorina Felicità Vestväll, was drawn expressly for us from an admirable photograph by Messrs. Masury, Silsbee & Case, of this city. It is an unquestionable likeness, as thousands of our readers in New York, Philadelphia and this city, can testify. This lady is a native of Poland, and is now in the full plenitude of personal attraction, in the maturity of her vocal power, and in the enjoyment of a reputation fairly won in both hemispheres. Coming to London with a continental reputation, her debut in Italian Opera in that city was a veritable triumph. It was not so much her singing, though she possesses a cultivated contralto voice, as the happy combination of vocal powers with great histrionic talent, which gave her such a hold upon the public. With her European and London reputation fresh, she came to this city, and received that warm welcome which America knows how to give to distinguished talent. In New York she created a furor; in Boston she warmed the popular heart, and in other cities she was equally successful. No one who has seen her Roméo, in the operatic version of Shakespeare's play, or her Azucena, the gipsy, in Verdi's "Trova-tor," can forget those impersonations. If, in the former character, she fully realized our conceptions of Shakespeare's passionate and fated lover—conceptions rarely realized upon the stage—as the wild gipsy she has surpassed all preconceived expectations. She is particularly excellent in made characters. She wears the doublet and hose with a grace and ease and abandon peculiarly her own, and certainly no finer cavalier ever trod the lyric stage. But the crowning triumph of her career was reserved for her trip to Mexico. Her visit to the Halls of the Montezumas was as genuine a triumph as that of General Scott's, though in a different path of glory. She managed to inspire the seniors and seniors, particularly the former, with the wildest enthusiasm. Each night witnessed an increase of warmth, until her benefit, when the popular liberality and the popular applause were unbounded. This night yielded the fair prima donna a substantial proof of admiration in the shape of some three thousand Mexican dollars, to say nothing of jewels and other costly souvenirs which were bestowed on her. Moreover, the stockholders of the opera house insisted on her taking the management of the establishment, and she finally left Mexico, amply furnished with funds and letters of credit to enable her to procure the best musical talent for her company. She has performed once or twice in New York, since her return from Mexico, at the splendid academy of music, under Max Maretzek's management, and her reception was such as to show her that she was still the favorite of that warm-hearted public so often accused of caprice in its attachments. Vestväll has been passing the summer at Hoboken. We believe that she is on the eve of departure for Europe to secure musical talent for her Mexican opera house. Whether the Italian Opera will ever be a permanent institution remains to be seen. Thus far Italian Opera has only been partially successful in a pecuniary point. From time to time different troupes have drawn large houses for a number of nights, but we believe that almost every manager who has meddled with Italian Opera has burned his fingers. The Astor Place Opera was a failure—so was Palmo's—and but for the gallantry with which Max Maretzek threw himself into the breach, the Academy of Music must have degenerated to "base uses." The expense of an Italian Opera company is enormous, for of all professional people, opera singers are most exorbitant in their demands. It is true that beauty and voice are fleeting, but we think that these gifts are rated a little too high. The opera is necessarily so costly that it must rely for support on the wealthy, and the wealthy in this country are precisely the persons who have shown themselves not to be reliable for a steady patronage of Italian music. In France, the Italian Opera could not live without the patronage of the government. In England it is supported by the nobility who engage boxes for the season—the prices of admission are very high. When first introduced in England, Italian Opera was supported by the subscriptions of the nobility—and the wits and the people were against it. Pope attacked it severely. Addison and his contemporaries set their faces against it as improbable and absurd. While we do full justice to the merit of their sarcasms, we must dissent from their reasoning; a drama in music is as probable and reasonable as a drama in verse. The objections to its absurdity might be equally urged against every species of theatrical representation. The truth is, that operas may be defended on the same ground as other arts of imagination; the mixture of music, decoration and dance, has been called incongruous and frivolous; but, perhaps, upon too little reflection. As to the poetry, it is another thing; any poetry is good enough for an entertainment where no poetry could be understood. But there is no subject on which, and about which, an affectation of pen-chant is more universal than that of music. It may be justly questioned, after all, whether the combinations of scientific music afford those who are able to enjoy its harmonies, a degree of pleasure at all equal to that which is felt by the less tutored ear on hearing simple melodies. Complicated music will always attract a large crowd of auditors, where very few feel gratification; nor would the labor of learning the science, so as to comprehend its more scientific beauties, at all repay itself with the many. Every noble emotion which it can raise in the bosom, is raised by the boldest and simplest tones, and these are universally felt and comprehended. If we are correct in our views, then, Italian Opera can never be a permanent institution with us, because it must depend more on fashion and science than on the popular taste for its support. Yet there is a class so devoted to its love for Italian Opera, or rather for the display which accompanies it, that we should not be surprised if one opera house were sustained in New York.

SIGNORINA FELICITA VESTVALL.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE GIPSEY'S SECRET:

—OR—

THE LEAGUE OF GUILT.

A STORY OF HIGH AND HUMBLE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE CONTRABANDIST."

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER XXII.—[CONTINUED.]

Morning passed, and the day waned slowly. Caroline remained shut up in her own apartment. A quiet and unusually silent dinner was but just over, when a visitor was announced, who desired to speak with Miss Ashburton.

"Who is it?" asked Lady Mayhew.

"A lady, madam, who will not give her name."

"Will not give her name? That is somewhat extraordinary," said Lady Mayhew, musingly. "But, at all events, I do not think I dare disturb Caroline at present. Who is she, James,—a stranger?"

"I never saw her before, to my recollection, my lady."

Lady Mayhew considered for a moment.

"I am afraid it will not do to trouble Caroline at present," she repeated, reflectively, after awhile. "James, ask the lady if it will be convenient to call again—that is, if her business is not very urgent."

The man disappeared, but directly returned, saying that the stranger said she "must see Miss Ashburton; she could not delay."

"Curious!" said Lady Mayhew. "Who can it be, I wonder, and what does she desire? Well, at all events, I must go up and see if Caroline is willing to give her audience." And rising, she left the table.

But she had only just crossed the hall, when Caroline Ashburton herself appeared, slowly descending the great staircase. She was very pale, but otherwise retained her usual appearance.

"O, is this you, my dear child? I was just going to seek you," said Lady Mayhew, as she met her, and she kissed her tenderly. "How do you feel this evening?"

"Very much better, I thank you," answered Miss Ashburton, with a quiet and somewhat faint, but grateful smile.

"There is somebody, then, in the drawing-room, who has been inquiring for you: a lady, James says, and a stranger. Do you feel equal to an interview with her?"

"Quite, aunt. But I wonder who can she be? A stranger, you say?"

"She would give me no name, and I have not seen her, my dear. James says he has never seen her here before."

Miss Ashburton proceeded, with an air of thoughtful inquiry, to the drawing-room: and as she opened the door, Lady Mayhew, in passing, saw through the open doorway a woman, tall, of fine and even strikingly beautiful proportions, attired in plain, dark garments, and wearing a thick veil, which quite concealed her face. She was standing, as Caroline Ashburton entered; and that was all Lady Mayhew saw. She rejoined Eleanor and her son, and shortly all three repaired to the library.

The door of the drawing-room had been closed on Miss Ashburton and her strange visitor, and for some ten minutes remained so. Then a faint cry was heard to proceed from the apartment, mingled with some confused exclamation in a voice of agony. The door was thrown open, and a bell rung with agitated haste. And when Lady Mayhew, followed by Edward, reached the drawing-room, they found Caroline reclining insensible upon a couch, and the veiled visitor bending over her, bathing her temples. Alarmed, both sprang to her side.

"What is the meaning of this?" exclaimed Lady Mayhew.

The stranger rose, and gave place to them.

"Its meaning is not evil," she said, in a musical though sad, nay, almost stern voice,—"its meaning is not evil. I have not harmed Caroline Ashburton, Lady Mayhew. She is too good. Would that none were more willing than I to harm her!"

She spoke and was gone. Her veiled figure passed Eleanor at the door, half paused, wavered, then sped silently through the hall, and out into the twilight.

And Caroline Ashburton awoke to consciousness, to find her aunt and Eleanor busied, with anxious suspense, in endeavoring to restore her, and Edward Mayhew bending over her in speechless alarm. As she slowly regained her faculties, her dark eyes wandered about the room, as if in search of something remembered; then came back, and rested on Edward's face. Their glance grew elarser—more intelligent, and by its fixed, earnest, wistful expression, she seemed to be trying to recollect the past.

Suddenly, she grew even more deathly pale than before; a quick shudder and a low, faint moan answered the first awakening beam of memory; a look of suffering anguish filled those large eyes, and settled around the white lips, half parted and livid as ashes. She pressed both hands upon her heart for a single instant, and turning her face away from Edward's anxious glance, rose from the couch, murmuring, in quivering accents of agony:

"It is too true—it is too true!"

"What? O, Caroline!" uttered her cousin.

"My dear child," said Lady Mayhew, tenderly, "what is the meaning of this? Who was that woman? What has she said to you?"

"O, aunt—ahunt, do not ask me! In the name of mercy!"

She sank upon her knees, and buried her face in the cushions of the couch. For a moment, her whole frame shook like a reed before the tempest; while those about her stood silent, in sorrow, distress and perplexity. It was only for a moment, and then, with one strong and terrible effort of will, she crushed down the agony that filled her, and rose from her knees. The tears were flowing over her face, as she put back the disordered hair from her brow.

"Let me go, aunt—Edward—Eleanor,—let me go! Don't speak to me!" she said. And passing from among them, she left the drawing-room, and went up to her own chamber.

And they were left together there, troubled, anxious and perplexed to know the mystery of this. Lady Mayhew, it must be confessed, was a little irritated against this dark stranger, to whose influence the agony and distress of her niece were, without question, alone to be attributed.

"Who could she have been, I wonder?" she repeated for the twentieth time, in an uneasy tone; "and what can have been her business with Caroline, which has so agitated my poor girl? Really, it was very imprudent in me not to send her away at once. I might have known that Caroline was not fit to see any one, especially one whose errand was so mysterious as that of this person, whoever she was. I wonder what does Caroline know of her? and where she ever saw her before?"

It was fruitless questioning, all. The matter was destined to remain, for the present at least, a mystery. Meanwhile, Miss Ashburton remained secluded in her own room, refusing admittance to any. Lady Mayhew was inexpressibly distressed. A thousand times she wished that she had sent the stranger away without hesitation. As it was, there was no help for the deed already done; but she resolved to investigate the matter, and discover its import, before the mystery should have time to grow deeper.

"James," she said to the servant who had admitted Caroline's visitor, "if that person should come here a second time, you will come to me, and inform me of it; for I wish to see her."

They saw no more of Miss Ashburton till the following morning, when she appeared at breakfast, pale and quiet, but with an aspect of suppressed suffering in her countenance. She spoke little, and ate nothing. She seemed to avoid, with pain, the regards of her aunt and cousin; and once only she raised her eyes to Eleanor's, with a mute yet eloquent glance of earnest tenderness and infinite sorrow—a glance that Eleanor was unable to comprehend, though it impressed her deeply.

Lady Mayhew also had been silent during the repast. When it was concluded, she rose, and saying gently to her niece: "Caroline, my dear, will you come to me in the library in a few moments?" slowly left the room.

For a few seconds, Miss Ashburton sat silent and evidently deeply agitated, her eyes cast down; then she, too, rose, and proceeded to follow her aunt.

Edward stood at a distant window, looking out. Eleanor was nearer the door; and Miss Ashburton, as she reached her side, paused, and silently clasped her hand, fixing upon her once again the strangely mournful expression of those troubled eyes, and as Eleanor looked up, she bent and kissed her.

"O, Eleanor, poor child!" she murmured; "and yet happy—happy, in comparison with me! For you are safe, and I—"

She could not utter another word. Her face was turned suddenly aside, to hide the tears she was unable to restrain; and with a convulsive pressure of Eleanor's hand, she released it, and left the apartment, leaving Miss Ashby saddened and perplexed by her manner.

She went directly to the library, where she found Lady Mayhew awaiting her. She entered, pale and trembling; her eyes met those of her aunt, and were instantly cast down. She stood just inside the door, motionless, silent, unhappy.

"My dear child! my poor Caroline!" said Lady Mayhew, tenderly, advancing and taking her hands in her own. "What is this unhappiness of yours—this trouble which you compel yourself to bear alone? You are unhappy; you are in trouble, and you will make no confidant; you will receive no consolation. I entreat you to tell me the meaning of all this." Her voice and manner were gentle, earnest, entreating. She led her niece slowly towards a seat, with her hands pressed tenderly in hers. "Tell me, I implore," she repeated, "the cause of your sorrow."

There was no answer. Covering her face with her hands, Miss Ashburton sank upon a chair, and wept silently. Lady Mayhew waited a few moments, regarding her with a glance of blended pity and affection. Still, Caroline did not look up.

"Caroline," said Lady Mayhew, with gentle seriousness, after waiting awhile,—"Caroline, you cannot mistake me. It is not from mere curiosity that I seek to know the cause of this trouble which I see. It is not from the conviction of my right, after all these years of love and care lavished on you, to be admitted to your confidence now. Since the death of your own mother, I have tried to replace to you her lost affection. I have loved you with the love of a mother for her child. It is with that love, that solicitude, that tenderness, which leads my heart to share in every emotion, in every trouble or delight of yours, that I now seek to share in your sorrows."

With clasped hands, and a face whiter than death itself, Caroline Ashburton hastily rose from her seat.

"Aunt—ahunt," she uttered, "don't—you will kill me! I have erred; I have sinned; I am guilty. I have deceived you. I have hidden the truth from you!" And she walked the floor back and forth, a picture of pale and passionate despair. "I deserve your reproaches," she went on, desperately,—"I deserve your reproaches; but O, they cannot be more terrible than my own! And Edward—O, that it should be mine to break the noblest, the tenderest heart that ever throbbed in a human breast!"

Silent and pale sat Lady Mayhew, listening to the agonized ejaculations of her niece. Now, as they ceased, she arose, deeply agitated, and came to her side.

"Tell me, Caroline," she said, in trembling accents of suspense,—"tell me. What do your words mean?"

She stood beside her, awaiting an answer. None came. But the hand of Caroline was placed upon her arm, and rested there more and more heavily by degrees, while a dark circle settled around her bloodless lips, and her eyes wore a fixed expression. Lady Mayhew started, and threw her arm about her, fearing she was about to faint again.

"My dear, sit down," she said, hastily, "and let me get you some water."

"No, no," murmured Miss Ashburton, feebly, making an effort to recover herself,—"no. I shall be better presently."

She sat down in the chair to which her aunt led her, and leaned her head upon her hand, with a low moan. Her eyes closed, and from beneath the heavy lids large tears rolled slowly down her pale cheeks, that seemed to have become hollow, and wan, and wasted, even within the last twelve hours. Lady Mayhew's heart was filled with anguish, as she stood there regarding her. She placed her hand tenderly upon Caroline's head.

"My poor child," she said, "do not distress yourself thus. Forget this for a little while."

Miss Ashburton's large eyes slowly unclosed, with a look of suffering.

"Forget? O, that it were possible! No; I must think—think think!" She hid her white face again. Presently it was uncovered. "No, no—I cannot forget!" she murmured; "but grant me a little time yet before I tell it,—a little time for strength, for preparation. For I am weak, now, and it is so hard—so hard!" Her voice sunk to a whisper, and the dull, heavy tears filled her eyes again. "A little longer," she repeated; "a single day; only till to-night, and then I will tell you."

She turned her face away, as she spoke, to hide the livid hue that again overspread it; but Lady Mayhew saw it, and a troubled look crossed her countenance. What was she to hear?

At that instant, a knock sounded at the library door. She went to open it, and found the servant, James, there.

"My lady, the person who called last night is here. She desires to see Miss Ashburton again."

Lady Mayhew hesitated, and turned to her niece, who had heard, and was bending forward anxiously.

"My dear," said Lady Mayhew, gravely, "I do not think it is right for you to see her. I hardly think you can hear—"

"O, aunt, let her come in; indeed I must see her," pleaded Miss Ashburton, in a still faint but intensely earnest tone. "Let her come in. Her errand, I assure you, is of the utmost importance."

"Show her in here, James," said Lady Mayhew. Then turning, she added, to Caroline: "And, meanwhile, I must insist upon remaining here during her visit. I cannot consent to leave you alone with her again. But I will go to yonder window, where I shall not disturb you."

"O, aunt—ahunt," said Miss Ashburton, "if you only knew her mission! Were it not for her, I should be—" She broke off; tears once more checked her utterance.

At the moment, the veiled stranger entered. She half paused at the threshold, her dark eyes glancing through her veil, towards Miss Ashburton first, and then beyond to her aunt, who was now at the far end of the apartment, by a window. Then, as Caroline half rose, she came forward, and stood silent again, just before her, for an instant, regarding her intently. No wonder, if that pale, suffering face struck her with compassion.

"Poor child!" she murmured, "it is hard that the sins of others should be visited on you."

Miss Ashburton's eyes were turned imploringly upon her.

"The paper—the record? you have brought it?" The stranger placed in her hand a small roll of paper which she had carried concealed under her veil.

"Take good heed that you do not lose it," she said. "The watchfulness of years must not come to naught now."

Caroline Ashburton clasped it eagerly in her hand. And even as she did so, a shudder ran through her frame, and a subdued ejaculation of misery escaped from her ashy lips.

"It seals my fate!" she uttered, in a low voice of anguish.

"And yet you were better dead than be without it," said the stranger, gravely, "and not you alone, either. Courage! and be glad that you have it in your possession; for the evil deeds of past time must be brought to light ere long, and then you may need it. I go now. When you are ready, seek me at the red house on the hill yonder." And turning away, she departed as she had come.

CHAPTER XXIII.

ANOTHER WARNING. TOO LATE.

DURING the private interview of Lady Mayhew and her niece, Eleanor, in a sad and disturbed frame of mind, had left the house, and walked out into the grounds, leaving Edward, painfully absorbed in his own thoughts, still standing by the window in the breakfast-room. The mysterious and perplexing events which had occurred since the previous morning, had aroused her anxiety and concern, almost as deeply as that of Lady Mayhew and her son; for, with a heart naturally affectionate, she had become warmly attached to her new friends, and her kindest sympathies were with them; and it was with her mind fixed upon these matters that she now directed her steps towards the banks of the stream, which formed the southern boundary of Lady Mayhew's estate.

Almost unconsciously she took the path leading down the stream, in the direction of the old farm house, which she had left but a few days before. Lost in contemplation, she walked on until she was quite out of sight of Lady Mayhew's mansion; and it was not till the approach of some person, at a little distance, startled her, that she at length looked up. It was a young country boy, with coarse frock, heavy hob-nailed shoes and enormous straw hat, whom she beheld advancing towards her; but in the well-known voice which joyfully said: "Good morning, Miss Eleanor; don't you know me?" she directly recognized that of Harry Longworth.

"So this is you, Harry, is it?" she said, with a kind smile. "I am very glad to see you. I did not know you at first."

"No—because I've on these clothes, you see, miss, that make me look different. But I must wear a strange dress when I come to you with an errand, that Sir Edward and young Mr. Morley and his father mayn't find out where I go. For although I've left there, they watch me like cats watching a mouse; and I'm only too lucky if they haven't cracked me as it is."

"Then they are still searching, Harry?"

"Pretty sharp, miss. Young Mr. Morley swears he'll hunt you out, and Sir Edward helps him, and his father, to look for you. Ah, miss!" and Harry shook his head, "I don't just see what it all means there. He's savage as a bear, is master—Sir Edward, I mean, and so crazy-like and desperate-looking all the time, and yet he seems to be led about by them—Mr. Morley and his father; to be afraid of them, somehow, it seems to me, so that they can make him do what they like. Indeed, some believe it is so; and that Mr. Victor Briancourt has got some secret kind of hold upon him, that forces him to do as they bid him, and that that is the reason he is so set upon getting you, miss, to marry the son."

Eleanor sighed. She alone knew how true this was—that he was in their power.

"But I am forgetting my business all this time, miss," said Harry, taking a billet from the pocket of his frock. "Here is something that the dwarf left this morning in the hollow tree in Penshurst Copse, where we have settled that he is always to leave his messages for you. I go there every day. I dare say he will tell you in it something about the goings-on at Ashby. He keeps close on the watch all the time. I am not there now, as I told you, but at Holt Farm, just beyond the village."

"So Lucy said, Harry. I hope you have a good place?" said Miss Ashby, as she received the communication.

"Yes, miss,—a very nice one, thank you."

"And the fever has all gone from the village?"

"Quite, miss. It run pretty hard while it lasted, but there weren't many took it, after all, and you know it was feared it would go through the whole place. They all think a deal of you, miss, in the village, for the cure you took of one and another in the fever, and of Mr. Hugh Latimer, who did so much for them."

"I am glad if I served them, Harry. I tried hard to, during the little time I could be with them. But now, I suppose you are waiting to ask about Lucy?" said Miss Ashby, kindly.

Harry's honest face lighted up.

"Yes, Miss Eleanor,—I was just going to ask you how she is."

"Very well indeed. Would you not like to go up and see her a little while, now, at Lady Mayhew's house?"

Harry said he should be very glad to.

"But," and he lingered, "isn't it rather unsafe, Miss Eleanor, if I may make so bold, for you to be so far away from the house alone? Because there's no knowing but you might be seen by those you wouldn't like to see you."

"True—true," answered Miss Ashby. "I forgot that I had come so far. I have not been out of the grounds since Pequin sent his last caution, until to-day. But I will come up directly, Harry. You may hasten along, and I shall be there soon."

And while Harry left her and continued his way up to see Lucy, Miss Ashby returned upon her steps, and walking slowly along, proceeded to open Pequin's letter. Harry was out of sight in a moment, so rapidly did he walk; and by the time she had fairly commenced reading, had already traversed a fourth part of the way to Lady Mayhew's. The communication was as follows:

"Take heed, Eleanor Ashby, lest the danger you know of reach you ere you are aware. Sir Edward has discovered the place of your abode! The hawk is all ready to pounce upon the dove, if she venture forth from her nest. PEQUIN."

Struck with alarm, Eleanor continued, for a moment, to gaze upon these words, with a pale cheek and a troubled eye. She was no longer safe, then. Perhaps her uncle was even now about to come and claim her.

Suddenly, the rapid tramp of a horse's hoofs, on a piece of stony ground not far behind her, such as bordered the stream for some distance along here, caused her to look back quickly. With a half-suppressed cry of terror, she beheld a gentleman mounted upon a large black horse, fast coming up. The creature was like the one Morley Briancourt usually rode. The thought of him, flashing like lightning across her excited mind, filled her with dread. Hastily she turned again, thinking to flee; but the first step was a dangerous one for her. Standing upon the very edge of the bank, which was here much elevated above the stream, and descending precipitously for some ten or fifteen feet below, terminated in a grassy level extending to the water's edge, the loose gravelly earth crumbled beneath her feet, and she fell.

The cry she uttered in falling was echoed from the lips of the horseman. Rapidly he urged forward his horse, and dashing along to where the path lying at the foot of the rocks branched off from that leading parallel with it up the ascent, dismounted, and throwing the bridle over the beast's neck, sprang to the place where Miss Ashby had fallen. It was Hugh Latimer.

His face was pale as death, as he caught sight of her insensible form lying upon the ground, beneath the branches of a stunted oak that grew close by the precipitous bank. Kneeling beside her, he partially lifted her, so that she rested upon his breast.

"Eleanor," he uttered, passionately,—"Eleanor! it is you, then,—and lifeless!" He shuddered as his glance was fastened on that pale, pure, inanimate countenance. "What if she is dead?"

He lifted her in his arms, as he would have lifted a child, and bearing her down to the water-side, knelt with her there. Dipping his hand into the cool wave, he bathed her blue-veined temples, and smoothed back the heavy dark hair that lay in thick, curling masses around them. Handful after handful of water was gathered up and rained in crystal showers over her face. But she lay insensible still.

"Eleanor—Eleanor, my beloved!" he uttered again. "O, wake—speak to me, Eleanor!"

His very heart thrilled, as a faint tinge of color dawned in her cheek. Bending over her, he waited eagerly for the first ray of consciousness to beam from those hazel eyes upon him.

They unclosed, presently, and a low sigh parted her lips. For a moment, her glance rested silently upon his face. At first, it was evidently without recognition. Then a soft light stole into them; they were averted, and gradually the broad white lids drooped over them again. The tender flush that had tinged her cheek became deeper; warmer and warmer it grew, and he watched with a delight as deep as the anxiety, suspense and apprehension that he felt. The soft eyes opened again.

"Eleanor," he said, gently, "do you recognize me?"

"Yes, Mr. Latimer."

She tried to rise, grew pale again, and sank back.

"You are injured, Eleanor!" he said, in a voice of increased alarm.

"No—I have no pain; do not fear for me. But my head is not clear yet—that is all."

All! It was a miracle, almost, if it were all, if she were not crippled for life. He raised her gently, so that her head lay higher up on his breast, and dipping his hand into the stream, commenced bathing her temples once more. She lay with her eyes closed a little while. Presently she said:

"That was you, then, whom I saw, and Ranger? I thought it was somebody else. It was just before I made that false step."

"I was not far distant from you when you fell. You remember, then?"

"Yes. How horrible that fall was!" And she shuddered faintly. "I remember thinking that I should be killed; but that tree was in the way," raising her eyes to the oak above them; "the branches bent with me, and broke the force of my fall, I suppose."

"That was it, then; you were only stunned. Thank Providence it was no worse!" And he breathed a deep, unconscious sigh of relief and gratitude.

Again the warm vermilion tinged her cheek; but it faded directly again, leaving it whiter than before.

"I think," she said, after a little silence,—"I think I am stronger now; and I must get back home. Lady Mayhew will be alarmed."

The words did not surprise him. The housekeeper at Ashby had told the Latimers how Eleanor had fled from Ashby because her uncle had treated her cruelly, and shut her up a prisoner in her own apartment; and though they had remained in ignorance of her whereabouts during her stay at the farm, owing to Pequin's charge of utter secrecy to Harry Longworth, they had been assured that she was in a place of safety; and it was only the day previous to that of the events recorded in this chapter that they had learned of her being at Lady Mayhew's, through Dr. Gregg, from Dr. Morrison, her family physician.

"I am on my way to Lady Mayhew's," said he. "We can proceed thither in company. But you mistake, I think, in regard to your strength. See! no—no; you cannot stand!"

At her desire, he had assisted her to rise. But he was right; she could not stand without assistance. Her head whirled. Tenderly supporting her towards a low rock projecting from the bank, he seated her upon it.

At that moment, a bird, which had its nest among the brushwood at the end of the path, flew upward with a loud flapping of its wings, frightening Hugh Latimer's horse, which was grazing there quietly, so that he started aside, and then dashed off at full gallop.

"See," said Eleanor; "there goes Ranger; and you must go after him, Mr. Latimer, or you will lose him."

"No; I cannot leave you thus," answered Hugh.

"I shall do very well while I sit still here. I will not stir till you come back. Go, Mr. Latimer; I insist upon it."

She spoke faintly, but with earnestness. Still he did not obey.

"Go," she said again; "and when you return, I shall doubtless be so much better as to be able to go back with you."

To satisfy her, he did as she desired, charging her first to remember her promise, and not attempt to move till his return. She promised, at the same time urging him, in turn, not to come back until he had captured Ranger.

Left alone, her glance fell now, for the first time, on the letter of Pequin, which had fallen from her hand, and lay half-hidden in the grass. A faint shudder ran through her as she remembered its contents. Her uncle, and Victor Briancourt, and Morley knew of her being at Lady Mayhew's. She trembled. What if they were on their way thither even now? Her head grew more and more confused. It was only by leaning back against the bank that she could keep herself from falling. She closed her eyes, feeling sick and weary. She almost wished she had not insisted on the departure of Hugh.

She had remained for some time with her eyes closed, and the dizziness in her head continually increasing, when the sound of horses' hoofs once more aroused her, striking on the stony ground not far distant.

"Hugh is coming back with Ranger," she thought. "I am glad."

Feebly she turned her head in the direction of the sound. It was not Hugh coming back with Ranger; it was a light carriage drawn by two chestnut horses, advancing slowly along the bank of the stream from the direction of the road, half a mile down, leading to the adjacent town.

Her heart bounded with sudden fear; for in her uneasy state of mind, she could not help fancying that it strongly resembled that of her uncle; and the horses, too,—those of her uncle were bright chestnut, like these. In her anxiety in watching it, she forgot for a moment that, as the carriage rounded the curve which the stream made, just below the place where the path here branched off from that leading up the ascent, the spot she occupied must be plainly visible to those within it, and that her form could be easily distinguished in its white garment, against the dark rock.

Whoever the occupants of the carriage were, they were now in full sight; and as they rounded the bend of the stream, they both—for they were two gentlemen—bent forward to the window. They came nearer—nearer; there was no longer any doubt. It was her uncle's carriage! And, at the point where the paths diverged, it drew up.

A faint ejaculation of terror and despair escaped her lips. She essayed to rise—to escape; it was impossible. It was as if she were chained to the rock. Sight failed her; there was a sound in her ears as of rushing waters; in vain she endeavored to utter the name of Hugh Latimer. She was just conscious of the approach of footsteps—of being lifted, helpless, in some one's arms—of hearing a cold, stern voice which she knew but too well—the voice of her uncle, and then she became insensible.

CHAPTER XXIV.

A RECORD OF GUILT.

It was with a savage, exultant joy, too deep for description, that Morley Briancourt—for he was one of those whom Eleanor had seen in her uncle's carriage—beheld the object of a three weeks' fruitless search, in the form of Miss Ashby, down in the hollow by the river-road to Eldon, Lady Mayhew's place, whither their course had been directed. Sir Edward, in company with him, had set out that morning, after discovering through the means of Will Humphries, the valet and spy, the neighborhood of Eleanor, to claim her from the sanctuary which had given her shelter. Of their movements during these past three weeks, little need be said. They had sought and inquired in every possible place for their missing prize: Victor Briancourt and his son, with a desperate and wrathful determination to find her, and the baronet himself, in a state of fear and trembling, enraged and despairing at her loss, yet goaded and urged on by his graceful, smooth-voiced tyrant, Victor Briancourt, to recover her at any cost; believing her beyond his reach, without the slightest prospect of finding her, and yet never daring to give her up—never daring to rest one moment from his search; cursing, day and night, the act which had put him into this man's power, but without hope of escaping from it.

As we have said, Will Humphries was the means of discovering her whereabouts by accidentally finding a note, written by the old housekeeper (who had resigned her place, like many others of the family servants, after Eleanor's flight), to Miss Latimer; and it was with a revulsion of feeling almost insupportable that Sir Edward received the tidings. Reduced by despair almost to insanity, it was a joy hardly to be believed or borne, to learn that Eleanor was so near—almost within his very grasp, as it were; and while Morley and his father exulted in the prospect of regaining their prize, the plan was made to recover her.

Not ten minutes after the discovery, Sir Edward set out, with Morley, for Lady Mayhew's, to claim his niece and ward, well satisfied of success, as his legal right over Eleanor's actions did not expire yet for some months, for she was not yet of age.

The reader has already been made aware of the encounter by the way. Attracted, first, by the sight of a woman, seated at the foot of the rocks, by the stream, in this lonely place, the attention of both had been struck by her dress and appearance, as they drew nearer; for over her white gown was cast a crimson scarf, which they had often seen her wear, and the complexion and hair, distant as the observers were, were unmistakably those of Eleanor. "It is she!" was the deep-toned exclamation of Morley, as, having alighted from the carriage, they approached her; and his heart beat as it had never beat before.

A wild thrill rushed through Sir Edward's frame as he saw her so near. Now—now, his bond was safe. He trembled in every limb with joyful excitement. It was hard to conceal the almost delirious agitation he felt; for he had suffered so much, and so long, and now Eleanor was in his power once more. But with a hard struggle he partially subdued the evidence of his feelings. He had done or tried to do so, during all the suspense and agony of her loss, that Victor Briancourt and Morley might not see how terrible was his fear of them, and thus let them know the full extent of their power. Now, though his voice slightly trembled, it had yet resumed, in a great degree, the cold, harsh tones natural to it.

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

Literary dissipation is no less destructive of sympathy with the living world than sensual dissipation. Mere intellect is as hard-hearted and as heart-hardening as mere sense; and the union of the two, when uncontrolled by the conscience, and without the softening, purifying influences of the moral affections, is all that is requisite to produce the diabolical ideal of our nature. Nor is there any repugnance in either to coalesce with the other: witness Iago, Tiberius, Borgia.

INTERIOR OF THE LOUVRE, PARIS.

The series of pictures on this and the succeeding page represents some of the most striking features of the interior of the world-renowned Louvre. The engravings are made from drawings executed on the spot by the very best artists of the French capital, and may be relied on for their accuracy. The first of them represents the ceiling of the Apollo Gallery, painted by Mr. Delacroix; next we have the magnificent Apollo Gallery itself; then the Square Saloon, in which is a fine collection of pictures, where, besides the visitors, male and female artists are seen busily at work at their easels, executing copies; and lastly, the frieze of the Hall of the Seven Chimney-places. We shall refer more particularly to these features in the course of this article. The interior of the Louvre has lately been remodelled, and the pictures re-arranged. We have represented those portions of the Louvre only which have been repaired and remodelled. The museum of the Louvre, such as it has been made by the luxuries, fauities and the successive changes of the monarchy, the republic, the first and second empires, is now one of the first museums in the world. Its extent and magnificence command admiration. After having been a long time closed to the public, in order to complete the improvements and changes, the Louvre was reopened June 5, 1851. The Gallery of Apollo, the Square Saloon and the Hall of the Seven Chimneys had been decorated with great magnificence—particularly the Square Saloon, which is devoted to the reception of masterpieces of art, like the famous Florentine "Triumph." The attention is attracted in the Square Saloon by the gildings and particular ornaments of the ceiling. Between the spring of the arch and the place where the top of the hanging of the four walls terminates, there is a frieze containing scutcheons, on which are inscribed the names of celebrated painters, placed between the pilasters. This frieze, which prolongs at the base the brilliant ornamentation of the ceiling, diminishes the height and narrows the space reserved for pictures. Above it are a row of plaster figures in relief. These four figures, representing Architecture, Painting, Sculpture and Engraving, are placed on the edge of a cornice. The four angles are occupied in their whole length by colossal Termes, sustaining over their heads a scutcheon, surrounded by instruments borrowed from architecture or manufactures, and surmounted by the head of a horse or ox. There are also other figures representing geni holding garlands of flowers. The ornamentation of the Hall of the Seven Chimneys consists principally in large figures, representing Victory, to the number of fourteen, with arms and wings extended, and holding palms and crowns of gold. They are colored very light in the flesh and the draperies. Between these figures, relief portraits of painters and sculptors, of a white hue, appear on a colored background.

CEILING OF THE APOLLO GALLERY.

The least satisfactory part of the ceiling is, as in the Square Saloon, that of the angles of the arch, here occupied by a sort of irregular pilasters, resembling clock-cases in shape, and resting on large volutes, beneath which are gilded trophies consecrated to art, agriculture, the navy and army. On the other hand, the frame of the height of the arch is of a design at once elegant and severe, and produces a fine effect. In general, the decoration of these two ceilings is of a fertile and varied invention, full of charming details, drawn with great delicacy. They do honor to Mr. Duban, and the sculptors who aided him, Mr. Simart for the Saloon, and Mr. Duret for the Hall of the Seven Chimney-places. But, in our opinion, all this rich ornamentation has too much prominence and brilliancy for the place for which it is designed. It is ambitious and aims at effect, instead of being retiring, as it should be. In a picture gallery, nothing should enter into competition with the pictures themselves. They are emphatically the ornaments. Above perfectly smooth walls, the friezes, cornices and panels should be simple and quiet in design, of a relief but slightly accented, and of a sober color. We think it imperative to avoid the employment of large sculptured figures and painted subjects beside figures drawn by Leonardo da Vinci, Raphael and the great artists of the Renaissance. Whatever be their merit, it is ungraceful for these new-comers to thrust themselves into a senate of kings. The magnificent Gallery of Apollo, of which we give a fine representation, had been closed up to 1851. The restoration was effected in admirable taste. The gallery, built by Henry IV., was partially destroyed in 1661, by a fire, while they were building a stage on which Louis XIV. and his court were to dance. Repaired and decorated with its present rich ceiling, drawn and painted under the direction of Lebrun, it had been intended, under the Directory, to contain drawings, pastels, enamels and miniatures. The deteriorated condition of the arch, which threatened to fall in, required propping; and from 1824, the hall, encumbered by scaffolding, in the midst of which, by means of hangings, a temporary passage-way to the exhibitions was contrived, testified the carelessness of governments with regard to the Louvre. Finally, after the revolution of February, and with the initiative of M. Jeanron, under the direction of whom these different restorations were undertaken, followed and brought to a close by Nieuwerkerke, his successor, the arch and the facade on the garden of the Infanta were constructed, and the Apollo Gallery in the interior clothed with all its ancient magnificence.

THE APOLLO GALLERY.

The paintings have been so skilfully retouched, and the gildings renewed with such care, that they have the harmonious aspect and, so to speak, the varnish of time. Another change has been made. The old ante-chamber preceding the Square Saloon, and which contained the pictures of old masters, now placed at the commencement of the Grand Gallery, is devoted to another purpose. Thither has been transported a collection of gems and precious objects, formerly in the hall of the museum of Charles X. The cabinets of dark wood in which they are arranged, and the sombre hanging of the hall, are admirably adapted to display these rich gems, and to give to this apartment a classic and tasteful character. Instead of an ante-chamber, it is now a retired cabinet. The Gallery of Apollo was designed entirely by the famous Lebrun. He died in 1690. For the hundred following years, the Louvre, deserted by the court for Versailles, Triann, Marli and Choisy, served principally to lodge the different royal academies, and particularly that of painting and sculpture. The Gallery of Apollo was divided into apartments. In 1756, it served as a studio for Vauclou, with rooms for his pupils; then, successively, for different exhibitions of pictures and objects of art till 1818. It was reserved for the public to resume the task commenced by the monarchy, and so long interrupted, and bring it to an end. The complete restoration of this gallery was decided and reported on the 7th of December, 1848, and confided to Mr. Duban, the architect of the Louvre. The walls had partially given way, and portions of the arched ceiling had fallen in, which it was necessary to replace with great care. The numerous figures sculptured by the brothers Murry, by Girardon and Benardini were restored; the ornaments in relief reviewed and repaired; the old pannels retouched, and the arabesques and figures completed. This work of restoration, if we do not criticise too severely a few arabesques of conventional design and too modern pretentiousness, has arrived at a harmonious whole. It is not the same with the compartments of the arch. Lebrun did not finish his work; hence the unity he would have secured is wanting. The four compartments situated at the base of the arch, to the right and left, and representing the four seasons, were painted a century after him: Spring, by Callet; Autumn, by Taraval; Summer, by Durameau; and Winter, by Lagrenée, Jr. These two last subjects, opposite the windows, are feebly executed, in dull and faded color, whose neighborhood to the painting of M. Delacroix makes its feebleness more apparent. The only painting executed by the hand of Lebrun is that at the extremity of the gallery, on the side of the quay. It represents the awakening of the waters, on the Triumph of Amphitrite. This elegant composition, one of the chefs-d'œuvre of Louis XIV.'s painter, was unfortunately much injured in the portion to the right; six figures of tritons and naiads balancing similar figures grouped on the other side, were entirely wanting. It is not explained why M. Guichard, entrusted with retouching the paintings, did not consult the collection engraved by a pupil of Lebrun, named St. Andre, who has preserved to us all the paintings and sculptures of this gallery, executed or projected in his time. A print of St. Andre and a drawing owned by the museum, served M. Guichard to reconstruction, with an unnecessary modification in some of the subordinate details, the other composition of Lebrun facing the preceding. This painting of M. Guichard is above the entrance door decorated with the fine iron grating from the Chateau de Maisson, which so generally attracts public attention: it represents the triumph of the Earth. The centre of the arch is occupied by a large composition painted by M. Delacroix, and consecrated to the triumph of Apollo. There remains nothing of Lebrun's plan for this central composition. He would, doubtless, have developed in it all the fertility of his imagination; but probably less occupied with Apollo as a vivifying and creative displays her scarf in the air, a symbol of the triumph of light over darkness and the revolt of the waters." This design embraces a vast field, and one would be tempted at once to pronounce it impossible, if the composition of M. Delacroix were not a splendid realization of it. Before considering it as a painting, we must first acknowledge how felicitous it is as a great decorative machine, and how it naturally adapts itself to the vivid turbulent ornamentation, whose abundance and luxury expand about it. Of this it is at once the centre and the crown. Considered in itself, it is a work of fire, full of vigor, and bearing the impress of burning poetry. The principal merit of M. Delacroix's ceiling, is that it is really a ceiling. It is a victorious refutation of the numerous paintings which so ridiculously usurp this name in the halls of the Louvre. This last page of the artist is a confirmation of his aptitude for this kind of work. It is a new monument to add to those he has already raised to his glory.

THE SQUARE SALOON.

god, than as an emblem of the glory of Louis XIV., he would have summoned frigid allegory to the aid of his courtier-like flatteries; under the pencil of M. Delacroix, it has become a poem. Four cartoons distributed along the length of the arch and representing Diana, or Night in her car, Evening or Morpheus, the Star of Morning, by Henou (1784), and Aurora, by Mr. Muller, complete, together with medallions and candelabra consecrated to the twelve months, the picturesque decoration of the gallery. In the piers, between the windows of one side and the false doors of the other, it is proposed to place the portraits of the celebrated men of Louis XIV.'s century, taken from contemporary pictures. These portraits, executed in tapestry, are preparing at the Gobelins. The ceiling by M. Delacroix is 24 feet by 22 feet. The composition is so completely elaborate that it is necessary to subjoin the artist's own description of it:—"Apollo vanquishing the serpent Python. The god, mounted on his car, has already discharged a portion of his arrows; Diana, his sister, floating after him, presents him her quiver. Already pierced by the arrows of the god of light and life, the bleeding monster writhes, as he exhales in fiery vapor the remains of his life and of his impotent fury. The waters of the deluge are beginning to subside, and leave on the summits or drag with them the bodies of men and animals. The gods are indignant on beholding the earth abandoned to formless monsters produced impure from the slime; they have armed like Apollo; Minerva and Mercury spring forward to exterminate them, while waiting for divine wisdom to re-people the solitude of the universe. Hercules crushes them with his club; Vulcan, the god of fire, drives before him night and the impure vapors; while Boreas and the zephyrs dry up the waters with their breath, and finish the work by dissipating the clouds. The more timid divinities contemplate from a distance this battle of the gods and elements. Meanwhile, from the height of Heaven, Victory descends to crown Apollo, the conqueror; and Iris, the messenger of the gods,

FRIEZE OF THE HALL OF THE SEVEN CHIMNEYS.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

BESSIE.

There's many a maid with lovelier face,
Of comelier form, and many a grace
Outrivaling dear Bessie, perchance;
There's many a maid of dignified mien,
As courtly as Jane, as proud as a queen,
But Bessie's the sweetest I've seen.

There's many a maid whose smile is as sweet,
With tapering fingers and ankles as neat;
There's many a maid full as fair,
There's many a maid with as kindly a glance,
With beauties and charms, which each other enhance,
But Bessie is still in advance.

There's a charm in her presence—in goodness it lies—
A charm in a true heart, and proudly I prize
The friendship which binds us together;
All the wealth in the world, the rank or the fame,
Can never allure me, or passion inflame,
While Bessie continues the same.

Her smile is so gentle, her voice is so kind,
I might search the world o'er, I never should find
One so true, so faithful, so pure;
There's a magic to me in each glance and each tone,
In her presence I seem on happiness' throne—
Shall I ever call Bessie mine own?

M. P. Ja.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

ALESSANDRINA OF RUSSIA.

BY FRANCES P. PEPPERELL.

ALTHOUGH Catherine of Russia was empress of all the Russias, in the chief city of her realm was one who divided sway with her and held hardly the second place of sovereignty in the hearts of her subjects. This was the beautiful Princess Alessandrina (daughter of a deceased dignitary and ward of Galovitch, the prime), whose wit and beauty the train of her suitors testified, and whose charity and sweetness, the populace, receiving her bounty, were only too happy to acknowledge.

It was a night of early spring in St. Petersburg. The winter palace was glaring with illumination, and the court-yard packed with coaches, cars and droskas. The empress received, to-night, Ivan, the gallant young officer just returned from the victorious war, and conferred upon him, in the presence of her court, the order of St. Andrew. There was a momentary hush in the drawing-room, splendid almost to barbarity, when the Primate Galovitch entered arm in arm with Ivan, and followed by a brace of gigantic Cossacks. The extremely tall, slender figure; the graceful step; the white, jewelled hand; the long, black hair, curling in soft, fine masses over a collar of gems; the almost feminine regularity of feature and olive skin; the full, crimson lip—all these beauties gave no indication of the hero of two campaigns, of a man foremost on the enemies' ramparts, sleeping in trenches, working in ditches, never flinching in the hottest fire, and a conqueror wherever he directed his forces; but in the large, black eye, although at first sight languid and soft as a woman's, there was a fire that flashed fitfully, and transformed, whenever it kindled, the whole man into an impersonation of energy and will, lending him the majesty of Mars. Only the Cossack blood in his veins could account for the dark style of his countenance.

Catherine, it is well known, had a fine eye for beauty, and when she caught sight of the prince, her courtiers could have told beforehand, from the expression of her countenance, with what empressment she would afford him his reception. During his conversation with the empress, which lasted over an hour, his eye now and then wandingly traversed the room and fell back dreamily and listlessly to light up beneath her smile. At last, leaving him to amuse himself, the empress turned to her prime, and the prince sauntered down the lane opened for him through the thronging nobles, bowing negligently to right and left, as his eye met one familiar. As for the ladies and maidens, he seemed to ignore either beauty or existence on their part, and idly strolled down where the curtains were looped high above an alcove. As he would have entered and thrown himself on the lounge, he hesitated, glanced again and stopped entirely still, gazing before him.

Just under the sweep of the curtains, crowned with the massive braids of her yellow hair, the white gauzes of her array fluttering in the breeze from the balcony, while she herself stood like a statue distinct in her delicate symmetry against the heavy purple drapery—her blue eyes shining upon him, her face tinged with the hue of the anemone, and her chiselled lips half parted as if to speak, was Alessandrina. Thus they mutually gazed an instant, when extending her hand, she said:

"Let it be no flagrant rudeness, if, in recognizing Prince Ivan I require no master of ceremonies."

"Nor," returned he, "shall I presume wrong if I venture to believe myself in the presence of that queen whose subjects all Europe cannot contain, most noble Alessandrina."

"Since you entered with my guardian, I should have seen you at home to-morrow, and once in a while, for a novelty, it is pleasant to forestall the proprieties, and when 'allow me to present,' comes along, to be able to return, 'I think I have the honor.' Now is it not?"

"Like taking the enemy's fort by strategy before soundding a parley at the gates," said he, smiling; "but although diplomacy is fast becoming a feminine accomplishment, I scarcely expected that your highness was a devotee at that shrine."

"Devotee? Far from it. Does one worship evil unless one is Armenian or barbarian? But I might venture to call myself an imp of it, and somewhat of an adept in the art!"

"As you intend me to find out if you allow our acquaintance to continue. Coquetry is an excellent school for that art, and therefore, no doubt, ladies are so much more successful than our blunter sex. Sotto voce, you have, madam, in your attendance on the empress, a fine opportunity to perfect yourself in your studies in these branches!"

The princess laughed with downcast eyes, but raising them, seemed to look at some one behind Ivan, and turning, he saw Catherine, who had left her throne, on the arm of Galovitch.

"Your highness has met with an acquaintance?" asked Catherine, with considerable hauteur.

"Obeying your imperial commands," he answered, "I have found a friend."

Alessandrina looked quickly up, and if an angry glance could have slain, would doubtless have done the prince some damage.

"It is coming on a little too fast!" quoth she, to herself.

"Friend, indeed! when I have not exchanged fifty syllables with him!" And adding aloud, for Ivan's ear, as she curled her lip and looked at him—"Presumption!"

The fire that burned the Adonis to a hero flashed into his eye only for a moment, but that glimpse told her of something beyond the smile, and made her half repent her hasty word. It was gone, however, instantly, and in a manner totally changed from any he had exhibited, he whispered:

"I shall only be too happy to receive such an instructress in court phrases."

"Prince Ivan!" then said Catherine, "shall we have the pleasure of your society at Nicolaeff, our summer house, for a few months? We start to-morrow."

Ivan made the necessary acknowledgements, and she added:

"It is but six leagues from the city—our court goes with us. Galovitch, then wilt order the horses; Alessandrina and I must have some hunting."

And taking the arm of Prince Ivan, she continued her walk, while a throng of courtiers clustered at once round the princess. When, some time later, she descended to her coach, an arm was presented to her by Prince Ivan, and as she seated herself, he kissed her hand and disappeared. The next morning was to be the great review of the troops, and, somewhat curious to notice the manner of her hero, Alessandrina was beside the empress, who was also on horseback, at an early hour. She looked more splendidly in that dark, tight-fitting habit, with the close, black cap, exhibiting her fine horsemanship, while a deep color was fanned into her cheeks by the exercise, than beneath a blaze of chandeliers, on the night before; and so thought Ivan, as with his sabretache dangling at his heels, he strode across the square, to reappear, immediately, in full gallop at the head of his staff.

It certainly could not have been the martial music that startled the horse the princess rode, when the exercises were nearly through; but some unaccountable circumstance occasioned that breach of propriety on his part, and suddenly shying up against the empress, he wheeled and darted at full career up the street above, threatening to crush her every moment against the walls on either side. Needless of all her soothing endeavors, or of whip and rein, he raced on and unexpectedly stopping stone still, threw up his heels, gave a loud neigh, turned about and dashed down the street right through the cortege of the empress, the front rank of the soldiery, the square of cavalry, and was rushing on, when, without any apparent effort the hand of Ivan, still sitting lightly in his saddle, grasped the reins, and, with an almost herculean strength, held the wild creature (who seemed to recognize a certain irresistible force in his controller) motionless. To have left his troops for her rescue would have been a glaring offence, and he had therefore, at the first moment, hastily ordered some one to gallop up a circuit and confront her, when the animal would doubtless turn and bring her within his reach, as indeed he did. Now, still holding her reins, with Alessandrina, who, though incapable of managing her steed, had maintained her seat and composure throughout, beside him, he coolly, without a word to her, put his squadrons through their last manoeuvres, dismissed them, and turning, congratulated her. They remained alone in the middle of the square till the last file of the army had lowered their arms before the empress, and then sought her presence.

"A pretty interruption we have had!" laughed she, good-humoredly. "Come, everything is prepared at Nicolaeff."

And, before sunset, the court relieved from the weight of etiquette and ceremony, wandered unrestrainedly through the beautiful gardens and fields, and along the tiny lakes and river in the grounds of Nicolaeff.

Alessandrina was lying beside a brook, alone and half-hidden in the tall growth of the fern of a sudden Russian summer, when Prince Ivan, with his usual indifference of manner, sauntered idly along, and throwing himself down on the bank just below her, commenced skipping stones across the water. Alessandrina picked up a pebble, and raising herself to a sitting posture, followed his example. Looking round for his competitor, the prince beheld her beautiful face rising just above the fern like a dryad from some gigantic southern blossom.

"Your highness thinks them cannon balls!" said she, merrily.

"And what thinks your highness?"

"I think it marvellous that the hero of the Susposki and the great campaigns, can play the lady so."

"Owing to undue familiarity last night, the Princess Alessandrina volunteered instructions in politeness. At this moment methinks I might retort. Nevertheless it can be said that explanations of such conduct must be vouchsafed to friends alone."

"But I am curious."

"Does etiquette allow it?"

"Pray then, let me be considered, for the nonce, as a friend, and explain."

"Ah," he returned, raising his brows and extending his hand to touch hers, "I have overcome—I am used to triumph!"

She flung his hand away, saying:

"You will not triumph again, boastful one!"

"Perchance not. But as I was about to say—you insinuate that, having engaged in one or more campaigns, I am idle, madam. I have already opened another and vaster campaign. I see an extent I could scarcely have hoped for, where to deploy my forces. Already I encounter difficulties which only kindle my zeal. Seasons may roll ere my victorious banner shelters the object of my attack."

"Your would carry your fort by storm."

"In turn I offer a fortress which has hitherto preserved an impregnable front, and, strangest event in the annals of war, the enemy refuses to take up the offer or march into the strong-hold. But conquest attends upon me. Madam, peace has her victories!"

"If you will speak in enigmas I cannot follow you."

"I utter no parable."

"You may as well be silent then."

"As you wish," he replied.

And till the stars began to come out they maintained unbroken silence, then, rising simultaneously, wound their way to the palace. The empress was alone, as she had desired, when they entered.

"How now?" she asked. "Am I forsaken by my hero already? I forbid it! You two young people must not fall in love with each other!"

"There is little danger of it, my liege," answered Alessandrina, carelessly.

"Your majesty has taken the very step likely to insure such a proceeding," laughed Ivan.

But Catherine's mandate had gone forth, and though she spoke jestingly, as was frequent with her, she meant to be obeyed. Thus matters progressed during the summer months, while the empress, lynx-eyed, watched every step, and, well abetted by the envious suitors to whose aspiring passions the singular, careless and indifferent courtship (if such it could be called) of Ivan, offered an impassable check.

The empress and a few favored ones of her train sat in the celebrated painting room at Nicolaeff, early one September evening, the Count Orrode standing beside her chair and engaged in a half whispered colloquy. The count had been, since Alessandrina's introduction at court, for some two years, an unsuccessful suitor of her highness, and was now pursuing Ivan with a bitterness almost contagious, so that Catherine, in her anger at his quest of the princess, almost forgot the transient favor with which she had regarded him, and entirely so, the victories with which he had increased her glory.

It is a fact that Catherine was as fickle as violent in her passions, and now, angry at being thwarted, she determined, if only for the success of an affair which she had undertaken, that she would bring Ivan to her own imperial feet; and as by-and-by, Alessandrina might be of service to her, she would temporarily dismiss her and put her out of Ivan's way for the present. The empress and Orrode still continued their conversation, when Alessandrina glided in and sat down on a low chair not far distant; her hat hung from her hand, her head was slightly bowed—and thus she remained in deep thought for almost half an hour, when, carelessly entering, with a jest for Galovitch, a courteous compliment for the empress, and a sneer for Orrode, Ivan took a seat beside her.

"I have omitted to ask," said the princess, after a little while, "how the campaign, your highness once spoke of, progresses?"

"Ah! finely. I could not wish better luck. It is no merit to overcome with a day's siege. Better a protracted struggle. You agree with me?"

"Decidedly—if one is certain of success in the end."

"In this case it is the uncertainty that piques one to further prowess?"

And he took her hand that he might examine a curious ring on her finger.

"Is your highness aware," here interrupted Catherine, blandly, "that we lose the Princess Alessandrina to-morrow?"

As if suddenly stung, Ivan sprang from his seat, but instantly controlled himself; while the princess, taken equally unawares, pressed his hand impulsively, but as quickly released it and braced herself against what was to come.

"And where does the court intend to hide its crown, madam?" asked Ivan, with indifferent languor.

"Its crown? Nay—I remain here with your highness and my other friends. It is of Alessandrina I speak!"

"Yes, madam, so you said before. Where shall you dispose of her excellency?"

"We do not disclose our private intentions," answered Catherine, haughtily.

"Do you know, yourself?" asked he aloud, turning, with considerable of the martial spirit in his eye, to Alessandrina.

"Not in the least."

"Then there is no earthly reason why I may not find out," he returned, adding aside, so that none but she might hear—"and find out I will."

"Your highness will see a reason why not," responded Catherine, "when I forbid it."

"Ay, madam, when."

"Does Ivan forget in whose presence he sits?"

"That were impossible, lady," he said, rising and bowing, "let me beg pardon for any seeming disloyalty and intrusion."

Instantly smiling and waving her hand with consummate grace and sweetness, the empress answered:

"In the affairs of the empire it may be necessary to grant it, but where our own person is concerned, Ivan can not be intrusive; with which stroke she flattered herself she had finished the business. Shortly after, Ivan approached the princess and requested permission to rescue her if she found herself in danger.

"I am quite equal to my own safety," answered Alessandrina, in the same whispered tone, and turned to continue her flirtation with Orrode, whom, in her heart, she despised.

The empress danced, later in the evening, and with Prince Ivan, while Alessandrina and Orrode were their vis-a-vis, and Ivan either hung by the empress's chair or danced with other ladies, till Catherine gave the signal for retirement, and never once approached the princess, who now seemed out of favor, but as regardless of that as she had been of her prosperity. The next day she was not at the court, nor the next; it was evident she had departed. But where should Ivan seek her, even if he cared to do so; for, judging from his manner, it would be a matter of doubt to determine were it actuated by anxiety or total unconcern. Should he send emissaries to Paris or Vienna, or was she more probably concealed in some apartment of the palace at Nicolaïff, or dwelling, guarded, in a Finnish hut? He could easily have inquired at the gates for the direction taken by royal couriers preceding a princely barouche, but closely as he was watched, it was not discovered that he had troubled himself at all about the matter.

"Like all men," thought Catherine, "capricious and careless. I would venture he would as easily part from me after all the pains I shall have taken to secure him."

And she glanced at the perfect splendor of his face and bearing, as he sauntered up the garden alley towards her. But after a few days, with a boldness to be expected from him, had she judged aright, Ivan did not present himself, nor, strictly as he was searched for, could himself nor any clue to his whereabouts be detected.

It was a fortnight from the disappearance of Ivan, that a black gondola was slipping one evening down the lagoon at Venice, the gondolieri chanting their endless strains, and countless others shooting past and gliding down the stream beside it. Behind the curtains sat a lady in long dark robes and mantle, and her face covered by a fall of black lace. She sat listlessly, with her hands folded in her lap, and now and then audibly sighing. All at once another barge grazed against hers, and a complete entanglement seemed to take place with a dozen others, while all the gondolieri raised their voices together in one scolding tumult. A hand thrust back the curtains, parted them quickly, and a tall form, stooping, entered and sat down beside her. She would have shrieked for help, if there had been any possibility of her being heard in the snarl without. But as quickly as they had locked together in confusion, the gondolas separated, the clamor ceased, and they slid smoothly on again.

The stranger removed his hat and plume, and revealed the features of Ivan.

"I said I should find your highness," laughed he.

"And you have been successful?"

"What will her majesty say?"

"Probably recall me and banish you."

"She knows nothing of my whereabouts."

"But my gondolieri are Russian spies!"

"Ah! They are quite welcome to pursue their vocation. But recall you? Why then banished for so short a period?"

"The empress will be more secure if I am in her sight. And look!"

She gave him a letter to read—it was a mandate for her return to Russia.

"You questioned me about my campaign, ages since—"

"Not quite three weeks!"

"You asked, was it prospering. It remains for your highness to say shall I, who never was foiled, be now repulsed, or shall I carry back victorious banners of a successful siege, to Nicolaïff. Shall I confront Catherine with a wife? Alessandrina! tormentor—capturer—enslaver! If I conquer, I am conquered; and if defeated—"

He stopped as if petrified by the cold, icy look she gave him, as, having uncovered her face, she turned it upon him. Her tone sounded distant and hollow.

"You are using very singular language. I do not choose to be thus addressed. You presume! Go!"

And she waved him away. He rose, and stood bending an instant, looking down into her eyes.

"False!" he said—"beautiful and false! You, too, will know what it is to suffer such pain!"

He passed his arm round her, pressed her to him, kissed her with burning lips—and was gone. Another instant and she might have relented, have recalled him, though at the risk as she knew it was, of the lives of both. But ere she could speak, four strong arms had pinioned the bold lover from behind, and two others bound him hand and foot with chains, and replaced him on the lounge opposite Alessandrina, behind the curtains, while resuming their oars and song, the gondola was turned about and sped on.

"In double and treble chains, your highness, now?" said Ivan, with a manner that seemed to declare his peculiar situation quite indifferent to him, the moment they were alone.

Alessandrina gazed at him steadily, and then bowing her face to her knees, seemed to shake with sobs.

"Sobs, lady?" said the prince. "Your pity comes too late. Pray dispense with it—it is unnecessary."

"I am not weeping," she answered quietly, raising her head, "nor do I offer you any pity. You have brought yourself into this trouble."

"I shall not retort by declaring you the magnet that drew me thither. Reverses are the fate of war and love—but I shall rise again!"

At this moment the gondola touched the river.

"Has your highness no farewell, no word of consolation for him over whom you have hanged a perhaps terrible fate?"

A gondolier offered his palm for Alessandrina's elbow, to assist her on shore. She rose without a word, although conscious that his eyes were fixed sorrowfully upon her, and only waved her white hand backward through the gloom.

"Stony-hearted!" he murmured, and she left him.

Many and many a long, dreary winter's, summer's and winter's day again was to intervene and punish her haughty spirit, ere she saw that noble form once more. Ere a fortnight she had joined the court at St. Petersburg; but, saying that the first night of her return the empress called her into her presence, and, resting her imperial elbows on the table and her cheeks on her hands, gazed at her steadily for full three hours, not a word was spoken of the late occurrences, nor any reference made to Ivan; but Alessandrina was, to all appearance, fully reinstated in favor, and Prince Ivan, with his order of St. Andrew and the memory of mighty battles won, was seen no more at court.

On first meeting Orrode, Alessandrina had congratulated him ironically on his good fortune, and then assuming her old quietude had received his services with the same coolness as those of all her other suitors; but she knew very well, in what it must all end; and weary the days, weary the nights while winter and summer crawled by, and winter, long and endless, again set in. The festivals of the season were at their height, and tired at heart of all the world, while the dreadful uncertainty of Ivan's fate hung over her, Alessandrina was apparently the centre of all gaiety.

One morning the empress summoned her to her private audience chamber. From the windows might be seen the mirth of the capital, the glistening ice-hills, and the crowds of fur-wrapped people. Catherine motioned her to a seat.

"Your highness, being in my service," said she, "cannot have been at great expense, these last two years. To how much does your fortune amount?"

"Your majesty has the inventory of my valuables. Some millions of roubles."

"I propose to double them, my child, if you accede to my proposition. You have long had several suitors—among them, one whom I have favored."

Her listener turned pale.

"I now wish you to marry Orrode, who has waited on your whims with most exemplary patience."

"And if I refuse, madame?"

"If you refuse? Do you dare dream of such a possibility?"

"Dare do it, madame!"

"Tush! You are absent-minded or surprised. So much happiness may have turned your head. I intend it and it shall be! Come, you have fancied idly, long enough, about Prince Ivan."

It was the first time his name had been mentioned between them.

"Ivan, madame? Where is he?"

"Think you I shall tell, having kept it secret nearly two years? No, no. Dismiss all this. I give you a week to consider."

"I do not need a day! I will never marry Orrode!"

"A week to consider," continued Catherine, "and then refuse if you dare!" And throwing down her pen, she sat back in her chair. "I shall have no punishment too horrible for you!"

So Alessandrina swept away just as determined as if nothing had occurred. Three days of the week had passed, and on the fourth a courier with his horse foaming from the speed of travel, even in that cold weather, dashed into the city. As he left his horse, the noble beast fell dead with fatigue. Instantly seeking the palace, the breathless messenger fell at Catherine's feet and told her of the dreadful condition of her soldiers on the Persian frontier, and of the enormous and dauntless hordes pouring down to overwhelm them. Three hours after, and again at midnight, others arrived with news of accumulated disasters, and at sunrise, a last one, bearing intelligence of the commanding officer's death.

"Good heavens!" cried Catherine, "what shall be done?"

Several of her ladies, the Primate Galovitch and Alessandrina were in the room.

"We shall be ruined! Overcome before all Europe! I have none to supply his place!"

"No one?" asked Alessandrina, looking steadily at her.

"What does it matter to you, mix? Do your fame and glory stand at hazard before all the world, all posterity?"

"Madame, I have no doubt they can be saved."

"Would that I had never banished him! I will give any one five thousand roubles who will bring Prince Ivan to me in time! Alas—it cannot be. There is not another man in the empire whose genius is equal to the necessity. The Siberian snows are melting and prevent travel. Tomsk never can be reached!"

"Lady," whispered Alessandrina, "only write out a pardon and firman. I will find some one to carry them. All will be well."

"Dear child," cried the empress, drawing pen and ink towards her, "I can almost forgive thee everything for the hope thou instildest."

Farlon, and a firman for a messenger were speedily in her hands, and Alessandrina left the room. An hour afterwards Count Orrode entered, and on being informed by the delighted empress of the steps taken, censured everything as a rash proceeding, bade her see what it would come to, and went to bid the gates to be closed and to prevent the messenger of Alessandrina from passing. But too late. The Cossack who had entered her service on leaving Ivan, had already passed out with a large stud of horses for relays along the road, and a person entirely wrapped in furs had quickly followed him, showing the empress's firman, and no questions had been asked. Orrode could only trust to the bad state of the roads for the non-success of the despatch. Next day, Alessandrina not presenting herself, the truth flashed on Catherine's mind, which, as she had a new favorite in the place of her former fancy for Ivan, she was quite ready to applaud; and as days and weeks dragged on and no Alessandrina appeared, Orrode saw that his strategy had been fairly overcome, and waited.

Thus six weeks passed, when, one morning, the old Cossack rode into Tomsk and passed out within an hour, leading a fresh collection of hardy northern steeds to be left on the southern route to Persia, and in the evening the person who bore the firman of the empress alighted beside the door of the stronghold where Ivan was lodged. Seeking the governor, the pardon of the prince was displayed and acknowledged, and the messenger was ushered into the exile's apartment and left there. A low fire burned on the hearth; the room was bare, large and gloomy; the high, narrow windows were above reach and barred. She looked round for the prince himself. He was lying on a bench of boards, over which was thrown his sable cloak. His head rested on his arm, showing his profile, thin and clear, against the black surface, and the paleness of his hollow cheek swept by the long lashes, while he slept. Himself, weary, worn, pallid and travel-stained, she moved softly towards and knelt down beside him. He started and turned uneasily, then opened his eyes and gazed dreamily around.

"Away! away!" he murmured, closing them again. "Will you thus always torment me, heavenly, impossible vision, sleeping or waking?"

"O, my love," murmured she, but half audibly, "have I at last found you?"

A moment more and opening his eyes he beheld her again.

"Am I mad?" he cried, half rising.

"Hardly," answered Alessandrina.

"Is it possible—"

"Entirely so. Prince, you are free! I have brought your pardon."

"And did you bring me nothing else?" he asked, looking earnestly at her.

"Prince, have not the snows of Siberia cooled your love?"

"Like fires on Etruscan altars, it will never be extinguished."

"Does your highness remember that day in Venice?"

"Never, never can it be forgotten."

"Not if I beg you to put it aside forever?"

"It has taught me a thousand things. The sweet I would not lose; the bitter, only by a happiness so glorious that I dare not expect it, can be effaced."

"A glorious happiness! I can give it to you."

"I know you can."

"Behold your appointment. You are commander-in-chief of the great army on the Persian frontier. You are to leave immediately, and go forward on your conquering way. The Cossack, who has been with me since your disappearance, leaves relays all the way, to hasten your progress. There is a happiness that suits you well."

"You are mistaken. All glory and honor and fame are vain and empty beside your love! Alessandrina! Have these two years taught you nothing? Never brought you near me by one sympathetic pulse?"

She put her arm round his shoulder, and raised her mouth to his lips.

"I have been miserable," she said, "for I have had my own folly for a constant self-reproach."

"And Orrode?" asked the happy man, some time after.

"He is still awaiting me at the altar."

"Poor fellow! Alessandrina! how about the campaign? But now for Persia!"

Not another six weeks had elapsed, ere another courier, hurrying into Catherine's presence, announced that while the army was at its worst, suddenly, like a god dropped down from heaven, a stranger had appeared, united the forces, gained a great victory, repulsed the Persians, bearing the war into their own country, added great territories to the Russian empire, and having completely subdued the enemy, would soon be on his triumphal march to St. Petersburg.

A month later, the troops, under arms, were in review upon the square—the general was in the capital, and riding by his side was Alessandrina, while Orrode gnashed his teeth outside the pale of their happiness.

"Your highness," said Catherine, "must forgive our punishment of your escapades, on account of your pardon. We should have known, when banishing you, that we only put ourselves in danger. And but for your noble bravery and the energy of my darling, the ward of Galovitch (who, by the way, is promised to Orrode, yonder), far from being the haughtiest, we should be the humblest nation upon earth. What favor would be too great to grant you? But who, pray, is the lady beside your highness?"

Alessandrina raised her cap with its shading plume and veil, and Ivan answered:

"For the favor, grant me a second pardon. Madame, it is the Princess Alessandrina, my wife!"

INCOMES.

In comparison with Great Britain and the countries of the continent, we have very few princely incomes among us. A man with $100,000 a year would be an enormously rich man. We doubt if there are half a dozen in the whole country who spend this, although many have it. The income of Mr. Astor, for example, is enormous. We have heard it facetiously stated, that if he were to be placed in a room full of three cent pieces, armed with a shovel, he could not throw his income into a basket as fast as it really accumulated. No doubt many millionaires hide their incomes under a basket, and many more reputed ones are glad to hide their principal anywhere. But abroad, £20,000 is a very common income. Wherever the law of primogeniture prevails, incomes must enormously swell.—Sunday Times.

GAS WORKS JOHNSON STREET, KEOKUK, IOWA.

CITY OF KEOKUK, IOWA.

The engravings on this and the succeeding page represent various interesting portions of the city of Keokuk, Iowa, and are from sketches drawn expressly for us on the spot, during the recent tour of that accurate artist, Mr. Kilburn, undertaken for the purpose of obtaining illustrations for the Pictorial. Keokuk is one of the most thriving and beautiful among the marvellous young cities of the great West. It is the semi-capital of Lee county. From its geographical position at the foot of the "Lower Rapids" of the Mississippi River, 205 miles above St. Louis, and 125 miles south of Iowa City, and from its other local advantages, it has been not inaptly termed the "Gate City" of Iowa. Situated in the southeast corner of the State, it is the only city of Iowa that has uninterrupted water communication with all the great tributaries of the "Father of Waters," and must therefore remain, as it is now, the principal outlet for the produce of one of the largest and most fertile States of the Union, so long as river transportation is cheaper than railroad for heavy freight. Notwithstanding these natural facilities for trade, an extensive system of railroads is projected from Keokuk. The Des Moines road, following that rich valley to Fort Des Moines, 150 miles in the heart of the State, is partly constructed, and rapidly going on under the energetic superintendence of Mr. Eaton, the well-known chief engineer. The Keokuk, Mount Pleasant and Muscatine Railroad is rapidly progressing northward. The site of Keokuk is remarkably fine. It covers the top and slopes of a large bluff, round which the river sweeps in a semicircle, and thus commands a noble prospect extending many miles north and south, and is exempt from those diseases so prevalent in the low bottom lands of the western country. The city now contains a population of seven or eight thousand; but, according to the ratio of increase in previous years, it will probably gain two or three thousand on those figures by the emigration of the present season. There is an extensive and rapidly increasing wholesale business done in manufactured goods, groceries, etc., which are supplied to an immense agricultural region north and west, and the demand seems to exceed the supply. This is especially the case with building materials; and double the present number of mechanics in every trade would find employment at high wages. The citizens are mostly eastern men, and their energy is shown by the modern improvements already introduced. The gas works, of which a view is given in our first engraving, erected by Messrs. Herrick & Kilbourne, in 1855, are built of brick, in a tasteful style of architecture that does the designer much credit. The Keokuk Athenæum, the last picture on the next page, was opened for dramatic entertainments last winter; it is a handsome brick building, with a neatly ornamented front, on Second Street, between Johnson and Main. The crossing of the last named street is seen in the middle distance of the picture. It runs at a right angle to the river, and is a wide straight macadamized avenue over a mile long, lined with substantial stores, many of which would do credit to Washington Street or Broadway. The intersection of this main thoroughfare with the "Levee" is shown in our third illustration, with a perspective of the boats, landing, etc., looking towards the north. On the right is the river and the distant shore of Illinois. A large proportion of the residences in and around Keokuk are well and tastefully built. The Female Seminary, represented on this page, is a specimen of this sort of architecture. It is constructed of stone, in an octagonal shape, and, with the surrounding grounds, occupies the summit of the bluff, commanding a magnificent prospect in every direction; just to the left is seen the residence of Col. Curtis, the present mayor of the city. A line of splendid steam packets runs daily between Keokuk and St. Louis; the number of steamboat arrivals in 1852 was 795. The Lower Rapids are eleven miles in extent, in the course of which the river has a fall of twenty-four feet. The cargoes of vessels ascending the river are transhipped over the rapids by steamers drawn by horses, and then reshipped on board of steamboats for their destination. The city contains the medical department of the State University, six or seven churches, three academies, several public schools and a hospital. Two weekly newspapers and a medical journal are published here. The town contains also between eighty and ninety stores, two steam flouring mills and two iron foundries. The value of the merchandise reported as sold here in 1852, was $1,345,000. The Mississippi is about a mile wide at Keokuk, flows on a bed of limestone, and is bordered by bluffs rising abruptly to the height of one hundred and fifty feet. The above statistics, though the latest published, probably give an imperfect idea of the condition and business of the place, which is conducted on the high pressure, go-ahead principle, and increases yearly in magnitude. Enough has been said, however, to show that it is really "something of a village," as our New York friends are willing to admit that Boston is. The State of Iowa, of which Keokuk is one of the most remarkable cities, formed originally a part of the Louisiana purchase, then, successively a part of Missouri, Wisconsin, and lastly of Iowa territory. The first permanent settlement was commenced at Burlington, in 1833. It was admitted into the Union in 1846. It is bounded as follows:—north by Minnesota territory, east by the Mississippi, west by the Indian territory and Minnesota, from the former of which it is separated by the Missouri, and from the latter by the Great Sioux River, and south by Missouri. It contains an area of 50,914 square miles. The face of the country is generally a rolling prairie, furrowed by several important rivers, such as the Des Moines, 450 miles long, which traverses the entire State, the Skunk River, 200, and the Iowa, 300 miles long. Iowa is rich in mineral resources; about one tenth of the great lead region of the Upper Mississippi lies within the State. In 1853, 3,256,970 pounds of lead were shipped from Dubuque and Buena Vista. Zinc and copper are found, and there are also productive coal mines. The climate is healthy, and permits of a varied agriculture; the peach tree blossoms in April, fall wheat ripens in July, spring wheat in August, and Indian corn in October. The rivers are generally frozen over from two to three months in winter. The soil is generally excellent and easily tilled, and there is due admixture of woodland and prairie; the staple productions are Indian corn, wheat and live stock, besides large quantities of rye, barley, buckwheat, oats, potatoes, butter, cheese, hay, wool, maple sugar, honey and beeswax. Iowa is, on the whole, well wooded, though north of the 42d parallel of latitude there is a scarcity of timber. Ash, elm, sugar and white maple grow in belts on the river banks. Among the other trees are oak, black and white walnut, locust, ironwood, cottonwood, lime and pine. Manufactures are yet in their infancy; but as the State possesses abundance of coal and water power, we may presume that they will be rapidly developed. In 1850, there were 482 manufacturing establishments, with an average yearly product of about $500. Three of them were engaged in the manufacture of iron, employing $5500 capital, and producing castings worth $8500; one woolen factory, with $31,225 capital, producing stuffs valued at $13,000, and breweries and distilleries, producing from an investment of $19,000, 160,000 gallons of whiskey, beer, etc. In 1852, $280,483 were invested in mills and distilleries. We have alluded above to the internal improvements of the State. Thoughtful provision is made for education. All lands granted by Congress, all escheated estates, and whatever percentage Congress may allow on the public lands sold within the State, are to constitute a fund, the interest of which and the rent of unsold lands, together with military and court fines, are to form an appropriation for the support of public schools in Iowa, which are to be under the direction of a superintendent of public instruction, elected for three years by the people. Schools must be kept open at least three months in every year in each district. An appropriation is also made for the support of Iowa University, which is to be perpetual. In 1850, there were two colleges, with 100 pupils; 742 public schools, with 29,616 pupils, and 31 academies and other schools, with 1051 pupils. In the same year there were 193 churches in Iowa, of which the Baptists owned 20; Christians, 10; Congregationalists, 14; Episcopalians, 5; Friends, 5; Lutherans, 4; Methodists, 71; Presbyterians, 38, and Roman Catholics, 18. The rest were divided among German Reformed, Moravians and Universalists. Many excellent newspapers are published in the State, which also contains several libraries established on a good basis. The governor of the State is chosen for four years, and receives a salary of $1000; the senate is chosen for the same period, and the representatives for a term of two years—all elected by the people. The sessions of the legislature are biennial, and the two branches assemble on the first Monday in December of each alternate year. The members receive $2 per diem for the first fifty days of the session, and $1 a day thereafter—a plan unfavorable to protracted debates and dilatory legislation; the members receive mileage at the rate of $2 for every twenty miles of travel. The judiciary consists of a supreme court, presided over by one chief and two associate judges, receiving each $1000 per annum, and of district courts, each presided over by one judge, who receives $1000 a year. The judges of the supreme court are elected by a joint vote of the legislature for six years, and the district judges by the people of their districts for five years. The assessed value of property in Iowa, in 1853, was $49,384,905. In 1854, the public debt was $79,795. There was but one bank in the State in June, 1852, with a capital of $200,000. But after all, statistics and figures convey to few minds an accurate idea of the substantial realities they represent. To understand and appreciate the greatness and rapidity of growth of the great West, requires a deliberate tour through it. Travellers rush abroad to examine the marvels of Europe, and neglect the wonders that lie within four or five days' journey of their homes.

FEMALE SEMINARY, CORNER OF SECOND AND HIGH STS., KEOKUK, IOWA.

THE ASSAULT OF IVREE.

During the campaign of 1800, the French army, destined to meet the power of Austria on the plains of Italy, before it could render itself master of Turin and Milan, penetrate even to the walls of Genoa, and declare the terms of peace on the battle-field of Marengo, had yet to surmount that vast Alpine barrier which extends from the St. Bernard to Nice and Montenotte, and to overcome a series of tremendous obstacles, presenting themselves one after another in seemingly endless succession, and tasking to the utmost, if not defying, the courage of the troops and the military genius and perseverance of the leaders. These obstacles were not merely the result of natural position; but there were instances in which the resistance of the invaded was more obstinate and terrible than that of mountains, precipices or rivers. Protected by fortifications of little strength or difficulty, and but very inefficiently aided by a locality which yielded but few means or opportunities of vigorous defence, but sustained by an indomitable courage, great resource of invention, and an enthusiastic love of country, infinitely more formidable even than their courage and their skill, the inhabitants of the small town and citadel of Ivree, with a garrison of four thousand Austrian soldiers and twenty-five pieces of cannon, maintained their post for three days against an army of forty thousand Frenchmen, commanded by the three youngest, but already most illustrious generals in Europe, Massena, Lannes and Bernadotte. Furious at seeing his march thus arrested before this insignificant little place, he who had taken Alexandria in a day, and Cairo in an hour, and impatient moreover to assume his position for the investment of Milan, the commander-in-chief, on the twenty-fifth of May, 1800, ordered the division of General Laanes to march upon the village in all its force, and take it by assault. After three hours of sanguinary combat, of fierce attack and the most heroic defence, a handful of the defenders, driven from the citadel, retreating step by step, and hotly pursued by the victorious Frenchmen, threw themselves as a last resort into the quarters of Adjutant-General H., with the resolution there to maintain themselves to the last, and sell their lives as dearly as they might. In a moment the house occupied by this brave veteran was converted into a fortress—barricades were thrown up, loop-holes for musketry cut in the walls, and every disposition made that time and means afforded, for a last desperate resistance. Lannes, who was the first to enter the deserted village, detached an officer in command of two battalions, to drive the insurgents from their position. The officer, equally distinguished among his fellow-soldiers for his impetuous courage and his ferocity, soon forced his way, at the head of one of his battalions, into the disputed mansion, trampling as he went upon the bodies of the forty brave fellows by whom it had been defended. General H., the only survivor, after beholding the slaughter of his garrison, had armed himself with a hatchet, and with almost superhuman strength and desperation, opposed the entrance of the republicans; and when their leader presented himself, sword in hand, at the door of the room to which he had retreated, as his last stand of defence, the old general aimed at his head a furious blow, which would have closed his career at once and forever, had it not been skillfully parried by the sabre of the Frenchman. It was the last effort of the wounded and wearied veteran; he fell—and in another moment the apartment was filled with republicans. The Frenchman, who was never known to yield quarter to a vanquished enemy in the fifteen years of his military life, stepped forward to despatch the fallen general, when a young and lovely woman rushed from an adjoining room, threw herself at his feet, and kneeling there, pale, distracted, the tears streaming from her eyes, shrieked forth, in a voice of terror and despair:

"Spare him! O, spare him! Do not take his life; he is my husband—the father of my child!"

The Frenchman glanced for a moment at the suppliant, with an eye in which there was no trace either of anger or pity—and then, deliberately pushing her aside, he made a step in advance, took a cool and steady aim with his pistol at the wounded officer, and shot him through the heart. The wife of the murdered man uttered a fearful scream, and starting to her feet and flying to the room whence she had come, returned in a moment with her boy, who, at the sight of his father's massacre, had hidden himself, pale and trembling, under the bed; she held him up to the ferocious republican, and exclaimed:

"Monster! you have slain the father—complete your work, and destroy the son!"

At this moment loud shouts were heard, and a French general, surrounded by a crowd of officers, appeared at the door of the apartment. The scene was dramatic—a perfect coup de theatre. The heart of the ferocious soldier failed him; pallor overspread his features, and his limbs shook; while Madame H., as by a sudden impulse, flung herself at the feet of the general, with a single cry for "vengeance!" The general raised her kindly and respectfully, demanding at the same moment an explanation of the scene before him. There was but little need for words; the objects upon which he gazed bore to his mind the accusation of his subordinate; that disfigured corpse—that female upon whose lineaments were stamped horror and despair—that feeble child, with pallid cheeks, and his eyes streaming tears, calling upon his father, who answered not. The general perceived at once that there was no fact to be ascertained, no excuse to be admitted. His eye flashed fire, and striking his glove forcibly upon the palm of his left hand, he turned abruptly, and with a lowering brow, to the assassin who stood before him speechless, and exclaimed:

"Sir, you are a coward and a savage! What! murder in cold blood an unarmed man—defenceless—a veteran—before the eyes of his wife imploring mercy! It is the act of a fiend!"

"But, general," muttered the criminal, with a hesitating voice—the voice of one who feels that he is lost—

"Be silent, sir!" interrupted the general. "I listen to no excuses; I admit of no defence. You are unworthy to serve the republic. Give me up your sword, your epaulettes. From this moment you are dismissed from the brigade, you have disgraced—from the army upon which you are a stain!"

The major raised his head with a proud, fierce look.

"General," he said, but with a voice that betrayed his emotion,

"I surrender my sword, but I demand a trial by my comrades."

"You shall have it, sir, and within the hour."

Then turning to the officers who had accompanied him to the spot, and reverentially baring his head before the body of the victim, he said to them:

"Unite with me, gentlemen, in rendering the tribute of respect to unfortunate courage—to a brave and fallen enemy."

The remainder of that dreadful day was passed by Madame H. in the bitterness of grief. After witnessing the interment of her husband with military honors, this unhappy woman, who had lost in a single moment, and under circumstances of such peculiar horror, all that made life dear to her, except her boy, sunk into a lethargy of sorrow—an abandonment to wretchedness. While she had a murdered husband to avenge, a helpless child to protect and save, she had preserved her energies of mind and body; but now, when the assassin had undergone the shame of a public degradation, and the prompt and terrible justice of a military commission impended over his head, the hapless widow could think of nothing but her loss. For her there seemed to be no longer cause of hope or fear. She was therefore more astonished than alarmed, when, early the next morning, a French mid-de-camp waited upon her, with a request from the commander-in-chief, that she would repair immediately to his quarters at the Hotel de Ville. Without a word of inquiry or remonstrance she arose, took her child into her arms, and followed the messenger of the general. Led to the council-chamber at the moment of her arrival, Madame H. found herself surrounded by all the glories of the republican army; by those noted men for whom such wondrous destinies were reserved; by whom crowns were to be won and lost. There were Murat, Duroc, Lannes, Desaix, Massena, Hoche and Bernadotte; and in the midst of them the general, who, with his arms folded on his breast, and his eyes fixed upon the floor, walked slowly to and fro, as if in deep and painful meditation. On the entrance of Madame H. he stopped abruptly, motioned her to be seated, and then, after gazing for a moment upon the face of her child, with a gentle smile of interest and affection, resumed his walk. Madame H. began to feel alarm. This unexpected summons, this strange reception, the silence that prevailed around her, all combined, first to surprise and then to terrify her. A vague sensation of anxiety and fear oppressed her heart, and she could not command her nerves for the utterance of a single word that might call forth a solution of her doubts. All at once the roll of a drum at a little distance startled her from her painful reveries. It was quickly followed by a volley of musketry, and the general, pausing in his walk, placed his hand upon her arm, and led her to a window, from which she beheld in the square below the fearful spectacle of a military execution just accomplished.

"Look, madame," he said, in a calm, yet impressive tone. "The man whom you see lying dead upon the ground, was a French officer, whom his comrades in arms have condemned to death, for the assassination of an Austrian in a city taken by assault."

He paused for a moment; then glancing round upon the officers who stood near, he continued:

"You are at liberty to quit Ivree this morning. General Desaix, whom I have requested to be your escort, will answer to the republic for your safety. Farewell, madame; report to the Prince Charles what you have seen of the justice maintained in the armies of the French."

This general, at that time first consul, was afterwards the Emperor Napoleon.—Portfolio.

VIEW OF THE LEVEE, KEOKUK, IOWA.

KEOKUK ATHENÆUM, SECOND STREET, KEOKUK, IOWA.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

MYSELF.

BY WILLIE B. PARSON.

I tired of all the thousand themes
On which we rhymesters ply the pen;
The vague desires, the various schemes,
Bubbles on fancy's flowing streams,
That fill the measure of their dreams,
To charm the ears of maids and men.

And so, forsaking star and care,
The maiden's pride, the miser's pelf;
The noisy town, the quiet grave;
The purring tide, the rollicking wave;
I for awhile attention gave
To one sole theme, and that—myself.

The past to memory was true,
And, at my bidding, it called up
Hopes—cherished when my years were few;
Dreams—that with ripened boyhood grew;
But now, unwelcome to my view,
Like leech from life's enchanted cup.

There was the promise of my years,
Plain written on my ample brow;
Ere errors, agonies and fears,
Brought with them heart-notes, bathed in tears;
Ere I had sunk beneath my peers;
What answers to that promise now?

Nothing that would redeem those hours,
Even yet, to memory sweet;
The flowers that bloomed in those fair bowers
Have withered now, and evil towers
Supreme above her sister powers
Of sorrow and deceit.

I look along the path of years,
And see life's ruin as it lies,
Just where it fell, amid the jeers
Of scornful ones, who uttered sneers
To mockery of all my tears
And all my spirit sighs.

I look again, and now I see
A simple mound, with grass o'erspread;
There sleeps one who was true to me
Through peril and through poverty;
But now she rests! and wearily
I watch the green grass o'er her head.

I can but own my life has been
A failure, fatal to my peace;
I missed the goal I hoped to gain,
I missed the measure of the strain
That harks fame's fever in the brain,
And now—when shall my sorrows cease?

Myself! Alas for theme so poor—
A theme no one heart calleth dear;
I stand a wreck on error's shore,
A spectre on mirth's jocund floor,
Throwing a shadow evermore—
Ah me, what do I here?

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE LITTLE ORPHAN.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

THE low-hung clouds had drooped all day over that little green churchyard, and still the little mourner sat there upon the turf, weaving the small blue violets into wreaths with the pale, tender leaves of the hawthorn, just out of bud. Large drops of rain splashed down upon the clear olive brow, and bathed the pale cheek, and yet she stirred not from the freshly-turfed mound. She had been watched by eyes of which she was unconscious; and now the sound of footsteps startled her not, so deep was her abstraction, so self-contained her grief. But when a figure came before her, and a kindly face met her now upturned eye, she betrayed no sign nor fear of agitation.

"Who is it for whom you are making those garlands, dear?" said a gentle voice.

"My mother, sir," said the child; and as she looked at his sympathizing face, she burst into a new passion of sorrowful tears.

The stranger, a man apparently about thirty-five years of age, sat down by the side of the little child, and passing his arm about her, tenderly as a father or brother would do, he tried to hush the convulsive sobbing, which seemed as if it would shake her slight frame too violently. She covered her eyes with her small, dark hand, and the stranger then had an opportunity to remark her appearance. She was about eleven years old, he judged; with small, finely formed limbs, and a face which showed no hue but the olive. Dark, spiritual eyes, from which the sparkle had been dimmed by recent tears, teeth whose snowy whiteness was almost painful to the eye, when contrasted with the dark face, met his gaze.

No flashing of red blood came into that cheek; it was as if chilled from dark marble. Only in the lips was a faint crimson, scarcely perceptible. Not a blue vein to be seen in the temples; and yet she was a glorious little creature. The dark crisp waves of her long hair were gathered up at the back of her neck by a large silver arrow, and a cross of the same hue from her girdle. Her dress was a simple loose robe of some black material, fastened round the waist by a broad leather belt, and coming up very high round the throat, while it left the arm bare to the shoulder. Excepting the arrow and cross, the dress, although scrupulously neat and clean, betokened something like poverty—so coarse and plain was its material.

By degrees, as she could speak, she related to her new friend the death of her mother and only brother—the long, long absence of her father, and her utter destitution of friends and money, in a strange land, and wasting with grief for her desolate state. If she could get back to Germany, she would find some one to take care of her, and if she could but keep back her tears, she would hire an organ and go round until she could get money enough to take her back; but her heart was so sore, she could not bear the sound of music. Her name was Dahl, she said—Zaira Dahl. She was named Zaira after an Italian friend of her mother's, who was also an Italian by birth, although her father was a German. But there was no trace of German blood to be seen in their child—she was all Italian.

The poor child might have lighted upon a worse person than Rufus Trent; and yet there were people who thought very ill of him, too, and would have shuddered to think of his voluntarily adopting a little girl—for even while the child was telling her simple story, the purpose was formed in his mind.

Many faults had Rufus Trent. He was an only son, left at an early age with a large fortune—so large that he had not thought it necessary to acquire any profession, and had spent most of his time in travelling. He came back from his travels with a look that spoke of something more than mere weariness or satiety. He walked apart from others, paid no homage at the shrines that were duly decked with gems and laces for his adoration, and had the air of a man who had "not loved the world, nor the world him."

Abroad, he had drained the cup of pleasure to the dregs. At home, he refused to mingle with those who drink less deeply. On his native soil he was at least free from stain. His patrimony was undiminished, his broad lands free, and the giant oaks had not been ever thinned in his ancestral woods. Some vain babble there was, that a terrible disappointment in a foreign country had blighted his happiness, had seared his heart, and perhaps steeped him in crime; but there was no evidence of the truth of this, and few would have dared to speak it loudly. It was named only in whispers, and with closed doors.

Since he returned home he had experienced, for the first time in his life, a feeling of utter loneliness. He scorned the society about him, and would neither heed to them, nor receive their hollow compliments. His home, therefore, was silent in its deep quietude of wood and vale, and mountain and rill—all his own, never intruded upon by strangers. In the house, only one old servant, who had been with his mother during her last sickness, and a man and boy, who took care of the grounds.

What would Hannah Drury say, if he carried home this child to increase her cares and labor? Little would she care, if it only made him happy; for never were servants more attached to a master—never was master more tender and indulgent to servants. So, after soothing the little girl's tearful sorrow, he took her home.

"I have brought you a present, Hannah," he said, as he drew the child into the large room where Hannah reigned mistress. "You will be kind to her, for she has neither father nor mother."

"Poor thing!" said Hannah; and her voice of genuine pity sealed a bond that was never broken. The child was "a present" to her forever, and she always called her "her own."

Mr. Trent called her Hannah's child, too; and he allowed her to come and go as she pleased, either to his own parlor or Hannah's. He would look at her as she sat reading, as she best loved to do, on a low stool by the fire, and think how beautiful she was growing. Her presence made his room seem less lonely; and, instead of exacting gratitude to her for the home he gave her, he was grateful to her for her presence there. It was like an angel's wing overshadowing his household—the continual presence of that little pure and innocent child.

She had ceased to weep for her mother, now that she had found other friends. She loved old Hannah so well, that she would eagerly lay her book aside, and run to execute any little demand upon her time. No heavy task was assigned her. But her dearest work was to wait on her benefactor. He would not take a cup of tea even from any other hand than hers, and it was she who prepared his breakfast every morning, to Hannah's manifest vexation.

He would not send her to school, but had masters attend her at home, and her proficiency in her studies, though not remarkable, was still quite good. She did not acquire rapidly, but she retained everything she learned. She had no taste for mere accomplishments, and he did not press her to learn, for he had become thoroughly tired of the unvarying round of young ladies' music and painting. Zaira sang; but it was just as a bird trills out its native, wild bursts of song. She knew no art, no measured swells or cadences. How he loved to hear her wake up the echoes of the large hall, where her birdlike notes deepened on his ear as he sat in his own quiet room. And how she would hush up as she came into his presence, until he urged her to sing to him; and then she would draw up her low seat to his side, and leaning her arm upon his chair, she would pour forth a full stream of glad music, such as never comes from the trained throats of fashionable young ladies.

"You would make your fortune with that voice, Zaira," he once said to her. "Suppose that I set you up with an organ, and let you try street practice."

"I have thought of it," she said, quietly. "When shall I begin?"

He looked at her earnestly, and for the first time in the three years that she had now spent in his house, he asked himself the question what should he really do with her? "Time enough to answer that question," he said to himself; but he could not help thinking how ranch she had altered since he brought her home, a little tearful, tawny child.

He had spared no expense in her dress, always getting rare and costly material, although she would wear no color but black or white. The silver arrow had given place to a pearl one, and so had the cross; the hair had grown darker and longer, but the waves were as perceptible as ever.

To-day she was radiant. Her lip, now full and red with health, had curled just a little, when he spoke of her singing in the street; and with that scarce perceptible curl, there came a memory flashing up from the past, and, as if by magic, she recalled the form of one whom he had known in Italy. And for three years he had loved this little child, and never known why. A child no longer, she was bursting upon him in the fresh glow of early womanhood. Just so had Teresa looked in her bridal garments on the day when he saw another kneel by her at the altar, bearing her away from his own faithful heart.

For nearly sixteen years he had been trying to shut out this vision, and now it was coming back to him by his own hearthstone. He had wandered in other lands, trying to drown, with the Lethean cup of pleasure, all memory of the Italian Teresa. He knew she was not happy with the man for whom she had forsaken him. He knew, afterwards, that she had suffered from poverty, desolation and sickness; that she and her children had left their home, and wandered no one knew where. Could this be the solution of the mystery which had kept him so long from finding her? Was the name of Dahl assumed? For so sure as love had ever breathed from the mother's lips to his listening ear, this was Teresa's child—and yet he had never seen it before.

Question after question succeeded, and every artless answer deepened his conviction. From Zaira he gathered enough to know that her mother was deserted, that she was broken-hearted, and that when her youngest born had died, she had but one pang in dying—leaving her helpless child to the uncertain mercy of the world. Could she have known that he would have protected her, how would the pang have been softened?

For awhile Trent almost sunk beneath his emotions. Never for a moment had he ceased to love Teresa. He was but a boy when he first saw her, and she was a radiant woman, brilliant with all the fascinations of the daughters of Italy; but he loved her with a deep and undying love, and she returned it. Then a bitter misunderstanding rose between the two fiery hearts, and in a moment of passion she gave her hand to the cold, calculating German, to whom she had really transferred her love. How often had Trent repeated to himself the words which, of all others, expressed his sensations at that period; and in this hour they returned to him again with added force:

"I saw thee wedded—thou didst go
Within that sacred aisle,
Thy young cheek in a blushing glow
Betwixt a tear and smile
Thy heart was glad in maiden glee,
And he it loved so fervently,
Was faithful all the while.
I hate him for the vow he spoke—
I hate him for the vow he broke."

Zaira felt conscious of a change in her guardian's manner towards her, but she could not fathom it. She imperceptibly followed out this change in her own conduct, and for some days the two were nearly separated, without knowing exactly why.

It took some time for Trent to analyze his true feelings for Zaira. Sometimes he acknowledged no feeling but that of an almost paternal love. He had taken her as a child, and until now had regarded her as such. She had burst suddenly upon his sight a woman—almost as beautiful and radiant as she whose image had been so dear to his boyish fancy. What relation could he now bear to this young creature? Walking hastily up and down his chamber, he caught a glimpse of himself in the mirror. How little had time changed him! He drew from a desk a miniature of himself which had been painted expressly for Teresa, but which was not quite finished when they parted. He was but twenty then; now he was nearly twice that age, and yet there was little perceptible change. Not a silver thread in the dark hair; not a furrow in the high, pale brow. Nothing had altered except the expression. In the miniature there was a look of hope and joy; the face reflected back from the mirror had neither.

And then the thought came over him that she, for whom this youthful face had been pictured on the ivory, who had gazed upon it as it grew beneath the painter's hand, had immolated her heart upon this unhappy marriage, and then lain down her beautiful and queenly head in the grave! How different would it have been, had he married her! All that wealth could buy, or affection suggest, would have been showered at her feet. She would have been living now, unchanged perhaps even less than himself, for she would not have been borne upon the billows of disappointment as she had been. No; Teresa's face was not one that could change.

This child should have called him father! He was that to her now almost. Could he be more? Or how could he best devote his life to Teresa's child? It was a hard question, and Trent came from his chamber that day, darkly feeling how little the present can repay us for the past. He looked again into those clear, beautiful eyes, and he almost fancied that he saw something which, had he been more trustful, would have persuaded him that he was loved with a deeper interest than he had before thought it possible.

Zaira gave him the same quiet, unquestioning obedience that she had done always. From the moment in which he had brought her home and bestowed her upon Hannah Drury, until now, his will had been her supreme law, and it was also her supreme pleasure. Not a wish did he but remotely hint at, or even look, that her ready eye did not see, and her ready hand execute. If, in the long future, he should find some being whom he might consider "divinely endued" to become Teresa's successor in his long widowed heart, would she be to him what this little Zaira was unconsciously becoming? And if that should ever happen, in what relation could he place Zaira to him or his wife?

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE CRAZY CAPTAIN.

BY EDGAR A. FARNSWORTH.

He had passed out into the small but rare conservatory, which the hands of Zaira had so beautifully tended, and was leaning sadly against the door, looking at the lovely blossoms that were clustering in graceful beauty around him. From within he heard her sweet voice singing a sad, low strain, the echoes of which had lingered on his memory for seventeen years! Teresa had sung it for him again and again; and not even Teresa's voice had the beauty and volume which dwell in this untutored child of song. It was like hearing Teresa's notes from the other world, so spiritual did that young voice seem in its low, sweet tones.

It was long past sunset, and while Zaira was wondering why he stayed from her so long, he came to the door and asked her to go with him to the grove. This was an avenue of tall oaks, under which they frequently walked, and to which they had given the name of the grove. By the time they reached it, the moon had risen, and was silencing the tops of the giant trees. Under these trees Trent had placed seats, and here they often passed long hours reading. He drew Zaira to a seat, and told her the history of the past. He dwelt longest upon his own misery when he found that he had lost Teresa; how dark and cold had seemed the world, and how fondly he had longed for companionship, but refused to take any other to his heart, because no one could be to him what Teresa had been.

Zaira wept long and tenderly at the sorrow he had known; but when he told her that this being was her mother, she looked at him with an almost incredulous surprise. In that look he again traced Teresa's. Just so had she looked at their last parting. Zaira's, perhaps, had more of dewy softness, less of fire; but there was the same dark, liquid depth, the same expression that, under strong excitement, made language almost superfluous. That expression in Zaira's eyes seemed to ask if she too was to be parted from him; and in that question seemed involved the whole of her earthly happiness.

Lonely and desolate enough seemed the girl's life, if now she were banished from the roof that had so kindly sheltered her—the heart that had so cherished her. And where could she go? These were thoughts that filled both their minds equally. To have her stay now, just as she had done, was a thing not to be thought of; she was no longer a child to be petted and indulged. She had grown up suddenly into that image of Teresa—that wife of whom he had been cruelly defrauded. He was here free, unshackled, scarcely older in seeming than when he had stood by Teresa's side, almost her husband. Could he but annihilate the time between those two periods—could he but forget that she was Teresa's daughter! Alas, when does knowledge bring happiness! From the time of our first parents until now, the tree of knowledge has borne its bitter fruits.

In the hush of midnight he reflected, for the first time, that there need be no haste in his decision; he would wait—wait until time should develop the best or the worst of their situation. He would go away, where he could judge calmly. This sudden restoration of Teresa to his sight might perhaps warp his judgment, and he would leave Zaira with Hannah, and travel over some unvisited portion of his own country.

There was genuine sorrow in Zaira's face when he came down unexpectedly one day prepared for travel, and announced his intention. There were tears in her beautiful eyes, too, that latterly had seemed hardly to be dry at all; and almost he felt like giving up his plan of separation. But he went; and Zaira wandered about the house and garden with a sad face and a languid step, that brought Hannah to her side with roots and herbs, and a thousand infallible recipes for sickness.

"But I am not sick, Hannah," she persisted in saying.

"Never tell me, deary," Hannah would answer. "Don't I know the syntims of tryphus? There's your back—that aches, I know, for you walk crooked, and you've allers bin as straight as an arrer. Then your head's hot—that's tryphus, too; and your eyes are heavy. So now drink all this and go to bed, for master will never forgive me, if I don't take care of you while he is gone. Says he to me that very morning, 'Hannah,' says he, 'I want you to see to her,' says he. 'And let me find her well and comfortable like,' says he, 'when I come home.' So now, I am going to do it."

And Zaira swallowed the bitterness for the sake of the sweetness of knowing that she was thus cared for by the absent.

Trent was gone four weeks. He returned one evening as unexpectedly as he went. Zaira had lived through Hannah's prescriptions, and was coming home through the grove, after a long ramble in the woods beyond. She knew his step as he came up behind her, and she turned back to meet him. Their eyes met in the dim twilight, and they knew then how dear they were to each other. These four weeks had shown them that they could not live apart. To her he was her first and only love. To him she was the new earthly embodiment of that which made at once his boyhood's hope, the suffering of his youth, and now lived again, renewed in the deep happiness of his manhood.

THE EOLIAN HARP.

This instrument, which gives forth such sweet music, should be placed in the window of every man's house. Its "mutterings" will do more to harmonize the soul than any other thing that can be devised. The Eolian Harp consists of a long narrow box of very thin deal, about five or six inches deep, with a circle in the middle of the upper side of one and a half inches in diameter, in which is to be drilled small holes. On this side seven, ten, or more strings of very fine gut are stretched over bridges at each end, like the bridge of a fiddle, and screwed up, or relaxed with screw-pins. The strings must all be tuned to one and the same note, and the instrument placed in some current of air, where the wind can pass over its strings with freedom. For instance, a window, of which the width is exactly equal to the length of the harp, with the sash just raised to give the air admission, is a proper situation; when the air blows upon these strings with different degrees of force, it will excite different tones of sound.—Scientific American.

We were homeward bound with a fair wind. Two bells had been struck in the mid-watch without one of our men having started even an apology for a story; but the silence was at last broken by the following inquiry: "Does any man on this forecastle know what's become of Cap'n Osborne as used to sail out of Boston a good many years ago?"

"Which d'ye mean?" said an old foretopman; "there's been a good many of that name masters of Boston vessels; but I never knew anything particular about any of 'em, unless 'twas Cap'n Willis Osborne."

"Ah! he's the very man!" returned the other; "I sailed with him a number of voyages, off and on, but of late years I've lost track of him; but do you know what's ever become of him?"

"Run mad—crazy—got out of his senses," was the reply, "and finally got killed by a whale, which was the most rational thing he'd done for a whole cruise; but if you'll take the trouble to listen for the matter of a few minutes or so, I'll tell you all about it."

"I was supercargo of the Muscatine barque; Cap'n Will, as we used to call him, commanded her. We were bound from Boston to Valparaiso. We were several days out before Cap'n Will made his appearance on deck. He stayed below in his state-room, and left the barque entirely to the charge of his officers; and I couldn't help thinking that certain ship owners in Boston had got rather a queer sort of man to command the fast sailing vessel in their service; however, I saw nothing which led me to suppose he was not in his right mind, until one day when we were a little more than a week's sail from home, it began to blow in squalls."

"The second officer had the deck at the time, and had just given orders to clew up the royals, when Cap'n Will made his appearance on deck for the first time since leaving Boston. 'Mr. Toby,' said he, addressing the second mate, 'I wish you to recollect that it's expressly against the laws of Neptune to ever take in a royal excepting while the vessel lies in port;' then looking aloft, he recalled the boys who had gone up to furl the royals, then went immediately below again. When we were in the Gulf Stream, he came on deck and ordered stun-sails set, when we should at least have been under single-reefed topsails, and the consequence was, the loss of the booms with everything attached."

"After this he did not interfere with the officers again—in fact, he took no interest, seemingly, in the working of the barque, until one night off Cape Horn, when it came on to blow—and it did blow a terrific gale, too. Not caring to sleep, I left my berth a little past four bells in the first watch, and going upon deck, joined the mate on the quarter-deck. Every stitch of canvass had been taken in and furl'd, with the exception of the main-top-sail close reefed, and the fore-staysail; yet the barque rolled and plunged fearfully, and the sea continually swept her decks."

"Have you noticed how singular Captain Osborne appears of late?" said the mate, addressing me.

"Before I could reply, we were joined by the object of his inquiry, who came on deck with nothing on but his pantaloons, and his long hair streaming in the wind. There was no longer any doubt in my mind but what he had gone crazy, and taking the mate a little further aft, I told him my fears."

"I think the same," said he, "but it will not do for him to see us talking here," and requesting me to stand by him in case of an emergency, he turned away."

"Mr. Freeman," said the captain, "go forward and call the other watch, and prepare to make sail."

"They are already on deck, sir," replied the mate. "I have just taken in the fore-top-sail, and was obliged to call all hands."

"The captain burst into a fit of laughter. 'What an idea,' said he, 'calling all hands to take in a mere rag like that! A mere child could furl it without difficulty; but I'm glad you've called all hands, for we need them to make sail; we've lain here becalmed long enough; and now good-by to all slow sailing, and go forward, Mr. Freeman, and set that fore-top-sail again.'"

"The mate hesitated a moment, to satisfy himself that the captain was in earnest, then went forward and set the sail, although it blew so violently it was with difficulty sheeted home. He started to go aft, when he met Cap'n Will coming forward."

"Mr. Freeman," said he, "set everything forward."

"It won't do, sir," said the mate, "there's already more canvass on her than she can well carry."

"Set everything forward, I say," shouted the captain, in his ear, "or, if you like better, you may go below and keep the cabin-boy from throwing the anchors overboard. I'll take the barque to Valparaiso before daylight. Loose the foresail, men; see the hal-yards all clear, and stand by to sheet home. Wont she sail beautiful, though! Some of you boys lay up and cast the gaskets off the fore-top-gallant sail and royal. I'm bound to be in port before morning, so work lively, boys, while we have a breeze."

"Captain Osborne," said the mate, "this is downright folly, to think of carrying so much sail in such a gale as this."

"Loose the fore-topmast staysail and the jib," shouted the captain, entirely regardless of the remonstrances of the mate.

"The foresail was at length set; but no sooner set, than the lee sheet parted, and the sail was blown into ribbons quicker than you can say 'belay that.'"

"Work lively with those head sails there, and heud on a new foresail—it never'll do to lose such a breeze as this."

"Cap'n Will had hardly ceased speaking, when the jibboom parted close to the bowsprit, and came alongside with a terrible crash, throwing the man who was loosing the jib into the sea. Almost at the same instant the fore-top-gallant and fore-royal mast went over the side, carrying overboard the two boys who had gone up to loose the fore-top-gallant sail and royal.

"Lay up and loose the main-sail, and shake the reefs out of the main-top-sail—we want more kindly wind."

"For the last few moments I had watched the mate closely, and on seeing him beckon to me, I left the quarter-deck, and made my way forward, but before I had passed the main rigging, he took a belaying pin from the rail, and with one blow felled Cap'n Will to the deck; then loading his arms with a bit of sewing stuff, he lifted him from the deck and carried him to the cabin, and into the state-room, then fastening the door, came immediately on deck, and ordered the barque put about on the other tack, in order, if possible, to save those who were overboard. The men all saw the true state of affairs, and obeyed the mate's orders with all possible despatch; but the barque was so encumbered with the fallen spars, that considerable time elapsed before we could clear the wreck, and put about on the other tack; and no boat could live in such a sea as was running then; and although we cruised about there for a long time, we saw nothing of the missing men."

"Mr. Freeman mustered all hands on the quarter-deck, and stated to them his belief that Captain Osborne was crazy, and that while any symptoms of it lasted, he should take the command of the barque upon himself. The crew had seen enough that very night to convince them of the truth of his statement, and they all agreed that it was best for him to take command of the vessel as long as Captain Osborne should show symptoms of insanity."

"The captain was securely confined in the cabin, and a close watch kept upon his movements. For a few days he raved incessantly, although he did not appear to realize how matters stood on board the barque. A few days before we got into Valparaiso, he was taken dreadfully sick with the brain fever, and remained so most of the time we laid in port; but a few days before we started for home, he began to recover not only his health, but his reason, and had forgotten entirely the events of the past few weeks. All he knew was that he had been sick. He now took the command of the barque as though nothing unusual had happened, although he several times remarked to the mate that he must have had a great deal of heavy weather to have carried away so many spars."

"When we were three days out, on the homeward passage, the mate had a fall from the main-top-sail cross-trees to the deck, which broke his arm, and otherwise disabled him so that he was unfit for duty. Cap'n Will stood his watch for him. Everything went on finely until after we doubled the cape."

"One fine night, while we were coming up the South American coast, I was below, engaged in conversation with the mate, who had not yet sufficiently recovered to resume the charge of his watch."

"I've been thinking," said he, "that I should go on deck tomorrow and try to stand my watch again. I don't exactly like the way the captain has appeared for the last twenty-four hours; he acts strangely; he may have another crazy spell for all I know; at any rate I think it best to keep watch of his movements."

"He had hardly ceased speaking, when we were startled by a tremendous crash, accompanied with a shock that shook the barque from truck to keelson. The thought of the instant was that some vessel larger than our own had run afoul of us. We both rushed upon deck immediately, but not a craft of any kind was visible in sight excepting our own. The next thought was that we had struck upon a coral reef, but upon going forward, I knew in an instant that such was not the case, for our starboard bow was completely demolished from the top-gallant rail to the water's edge, and had we struck upon a reef, the probability is that the damage done would all have been below the water line. There was but little time to spend upon conjecture, as the barque was rapidly settling in the water, and we had barely time to provision our boats and push off, before the barque went down. Upon mustering our men we found them all safe with the exception of Captain Will. He was in neither of the boats; but his disappearance was accounted for, as well as the cause of the loss of our vessel, by the man who had been last at the wheel, in the following words:

"I relieved Jack Bronson at the wheel at four bells. I had been but a short time there, when Cap'n Will came up on the quarter-deck, and says to me, 'Ned, go forward on the fore-castle and see if you can make out what there is on the weather bow.' I was going to strike one bell for some one to take the wheel while I was gone, but Cap'n Will stepped up, and taking the wheel, tells me to hurry up and report what I made out ahead."

"I went right away forward, and soon made out that what the captain had seen was a very large sperm whale apparently asleep on the top of the water, and I went aft and reported accordingly. At the course we were then sailing, we should have passed somewhat to leeward of the whale; but the moment Cap'n Will knew what was ahead, he had the yards braced in, and ordered me to keep her up a couple of points."

"I dare not disobey orders, although I knew that if the whale didn't haul off or go down, we should be afoul of him. As soon as the yards were braced up, Cap'n Will went forward. He had hardly got on to the fore-castle when the barque struck the whale about amidship, and the next instant his tail came across the fore-castle directly where Cap'n Will stood—and here we are in these two boats as the natural consequence."

"After a brief consultation, we headed our boats for Pernambuco, and having pleasant weather and a smooth sea, we arrived there in a little more than two days from the time the barque went down so unceremoniously, and we soon had an opportunity of shipping for home."

In war, people judge, for the most part, by the success, whatever is the opinion of the wiser sort. Let a man show all the good conduct that is possible, if the event does not answer, all fortune passes for a fault, and is justified but by a few persons.—St. Evening.

HENRY WILLIAM HERBERT.

The accompanying portrait of Henry William Herbert, so well known and admired by his various works published under his own name and the nom de plume of "Frank Forester," was drawn for us by C. Barry, from a fine daguerreotype by Meade Brothers, of New York. The subject of this notice was born in London, April 7, 1807. He is the eldest son of the Hon. and Rev. William Herbert, dean of Manchester, eminent as a man of science, a poet and a liberal politician, and a descendant on the paternal side, from the historical houses of Pembroke and Percy. Young Herbert was sent to Eton College at the age of thirteen, and graduated at Caius College, Cambridge, in 1829. Of the educational advantages afforded him he made excellent use, and though he is entirely untaught by pedantry, there are probably few men of his age who are more thoroughly versed in the classical languages and literature. He is also familiar with the modern European languages, is well read in history, and possesses a large share of antiquarian lore. He commenced life with a fortune ample enough for the gratification of all his tastes—his love of study, of travel, and of the exciting sports of the field and forest—but a sudden reverse in 1830, forced him to rely upon his education and literary ability for support. He came to this country in December, 1831, and for eight years thereafter was employed as a Greek teacher in a classical school of high repute. While thus engaged he also turned his attention to authorship, and from 1833 to 1836, edited the "American Monthly Magazine" with signal ability, besides writing for various other periodicals. In 1835, he published a novel, entitled "The Brothers, a Tale of the Fronde." We well remember the impression produced by the first reading of this spirited work, an impression resembling in its pleasurable character that awakened by the first perusal of a romance by Scott. Subsequent and recent readings have only confirmed the opinion then formed of it. It is a dashing, dramatic narrative, that grasps the attention of the reader at the outset and hurries him along breathless to the close. The incidents are strange and startling but not improbable, and the characters sketched with a few vigorous, decided strokes of the pencil. The manners and spirit of the age are happily reproduced, and the story ends, like a stirring drama, with a brilliant denouement. This fine story was followed, in the next year, by the production of "Oliver Cromwell," a work distinguished by the same vigorous style, the same bold, truthful portrait-painting and the same marvellous perception of the spirit of the past. These works, like the subsequent performances of Mr. Herbert, republished in England, created a powerful sensation there, and established the literary reputation of their author. Their success induced him to abandon the harassing occupation of teaching, and devote himself exclusively to literature. In 1842, he published "Marmaduke Wyvil," an historical novel, and, in 1846, the "Roman Traitor," a romance founded on Catiline's conspiracy against Rome. Equally successful with these works have been his "Field Sports of North America," and "Fishes and Fishing of North America," published under the nom de plume of "Frank Forester," and displaying both the experience of a thorough sportsman and the knowledge of a naturalist. His various sporting sketches published in periodicals of the day, are remarkably spirited and telling. In 1848 his scholarship and poetical talent were displayed in a poetical translation of the "Prometheus" and the "Agamemnon" of Æschylus. Had Mr. Herbert chosen to cultivate his gift he might have won a brilliant reputation as a poet. His "Wellington sonnets," written for and published in this paper, are brilliant proofs of poetical genius. We have not space to enumerate the various productions of Mr. Herbert's fertile pen. Among them, and particularly deserving mention, is a series of historical works included in his later performances, entitled, the "Captains of the Old World as compared with great modern strategists," the "Cavaliers of England," the "Knights of England, Scotland and France," and the "Chevaliers of France." His historical works appear to be equally popular with his novels and romances. A vigorous and picturesque style, an unerring verve, an artistic grouping of characters, enchain the attention of the reader. He does not give us the dry bones of history—he clothes them with flesh and blood, and makes the storied heroes of the past speak and act before us as living men and not as phantoms. It cannot be denied that Mr. Herbert has ably won a high position among the distinguished English authors of the nineteenth century.

HENRY W. HERBERT.

PRINTERS' ALMSHOUSES, TOTTENHAM, ENGLAND.

We present, below, an accurate representation of the almshouses recently erected and formally inaugurated at Tottenham, England, for the reception of aged and infirm members of all branches of the printing trade. The buildings will accommodate a large number of persons, though only six have yet availed themselves of this charity. The inmates of the institution receive, in addition to the gratuitous house accommodation, a certain weekly allowance, which varies according to the amount of any other means of subsistence which the recipient may possess. The building is in the Tudor style of architecture, and occupies three sides of a square, the fourth, fronting the road, being tastefully laid out as a garden. It contains between thirty and forty rooms, and will give accommodation to about twelve couples, allowing a neat and commodious sitting room and bedroom and kitchen to each couple. The ceremony of inauguration was performed only a few weeks since, on which occasion a grand breakfast was held in the grounds adjoining the building. Earl Stanhope, the president of the institution, whose family name is so intimately connected with the printing trade, in both a literary and mechanical point of view, most appropriately presided on the occasion. The noble chairman and the stewards, comprising the representatives of some one hundred and fifty of the leading publishing firms of London, assembled at the building, and were conducted over the whole establishment by the architect, Mr. William Webb. The inspection of the building being concluded, the whole party retired to the pavilion erected on the grounds at the back of the almshouses, where a breakfast was served, at which Earl Stanhope presided. In the evening a grand tea party, followed by a concert and a ball, in celebration of the inauguration, took place at the Highbury Barn Tavern, at which between four hundred and five hundred persons connected with the mechanical portion of the printing trade were present. On the day preceding the opening of the almshouses, a neighboring Quaker lady (an acquaintance of Elizabeth Fry), rapidly approaching threescore years and ten, visited the institution, and, having inspected the building, presented each of the newly-elected inmates with five shillings, and directed them to send to her residence every other morning for a supply of new milk; nor did this kind visitor depart without leaving a donation in the subscription box, and her name enrolled in the visitors' book. The subscriptions in connection with the festival exceeded four thousand dollars. The public charities of England are numerous and manifold, and they had need be so, for misery and destitution are rife there. It requires the utmost exertions of the philanthropist only to alleviate and assuage the sufferings of the poor—to banish them entirely is out of the question.

A FASCINATING LION.

About thirty years ago, says Jules Gerard, the great lion hunter, a young man named Seghir, belonging to the tribe of Amamera, established in the Aures mountains, fell in love with a young girl who had been refused to him by the father on account of his poverty. The young people, however, were much attached to each other, and one fine evening the girl ran away with her lover. The distance being considerable between the two douars and the road extremely perilous, Seghir had armed himself from head to foot. Already the most dangerous part of the road had been cleared, and they were beginning to hear the dogs of the douar towards which they were rapidly advancing, when, all at once, a lion, who till that moment had lain concealed behind the bushes, rose and walked straight towards them. The young girl shrieked so fearfully that her cries were heard by the people in the tents, and several of the men immediately seized their arms and rushed out to the rescue. When they reached the spot to which they were directed by the screams of the young maiden, they saw the lion walking slowly a few paces in front of Seghir, with his eyes steadfastly fixed upon him, and leading him thus towards the forest. The young girl did all she could to prevent her lover following the lion, or induce him to let go his hold of herself, but it was in vain; he kept dragging her on in spite of all her efforts, saying: "Come, my beloved, come, our master will have it so, we must go!" "But your weapons," she cried, "what are they good for, if not to save me?" "Weapons! I have none," answered the fascinated wretch; "great lord, believe her not, she lies—I am perfectly unarmed, and will follow you wherever you will!" At this moment the Arabs, eight or ten in number, who had come to the rescue of the unfortunate couple, perceiving that the lion would very soon have them in the forest, fired every one of them upon him; but on finding that he did not fall, they took to their heels. The lion sprang upon Seghir, and with one bound crushed him to the earth, smashing his head at a bite; after which he laid down by the side of the young girl, placing his huge paws upon her knees. The Arabs now finding that the lion did not condescend to pursue them, took courage and returned, and having reloaded their guns, prepared again to fire; but being afraid of killing the girl, they told her to try to get a little way from the lion, which he allowed her to do, without ever losing sight of her. The moment the guns of the Arabs were levelled at him, the lion sprang into the midst of them, seized one with his teeth and two others with his claws, dragging them together, so as to make, as it were, one bundle; then, placing under him that mass of palpitating flesh, he instantly smashed the three heads, as he had done that of Seghir. Those who escaped ran to the douar and told the story, but no one was bold enough to return for another attack. The lion then carried the woman into the forest. Next day they came to carry away the bodies of the four men; as to the young girl, nothing was found but her hair, her feet and her clothes. Is it true that the lion has the power of fascination over weak organizations? All I can say is that the Arabs answer in the affirmative, and give numerous examples.—Spirit of the Times.

PRINTERS' ALMSHOUSES, WOOD GREEN, TOTTENHAM, ENGLAND.

MATURIN M. HALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
FRANCIS A. PURIVAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

FRANCE AND THIS COUNTRY.

— "trifles light as air,
Are to the jealous confirmation strong
As proofs of Holy Writ."

APPRECIATIVE OF ART.—A celebrated landscape of Rubens, called the "Rainbow Picture," from one of its features, was lately bought by the Marquis of Hertford for $18,000.

SPLINTERS.

.... The Sauks and Foxes lately had a bloody battle with the Camanches, and completely routed them.

GO AHEAD?

When shall we slacken this national velocity? When shall we subside into the moderate pursuit of the ends of sublunary existence? Not until the whole continent is redeemed and occupied, regenerated and civilized. When the whole of North America is covered with a network of railways, when every navigable stream swarms with steamboats, when there are free presses, and free schools, and free colleges in every nook and corner of the land, then, and not until then, shall we begin to pull on the breaks and open the safety valves.

THE ASPECT OF NATURE.

There is something awful in the immutability of nature—in the unchanging aspect of those glittering stars, that soar, and sink, and wheel in their appointed courses forever and the same. We ascribe to them benign or baleful influences according to our moods, but beautiful as they are, they are cold and unsympathizing. They look down with equal brightness on the city of the dead and the city of the living—on the corpse and on the bride. The nearer we approach the earth, the more ephemeral are the objects that meet our eyes. The trees that stand for centuries yet have their appointed time to fall. Even the steadfast rocks crumble and decay. The life of man, the lord of all, is the briefest of all. Yet something in every bosom tells us that there is a life beyond and above all these perishing creatures—a glorious guerdon reserved for man's immortal spirit.

FLOWERS IN WINDOWS.—There are fewer tests of a happy home than a display of beautiful flowers in a parlor window. In the winter in the city, they attract the eye of the passer-by like the smiles of sunbeams.

DISTINGUISHED ARRIVALS.—Many individuals banished by the Vigilance Committee from San Francisco, have arrived in New York, to add to the cares of the officials of Gotham.

AMERICAN ACTORS.—Mr. and Mrs. Barney Williams have been prodigiously successful in London. We were sure beforehand that they would make a hit.

AN ODD IDEA.—In England, they are talking about presenting a testimonial to the jury that convicted Palmer of poisoning!

TRUE.—Difficulties dissolve before a cheerful and resolute spirit, like snow drifts before the sun.

TRAVELLING

But after all, we think the Yankee is the best ideal of a traveller—that our countrymen possess a real talent for travelling. They are sharp and inquisitive, and understand how to gather the greatest amount of information in the shortest given time. Moreover, they possess a faculty for acquiring languages, only equalled by that of certain exceptional peoples of the continent—the Poles and Russians, for instance. And, added to that, the social habits of a democratic form of government fit them readily for mixing with all classes of people. Their peculiar cleverness enables them to make up for the want of book knowledge, which the Germans possess in a greater degree. But the Germans are apt to undertake too much. They dive rather too deep and mine rather too extensively; whereas the Yankee traveller suits the extent of his investigations to the time he has to spend on them.

A TRAVELLER'S TALE.—Mr. T. was relating that he saw, in the course of his travels in Japan, a church a thousand feet long. A friend checked him as he was going on, and Mr. T. added, "and two feet broad." Everybody laughed at this absurdity, when the story-teller flew into a passion, and exclaimed: "It's my friend's fault—if it hadn't been for him, I'd have made the church square."

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. Mr. Edmunds, Miss William Mowse, of Bath, Me., to Miss Elzino J. T. Kandall; by Rev. Mr. Gardner, Mr. Horace D. Jerald to Miss Mary B. Cooper; by Rev. Mr. Stone, Mr. Thomas Walton to Miss Sophia Talbot; by Rev. Mr. Craft, Mr. William W. Benson to Miss Abby F. Sweeney, both of Hoxbury; by Rev. Mr. Studley, Mr. Edmund C. Bradford to Miss Lucy M. Whitaker; by Rev. Mr. Taylor, Mr. W. H. Garner to Miss Eliza Turner (Sabb), by Rev. Mr. Grimes, Mr. Daniel Burdett to Miss Harriet Hales.—At Chelsea, by Rev. Mr. Thomas, Capt. Horace H. Watson, Jr. to Miss Anna Freeman.—At Charlestown, by Rev. Mr. McNulty, Mr. Edward E. Herriek to Miss Emily F. Moody, both of Beverly.—At Cambridgeport, by Rev. Mr. Howe, Mr. Albert A. Horn, of Boston, to Miss Selena H. Sanford.—At Somerville, by Rev. Mr. Purdie, Mr. Edwin M. Wheelock, of Uxbridge, N. Y., to Miss Ellen M. Brackett.—At Brighton, by Rev. Mr. Whitney, Mr. Emmett Weeks to Miss Elizabeth Green, both of Cambridge.—At Salem, by Rev. Dr. Thompson, Mr. Benjamin K. Symonds, Jr. to Miss Sarah C. Fillebrown.—At Waltham, by Rev. Mr. Hill, Dr. Algernon Goodale to Miss Mary Lowell.—At Medford, by Rev. Mr. Field, Mr. Thomas Parker, of Hingham, Italy, to Miss Elizabeth Temple (Sabb).—At Newburyport, by Rev. Mr. Barnaby, Mr. William S. Campbell to Miss Ellen Westbury.

DEATHS.

In this city, Mr. Peter White, 22; Mr. Charles Browne, 63; Mr. George Graham, 94; Miss Helen Calkender, 59; Mr. George Thorton, 40; Mrs. Elizabeth Twining, 24; Mr. Timothy W. Quinlan, 73; Mr. George Dorr, 34; At Charlertown, Mrs. Caira L. Pike, — At Chelsea, Mr. Samuel Ward, 29; — At Cambridgeport, Mrs. Sarah W. Newman, 67; — At Quincy, Mr. Thomas Page, 71; Mr. James B. Reed, 48; — At Lynn, Mr. Edward W. Dawson; Widow Mary Ramsdell, 80; Mr. J. Harris Chudwell, 21; — At Lynnfield, Mrs. Sally Newhall, 93; — At Salem, Widow Mary Pence, 82; Mrs. Sarah Babbidge, 87; Mr. John Campbell, 21; Mr. Nathaniel P. Morse, 54; Mrs. Mary Teare, 52; — At Marblehead, Mr. John C. Smith, 60; — At Nahant, Mr. John D. Bond, 60; — At Groveland, Mrs. Sally Colby, formerly of Newburyport, 65; — At Abington, Mr. George L. Thompson, 56; — At Marlboro', Mr. William Felton, 75; — At West Brookfield, Mrs. Elizabeth G. Housha, 66; — At Nantucket, Mr. Daniel Austin, 53; — At New Bedford, Mrs. Susan M. Lombard, 32; — At Sandwich, Mr. Elisha B. Fumme, of Charlestown, 45; — At Northampton, Mrs. Fanny E. Thayer, 34; — At Hatter, Mr. Samuel Kellogg, 78; — At Amherst, Mrs. Zebina Hawley, 81; — At Fitchburg, Mr. John W. Fitch, 84; — At Dartmouth, Widow Hannah Fitch, 70; — At Wrentham, Henry Kirby, 50.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL
DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION.

A Record of the beautiful and useful in Art.

This paper presents in the most elegant and available form, a weekly literary change of notable events of the day. Its columns are devoted to original sketches and pictures, by the most celebrated artists, and to the original and domestic foreign news; the whole well speeded with wit and humor. Each paper is beautifully illustrated with numerous accurate engravings, by eminent artists, of notable objects, current events in all parts of the world, and of men and manners, altogether making a paper entirely original in this country. Its pages contain views of every populous city in the known world, full portraits of every monarch or emperor, of every state, of every principal naval and military commander of the navy and merchant service, of every principal port and seaport, of every noted character in the world, both male and female.

TERMS:—ENTIRELY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year.....	$3 00
4 subscribers, " ".....	10 00
10 " " ".....	20 00

* * One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, when taken together by one person, one year, for $4.
Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU.

CORNER OF TREMONT AND BROMFIELD STS., BOSTON.
 WHOLESALE AGENTS.—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Winch, 116 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; A. C. Bagley, 162 Vine Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Reynolds, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Wardlaw, corner of 4th and Chesnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Kingold, Louisville, Kentucky; Trubner & Co., 12 Paternoster Row, London, general agents for Europe.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

SHADOWS.

They are around our every path; we feel
Their touch upon our brows when summer's breath
Fans the pale cheeks of flowers, and bids them glow
With a bright splendor, whispering of death.
Upon the mountain tops with folded wings they rest,
And to the valleys steal with sure, still feet,
Amid the broad green fields, and on the heart
Of the blue sea, in tireless bands they meet.

Where the red sun sinks low o'er battle ground,
And helm and plume amid the dust are strown—
They fall on white, still brows like kisses prest
By weeping Love, in hope to wake her own.
Slowly the stars arise—a thousand winds
Are on the track of night, and o'er the plain
Pour their low requiem, then with patient gaze
Those dark-robed watchers gather by the slain.

When the calm hour of evening prayer has come,
And friend meets friend, and gentle words are said,
And kind thoughts for the living blend with tears
That fall at memories of the blessed dead;
With folded hands beside the dear home hearth,
And heads bowed lowly and lips compressed—
The angels of the shadows stand in grief,
That on warm, loving hearts their touch must rest.

Each human life at first is a white scroll
From God's great library, unsouled and fair,
Each writes upon it his own destiny in part,
But none can help the shadows falling there.
They may sweep o'er it with a wild, stern wing,
Blotting the dreams which love in gladness drew,
Or gently, tenderly, with warm, soft breath
Remove each sign that tells where blossoms grew.

We all walk sometimes in a cloud, and feel
A trembling longing which we may not speak,
For the full noonday light, which from the walls
Of Christ's fair city beams upon the meek;
O brothers! whether on the mountain top
Of glad prosperity our feet shall tread,
Or in the vale of grief, 'tis well to think
From His dear hand are light and darkness shed.

L. H. F.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

TOWN AND COUNTRY.

BY ALICE C. DENTON.

Mrs. ENDICOTT was a very quiet, unassuming, contented farmer's wife; kind and hospitable, and quite able, from her circumstances, to carry out her intentions of being so. Single-hearted and genuine herself, she never suspected any under-current in the character of those with whom she associated; and as she was so unsophisticated, she was very liable to deception on the part of others who might have a motive to employ it. Her house was ever open to all who might seek, from motives of friendship or interest, a pleasant retreat in the warm season; and every attention which she or her daughters could bestow was at their service.

It was not an unusual circumstance, then, when one very sultry afternoon in July, a carriage stopped at her door, and deposited Mrs. Waterbury, her niece, Miss Hastings, two boys of thirteen and fifteen, and a little girl of seven. The day was hot and dusty, the travellers tired and hungry. It was the busy hay season at the farm, and in addition to the usual family, Mr. Endicott had half a dozen extra hands in the fields. Mrs. Endicott had not been very well, and Sophia and Alice had been more fatigued than usual, in consequence of her inability to perform her own part of the work. All the family, however, received the visitors with kindness and attention. Two of the best rooms in the house were given up to them, and the daughters resigned their own room to the boys, retiring to the attic themselves—which attic, not being finished, proved a warm retreat, compared with the large airy apartments, with their cool straw carpets and delicate white drapery, which their guests enjoyed.

Mrs. Endicott's house, so neat and cool-looking when the company arrived, presented a scene of confusion the next morning perfectly indescribable. Shawls, dresses, bonnets, shoes and boots lay indiscriminately on the beds, on the floor, on the couches, which were covered with spotless white dimity; and, in fact, everywhere. Water was spilled, soap left on the painted stands, towels were thrown wet on the straw matting, leaving brown stains on the surface, and indeed it took Sophia two or three hours to restore anything like decent order.

After breakfast the two boys went out to the pond to fish for pickerel. They returned at noon with splashed clothes and wet stockings, which Mrs. Endicott had to place in water, but which Mrs. Waterbury did not offer to assist her in doing. Tired and cross, they laid themselves down on the clear white bed with their shoes on, and slept off the afternoon. Mrs. Waterbury also retired for a siesta, and Sophia and Alice had to entertain Miss Hastings and little Maria Waterbury, whose incessant demands for new objects to play with taxed them severely. After tea, Mr. Endicott took them out in his large family wagon, which Mrs. Waterbury declared was so heavy and jolting, that she should never get over it.

When Saturday night came, Mr. Waterbury made his appearance, bringing also a gentleman friend, and staying until after dinner on Monday, and another room had to be given up. Although the Endicotts were well supplied with abundance of food on the night of the first arrival, yet the addition of five to the family required constant cooking, and Alice declared that her arms were swollen to twice their usual size, by rolling pastry so continually.

Other company—dear friends, too, they were—arrived, and they were obliged to find rooms for them at the next farmhouse. Three weeks formed the period of the Waterbury visit; and it took three more to restore the house to its wonted condition, and to repair damages. Mrs. Waterbury begged them to call if they came to the city next winter, and Mr. Waterbury told the girls that he would take them to the theatre and the opera, if they would come in some time and stay all night. Mr. Endicott smiled his quiet smile, but said nothing. After they had gone, he sat down to his writing-desk, and appeared absorbed in accounts.

"What are you writing, John," said his wife, "that engages your mind so intensely?"

"I am calculating my losses, Susan."

"Losses! In what way have you lost? Has anything happened?"

"Nothing but the Waterbury advent," he said, with a queer look. "I am casting up the probable expense of their visit. I will read you the items. First, board for five people for three weeks, including transient boarders, fifty dollars; second, loss of time, fifteen dollars; third, damage to house and furniture, twenty dollars; fourth, yourself and two daughters, in the capacity of servants, three dollars—very low; besides which, I have paid Symonds ten dollars cash for the use of his horses, making a hundred dollars for the pleasure of Waterbury's taking our house for his summer stopping-place, instead of going to a hotel or boarding-house."

"So it is, John; but I would not have thought it. However, the girls shall make their visit there next winter, and so all will be right. I am anxious to have them go; and I am sure they cannot be too attentive to them, after all this exertion on our part."

"But did you notice that Mrs. Waterbury said they must call when they went to town?"

"Well, of course they meant them to stay with them. What else could they mean?"

"Poor little wifey! You are not up to the Waterbury tactics, I see plainly," said Mr. Endicott, as he left the room, laughing. "We shall see when winter comes."

Winter in Boston! Bright, dazzling snow and ice, merry sleigh bells, theatre and opera house open, lectures, concerts—it is a pleasant season in town, and the country has few attractions now for town people. The Waterburys have forgotten that they were ever at Belleville, in the hurry and excitement of the season.

Mr. and Mrs. Waterbury, Belle Hastings, and two visitors, are dressing for an evening party. The cars are just coming in on the Worcester Railroad, and they are expecting grand friends from New York. A carriage stops at the door, and a servant is sent down to receive the expected guests. He returns with the names of the Misses Endicott and their father, from Belleville. Mrs. Waterbury stands at her toilet aghast.

"Do you hear that, Belle?" she says, gaspingly. "What on earth has sent those people here to-night? Mr. Waterbury, you must go and say that we are engaged, and make an apology."

"But how can we? We are under obligations to receive them."

"Fudge! For what?—for their miserable accommodations of last year? I am sure that I did not have a single night's rest while I was there, with their terrible mosquitoes."

"Fy, Mrs. Waterbury! I am ashamed of you! Do you know that Endicott has loaned me several thousand dollars lately, and that I should have failed if he had not done so?"

"No, I did not. But if that is the case, I suppose we must receive them. Austin's family will not be here to-night, I suppose, for the cars are in, by these people being here at this time."

Mr. Waterbury went down and received his guests somewhat cordially, made excuses for his wife and Belle, and showed Mr. Endicott to his room himself. The chambermaid was called to conduct the young ladies to theirs, and after tea had been provided for the guests, Mrs. Waterbury made her appearance in full dress.

"Make yourselves comfortable," she said, "and retire when you please. This is an engagement which it would not answer to break, so you will excuse us."

Belle Hastings extended the tip of her gloved hand to the girls whom, in the country, she had loaded with caresses. The two boys sat apart, eyeing Mr. Endicott, who was resting his lame foot on an ottoman, as if he was committing some grievous sin against etiquette. They forgot their afternoon slumbers on Mrs. Endicott's spotless quilt.

After they had gone to the party, and the boys had retired to bed, Mr. Endicott drew a writing-table towards him, and wrote a note to his host, in which he excused himself for taking his daughters away during his absence. He remarked that, as his visit seemed to be made at an unseasonable time, he was about to have them removed to the Tremont House, in order that they might enjoy the privilege of attending public places, without inconvenience to acquaintances.

They left this letter on the table, and Mr. Waterbury, to his great mortification, read it when he returned from the party. He called on Mr. Endicott the next morning, and made every apology necessary, entreating him to return to his house, but in vain. He stayed two or three weeks, during which time the Waterburys called several times, but there was an evident coolness on the part of Mr. Endicott and his daughters.

Several times they met at the houses of distinguished people, who honored the plain country farmer, so long known to them, and admired the beautiful girls, whose simple graces charmed all who saw them. At such times, Belle Hastings recognized them warmly; but they did not need her patronage. They were on intimate terms with some whose acquaintance she had not been permitted to approach, and could have looked down upon her, had not they been too amiable. On her part, she was somewhat mortified to see Sophia and Alice led out to dances, or urged to play, while she was neglected.

Years afterwards she recognized two ladies at a large party, where she sat unattended. They were leaning on the arms of two distinguished gentlemen, and she heard them introduced as the wives of those gentlemen. They were Sophia and Alice Endicott, and she was Belle Hastings still!

PRACTICAL PRAYER.

In the vicinity of B— lived a poor but industrious man, depending for support upon his daily labor. His wife fell sick, and not being able to hire a nurse, he was obliged to confine himself to the sick bed and family. His means of support being cut off, he soon found himself in need. Having a wealthy neighbor near, he determined to go and ask for two bushels of wheat, with a promise to pay as soon as his wife became so much better that he could leave her and return to his work. Accordingly he took his bag, went to his neighbor's, and arrived while the family were at morning prayers.

As he sat on the door-stone he heard the man pray very earnestly that God would clothe the naked, feed the hungry, relieve the needy, and comfort all that mourn. The prayer concluded, he stepped in and made known his business, promising to pay with the avails of his first labors. The farmer was very sorry he could not accommodate him, but he had promised to lend a large sum of money, and he presumed neighbor A— would let him have it.

With a tearful eye and a sad heart the poor man turned away. As soon as he left the house, the farmer's little son stepped up and said:

"Father, did you not pray that God would clothe the naked, feed the hungry, relieve the distressed, and comfort mourners?"

"Yes—why?"

"Because, if I had your wheat, I would answer that prayer."

It is needless to add that the Christian father called back his suffering neighbor, and gave him as much he needed.

Now, Christian readers, do you answer your own prayers?—New York Evangelist.

CURIOUS LAKE.

The Placerville American (Cal.) gives an account of a peculiar lake on the east side of Bear River Valley. It is an immense pool or spring, rather than a lake, a little over one hundred yards in length along the base of the mountain, and nearly the same in width, but extending in one place under a shelving rock that nearly touches the surface of the water for many yards. That it is an immense spring issuing from the mountain, is apparent from the fact that any floating substance thrown under the shelving rock, is immediately brought outward to the opposite bank. There is no visible outlet to the waters, except that the margin is little else than rock, with innumerable fissures traversing it in every direction, and through which, though with no apparent current at the surface, the water undoubtedly escapes.

The surface of the rocks at the edge of the water, and for several inches above and below, is coated thick with a substance closely resembling sulphur, but without its properties, being unflammable. Not a living fish is to be seen in its waters, but digging into and breaking up a kind of soft scoria or volcanic mud nearly hardened into stone, that makes a portion of the bank, great numbers of fish, from two to six inches in length, are embedded therein, and perfectly petrified.

NOTICES OF NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE PICTURE BOOK FOR THE YOUNG. By MARY HOWITT. With twenty illustrations by Byron and Peirce. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1856.

The pictures in this book are very well executed, and will afford nice patterns for young draughtsmen, while the letter-press is excellent. For sale by John P. Jewett & Co.

ALPHA: or, Shells from the Strand. By Mrs. ADA M. FIELD. Boston: James French & Co. 1856.

The staple of this volume is a series of well-connected pictures of home-life, gleaned, we are told, from experience. The book certainly exhibits great power and great knowledge of the human heart.

LIFE, EXPLORATIONS AND PUBLIC SERVICES OF JOHN CHARLES FREMONT. By CHAS. WESTWORTH UPHAM. Illustrated. Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 12mo. pp. 355.

This work, though recently published, has met with a vast sale. It is a well written sketch of Fremont's adventurous career, and well calculated for popular reading.

THE LIFE AND PUBLIC SERVICES OF JAMES DUCHANAN. By R. G. HORTON. New York: Derby & Jackson. 1856. 12mo. pp. 428.

Mr. Buchanan's career is sketched in this volume, and illustrated by copious extracts from his speeches on various questions and occasions. The book is very well got up, and is embellished with a fine steel portrait of the veteran democratic statesman. For sale by Phillips, Sampson & Co.

FASHIONABLE LIFE. By MARY H. EASTMAN. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1856. 12mo. pp. 324.

An interesting and well written narrative by a vigorous writer, prepared with the purpose of showing the effects of a system, in which pleasure is the chief aim, on the heart and on the destiny of woman. It is affectionately dedicated to the only daughter of the author. For sale by John P. Jewett & Co.

THE KINGDOM WHICH SHALL NOT BE DESTROYED, ETC. By Rev. J. OSWALD, A.M., York, Pa. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. pp. 302.

The seventh chapter of the Book of Daniel may be regarded as the basis of this volume. Its object is to direct the attention to the study of the prophecies, and to the kingdom which is to come. For sale by John P. Jewett & Co.

CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY.

Encouraged by the unprecedented success which this popular monthly has met with, and the rapidly with which it has increased its circulation, the proprietor has resolved to make it still more worthy of the patronage of the public. That this admirable work is a MIRACLE OF CHEAPNESS, is admitted by every one, containing, as it does, one hundred pages of reading matter in each number, and forming two volumes a year of six hundred pages each, or twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for ONE DOLLAR!

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY is printed with new type, upon fine white paper, and its matter is carefully compiled and arranged by the hands of the editor and proprietor, who has been known to the public as connected with the Boston press for nearly fifteen years. Its pages contain

NEWS, TALES, POEMS, STORIES OF THE SEA, SKETCHES, MISCELLANY, ADVENTURES, BIOGRAPHIES, WIT AND HUMOR, from the best and most popular writers in the country. It is also spiced with a record of the notable events of the times, of peace and war, of discoveries and improvements occurring in either hemisphere, forming an agreeable companion for a leisure moment or hour, anywhere, at home or abroad, each number being complete in itself.

No sectarian subjects are admitted into its pages; there are enough controversial publications, each devoted to its peculiar sect or clique. This work is intended for THE MILLION, north or south, east or west, and is filled to the brim each month with choice, popular and graphic miscellany, just such as any father, brother or friend would place in the hands of a family circle. It is in all its departments, fresh and original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year, or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive a copy gratis.

[Sample copies sent when desired.]

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor.
Corner of Tremont and Bromfield Sts., Boston, Mass.

EDITORIAL MELANGE.

Twenty-two and a half tons of printed matter is daily sent from the Boston post-office. — In the town of Jerez-de-la-Fronteira, near Cadiz, in Andalusia, a gopher gave a poor woman, whose importunities annoyed him, a powerful dose of arsenic, from the effects of which she died almost immediately. She was the sister of the grocer's first wife. — It is recorded that Linnaeus cured himself of gout by eating strawberries. — Bridgeport, Ct., claims that the title of "City of Churches" belongs more appropriately to her than to Brooklyn, N. Y. The latter has a church to every thousand inhabitants, but Bridgeport has sixteen churches, or one to every four hundred of her population. — Mrs. Elizabeth Green died at Natchez, aged one hundred years. — In a beautiful little valley, near Stockholm, a most remarkable stone, covered with Runic characters and of considerable dimensions, has been discovered. The inscription is complete, and the ornaments are well executed. Its site, it is presumed, implies facts of more than ordinary importance. — Mr. Kellogg, the American artist, has succeeded in purchasing a genuine "Raphael," entitled "La Belle Jardiniere." — It is said that Lord Gough is of opinion that English women who were in the Crimea previous to the armistice or the end of February, ought to be decorated with the Crimean ribbon solely. In India, Lord Gough states, four English ladies were decorated, amongst them Lady Gough, who is very proud of her Maharajahpore bronze star, and likewise of the one given her by the 87th Royal Irish Fusiliers. — The father of Mr. Fillmore resides on his farm at Aurora, N. Y., and is now eighty-six years of age. — A noted brigand named Gembilargiu, whose band had long infested the vicinity of Sassari, in the island of Sardinia, has just been taken with two of his companions, after a desperate defence. He is accused of twenty assassinations. — A pickered was recently caught in the Connecticut River, by George Burland, of Amherst, which weighed twenty pounds. — Mr. Littledale, who has a farm on the Mersey, opposite Liverpool, England, keeps eighty-three cows and fifteen working horses on the produce of eighty acres of land. One acre of land to support a cow is deemed a small pattern in America, but should not be. The fact shows what thorough cultivation can do. — A new locomotive, built at Baltimore, is said to be the largest in the world. It has 12 wheels 44 inches in diameter, 22 inch stroke, 11 feet fire-box, and weighs 33 tons. — The country on both sides of the Rio Grande is described as being in an unsettled state. — The Paris journal La Pays, says that all the difficulties in the way of the construction of the canal across the Isthmus of Suez have been surmounted, and that more than the capital required for the execution of the works — which are already in progress — has been subscribed. — France and Saxony have agreed on the terms of convention for the guarantee of literary rights in the two countries. — The Tehuantepec Carriage Road across the Isthmus is about to be prosecuted, laborers having been sent out recently from New Orleans. The greatest confidence exists that this road will be open for travel in the month of November next. It will give a new and nearer route by which California emigrants may reach the Pacific. — To ascertain the length of the day and night, any time of the year, double the time of the sun's rising, which gives the length of the night, and double the time of its setting, which gives the length of the day. This is a little method of "doing the thing" which few of our readers have been aware of. — A river fire steamer has just been built at Cincinnati, constructed like a ferry boat, and having a fixed steam fire engine on board, to be used in the port of St. Louis, in case of a fire occurring among the steamboats at the levee. — It is said the cost of the new dome for the centre of the capitol at Washington, will be $1,000,000.

SUTERRANEAN DISCOVERY.

The remains of a magnificent palace have been discovered under a garden in the Isle of Capri near Italy. It must not only have been splendid in structure, but in situation, commanding a view of the bay of Palermo and Naples. Marble of various colors was used in its construction, and all its apartments, so far as the excavations have proceeded, are of the most spacious and elegant character. The doorway is twelve feet wide, and of white marble, and the rooms are paved in mosaic, while the walls are painted in red, blue, yellow, etc. Several coins of the reign of Augustus and Tiberius have been found, some of them disclosing the curious fact that the coins of one reign were at times recoined in another.

CHEMICAL MINUTENESS.—On the recent trial of Wm. Palmer, in England, for poisoning Mr. Cook, and for which he has been executed, Dr. Herepath, the well-known chemist, stated that the presence of strychnine could always be detected, and gave as an important proof, that if he put 10 grains into 70,000 grains of water he could detect its presence in a tenth part of a grain of that water.

LITERARY.—"The law is," said a sage alderman to a vendor of oysters, last August, "that oysters shall be sold in months in which there is an 'R.' How do you excuse yourself from being fined as the law directs?" "Why, the easiest way in the world; for I puts the R. in, and spells it Orgust." The man was excused for that month.

A CLERGYMAN ASHAMED.—A robust clergyman, meeting a physician, ran to hide himself behind a wall. Being asked the cause, he replied, "It is so long since I have been ill that I am ashamed to look a physician in the face."

TELEGRAPHIC.—The New Bedford Mercury learns that a line of telegraphic communication has been arranged between New Bedford, Martha's Vineyard, Plymouth and Boston, to connect with the Cape Cod line at Tremont.

Wayside Gatherings.

The camels work so well in Texas that the government is about to send for another cargo.

Our navy consists of eleven ships-of-the-line, thirteen frigates, nineteen sloops of war, three brigs, one schooner, twenty steamships and five store-ships.

The works of Daubigny, an extraordinary French painter, recently deceased, who was born without arms, and held his brush either in his mouth or with his toes, are about to be sold in Paris.

A man named Pever made a balloon ascension at Havana, on the 29th of June, and was wafted over towards the sea. He has not been heard of since.

A son of Alfred Van Wyck, of East Fishkill, N. Y., aged two years, lately died there. The child had been playing with a friction match-box, and swallowed a portion of the paper of which it was composed.

Letters from the Romagna, in the Papal States, give a frightful account of the state of society there. Brigandage had arrived at such a pitch that it was dangerous to go two or three miles from a town even in the day time.

A subscription, limited to three kreutzers (about three halfpence) each person, has been opened at Worms, for the construction of a Gothic chapel in that town, in honor of Luther and of his protest to the Diet of Worms.

Mr. John Trimble has contracted to complete a new theatre in sixty days for Miss Laura Keane. It is to be located at 622 and 624 Broadway, New York, on the ground now occupied by the Grinnell House.

A memorial, signed by influential authorities, has been addressed to the first lord of the treasury, praying for a final and limited search after relics of the Erebus and Terror, the lost ships in which Franklin and his crews left England.

Sixteen persons were bitten lately by mad dogs in Patterson, N. J., so severely that their death is regarded as certain, and one has already resulted fatally—in the case of a young man aged twenty-seven years.

The domain called John Brown's tract contains 210,000 acres, and lies in Herkimer, Lewis and Hamilton counties, New York. It is a portion of 1,920,000 acres, conveyed by letters patent from the State of New York to Alexander Macomb, Jan. 10, 1792.

The Russian and Austrian newspapers contradict the report that Odessa was to be made a free port, and they add that docks and ship building establishments for the construction of merchant vessels are to be immediately commenced at Sebastopol on a very extensive scale.

Count de Tocqueville, father of the author of "Democracy in America," recently died at an advanced age, in his chateau in France. He wrote and published, after he had completed his eightieth year, several historical works of acknowledged merit, among others, a "Philosophical History of Louis XV."

The Jewish disabilities bill was rejected in the British House of Lords, on the 23d of June, by a majority of 110 to 78, after a long speech from Lord Lyndhurst in favor of it. He showed that the oath of abjuration, "on the true faith of a Christian," did not contemplate the exclusion of the Jews, as it was in use before the Jews came into the country.

A cabinet maker at Northampton has made a beautiful set of furniture out of chestnut wood. The Gazette says this wood, smoothed and varnished, shows the grain in such a manner as to make highly ornamental cabinet work, and it is rapidly taking the place of most other kinds. It is more easily worked and can be afforded at a cheaper rate.

Official information received from Cordova announces that more than two tons weight of locusts have recently been killed in that neighborhood. As it is calculated that there are in each hundred weight 1,720,000 locusts, some mighty arithmeticians have figured it out that at Cordova no less than 404,332,500 of these insects have been destroyed and afterwards buried.

The deficiency in the French budget in the last three years is 1200 millions of francs. Seventy-six millions were spent in useless public buildings; fifty millions were paid out of the public treasury to keep down the price of bread in Paris to prevent riots; and the industrial exhibition cost eleven millions. The dinner at the imperial christening cost two hundred thousand francs.

The Emperor Alexander, in imitation of France and England, has just instituted a Crimean medal, to be given to all those who took part in the defence of Sebastopol. It will be in gold for the officers, and in silver for the privates. It will have on the one side, the words, "To the eternal memory of the immortal defence of Sebastopol," and on the other, "By their Majesties, Nicholas, of eternal memory, and Alexander II."

Several specimens of topazes, corundum pyrites and iserene, have recently been added to the Museum of Natural History at Melbourne. The pyrites contain nine or ten per cent. of gold, and the discoverer, a Frenchman, who says there are thousands of tons, has asked £1000 from government as a reward, on his pointing out the locality. A topaz of considerable size was lately found in a reef near the Criterion Hotel, Bendigo.

The Providence Journal says there is no doubt that the deserted schooner recently taken into Newport was a slave vessel. She is a splendid model, not over three years old, and pronounced by the pilots and boatmen of Newport as, in their opinion, one of the fastest vessels that ever came into that port. She is about one hundred and forty tons burden. The name "Ferris" is cut on the starboard rail, and "Elise" on the larboard rail.

The cheap press in England, which has sprung up within the last two or three years, is beginning to exercise a healthful influence upon the public mind. It is chiefly through this instrumentality that the government was compelled to a more moderate tone in the matter of Mr. Crompton's dismissal. The Times demanded retaliation on Mr. Dallas, but the independent press exposed the folly and madness of such an act, and public opinion would not justify it.

One of the persons who accompanied the emperor of France to Lyons, relates an interesting incident which passed under his own eyes. At the moment when he was the busiest engaged in distributing aid to all the sufferers around him, a man of the people, an ouvrier, face to face with him, standing right in front of his horse's head, and staring fixedly at him, said: "Well, Louis Napoleon, I cordially detest you; but I admire you as cordially, too."

An English journal relates the following: "To show the relative position in life of members of yeomanry corps, the following anecdote may be cited. A regiment in the north, recently on permanent duty, were going through their movements, when a private not suiting his sergeant, the latter bawled out, 'Private Jackson, if you don't pay more attention I shall report you.' The private rejoined, 'Ay, du if thou dar, an' w'll raise thee thy rent.' The effect may be imagined."

Foreign Items.

Immense preparations are making at Moscow for the Czar's coronation.

Miss Nightingale has been presented by the Sultan with a magnificent bracelet, set in brilliants.

An imperial ukase orders the issue of government bonds to the amount of 12,000,000 silver roubles.

The Cologne Gazette states that it is in contemplation to erect a monument to Handel, at Halle, his native town.

M. de Hayneval, the French ambassador in the papal city, is seriously ill, and is going home on sick leave.

A French soldier, who lost a leg by a Russian cannon ball in the Crimea, has set up a shop in Lyons, with the shot over the door as a sign.

The Swiss federal council has pronounced in favor of the declaration of the Congress of Paris regarding maritime rights in time of war.

The best descendant and grandson of the poet Schiller, Captain Frederick Von Schiller, of the Austrian cuirassiers, was lately married to Mdlle. von Alberti.

The king of Ava is said to have deputed Messrs. Kieraid and Dawson, American missionaries, on an embassy to the president of the United States, with a view of establishing friendly feelings between the two courts.

The emperor of Austria has recently joined the Antiquarian Society of Vienna; and, on becoming a member, granted the learned body a subsidy of two hundred florins per annum for the provisional term of three years.

Sands of Gold.

.... The wisest man is generally he who thinks himself the least so.—Bolero.

.... Some books, like the city of London, fare better for being burnt.—Tom Brown.

.... He who says that there is no such thing as an honest man, you may be sure is himself a knave.—Bishop Berkeley.

.... That which passes for current doctrine at one juncture and in one climate, wondrous in another.—Tom Brown.

.... Perfect virtue is to do unwitnessed what we should be capable of doing before all the world.—La Rochefoucauld.

.... Ambition often puts men upon doing the meanest offices; so climbing is performed in the same posture as creeping.—Swift.

.... Get your enemies to read your works in order to mend them; for your friend is so much your second self, that he will judge, too, like yourself.—Pope.

.... The power of fortune is confessed only by the miserable, for the happy impute all their success to prudence and merit.—Swift.

.... A short and certain way to obtain the character of a reasonable man is, whenever any one tells you his opinion, to comply with him.—Pope.

The common fluency of speech in many men, and most women, is owing to a scarcity of matter and scarcity of words.—Swift.

.... He that speaks ill of another, commonly before he is aware, makes himself such a one as he speaks against; for if he had civility and good breeding, he would forbear such language.—Selden.

Joker's Budget.

Happy Ladies.—At what age are ladies most happy? Marriage. A contemporary noting that Fred Corzens has gone to Havana for his health, wonders how it got there!

The position of an aeronaut must be a very painful one, from a constant tendency there is in it to make him soar.

Fred, a boy of three or four years, on being asked how he liked his ice-cream, replied: "Very well, though I'd like it better fried."

There is a man in Connecticut who has such a hatred to everything appertaining to a monarchy, that he wont wear a crown on his hat.

A Fifth Avenue lady being told that several poor people had died of starvation, in a wretched part of the city, said, with lofty contempt: "What silly people—before I'd starve, I'd eat brown bread and mutton!"

A wag says it is "folly to expect a girl to love a man whom everybody speaks well of. Get up a persecution, and her affections will cling so fast that a dozen guardians can't begin to remove them."

Two things to be kept—your word and your temper. The former when dealing with a printer—the latter when disputing with a woman. This may be difficult, but may be done by getting a couple of chapters of Job by heart.

A little boy, while writhing under the tortures of an ague, was told to rise up and take a powder his mother had prepared for him. "Powder! powder!" said he, raising himself on one elbow, and putting on a smile; "mother, I ain't a gun."

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

An elegant, moral and refined Miscellaneous Family Journal, devoted to polite literature, wit and humor, prose and poetic gems, and original tales, written expressly for the paper. In English, and on all sectarian questions, it is strictly neutral, therefore reading it is emphatically a PAPER FOR THE MILLION, and a welcome visitor to the home circle.

It contains the foreign and domestic news of the day, so condensed as to present the greatest possible amount of intelligence. No advertisements are admitted to the paper, thus offering the entire sheet, which is of the MAMMOT size, for the instruction and amusement of the general reader. An unrivalled corps of contributors are regularly engaged, and every department is under the most finished and perfect system that experience can suggest, forming an original paper, the present circulation of which far exceeds that of any other weekly paper in the Union, with the exception of "BALLOU'S PICTORIAL."

Sample copies sent when desired.

TERMS—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year..... $2 00
4 subscribers, " "..... 7 00
10 " " "..... 15 00

Any person sending us sixteen subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the second year copy gratis.

One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, $4 per annum. Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU,

Corner of Tremont and Bromfield Sts., Boston, Mass.

WHOLESALE AGENTS.—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Welch, 116 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; A. C. Bagley, 102 Vine Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Rags, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Woodard, corner 4th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Ringgold, Louisville, Ky.; Wallace, Austen & Buel, 25 Clark Street, Chicago, Illinois.

NAVIGATION OF THE AIR.

The taste for ballooning, after having lain dormant for a number of years, seems recently to have revived, and the various ascensions lately made by daring aeronauts have attracted as numerous and enthusiastic crowds as those which in the past century greeted the experiments of the first adventurers. What multitudes thronged Boston Common when Mr. Wislitz took his daring flight from earth in his splendid balloon, and soared away majestically over the city and its environs! But that was a free exhibition, and of course was liberally patronized. Yet when, shortly after, M. Godard, the hero of three hundred and six ascensions, announced that he would make an ascent with his monster balloon from the Agricultural Fair Grounds, no fewer than twelve thousand persons crowded the arena, though an admission fee was charged, while at least forty thousand persons were collected outside. This exhibits the desire of humanity to soar—to rise above sublunary things, to aspire higher and higher. It is something more and better, let us trust, than mere idle curiosity—something more than love of science—that prompts these aspirations. As the subject of aerial navigation seems now to be attracting a good deal of attention, we have prepared the engraving that accompanies this article, embracing a variety of machines by which the inventors fondly hoped to be able to navigate the air instead of floating through space the sport of every current. As none of these contrivances have proved successful, it would be idle to attempt a minute description of these machines, or an explanation of the various theories which governed their designers. Moreover, most of them sufficiently explain themselves—others are inexplicable. In one place we see an air ship, with rowers at work, as if they were afloat on the water. In another, a series of balloons linked together with masts and sails at each. In one corner is Madame Tessoire's ship, drawn by a vulture, which she proposed to tame. There are other odd and mirth-provoking contrivances in the cut. Mr. Petin, an honest haberdasher of Paris, brought over here, three or four years since, a machine which he was sure would be able to navigate the air, and on which he had expended a little fortune amassed by years of toil. The ascensive power was supplied by several monstrous balloons connected together. Then there were two planes suspended beneath sustaining a steam engine, (!) which was to drive a windmill, producing a current of air sufficient to control the course of the balloon. It was very ingenious, but it didn't work at all. The first balloon was launched in the air on the 5th of June, 1783, at Annoncey, a town in France. The first ascension took place in Paris on the 21st of November following, and yet, before the end of the same year, a hundred projects for the direction of balloons had been already proposed, described, published or announced. Enthusiasts say that the invention of the Montgolfier brothers is the point of departure, the assured basis of the regular transportation of men and merchandize through the air—that aerial navigation is certain, and will be the ultima ratio of future locomotion. The great problem to be solved is, how to steer and guide the balloon after it has been launched into the realms of space. There have been successively proposed, the re-action of the heated air of Montgolfiers' or fire balloons on the ambient air, by means of large valves opening in the sides; hydrogen gas, or atmospheric air, compressed externally or internally in the envelopes of balloons; the employment of steam, and even gunpowder; the archimedian helix, or screw; oars, sails, paddles, the reversed parachute, enormous bellows, etc. This is not all, some have proposed the use of trained birds of huge size, such as eagles and vultures! The latter idea was first enunciated in 1783. Linguet wishing, as he said, to come to the assistance of the "Parisian Prometheus," devotes several pages of his "Annals" to the examination of this curious method of traversing the air. "Even if every other resource should fail," says he, "have we not the birds?" Buffon has well observed that "in the midst of the slavery of almost all nature, this division of living creatures has maintained its independence and guarded against the attempts of man: he has assassinated many individuals, but he has succeeded in enthralling only a small number of races, from which his gluttony reaps more profit than his labor." Since that date, this method has been often suggested, and by persons who fancied that they had hit on the idea for the first time. The cut in the engraving of a large bird drawing a balloon illustrates a plan proposed in Paris, in 1845, by Madame Tessoire. She published a book on the subject, in which she seems to indicate as most particularly suited to the purpose of towing a balloon the great vulture of the Alps, whose wings in their full extent often measure fourteen feet from tip to tip. It is seen to poise itself softly in the air, and to remain suspended sometimes for whole hours. "The bird," says Madame Tessoire, "would be held at a proper distance from the car by a trace, which would start from a collar round his neck, passing under his wings and through a ring attached to a circingle going round his body. The reins would lead from his beak, being fastened to a ring inserted through both sides of the beak, in order that he should feel readily the hand of the aerial coachman. The reins would also pass under the wings through the trace rings attached to the circingle. The whole harness ought to be supple, light and very strong. The aeronaut, reins in hand, would have a long whip (carver) with which to cut the vulture in case he took numerous observations. Not finding in the migratory feathered species a power of flight and organization sufficient to account for their journeys from one country to another in search of the temperature and climate they required, and which was necessary to their pleasure and existence, this learned man asked himself, if these birds, instead of cutting the atmospheric mass horizontally, did not rise perpendicularly till they reached a stratum of air whose circular rapidity was less than that of the earth? After having remained there for a time, which their instinct would indicate, they would afterwards have only to descend in an oblique direction. Thus passing without effort from one parallel to another, they would find themselves without fatigue, transported into the favorable climate they sought, and which the diurnal rotation of the globe had substituted for that the severity of which had banished them. Starting from this hypothesis, Linguet, after having calculated the rotary speed of the earth, reckoning that of many sublunary regions much less, proposes to aeronauts to imitate the migratory birds, to rise rapidly, like them, into the higher regions of the atmosphere, to wait there a certain time to allow the balloon to lose the speed of the horizontal or circular movement acquired by the machine, while it yet was near the earth and participated in its motion, to watch from the height of this observatory the movement of the globe, and then to regain its surface when the country proposed to be visited should be observed to "turn up." One might in this manner, avoiding the wear and tear of his aerial carriage, and without stirring as it were, traverse vast spaces in very little time. What a magnificent idea! This is a tolerably fair specimen of the chimerical ideas of many experimenters in aerial navigation. As we observed at the outset, no man has yet succeeded in inventing a machine capable of traversing the air at will in any acquired direction; yet the possibility of so doing has been admitted by many scientific and practical persons. Whenever it enables us to traverse the air with certainty and safety will acquire immortal renown and a fabulous fortune. Even in ancient times, the idea of inventing a machine to enable man to navigate the air, seems to have occupied the mind, and the fable of Dedalus and Icarus undoubtedly originated in some early attempt at aerostation. When in 1766 Henry Cavendish discovered the great levity of hydrogen gas, or inflammable air, as it was termed, Dr. Black of Edinburgh conceived that a bladder filled with this gas must ascend into the air. Cavallo, who made experiments based on this theory in 1782, found that a bladder was too heavy and paper not air-tight. Soap bubbles inflated with the gas rose with great rapidity. It was reserved for the brothers, Stephen and Joseph Montgolfier, in France, to make the first public exhibition of a machine inflated with hot air and rising into the atmosphere—to send up the first balloon, in short. The Montgolfiers did not attribute the ascensive power of their balloon to the rarefaction of the air within it produced by heat, but to a peculiar gas arising from the combustion of the wool and straw which they burned in inflating. M. Charles, a professor of natural philosophy at a wrong direction, or exhibited a propensity to light on trees or house-tops." After having pointed out the manner of taming them, Madame Tessoire adds: "My confidence in vultures arises from what I saw of one in Portugal, in the fort of Caiscals, about twenty leagues from Lisbon. He had been brought there very young, but in all his strength and beauty; he was perfectly obedient to the officer who owned him. The vulture would fetch and carry like a dog, and at intervals he took leave of absence, and returned of his own accord, sometimes at the end of eight days. As he was always seen to direct his flight to the sea, it was conjectured that he went to Africa, whither he had been originally brought." It will be seen from the above that Madame Tessoire seriously considered birds as useful auxiliaries in aerostation. This lady is not alone in her opinion. Mr. Roch, the distinguished writer, thought the eagle and condor suitable to determine the direction of a balloon in calm weather. Linguet, whom we have before cited, gives in another part of his "Annals" another theory of aerostation, and certainly a very triumphant and victorious method of travelling through the air: A Swedish naturalist was engaged on the subject of the migration of birds. He had made

NAVIGATION OF THE AIR.

Paris, sent up the first gas-filled balloon. Pilatre de Rozier, who went up in a balloon constructed by himself and the Montgolfiers, in 1783, was the first man who ever ascended with one of these machines. This was a fire balloon. In November, when he and the Marquis d'Arlandes ascended from the Castle of la Muette, in the presence of an innumerable multitude, they came nearly being burned to death. M. Charles and M. Robert were the first to go up in a balloon filled with hydrogen gas, and their ascent was the same in form and managed pretty much in the same way as those of the present day. January 7, 1785, Blanchard crossed the channel from Dover to Calais with a balloon, having Dr. Jeffries of this city for a companion. Pilatre de Rozier and Mr. Romain lost their lives in an attempt to cross from the French to the English shore. On this occasion he had two balloons, one above filled with gas, and the other below filled with hot air supplied from a coal fire, by which he meant to increase or diminish his ascensive power. The machine took fire, and the mangled bodies of the adventurers, killed, probably, by the explosion of the gas, fell to the earth. This is only one among the many fatal accidents that have happened to navigators of the air.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { CORNER OF TREMONT
AND BROMFIELD STS.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 30, 1856.

$2.00 PER ANNUM. { VOL. XI, No. 9.—WHOLE No. 269.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

WASHINGTON STATUE.

The engraving on this page of the Washington Statue, in Union Park, New York, is from an original drawing made for the Pictorial after a daguerreotype taken expressly for us by those excellent artists, Meade Brothers, of New York, and represents the noble equestrian statue by H. K. Browne, the American sculptor, inaugurated on the fourth of July last, and justly regarded as one of the proudest ornaments of the city of New York. The statue is of bronze, and was cast at the foundry of the Messrs. Ames, at Springfield, in this State. It stands in Union Square, in the corner between Broadway and East Fourteenth Street. The weight of the horse and rider is about four and a half tons, distributed as follows:—The plinth, 2000 lbs.; horse, 2700; the rider and other parts, 3800. The combination of metals is as follows:—88 parts of copper, with nine of tin, two of zinc, and one of lead. The body of the horse was cast in one piece, and the thickness of the metal averages three-eighths of an inch. The group is fourteen feet in height, and is mounted upon a granite pedestal of equal height. The statue faces toward the west. The Father of his Country is represented sitting in the saddle attired in the Continental uniform. His head is uncovered, and his right arm extended as if he was about to speak. The artist has modelled the face from London's bust, the only statue ever taken from Washington's person. Mr. Houlton came from France, in 1785, and reached Mount Vernon on the 3d of October of that year. He spent two weeks at that place. The work was modelled when Washington was in his fifty-fourth year. A cast of this statue by Houlton is in possession of the Boston Athenæum. We are glad that the artist chose to represent Washington "in his habit as he lived." The popular mind has a distinct image of him in the costume of his day, and never will be brought to recognize their hero in the garb of a Roman consul, as in the Canova statue, or denuded of all drapery, like the figures of the classic gods and demi-gods. So far as we have learned, this statue gives universal satisfaction. It is the only statue of Washington in the city of New York, and its existence is owing to the indefatigable exertions of Colonel Lee, chairman of the Monumental Committee. The work cost thirty thousand dollars, which was contributed by the following named gentlemen, whose names are worthy of commemoration:—

William B. Astor, Augustus Belmont, John Bridge, Isaac Bell, Jr., James Brown, Edward K. Collins, William Chamberlain, Richard F. Carmo, Henry A. Coit, William W. De Forest, Benjamin H. Field, Hamilton Fish, Seth Grosvenor, Jasper Grosvenor, Boonen Graves, Moses H. Grinnell, Samuel S. Howland, Wilson G. Hunt, John Q. Jones, Shepard Knapp, James G. King, Jacob Little, Charles M. Leupp, Edward B. Little, Peter Lorillard, James Lenox, Andrew Mount, Samuel S. Mitchell, David S. Miller, Robert B. Minton, Charles H. Marshall, William C. Rhineland, Robert O. Williams, Nelson Robinson, Gerard Struyvesant, Cornelius Smith, Uriah J. Smith, Jonathan Sturges, Moses Taylor, Robert L. Taylor, William Wetmore, William Whitewright, Jr., Augustus H. Ward, John D. Wolfe, William E. Willmerding. The ceremony of inaugurating this statue was an imposing one, and took place in the presence of an immense concourse of citizens, including a large proportion of ladies. The military made a splendid appearance, and the oration by the Rev. George W. Bethune, D. D., was worthy of the occasion and the man. He closed by dedicating the statue in the following eloquent phrases:—"And now, fellow citizens—out of this State—exult as we may at other times, and exult more we who were born on its imperial soil, in that designation—it is not equal to this occasion—citizens of the Union (cheers), hear me and bear witness, that in the name and by the authority of those who have erected this statue, I give it, before God and our country, to the people of the United States! From St. Croix to the Rio Grande, from the Atlantic to the Pacific shores, it is theirs! And you, people of New York, individually and collectively, and not by any delegation of the trust, but as a democracy, shall be its guardians. God save the Republic!" The example thus set by our sister city will, we trust, soon be followed by our own. A proposition is on foot to raise by the subscription of small sums, through an appeal to the patriotism of the citizens at large, an amount sufficient to procure a colossal equestrian statue of Washington in bronze, and to erect the same on the highest eminence in Boston Common, a peculiarly advantageous site, than which no better can be chosen. We feel very confident that this project will be successfully carried out. It would be an honor to our city.

THE NEW WASHINGTON MONUMENT, IN UNION PARK, NEW YORK.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE GIPSEY'S SECRET:

—on—

THE LEAGUE OF GUILT.

A STORY OF HIGH AND HUMBLE LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE CONTRABANDIST."

[CONCLUDED.]

CHAPTER XXIV.—[CONTINUED.]

Eleanor never moved, as they came up, but sat leaning against the rock, with her face turned towards them. She must recognize them. Why did she not rise and flee? When they came close to her, her face was colorless, her eyes set, and slowly closing, she had fainted.

"She is ill," said Sir Edward. "Morley, go and bid them bring the carriage nearer."

While his orders were being obeyed, he lifted her in his arms, and turned back with her. Insensible as she was, he placed her in the carriage, and sitting by her side, supported her; while Morley, without speaking, followed, and then drove rapidly homeward.

Twice, during that homeward journey, Eleanor awoke from, and as often relapsed into, unconsciousness; and she was still insensible when, on reaching Ashby Place, Sir Edward lifted her from the carriage, and bore her to her old apartment.

Nearly all the old servants at Ashby had been replaced by new; and it was now a strange attendant who usurped the place of Eleanor's favorite Lucy. Sir Edward bade the woman use means to revive Miss Ashby; and after giving her directions as to the security of his ward, with orders to keep strict watch that she did not escape, he descended to meet Mr. Briancourt and Morley. They were both in the library, in conversation. Victor Briancourt advanced to the baronet, and extended his hand.

"The most admirable success, Ashby!" he said, with his usual light tone and smooth air—"the most admirable success! You are the favorite of fortune, certainly."

Sir Edward bowed silently, and declining the seat placed for him by the gentleman, commenced slowly pacing the floor, with his arms folded. Morley Briancourt stood by the chimney-place, leaning against it, with the gleam of passion and triumph shining darkly in his eyes. Victor Briancourt at length threw himself carelessly upon a seat, saying:

"Was the young lady insensible when you came down just now?"

"She was," answered the baronet.

Sir Edward shortly after left the apartment. In a few moments he returned. Mr. Briancourt regarded him with an inquiring glance.

"The maid reports," said Sir Edward, "that Eleanor is sensible, though very weak. She has spoken little, and asked no questions."

"Ah? I am gratified to hear that she is better," remarked Mr. Briancourt; while Morley, who had listened with unconcealed interest to the statement of the baronet, said nothing. After a brief pause, however, he moved towards the table, at which Sir Edward had seated himself, saying, as he did so:

"I suppose, sir, you are inclined to favor me by allowing this long-deferred marriage to take place as soon as may be?"

"Certainly. You will please yourself in all that regards this matter," responded the baronet.

"I am not disposed to subject the matter to any further risk. If agreeable, I should wish it to be consummated this evening."

"As you say," said Sir Edward, with a slight inclination of the head.

"So far, then, everything is right," exclaimed Victor Briancourt, lightly. "And now, my dear Ashby," addressing himself to his host, "you have but to see to the safety of our fair captive for a few hours. There is little difficulty in assuring us of that, I dare say. The greater will be, I fancy, in gaining the approbation of the lady herself; however, she will not resist when she finds there is no other way." And so it was settled.

It was some three or four hours past noon, when, with a pale cheek and closed eyes, Eleanor reclined in a large easy-chair by a window in her own apartment. The faintness of the morning was gone; the dizziness occasioned by her fall was also banished, under the care of the woman whom Sir Edward had sent to wait on her, and who, not unskilled in the simpler arts of healing, had administered to her a medicine which had entirely dissipated the effects of her fall.

But worse than might have been the danger of the morning, was the evil that threatened her now. Horror and despair had seized her, at finding herself once more in her uncle's hands; for she knew well that the purpose for which she had been brought hither would be speedily executed. And there was no help near, this time.

And yet she had hardly prepared herself for the sudden shock she received, when, near sunset, her uncle presented himself at the door of the boudoir adjoining her dressing-room, and after a brief conference with her maid, announced to Eleanor that her union with Morley Briancourt would take place that evening.

"And mind, Eleanor," he added, hoarsely and threateningly, laying his hand upon her arm with a grasp trembling with desperate excitement,—“mind, I say, no more attempts at escape! no struggles, no rebellion! In another hour, you will go voluntarily to the altar with the husband I have chosen, or—” He paused. His eyes flashed forth a glance more terrible than words.

He released her arm. "The license is procured," he said; "the clergyman waits for us at Woodthorpe church. Within the hour, I give you away!" He turned to the attendant: "Prepare your mistress for her bridal." And without another word, he left the room.

A thunderbolt seemed to have fallen over Eleanor's head, depriving her of all power. The sense of her own utter helplessness crushed her beneath its weight. The event so near, and not a hand to save! As one in a dream—a trance, she submitted to the preparations which she had no power to resist.

Three quarters of an hour had not elapsed, when Sir Edward knocked at the door again, and was admitted by the maid. Eleanor was conscious of his coming up to her, and drawing her hand through his arm; of his leading her from the apartment, down into the great hall; she moving mechanically the while, still in that trance-like state. Now she reached the church, she never knew; still, as one in a dream, bound by some terrible, invisible power, she felt herself led from the carriage into the church porch, and up the aisle, without the ability to break the spell upon her.

And, at the communion-rails, Morley Briancourt stood side by side with her, his heart throbbing with mingled passion and triumph, as the clergyman, book in hand, commenced the services. In that moment of exultation, he cast one hasty glance of triumphant retrospection into the past. Where now were Maida's threats?—where Hugh Latimer's rivalry? The first, sepulchred in silence at the bottom of the Wye; the last, defeated. And he himself held the disputed prize. What power was there to wrest it from him now?

Slowly and solemnly the ceremony proceeded. Quiet and firm stood Morley Briancourt by her who was almost his bride. But Sir Edward himself was obliged to support Eleanor on the other side; for so fixed was her glance, so colorless her face, that he was in dread lest she should faint. With an anxious yet perplexed glance, Victor Briancourt, too, standing at a little distance, beheld her; for he wondered at that stony silence, where he had looked for opposition—for resistance.

The services went on, and the clergyman's tones, low as they were, penetrated to the furthest corner of the dim old church, where the dusk of night was fast settling down among the lonely aisles. Did some sudden sting of conscience deceive Morley Briancourt? or did the man of God utter in a voice that seemed to grow into that of an accusing angel, the terrible warning contained in the marriage service?

"I require and charge ye both (as ye will answer at the dreadful day of judgment when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed), that if either of you know of any impediment why ye may not lawfully be joined together in matrimony, ye do now confess it; for be ye well assured that as many as are coupled together otherwise than as God's word doth allow, are not joined together by God, neither is their matrimony lawful."

In the pause that followed, a voice, that sounded hollow and dreary through the dim aisles, broke the stillness with a sound that was awful.

"Let the ceremony be broken off," it said; "it is a mockery and a sin!"

And slowly up the aisle, advanced a tall, dark woman, with her head covered only by its own luxuriant black hair, dark as night; her countenance deathly white, with sunken outlines; only a single red spot burning on either cheek, and her large black eyes brilliant as with fever.

"Let the ceremony be broken off!" she repeated, coming forward.

Sir Edward started and shuddered in every limb, while he continued to support Eleanor. Victor Briancourt, turning also, uttered a half-subdued exclamation, that seemed suffocated by dread. From the ashy lips of Morley, on hastily glancing at the face of the woman, broke a low, abrupt cry of superstitious terror. Was it a spirit he beheld? or did his eyes deceive him? He clutched the rails for support.

"Maida!" he ejaculated.

It was Maida—Maida in flesh and blood—alive—her very self! No ghost was it. And yet his very flesh crept as he looked upon her. She was here, but how? That night by the river, the stab, the watery burial, the cold face of the corpse—all rose up before him, to mock the reality he now beheld.

"You look astonished, incredulous, aghast, Morley Briancourt," she said, coming near; "and you, too, sir," and she looked from the son to the father, who stood, struck speechless, and gazing on this sudden apparition. "Doubtless," she went on, addressing the latter, "the death of Maida was revealed to you. But I am not silenced yet. See, Morley—I escaped! This hand is no ghost's; it is warm with life, though I rose from a sick bed but three days ago. Touch me; be satisfied!" and she laid her brown yet beautiful hand on that of the young man.

He started and shuddered.

"Alive!" he murmured, convinced. But how escaped? And had she come back to denounce him for that attempted murder?

She read his thoughts.

"Ay—you may tremble," she said, in a low voice. "You thought all secure; but there was one at hand who witnessed and saved me, even as you fled. No friend of yours was my preserver. And it is by his means that I am here to-day. I have been lying for weeks between life and death; but I am here now: not to avenge my own wrongs, however; do not fear that. I shall not betray that night's deed. I am here for another purpose." She turned to the clergyman. "This marriage cannot proceed. There is an impediment to it—an insuperable one."

"Take her away; she is mad!" ejaculated Victor Briancourt, recovering himself, with his conviction of her identity. "Let the marriage proceed!"

"That I cannot consent to do," said the reverend gentleman, "until some explanation of this interruption has been given."

"Would you listen to the words of a mad woman? for she is nothing more. Once more, let me request you to proceed."

"Sir, I must positively refuse to do so. An explanation I must have. And see, besides, the young lady is ill!" And he turned their attention to Eleanor, who, unnoticed, and supported still by the arm of her uncle, had fainted quite away.

Visible consternation overspread the countenances of the father and son. Sir Edward trembled as he looked at her. The clerk brought some water, and suggested, as did also the clergyman, that she should be carried out into the air.

"No, no!" was Sir Edward's hoarse and trembling reply; "she will recover where she is in a moment. But send that woman away. Do you not see? It is she who has alarmed her!"

"Excuse me; I must discharge my duty," said the clergyman, coldly. "Will you, madam," and he turned to the gipsy, "have the goodness to explain this singular scene?"

Meanwhile, Victor Briancourt had whispered to his son:

"Courage, Morley! She can prove nothing." And they both regarded Maida with an air of calm defiance, as, at the clergyman's question, she answered:

"It takes but a few words to explain it. Morley Briancourt cannot marry, for he has a wife already!"

"A wife already?" and the clergyman regarded the young man and his father alternately.

Morley Briancourt, already pale, turned paler still, but assumed an air of calmness.

"It is false!" said his father.

"The proof—your evidence!" were the clergyman's only words, addressing Maida again.

"I will give it as briefly as possible. It must first be known that, though gipsy born, I was, from my sixth year, an inmate of the Briancourt family—a protégé of Victor Briancourt's wife, who had been a good friend to my mother, and kind to our people. It was in the north of England that we lived; but just before the death of my kind protectress, when I was nearly eighteen, the family took up their residence in the neighborhood of Leicester. It was there that Morley Briancourt, unknown to his family, and especially to his father, who had other prospects for him, secretly wooed a young girl, then a temporary resident of a neighboring village; and in private he married her. It was in the little church of St. — that they were married, on the evening of the third day of May, in the year —, exactly eight years since.

"As I have said, the affair had been quite private; but it happened that the ceremony was scarce concluded, before the father of the young man became aware of what was going on. Morley Briancourt and his bride had but just left the church, when he met them. An interview followed between father and son; in that interview, either by threats or bribes, Morley was induced to abandon the bride won but that very hour."

Listening to this straightforward, circumstantial account, so accurately given, Victor Briancourt and his son had stood astounded—almost petrified. Now, from the white lips of the former, quivering with rage, broke the words, "Liar! fiend! traitor!"

"Sir—sir," said the clergyman, rebukingly, "I entreat you to remember the sacredness of this place." Then turning once again to Maida, he continued: "Will you have the goodness to proceed, and bring forward the main points of the case as quickly as possible? If this gentleman's wife is living, how is it that the existence of such a relation between them has so long been concealed?"

"You shall know shortly, sir," returned Maida. "But I am forced to be thus particular in the details of the matter, that I may prove my evidence to be true."

"Ay—doubtless the tale is well prepared," sneered Victor Briancourt.

Again the clergyman silenced him, and the gipsy continued:

"It was a golden marriage that Victor Briancourt wanted for his son; and he, either forced or won, consented to his father's scheme. It was—to conceal the marriage, and destroy all evidence of it.

"It was not an hour after this young girl had been married to her lover, when his father declared to her that the ceremony was illegal; and with the most consummate art, distorted the facts in such a manner as to convince her that he spoke the truth. She was scarcely more than a child—not yet sixteen—and easily deceived. She was told that she could never see her lover again, and either persuaded or terrified into a promise that she would never divulge the events which had that evening transpired. Thus, in the space of a single hour, was she made a bride and a widow. She returned home, and they saw her no more; for the next day, in company with friends going north, she had left the village where she had been staying.

"Another step was yet to be taken—to destroy the record of the marriage; but, bold as both these plotters were, it was a difficult thing to undertake.

"There was not an iota of all this that was not known to me; and I, the hitherto silent observer—I, who had been from infancy the companion of Morley, loving him with a blind and dog-like affection, at least as jealous as it was deep,—I, prompted first by jealousy of, and finally by pity for, the bride of Morley Briancourt, resolved to employ myself in this perilous act. I knew, too, that Morley, legally married as he was to one woman, could not lawfully wed another during her life. And that I might be the means of preventing evil thereafter, and yet avoid betraying this second crime that he was about to commit, and thus injuring him forever, I worked to prevent the destruction of the record.

"By throwing myself in their way, while they were arranging this matter, and then letting them find that I had overheard their conversation, I rendered it expedient for them not only to take me into their confidence, but, with my own offer, to make me the instrument of the deed they would accomplish. They trusted in me. That night, I gained access to the church, and to the register. The record of the marriage was there, and the only one upon the leaf where it was written. Lifting that leaf up, I wrote on the next one, in a corresponding line, a tolerable copy of the record, and was about to tear it out, to give to Morley, leaving the true one in the book, when some sound near startled and caused me to turn round. It was only the wind sighing. I instantly turned to my task again, and carefully tore out the leaf.

"But what was my consternation to find that I had torn out, not only my copy, but the true record also! the wind having blown it back, above the other, while I looked away, I supposed. For a moment, I felt my cheeks burning with alarm; but I had no time to lose in distress over the accident. I could not replace the leaf now. Secretly it, therefore, in my dress, I put the book back, and leaving the place, hastened away to Morley, who was waiting for me not far off. I gave him the record; he looked at it by the light of the moon, and, without detecting the cheat, tore it instantly into atoms. The true one I retained."

Victor Briancourt's hardihood had forsaken him. During these last disclosures, when the existence of the record was asserted, he had grown fearfully pale. Detected guilt sat on his fallen countenance. He moved nervously, and looked furtively towards the door of the side aisle. Morley, on his part, was also pale; but there was a look of deep desperation, of recklessness, succeeding the troubled, startled, alarmed expression which Maida's concluding declarations had caused his countenance to wear.

"And this record—you have it still?" asked the clergyman.

"No—it is in the hands of the clergyman who married Morley Briancourt. He is coming hither directly," answered the gipsy. "I have had it, however, in my possession until to-day. You little thought it, Victor Briancourt, or you, Morley, when, on learning that you were to seek a wealthy bride in the place of the one whom you had discarded, I warned you that I would expose you if you did, and you dared me to do so. You knew my feelings then; you did not guess my power."

Victor Briancourt ground his teeth, and cast a fierce look upon the baronet, who still supported Eleanor's insensible form.

"Baffled!" he muttered; "but the game is not up yet. Come!" And beckoning the baronet, with a frowning gesture, he strode from the church.

Sir Edward shuddered—a strong and terrible shudder. He almost staggered with the light weight of Eleanor. Instantly the gipsy took her from his arms, and trembling as one with an ague fit, he followed Mr. Briancourt.

Even as she did so, a group of persons entered the church door, and advanced up the aisle, the two nearest being Mary and Hugh Latimer. Morley Briancourt started; his glance passed them to those beyond, and he stood as if petrified. Maida, too, marked the approaching party, and a slight exclamation broke from her lips. At that moment, Eleanor's eyes slowly unclosed, and a deep, shuddering sigh marked her return to consciousness.

"O save me—save me from them!" she uttered, faintly.

Hastily Hugh approached with his sister. Those feeble, entreating words had reached his ear.

"Take her—take her," said Maida, quickly, giving Eleanor to him. "She is well rescued, but it was barely, and she needs to be away from here now."

"Eleanor—safe! thank Providence!" was the murmured ejaculation that reached only Miss Ashby's ear, in fervent and passionate tones, as his arm was thrown about her, and Mary on the other side, they led her tenderly out to the air.

The party who had entered behind them consisted of three persons. The two foremost advanced directly up the aisle. The one was Edward Mayhew, and his companion, leaning on his arm, a lady, closely veiled. Morley Briancourt still stood with one hand resting on the communion-rails, his lips compressed, and his eyes bent upon the new-comers.

"Now for the finale!" muttered the gipsy.

It was near. Edward Mayhew's countenance was colorless as marble, dark, stern, rigid, as he came up. He stopped before Morley.

"I have the honor of addressing Mr. Briancourt, I think,—Morley Edmond Briancourt?" he said, in subdued but deadly tones.

Morley bowed, with a dark and restless glance.

"You probably recognize this lady, then, sir?"

The veil was raised, revealing a woman's face, stamped with the unspoken suffering of the heart. Morley Briancourt looked upon it, met those large eyes, full of anguish, and started violently; but he did not speak directly. A thousand rapid changes crossed his countenance in that one brief moment of silence. All the past rose up before him; he was desperate. The game was up for him. Let right have its way; for night had proved itself powerless. He took a step forward.

"I recognize my wife—Caroline Briancourt!"

It was true. That afternoon had Caroline's unhappy secret been revealed, howing the heart of her aunt with grief, and sending a fatal shot to the breast of Edward Mayhew.

A gentleman in clerical attire, who had accompanied the cousins hither, now stepped forward. It was, as Morley saw, the clergyman who had united him to Caroline Ashburton.

"You acknowledge it, then, sir?" he asked, of Morley.

"I declare it," was the brief answer.

"It is well," said Edward Mayhew, sternly. "Caroline," and he gently released her hand from his arm,—"Caroline, go home to my mother. You, sir," to Morley Briancourt, "will have the goodness to follow me. I have a word to say to you."

Morley received and glanced at the card handed him by Edward Mayhew, and instantly the two left the church together.

"O, Edward," uttered the unhappy Caroline,—“Edward, what are you about to do?”

The cry rang from her lips in accents of anguish. She endeavored to move forward, failed, and sank fainting to the floor.

They hastened to raise her. At that instant, the report of pistols was heard; and while Maida supported the insensible form of Caroline, the rest hastily followed in the direction the two young men had taken. But too late. Just at the back of the church, in a small field, they found them—Morley Briancourt stretched lifeless upon the turf, and, lying a few paces from him, Edward Mayhew, resting upon his arm, his hand pressed tight upon his left side, where the blood was streaming rapidly. Even as they came up, he, too, sank back, with one faint moan, and lay silent.

CHAPTER XXV.

SHADOWS ON THE HEARTHSTONE.

DESOLATE was the hearth at Eldon Manor; silent the halls so lately filled with the music of happy voices. A shadow had fallen over the place. Rank grew the weeds in its neglected gardens; the grass sprang up tangled and wild, and thorns and thistles cloaked the untrodden paths. The autumn winds sighed drearily around it. The very sunshine that fell there had something sorrowful and lonely in its still beams, as it lighted up all this deserted wilderness.

Edward Mayhew, recovered from the illness succeeding his duel with Morley Briancourt, had left England forever, and wandered, a solitary, heart-broken man, over the wide continent.

Lady Mayhew had gone back to Scotland, to spend the remainder of a saddened, embittered life in seclusion, taking with her Caroline, who, freed from her husband by his death, even in the very hour of that first and fatal meeting since their marriage, and rendered wretched by the remorse resulting from the unhappy error of her girlhood, became a recluse from society, seeking, thenceforth, by works of mercy and charity, to secure for others a portion of the happiness which had fled from her own heart.

In the family of Dr. Morrison, these events caused the sincerest sorrow. It was during the year spent with them in England by Caroline, that she was drawn into that erratic step, whose consequences were so terrible, and it never ceased to be a source of sorrow to them that they had not guarded their trust more watchfully.

Victor Briancourt, in the sudden destruction of his long-cherished plans, and the death of his only son, had received a terrible shock; but it only served to render him desperate—to bring out, by the disappointment he had received, the darkest traits of a naturally evil nature, no longer covered by the smooth graces which had artfully cloaked them hitherto, and which now were recklessly thrown off. What had hitherto been concealed in his way of life, was now open. A rone, a gambler, a villain, he had always been, but it was under the character of a gentleman. Now he plunged, without restraint, into vice. His name was coupled freely with those of the lowest in London, whither he returned the very hour after Morley's burial.

Thus Sir Edward Ashby was left to himself, for a while, and relieved of the presence of one whom he dreaded as a vampire. But it was not for long. The power that menaced him had not released him. It was there still; and the hair might break—the sword fall, at a time when he least expected it. Meanwhile, grown a thousand times more harsh, and gloomy, and morose, than even before the failure of the marriage which he had so endeavored to bring about, he shut himself up in solitude at Ashby, and led a hermit's life. He grew nervous, fanciful, irritable; while, day by day, a deeper and darker melancholy seemed to settle over his mind.

Since the day which had produced such a change in the lives and destinies of so many, he had, as with some deep aversion, studied to avoid Eleanor. He shunned the sight of her, meeting her not even at meals, taking his own in his own apartment, or the library. He seemed to have taken, too, not only a dislike, but a dread of her. If ever by chance he encountered her, he passed her hastily and shrinkingly by, muttering to himself. Why it was, he alone knew. But he whispered, with a strong shiver, one day, on seeing her, something about her looking too much like somebody who died long ago.

A severe and somewhat protracted illness was the immediate consequence to Eleanor, attendant upon the excitement and distress of that day, when the projected union was so near being consummated; and for nearly a month, she never left her room. During this illness (in which Sir Edward never once visited his niece), Miss Latimer passed the greater part of each day by the bedside of her friend; and with her kind care, the faithful attendance of Lucy Elmore, and the daily visits of kind Dr. Gregg, Eleanor, after a tedious illness, slowly progressed towards recovery. Many a time, during her convalescence, she talked with Mary Latimer of all she had escaped, and of all she had suffered; and together they expressed their gratitude to those who had been the means of saving her—Maida the gipsy and the dwarf Pequin, who, as they rightly guessed, had some connection with each other. For Pequin was really one of Maida's own people.

It was he who had been near on the night of the scene by the river side,—he, who, though come too late to save the deed from being performed, had yet, with the assistance of a strong dark fellow of the tribe, who had remained with him on Peashurst Common that evening, drawn the yet living Maida from her watery bed, at a time when one moment more of delay might have been her last. She was resuscitated; and though the blow which she had received was nearly fatal, it was not quite so, and she had escaped with a severe illness. During this illness, while she took care that the fact of her existence should be kept secret, she had employed Pequin to take her place, in watching Morley Briancourt's proceedings; and, learning the near neighborhood of Caroline Ashburton, or Caroline Briancourt, had, on recovering sufficiently, proceeded (and the reader may have already guessed her identity with the veiled lady who called at Lady Mayhew's) to acquaint Caroline with the fact of the validity of her marriage, and place in her hands the record which proved it. As has already been seen, she was but just in time.

Eleanor had heard nothing of them since that opportune denouement at Woodthorpe church, nor, indeed, had any one else in the neighborhood. She wished much to meet them again. She could hardly have been said to have seen Maida more than once, since she had seen her but for a moment at the church, on recovering from her swoon, after which, being carried out, she had directly lost sight of her again. She wished to see her, and express the gratitude she owed her, and earnestly looked for some sign of her from day to day.

Meanwhile, she grew every day stronger, and finally was able to go out. It was with good Dr. Gregg and Miss Latimer that she drove out the first day of her leaving the house. She saw her uncle at the library window, as they set off. He was white, and worn, and haggard, as he always looked lately. He turned hastily away, as he beheld her, without noticing any of the party. It was to Briarfield they directed their course—Briarfield, whither Eleanor had not been for many a long week.

They reached their place of destination; and it was with the tenderest affection that Eleanor was welcomed by Aunt Dorothea, who was overjoyed to see her out again. Her coming had been quite unanticipated, Mary having planned it as a sort of surprise; and Hugh, when he looked suddenly up from the book he was reading, and found her standing beside him, started from his seat with a thrill striking every nerve.

"Eleanor—Eleanor!" he uttered, in tones of involuntary tenderness; and his eyes beamed on her, his hand clasped hers, with a look and touch that made her heart throb with a delicious emotion that she could hardly define—a sensation half of pleasure and half of pain, as new as it was sweet. Her cheek colored; she trembled; her eyes fell beneath his eloquent glance. Hugh Latimer alone marked these things, and it was with a sudden glow of hope, of relief, almost of conviction—a conviction too dear for words, filling his breast with brightness.

He had been sitting there, reading, for the last three hours, quiet, lonely, and rather weary; sometimes letting the book rest idly on his knee, and thinking, as he leaned back in his chair and looked about him, that there was growing to be something desolate and monotonous in the stillness of Briarfield,—that there was something dull and gloomy in the peaceful atmosphere around him,—that the sunlight was clouded.

Now, how inexpressibly bright and cheerful had the place suddenly become! A restless joy filled him. He sat and heard the others talking together; he talked with them, or, rising, paced the floor with unquiet steps; the agitation he felt, barely concealed by the resolute mastery of a strong will.

He longed for a moment alone with her, to know if he had not deceived himself. It came ere long. Once again, in the beautiful glades of Briarfield Park, he walked by her side, that morning. They had all come out together, with the exception of good Aunt Dorothea; and now, while Dr. Gregg and Mary lingered behind, Hugh Latimer kept on by Eleanor's side, talking with her of all that had been in the past.

"Until to-day," he said, "we have met but once, and not exchanged half a dozen words, since that morning when you so mysteriously vanished from the roadside, and when, on returning from my chase with Ranger, I found vacancy where I had left you. For our meeting in the church could hardly be called one. You were faint—ill. You could barely recognize, much less speak to me. But I was only too glad that you were safe. I had suffered much alarm concerning you." He broke off; his voice was subdued, yet earnest with the feeling that thronged back upon him with the recollection of that day.

"What did you think when you discovered that I was gone?" asked Eleanor. It was more for the want of something to say, than from any necessity for that particular question, that she asked it. She must speak, and calmly.

"I can scarcely tell you. But you had promised to stay, and I knew that you would not have moved from the place, of your free will. I searched instantly on every side. In vain. The only trace left was a crumpled letter, lying in the grass, which bore your name, and which you had probably dropped. But I discovered footsteps about the place, those of more than one person; and at the junction of the two paths, traces of carriage wheels, where some carriage had driven up, and turned back again, though none was in sight then. The tracks of the foot-steps led up to it, and instantaneously a vague suspicion of the truth flashed across my mind. I rode on at full speed to Eldon, and informed Lady Mayhew of the case. Her alarm was excessive; and you may judge how it was augmented, when Harry Longworth, who had come to visit your maid, Lucy, told of the letter he had brought you, discovered it to be the same which I had found, and we learned its contents. The fears we entertained were, ere long, changed to a painful certainty. It was but a little while before a hastily written communication was received from some unknown source (which has now proved to be your friend the dwarf), declaring that you had been carried away to Ashby. And not three hours after, a second, stating that a forced marriage was about to take place, and that if friendly measures were not taken, you would be sacrificed before the setting of that day's sun. It was then that the secret of Caroline Ashburton's marriage was disclosed, wrong from her lips by your danger, and the hour that followed, I believe it would be impossible to describe. It was then that we hastened to Woodthorpe, to witness that painful and fearful scene."

"Fearful, indeed, it must have been," echoed Eleanor. "Poor Caroline, how has she suffered! and what suffering has that fatal error of hers brought upon others! Edward, with his hand stained by the blood of a fellow-creature, and his heart turned to bitterness, has become an exile and a wanderer. His mother's heart is well nigh broken; and Caroline herself—alas! what is the promise of her life now?"

"Let us hope that it is not blighted forever. Let us hope," said Hugh, gently, "that one day may see the atonement; that some future sun may rise upon those hearts re-united; upon those lives flowing again together as one; with the bitterness of this great sorrow past. When the violence of that sorrow shall have become calmed; when, strengthened and purified by trial, they shall have learned to seek the way pointed out to the weary in heart, and meeting there, shall tread it thenceforth together, leaning upon a promise such as earlier days never gave."

"Amen!" uttered Eleanor, reverently.

Rendered serious and subdued by the reminiscences in which they had indulged, they walked on in silent meditation. When Hugh Latimer spoke to his companion again, it was with the tide of feeling flowing on in a calmer, quieter, sadder flow than it had known, in its joyful, restless agitation, an hour before.

"Eleanor," he said, "I have been thinking how much of trouble there has been, in many hearts, during the time that has past. And though, perhaps, you never guessed it, my own has hidden not the least. It was for you."

"For me?" she echoed, in a low tone.

"For you, Eleanor," and he took her hand gently in his. "You know that when I came home first from the continent, I met you in the belief that you were before a great while to become the bride of one who has gone. I looked on you as another's; and yet, when I saw you, day after day, and talked with you, and listened to the tones that were music to even your lowest dependent, I found in them a charm deeper, sweeter even than I had seen in your features, when, unknown to you, I had studied them with delight a long time before. I met you at the bedside of the sick and dying, where you waited, night and day. I heard you speak words of comfort to the bereaved. It was as if I had stood in the presence of an angel. I had loved you before, Eleanor; I did more then; I revered you. My love became deeper—purer. It was the soul that spoke to me through the purest, loveliest countenance on earth. Eleanor, you are free: I may speak now. My love is deep, and strong, and abiding. Will you take it? Eleanor, will you be Hugh Latimer's wife?"

Slowly his arm gathered her in a half embrace, as his clear and tender glance sought hers. As she lifted her tear-filled eyes to meet it, he saw that a happy smile trembled in them.

"Yes, Hugh," she said.

And for the first time, Hugh Latimer's lips were pressed to the brow of her he loved best.

CHAPTER XXVI.

A DARK DEED, AND A DYING DECLARATION.

It was a wild night, late in autumn, when not a star gleamed through the black clouds that overcast the sky. Through the leafless woods of Ashby Place, the cold winds wailed mournfully. A storm seemed near at hand.

It wanted some three hours of midnight, when a horseman, mounted on a powerful black beast, and muffled in a heavy cloak, dashed at full speed across the park, up the door of the hall, and dismounting, fastened his horse to a tree, and entered the mansion. There was no servant at hand to announce the visitor; but he seemed to need none. Proceeding directly to the library, across the dimly-lighted hall, he threw open the door, and went in.

Sir Edward Ashby was sitting beside the table in the centre of the apartment, an old man, worn and haggard, growing older and more worn and haggard every day now. You might see it even by the candle-light, that shed a softer glow than that of day over the white hair and the pale face, crossed and lined by many a deep wrinkle. He started up from his seat as the door was flung open, and an exclamation of fear was half arrested on his lips as he recognized his visitor, Victor Briancourt.

"Victor—you here?" he uttered, in a trembling voice.

"Ay—I am here, and for a purpose. Well, am I not welcome? You do not ask me to sit down. I will even do so without it!"

The baronet made no reply, but sat with his eyes cast down, and his hands folded lightly together before him.

"Come!" said the guest, frowningly. "Sir Edward, do you not hear? I want twenty thousand pounds to-night."

"Twenty thousand? You—you cannot have it!"

"I cannot?" Victor Briancourt smiled. "This bond says something different." He drew from his breast pocket a folded paper, and tapped on it significantly with his finger.

"Ay—it said that I was to advance you a certain sum on the day of the marriage. That marriage did not take place."

"How?—do you evade the conditions?" thundered the guest, springing from his seat. "Beware! Remember my power! Refuse to fulfil this written agreement, and I publish your guilt to the world; ay—even though my own life is the forfeit! See—I hold the bond, signed with your name. I will show it!"

The baronet looked ghastly white. He glared on his guest for a moment with a glance of terror and of hate, and upon the paper he held forth. Then, with a cry like that of a wild beast, he sprang forward, and bending across the table, attempted to seize it.

He succeeded; but before his trembling fingers could tear it, Victor Briancourt had reached him. Sir Edward threw the paper away, and grappled with him. Victor Briancourt was the younger and stronger man of the two; he could have easily flung his adversary to the floor; but Sir Edward's right hand clutched his throat, with a hold made terrible by desperation. He could not shake him off. Suffocating with the vice-like grasp, he snatched from his breast a small dagger. For a moment it flashed on high in the light from the flaring candles, then was plunged to the hilt in the bosom of his antagonist.

A wild cry of agony arose from the lips of the baronet, as he staggered back, echoed by another fainter one, as the library door was flung open, and Eleanor Ashby stood there, her face white as death, gazing upon the horrible scene before her.

Instantly the baronet's hold was released. Victor Briancourt sprang past Eleanor, and out through the hall, leaving his victim weltering in his blood upon the library floor, with the disputed bond—the evidence of the fatal league—lying beneath the dying hand that vainly strove to clutch it. It was of no use to its late possessor now.

Faint with terror, Eleanor sprang to raise her uncle, calling at the same time for assistance. In an instant the servants had flocked to the place. Sir Edward was conveyed to his apartment, and the physician summoned from Woodthorpe. Doctor Gregg arrived, but too late.

"Nothing can be done for him. He is dying!" he said. "How did this come about? What violence is this?"

The dying man touched him.

"Send for a clergyman," he asked, faintly,—"send—quick!"

Directly a servant was despatched; and while he was gone, Eleanor told Doctor Gregg of the scene she had witnessed. But it was in but a few brief words; for the dying man was calling her. "Eleanor—O, Eleanor! come to me—look at me!" he said.

Weeping, she stood beside him. He looked at her earnestly—wildly.

"You weep!" he said. "For whom—for me?"

"Yes—for you!"

"You weep for a wretch who has been your greatest enemy. I have wronged you—I have persecuted you. You should hate me!"

"I do not hate you. I pity and forgive you," uttered Eleanor, solemnly.

He groaned, and turned his face away.

"She forgives me!" he moaned,—"she forgives me! Me—who caused her all the sorrow she has ever known. Yes—all, even the first tear of trouble her infant eyes ever shed! The clergyman—quick!" he said, feebly, after a moment's silence. "Why does he not come?"

"He is coming now," answered the physician; and he held water to the baronet's pale lips.

Sir Edward drank, and looked up.

"How long have I to live?"

The physician hesitated.

"How long? Tell me."

"An hour."

"An hour! Ah, mercy—mercy!" he moaned.

Deeply as he had wronged her, Eleanor felt nothing but pity and grief for him now. She turned away to weep. He saw her.

"Ah, you leave me!" he uttered. "Come back. And yet, why should you pity me now? You will curse my memory when I am gone. Ah, I must confess! let me confess. I am dying! There is no more concealment. Everything will be known beyond the grave. It cannot be hidden there. I shall meet him face to face—I shall meet James Ashby. The account must be rendered up then!"

Eleanor had come back to the bedside. Her troubled glance met that of the physician.

"What is it that he means?" he asked.

"What do I mean?" echoed the dying man, catching the words.

"This—this! It is this for which Victor Briancourt has slain his victim!"

He held in his wasted hand a crushed and crumpled paper. He groaned as his eyes fell on it. A cold dew covered his brow and lips. The sight of that fatal paper seemed to fill him with mad terror.

"Eleanor," he ejaculated,—"Eleanor, I can keep the secret no longer! Fifteen years has it been wearing away my life; fifteen years has existence been a burden to me; fifteen years has Victor Briancourt tortured me with the memory of my crime; fifteen years he has held this paper to keep me in his power!"

He lay there, exhausted and panting, with a look of anguish on his pale face, and his hollow eyes closed. Doctor Gregg answered with a glance of sympathy and painful concern the anxious, appealing look of Eleanor. But he shook his head. He could do nothing. He was powerless to still the workings of a guilty conscience.

The dying man opened his eyes, and fixed them on Eleanor. He was growing weaker and weaker.

"Eleanor," he murmured, "my strength is nearly gone. I have little time left. I must tell you, if the clergyman has not come."

The door opened gently. The clergyman entered.

"He is here," said Miss Ashby, in a low voice. She beckoned. Mr. Graham advanced, and bent over the baronet's pillow.

"You have come? It is well. You are in time," were the faintly-spoken words of the dying man, meeting his glance. "Eleanor, nearer. Listen!"

With the sudden energy of re-awakened excitement, he slightly raised himself, and turned towards her, his eyes gleaming with a strange fire.

"I have wronged you; I have treated you ill, Eleanor," he said, panting, "and you have forgiven me. Know that there is no forgiveness for me, here or hereafter! I have been your enemy. I was your father's enemy—his bitter, deadly foe. He was my elder, but only my half brother—the child of our father's first marriage. I hated him when we were children, and as we grew up together, that hatred grew deeper; for I was jealous of the elder and favorite son. And while he was the wealthy heir of the house of Ashby, I was poor and obscure, with only a younger brother's portion, that I scorned to touch, contrasting it with his."

He paused for an instant, almost exhausted. A strengthening cordial was held to his lips, and directly he revived, and went on.

"We grew to manhood. Our father died, and James became the master of Ashby. Deeper grew my envy—darker my hate. Victor Briancourt was my friend, then. He was wily—cunning—evil. He fostered the enmity I bore towards my brother. He said to me, 'if it were not for James, you would be heir. There is none nearer than you.' My brother married. Within the four years succeeding, two children were born to him—the first, a girl; the second a boy. My hatred was now a thousand times augmented; for, if there had ever been a prospect of better fortunes for me, it was cut off now. Another direct heir was born to the house of Ashby. And now, Victor Briancourt was ever by my side, filling my soul with evil thoughts."

He paused, laboring for breath. A moment, and he raised himself with almost superhuman exertion.

"Eleanor!" he ejaculated, wildly—desperately—"how did your father die? and your brother?"

She could not speak. She had grown deadly white within the last few moments. She faltered and would have fallen, but for the supporting arm of the clergyman.

"You cannot answer me—but you know! You have heard—as all others have heard!" uttered the dying man, in a voice of frenzy. "Francis Ashby died in his cradle—it was I who poisoned him! My brother was drowned in the river—it was my hand that struck the dagger to his heart, and sunk the body in the waves! Victor Briancourt was my accomplice—my tempter—and there is the bond I gave him to keep his secrecy! He claimed it—his reward for helping me secure the wealth I had coveted. He has kept it for fifteen years—it is mine now. But I am a murderer—a murderer!"

And with a single groan he sank back—dead.

Years have passed away since the last painful scene which we have recorded was enacted within the walls of Ashby. Many a happier one has it beheld since. For, though for a long, long time, it was shut up and left in solitude, it has been re-opened, and often resounds to the music of pleasant voices when a happy family party gathers there from Briarfield, from Eildon, and from Upton Graoge, just beyond Woodthorpe, where Doctor Gregg used to live a quiet, bachelor life. For Hugh Latimer has long since won the bride of his heart, and the old house at Briarfield is Eleanor's home now, with her husband and her children. And the prayer in which Hugh and Eleanor once joined, for the re-union of those who had suffered so much unhappiness has been answered. Once again is Lady Mayhew with her son and Caroline, a happy dweller in her English home. Happier, even, than when we first met her of old; for Edward Mayhew and Caroline are man and wife now. A happiness, subdued, quiet, but perfect, is theirs. Purified and chastened by affliction, it has something in it yet sweeter than of old, when they loved, not having known sorrow.

Mary Latimer—sister Mary—is married to the doctor. They are a kind-hearted, cheerful pair, loving each other with a quiet, earnest affection, and making everybody around them happy.

Lucy Elmore and Harry Longworth are married, too, like the rest, and are both in Eleanor's service still. Faithful, honest and affectionate, they are as dear to each other, and as firm in the favor of their kind mistress, as ever; and Hugh, also, their beloved master, shares a place in their hearts, by her side.

Maida, the gipsy, and her dark Ariel, our old friend, Pequin, still lead a happy, because a wandering, life. The tragedy at Ashby played out, with all its plots and schemes of evil and of good, their sojourn here was over. They performed the services they had undertaken, and then took leave of it. Their object was accomplished. But they made Eleanor and her husband a brief visit ere their departure; and when they bade them adieu, it was with tears in the eyes of more than one of them, for the services on one side, and the obligations on the other, had served, as only such will, to draw their hearts towards one another in friendship and gratitude. Their parting was one of the warmest and kindest feeling; and the home of Eleanor and her husband will be ever a place of welcome to them.

Little have we to say of Victor Briancourt, save that he died worse than he had lived; and his name, if it were ever spoken afterwards, was coupled with dishonor, villainy and shame.

The death-bed confession of Sir Edward Ashby, fearful as it was, and terrible as was its effect on the mind of Eleanor, at first, left a saddening influence forever after. The mournful story of her father's end and the murder of her infant brother, never recurred to her without causing a feeling of inexpressible grief. But she dwells with compassion on the memory of her uncle, remembering that if he sinned, he also suffered.

QUESTIONS FOR A WIFE.

Do you recollect what your feelings were immediately after you had spoken the first unkind word to your husband? Did you not feel ashamed and grieved, and yet too proud to admit it? That was, is, and ever will be your evil genius! It is the temper which labors incessantly to destroy your peace, which cheats you with an evil delusion that your husband deserved your anger, when he really most required your love. It is the cancer which feeds on those unspeakable emotions you felt on the first pressure of his hand and lip. Never forget the manner in which the duties of that calling can alone be fulfilled. If your husband is hasty, your example of patience will chide as well as teach him. Your violence may alienate his heart, and your neglect impel him to desperation. Your soothing will redeem him—your softness subdue him; and the good natured twinkle of those eyes, now filling beautifully with priceless tears, will make him all your own.—New York Independent.

THE BELIZE.—MOUTH OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

THE BELIZE.

The first of the two large pictures on this page is an accurate view of the Belize, one of the mouths by which the "Father of Waters" seeks an outlet to the Gulf. At the present time when so many statistics are being published in reference to this great artery of trade and travel, the sketches we publish will be regarded as possessing peculiar interest. The scene we first present is a rendezvous for pilots, and on the low shore to the right a lofty look-out is erected for their use, from which they can descry vessels at a great distance. The buildings all along the pass are picturesque, and the trees planted at intervals impart a very pleasing aspect to the scene. Many of the little houses sketched in our view, are occupied by pilots. As soon as vessels requiring their services are signalled, they put off to discharge their arduous duties. From the Belize nearly all vessels are towed up to the city of New Orleans, and the vessels employed for this purpose are very different from the little steam tugs that ply in our harbor, as the force of the mighty current they are obliged to stem requires powerfully built craft and ponderous engines. Our readers are referred to the second engraving for a correct representation of these craft. One of them is seen along-side a large ship, while another in the distance has two vessels in tow—one to starboard and one to larboard of her. The long ladders seen in these tow-boats are peculiar to them. By reason of the immense extent of lowlands existing about the delta of the Mississippi, fogs are of very frequent occurrence. Indeed, a foggy state of the atmosphere appears to be its normal condition. These fogs generally settle and hang upon the surface of the water, only extending upward forty or fifty feet, so that above them the air is comparatively clear. Thus the masts of ships reach entirely clear of the obscurity while their hulls are immersed in the lower stratum of fog. The steamboat people take advantage of this very peculiar phenomenon, and, by means of the high ladders shown in our engraving, are enabled to keep a bright lookout aloft. From these ladders the men descry the masts of ships waiting for tugs below, and are enabled to steer directly for them. They are also enabled, by the same means, to avoid collisions with vessels. If the fogs reached a much greater elevation than they do, the delays and dangers of an entrance to New Orleans would be often disastrous. In approaching the pilot ground, the shouts and screams of the high pressure steam engines are heard long before the boats to which they belong can be descied. The river opposite the city of New Orleans is half a mile wide and from one hundred to one hundred and sixty feet deep. It preserves the same width almost to its entrance to the Gulf of Mexico.

TOWING ON THE MISSISSIPPI, FROM THE BELIZE TO NEW ORLEANS.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

"NOT WITHOUT HOPE."

Inscribed, with true sympathy, to Mr. and Mrs. Decatur Motery.

BY MRS. L. S. GOODWIN.

There is a night no earthly morrow's bathing
Can fully cleanse to-day;
A winter with no spring beyond its scathing
Of wholly joyous sway.

Living or dead, the child is portion tender
Of fond parental hearts;
The chill of death stays from the forced surrender,
Nor ever quite departs.

Yet heaven hath wondrous mercy in its keeping
For souls baptized in gloom,
They are made dear to him who once stood weeping,
A friend, at Lazarus' tomb.

Uplift the eye of faith to read the token:
Lo! mid your falling tears,
Where sunshine of immortal hope hath broken,
A promise bow appears.

She, darling of your bosom, has not perished,
But gone to be Christ's own;
The form below is now not more your cherished,
Than mould and lettered stone.

But view her on the mount of love reclining,
With earth-clouds 'neath her feet,
An angel in eternal radiance shining,
Her song forever sweet.

Rare was the loveliness unto her given,
Of face, and form, and mien;
But beauty such as she doth wear in heaven,
No mortal eye hath seen.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

PRIVATE THEATRICALS.

BY ANNIE CLAIR.

PERMIT me to introduce the reader into one of the most imposing mansions that wall the street on — Avenue. Nothing can be imagined that would please the eye or attract the fancy more than in that brilliantly lighted room. Long curtains of crimson damask, bordered with rich fringes, descended to the floor, and gave an air of imposing luxury to everything around. Soft Turkey carpets lay so thickly on the floor that it must have been a heavy footfall that sounded as it trod them—sofas and lounges of every form and fashion wooed indolent repose—choice pictures from skilful artists and magnificent mirrors decked the walls—books in gilded bindings glittered in rosewood cases; yet in the midst of all this—all that could charm the senses and fascinate the cultivated mind—one of the inmates was ill at ease and painfully abstracted.

Angusta Somerville was very queenly in form, and her tall, elegant person betrayed a love of command never surpassed in our republican cities. Her luxuriant hair was arranged in a heavy braid above the forehead; her dark eyes, usually sparkling and bright, were now downcast, while her small mouth was compressed closely over her regular and pearly teeth; and she pressed her diamond ring so hard that it actually caused a drop of blood to fall on the crumpled note she had dropped in her lap.

"Walter is very late to-night," remarked a lady who was in the corner of the apartment, and who had been gazing listlessly at her daughter for the last half hour.

"He is not expected this evening, as he is necessarily detained elsewhere," replied Augusta Somerville, with a proud curl of the lip.

In another moment the door bell was heard, and the lady hastily took up a volume and to all appearance was deeply engaged in its contents. The servant announced "Mr. Percival," and a tall, distinguished form, with a countenance which expressed nobleness of soul, approached the place where Augusta Somerville was sitting, took the small hand that was resting on the table, and placed it to his lips. The hand was hastily withdrawn, and a frown for an instant darkened the countenance that Walter Percival had always thought so lovely; but soon she saw that she was betraying more feeling than her wonted calculating policy permitted, and all was again calm and quiet.

"Why, Walter, I did not expect you this evening, and have become much interested in this volume that Colonel Fay sent me. I supposed you had gone to spend the evening with your new favorite, Miss Benton. Have you been rehearsing for our private theatricals?"

"Do not trifle with me this evening, Augusta; for I am in no humor for it. Listen to me calmly."

And his voice became almost stern as he placed his dark, earnest eyes on her countenance, while her own for a moment fell beneath the gaze. It was but for a moment, however—and she proudly confronted him, while she haughtily replied:

"Indeed, you have assumed a tone of authority this evening. Please to remember that the irrevocable words are not yet spoken which bind me as your slave! There was a time when my wishes were respected—my pleasure cared for."

"And so they ever shall be. But what is it that you require? To gratify a mere whim for selfish amusement, perhaps the happiness of a fellow-creature is to be sacrificed. And even were I to consent, Jennie Benton is too gentle and retiring to take so conspicuous a part in a society where she is a complete stranger."

"But I tell you, Walter, it is all to be reality to her for the time being. Do you think that a poor seamstress who has spent all her life in L—— Court, can have the sensitive feelings of one who has always lived with refined society? For a few moments, while the delusion lasts, she will be supremely happy at being the wife of the most—but I do not wish to flatter you—and then, perhaps, will repeat to her low companions how she has taken a part in one of the exclusive private amusements in — Avenue."

Could Augusta Somerville have seen the expression of her companion's countenance at that moment, she might have feared that her influence was not so potent as she had believed—but his face was turned from her, and for the space of five minutes there was no reply. When he spoke, his voice was quite natural, though the expression of the face then was one she could not fathom.

"Listen to me for a few moments, and then, if you still persist in this wish of yours, it shall be gratified."

"It was about twenty years ago that a poor orphan boy, scantily clad, wandered from one New England village to another in search of a home. He was a mere child then—not ten years had passed over his head, and it was a long time before there was any one that would give him a permanent shelter. But at length a country shopkeeper took him in and gave him employment in his store. The family of this kind man consisted of a wife and one child of two years of age.

Time passed on. By a fortunate speculation the village grocer became the possessor of half a million. He removed to New York, where they were now welcomed in the exclusive circles of the elite of the city. The daughter had grown up accomplished and beautiful and was just budding into womanhood, when, by another sudden reverse of fortune, he was reduced to extreme poverty, and in two months the father was called away to another and better mansion. But I am getting in advance of my story and will go back for the space of a few years.

"The child he had taken under his protection had no taste for a merchant's life, which his adopted parent had designed for him, and at the age of fifteen he went into a lawyer's office. I will hasten over the trials and privations he experienced, but in due course he was admitted to the bar. The position of a young lawyer, without money, friends, or clients, is not an enviable one. For two years he lived a life of almost abject poverty. His law books disappeared, one by one, to pay his landlady for lodging; and in the shadow of his adversity his proud and ambitious spirit feared and shrank from the tones of sympathy and pity that perhaps his former patron would have bestowed. He shunned all who had previously known him. But 'there is a tide in the affairs of men'—and one evening, as he sat alone in his office, casting panoramic views over the past, and probably dark future, the door slowly opened and a man with an appearance which suggested the idea of 'poor poet' entered. He stated without delay the object of his visit, and informed him that he had applied to several members of the bar, who considered his cause so hopeless that they refused to take it on his terms, which were—five hundred dollars if successful—but if not, he would be destitute of the means to pay any expense.

"He accepted the proposition of his client, though from all the evidence gained, his case seemed almost a hopeless one. In a few days there were other papers found which he believed might prove of some consequence. How anxiously he waited for the event which he believed would decide the 'great event of his life.' The important morning at length arrived. It was dark, rainy and cheerless. Was it a type of his future? He feared it was. It was not with pleasure that he surveyed his scanty and threadbare wardrobe; he knew that it was seldom the world remembered 'The mark was but the guinea stamp,' and appearances went a great way to those just commencing life. His reputation had not been handed down by a parent who had trod the paths of fame before him—or by a long retinue of influential friends aiding him onward on a smooth, pleasant road—or by gold and encouragement from a sympathizing world. No—he had none of these—but he had a heart strong in the consciousness of right, an untiring energy, a persevering will, to surmount all obstacles. And what would these accomplish? It was to be tried this day.

"Reputation, if it came to him at all, was not a free gift, but it must be earned—yes, earned by untiring toil, and sleepless nights devoted to study, and mental labor—earned when many others of his profession were quietly sleeping on beds of down, or revelling in the ball room and fashionable assembly.

"He entered the court house of the great city of New York. There were assembled judges, lawyers and jurymen—some who had grown old in the discharge of their duties in this very place; there were many in the full meridian of life, and not a few of his own age, seated by friends of the same profession, who came to listen to their proteges' maiden speech. All were surrounded by friends—all but one—and so much depended on this day.

"It was near the middle of the afternoon when it came his turn to rise. He had listened through the day to the different addresses that were made, and at times his heart sank within him as he thought how little was in his favor. At length he arose, and while big drops of perspiration stood on his brow, looked round on the audience. Many were glancing over papers which they held in their hands, while others were reclining on their seats and addressing those by their side.

"His voice trembled a little as he commenced, but it was unnoted in the hum around him. Soon it grew firm, and as he proceeded the people rose from their indolent posture, the papers were laid aside and they turned their attention to the orator. During the space of three hours he addressed them, and not a sound was heard save the voice of the speaker. When he closed a murmur ran through the court house—whether it was approval or censure he did not know; but when the court adjourned the members of his profession crowded around him and congratulated him on his success. Old men with hoary hair grasped his hand and confessed themselves happy to make the acquaintance of one who they flattered themselves was an honor to his calling. Those of his own age told him his would prove a brilliant career.

"When he retired to his lodgings that night he felt happier than he had ever before been in his life—he had reached a crisis in his career, he had made his first address since he had been admitted to the bar—and it was not a failure.

"His career was now an upward one; for fortune smiled and friends gathered around. He has ascended a few more rolls in the ladder of fame, and the gay and brilliant circles of fashion admit him into their midst, all of which he appreciates at its full value. But it has not hardened his heart, and he remembers that his feelings were as refined and sensitive when he was a penniless student—yes, and a thousand times more so, than when a gay world was murmuring its applause lovingly.

"And now I have given you a true history of one who was a near and dear friend of my own, and you will believe me when I tell you that it is not wealth or rank that makes the heart sensitive or the blood rush to the cheek with a rich glow at an unmerited slight or insult. And now I will leave it to you to say that all this deceit which you think will give you so much pleasure, is wrong and should be avoided."

"Your sketch has been a very interesting one, Walter, but then I cannot see what it has to do with the present subject under discussion, and then it will seem so much more natural to have her believe it reality, and she ought to think it a favor to be admitted into our pleasant assemblies, even when it was for our amusement. I am sure I do not see the harm in it, and if there is, I will let it rest on my shoulders."

"Be it so, then."

And his brow darkened, while his lips and cheeks became less as marble.

"And in return I will tell you a bit of a compliment to gratify your insatiable vanity. The other evening, when you were delivering your oration at — Hall, I sat on a seat behind this fair innamorata (you see I am not jealous) of yours, and at some new burst of eloquence she clasped her hands and whispered to an acquaintance at her side, 'O, is not that beautiful!' and you should have seen those eyes glisten—but I see by the flush on your cheek at this moment, that your vanity is raised to a high pitch. But you are not going so soon. We have made up and are friends now; if I was a little vexed at the note you sent this afternoon—it is all forgotten."

But Walter Percival had reached the door leading into the hall ere he trusted himself to speak. Then his words came clear and distinct:

"It shall be as you say, Augusta, only let me have a week longer to prepare for the occasion. In the meantime I shall be much engaged—" he hesitated a moment, then added: "how I have loved you, Augusta, you can never know, for it is a love you cannot understand. But—no matter—farewell!"

And he was gone.

"I have conquered, and I told Mabel that I should. It serves her right to think that my seamstress should dare to think of him. But then I must do away with the unpleasant impression which I have made on his mind, for I could plainly see it, and had it not been for Mabel Nelson I would have yielded; but she says I am a slave to his every caprice. I will tell her a different story. And she believes he loves her!—she cannot believe it! She merely says it to vex me, just because he insisted upon carrying her umbrella for her one stormy night, when she had been sewing for me till a late hour. But I did not like the way he spoke the last sentence he uttered—'how I have loved you.' Did he place an emphasis on the word have, or did I imagine it? It must have been the latter."

In a very poor but cleanly kept dwelling in an unfashionable street, sat a form clothed in morning robes, attentively perusing a large volume which she held in her hands. Her face might not have been called faultlessly beautiful when perfectly at rest, but whenever it moved with the least play of feeling it became so to a very high degree. Every sentiment of the heart the lips gave with a singular correctness, while the mind was as finely wrought as ever existed in palace or cottage; and grief or pleasure was as invariably telegraphed through eye and lips more faithfully than words could give them. The eyes, those "windows of the soul," were as clear and pure as an angel's might be imagined, while the voice might be pronounced faultless.

The door was slightly ajar, and Walter Percival paused a moment ere he should disturb the reverie into which she had fallen. She closed her book, pressed her hands to her forehead, and said:

"Mother, O my mother! why did you leave me alone in the dark, friendless world?" She paused, breathed a prayer to the throne of grace, and then added: "Thou, O my Father, thou hast done it, and it must be right."

How that face carried him back to the years beyond years when they had dwelt in the same homestead and sat at the same table—the one with her loving parents, the other with kind friends. There was the same outline, and yet there was a difference; for life had changed them. The brow with its purity and truthfulness, wore a shadow upon it such as only comes at the bidding of sorrow; and in every line of the face there was that which went to the heart of the person that was reading it.

He gave a gentle rap and in another moment was clasping the hand of the sorrowing one in his own.

"What has happened, my sweet friend?" said Percival, as he glanced at the mourning dress she wore. "You have not lost your only remaining parent?"

"My mother died the evening I was last at Mrs. Somerville's. She had long been sinking under a decline, but I did not suppose her hour of departure was so near. On my return I found her much more ill than I had ever seen her, and before midnight her spirit winged its upward flight to the 'house of many mansions.'"

"And what do you propose to do for the future, Jennie? You will surely not remain here longer, for you would be very lonely without a friend or companion. Don't you remember the time, Jennie, dear Jennie, when we dwelt together as brother and sister; when the world was all bright, and we thought friends were all true? When the heart had never been borne down by care, nor sobered by disappointment, nor chilled by bitter experience?"

"I remember all this—all the shadows that have fallen on my life—but I do not complain. All that I ask is, that a Father's hand may guide and help me to be faithful to the end. But what has this to do with you, who are surrounded by the society of the rich, the great and talented, beneath the smile of prosperity, in your hold and upward march to the temple of fame?"

"But all these are very unsatisfying. There is something wanting—another to share, to bless, to sympathize and to love. I am rich now, Jennie, and I have never forgotten the little fairy I used to say should become my wife when I grew to be a man. I love you, Jennie—can you return that love, and become my cherished wife?"

And he placed the hand he had taken tenderly to his lip. The hand was withdrawn and a tear trembled on the eyelashes—but there was but one, and her eye returned the gaze fixed upon her with a half-indignant, half-sorrowful look.

"These words to me, and from your lips! You, the betrothed of the proud and beautiful Augusta Somerville! You, yourself, confessed it the first time we met, three weeks ago. It were perjury in the sight of Heaven, were you to wed another. But you did not mean it. I did not believe this of you—go—we do not meet again!"

"Stay one moment—no, you must listen to me." For she had arisen from her place at his side, and looked anxiously for him to go. "Hear me, and if then you say so, I will leave you and not again return. I once believed I loved Augusta Somerville with a love that knew no change. We met a twelve month ago—she was very beautiful, beautiful in form and feature—but the soul—there was a stain there. It was but of late that I perceived it, for I vainly hoped that so fair and lovely a face was accompanied by a corresponding soul. That was a wild dream—a strange infatuation. The dream is over; the spell is broken, which for a time drove the sweet flower I had loved in boyhood from my mind. By the memory of all the days we have spent together, Jennie, I beseech you to believe me when I tell you that there is nothing dishonorable in breaking an engagement with Augusta Somerville, for she has never loved me. She has played a strange game, but one perfectly consistent with her character; and thanks that we learned this in time. She will never become my wife, and it remains for you to say whether my life is to be brightened by the presence of the only one I feel I can ever love, or is henceforth to be cheerless and lonely."

Jennie looked up with a startled look of wonder, but the dark eye gazing as though it would read her inmost soul left no doubt of the sincerity of his words, and ere Walter Percival turned his footsteps homeward, he knew that pure, truthful heart, with its untold treasure of priceless love, was all his own.

"And you will be there, Mabel? Will it not be glorious sport to see her come in hanging on his arm, with downcast eyes, while trembling lips utter the response which she will vainly believe makes her mistress of the most elegant mansion on Avenue! But I owed her something in return for the insolent manner in which she replied that she was otherwise engaged, when I asked her to assist in making my bridal trousseau. As though any engagement of hers was of so much importance as that. Walter took it somewhat amiss when I first proposed it, but he seems as much, or more, interested than I am, now. He has been busily engaged, during the last two weeks, in preparing his mansion for my reception. But supposing we go over to this new residence of mine, Mabel, for I believe it is almost completed?"

"O, yes—let us go immediately, for I am all impatience. You are very fortunate, Augusta, to win the love of one of whom the world speaks so highly, and who is adding increased laurels every year to a name already high on the roll of fame. Do you know aught of his connections? I have never heard him mention his parents."

"Neither have I; and I have never inquired aught of his connections, for it matters not, when his own talents and wealth have placed him on such a dazzling height."

But a well-known footstep was heard, and in another moment the door was opened and Walter Percival with a lofty and now haughty carriage entered the room where the two young ladies were standing surveying the apartment.

He coldly extended a hand to each, and with a faint "good morning" passed onward to the room beyond.

"It seems rather a chilling greeting from one so soon to become a husband, Augusta! What can it mean?"

But the question was all unheeded, and Augusta Somerville bent her steps homeward, heart-sick and almost feverish with anxiety and excitement. How often she repeated to herself the inquiry of Mabel, "What can it mean?"

But she well knew the meaning of that proud look. She knew that he was seriously, and she feared, irreparably displeased with her; and he had been absent so much of late. There was a time when he visited her daily, but now he had called but once since the time they had their quarrel. She had believed him absent from the city, but it was evidently not the case, as so much had been accomplished toward the fitting up and furnishing of their residence; and she had not been consulted—but then that did not make so much difference, as all had been arranged in the most exquisite taste, nothing with which the most fastidious could find fault was to be seen. If she only knew when and where this would end—but the morrow would tell.

Augusta the evening after she and Mabel had met Percival, had received the following note:

"MISS SOMERVILLE:—The tableau which you have wished so much to see, will come off this afternoon at the appointed time, at my residence. I hope, for your own sake, you have not invited many to be present.

In haste, W. PERCIVAL."

The note was torn angrily in pieces, while her face almost became livid with rage.

"I will not be trifled with. He shall repent of this hereafter. Were it not that he is the most talented and sought after of any individual in the city, I would never see him again. But it will not do to trifle with him—I have found that out. He thinks by this pretended indifference to bind me to his stubborn will—let him see if he can do it. I will be seemingly mild, gentle and amiable for a short time—a very short time! But it is time to array myself for this grand wedding! I will seem gay, brilliant and happy, at peace with myself and all around me."

There was quite a large assembly collected to witness—they knew not what, except that it was an amusement Augusta Somerville had prepared for them; the last entertainment before she became mistress of the splendid mansion where they now met together. But hush! a carriage stops, and the tall, manly form of Walter Percival leads a gentle girl, dressed in simple white, without jewels or ornaments save the orange wreath that surmounts the bridal veil, up to the noble looking man who had just preceded them into the room. The stillness as of death reigned, while some almost held their breath until the stranger arose, and with a serene and benignant look pronounced the marriage ceremony and uttered the nuptial blessing. The holy man and the expression on Percival's countenance, for he was no dissembler, caused a conviction of the truth to rush to Augusta Somerville's brain, and she stood transfixed like a statue until all was ended and Walter's friends were uttering congratulations—then she fell senseless to the floor.

"Do not weep, my dearest wife; it was indeed a bitter punishment, but she deserved it. And, Jennie, forgive me for deceiving you—it has been the first time and it shall be the last—but truly I do think the lesson was needed, and will prove useful."

"Vengeance is mine, and I will repay," are the words of One who rules both heaven and earth," uttered the sweet voice of Mrs. Percival, as her husband passed his arm caressingly around her and drew her more closely to his side. "It is a sad thing to wound the heart and cause unhappiness to one of God's children."

"Well, Jennie, you shall help me to attain to your truthfulness and forgiveness. But fear not—the heart is not wounded, though perhaps pride is."

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

A TRAGEDY OF BY-GONE TIMES.

BY E. S. SMITH.

[The following relation of a true story was given me in Paris, by General de Lambert, who was aide-de-camp to Marshal Junot, Duke of Abrantes, at the time it happened.]

In the year 1805, while General Junot was governor of Paris, as a poor mason inhabiting that city was returning one evening from his day's work through the Champs Elysées, he was accosted by three men, whose features the darkness of the evening prevented him from distinguishing. They asked him if he was willing to come with them at once, for the purpose of executing a work in masonry which it was necessary should be completed before morning.

He expressed his readiness to go, provided he was well paid for it. They then promised him five and twenty Napoleons as his reward, on condition that he would consent to have his eyes blinded, and would come with them without an instant's delay. The mason acceded to the proposal, and a handkerchief was bound over his eyes. The men then led him along at a quick pace for some time. At length they stopped and told him he was now to get into a carriage. Having placed him in it and got in themselves, the carriage drove off with great rapidity. For a considerable space of time they rolled over the stones, but afterwards left them and appeared to be passing along a cross-road. About two hours' ride brought them to the end of their journey—the carriage stopped and the mason was taken out. He was led through various passages, and up and down many staircases; probably for the purpose of rendering it the more difficult for him on any future occasion to trace his way.

When the bandage was taken from his eyes, he found himself in a room illuminated by a profusion of wax candles, and hung with black cloth. The floor, the walls, the ceiling and the furniture were alike covered with these mournful hangings; and no portion of the apartment was without them, except one large niche in the wall, near which were placed stones and mortar, and the necessary implements for making use of them. The mason was astonished and alarmed at all he saw; he turned round to seek an explanation of it, but found himself entirely alone.

He had full leisure to examine the funeral ornaments by which he was surrounded, but at length he heard a noise, and a portion of the hangings being lifted up discovered a door, which was thrown open. Through this entered a number of men in black cloaks, and whose faces were concealed by black masks. They entered, dragging with them a beautiful young woman, whose dishevelled black hair, streaming eyes and disordered dress proved at the same time her misery and the compulsion under which she suffered.

As soon as she was in the room she sunk on her knees before her masked conductors, and implored them in the most moving manner to have pity on her; but they only shook their heads. She particularly addressed herself to one of them, who, from his gray hairs appeared to be older than the rest, and entreated him by the holy name of father. She embraced his knees, and with sobs and cries besought his mercy. To these supplications no answer was given; but upon a signal made, she was again dragged forward, and in spite of her screams and resistance, was forced into the niche, where she was bound with cords. The gray-haired man then desired the mason to begin his task, and to wall her up. But the poor man, horror-struck at what he had seen, and affected beyond measure by the imploring lamentations of the lady, who besought him not to be an accessory to so foul a murder, refused to proceed.

Upon this the masks began to threaten him. The mason fell upon his knees and entreated to be permitted to depart. But the masks drew their swords from beneath their cloaks, and told him, with many imprecations, that if he continued to refuse to perform what he had promised, instant death should be his portion; while, on the other hand, if he obeyed, his reward should be doubled.

The poor man being thus intimidated, unwillingly commenced his horrible task, but stopped from time to time, and requested to be permitted to desist. The masks, however, stood over him the whole time with drawn swords, and obliged him to proceed, till at length, while the shrieks of the victim became every instant more dreadfully piercing as the wall rose upon her that was to shut her out from life, the tragedy was completed, and the niche was hermetically sealed with solid masonry.

The mason threw down his trowel, more dead than alive—the gray-haired man put fifty Napoleons into his hand, his eyes were again covered, and he was hurried from the room in which this tremendous scene had taken place. As on his arrival, he was hurried up and down through various passages, and then put into a carriage. The carriage was whirled along as rapidly as before, and after the stated period, the man found himself with his eyes unbound, on the spot in the Champs Elysées where he had first been met—and alone!

The night was now far advanced, or rather, the morning was approaching. The man was stunned and bewildered by what he had witnessed; but after a short time, he recovered the use of his intellect so far as to determine to go forthwith to the governor of Paris. Having with difficulty gained admission to Junot, his tale was at first disbelieved; but the fifty Napoleons which he produced, and still more the unvarying accuracy with which he related the different circumstances of that dreadful night, at length gained him entire credit.

The police employed themselves very diligently for some weeks in tracing the scene of the crime and the perpetrators of it. Various houses within a certain distance of the capital were searched and the walls of rooms were inspected, to see if any marks of freshly made stone-work could be discovered. The principal house-agents of Paris, the letters out of carriages, the horses and guards at the barriers were examined, in the hopes of finding some clue—but entirely without success.

This mysterious murder remained, and still remains unexplained, but conjecture imagined it to be an act of family vengeance. According to this solution, the masks were the father and brothers of the unfortunate lady, who was considered in some way or other to have dishonored her race. They were also supposed to have been strangers from some distant part of the country, who had come to the neighborhood of Paris for the purpose of completing the vindictive act, and had gone away again after its perpetration.

In most matters of opinion men resemble the time-pieces in a watchmaker's shop. No two of them agree precisely. Even the subtlest intellect or the finest chronometer may sometimes be a little out; and yet the homely Dutch clock and plain common sense are generally near enough for all practical purposes.

CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY.

Encouraged by the unprecedented success which this popular monthly has met with, and the rapidly with which it has increased its circulation, the proprietor has resolved to make it still more worthy of the patronage of the public. That this admirable work is a MIRACLE OF CHEAPNESS, is admitted by every one, containing, as it does, one hundred pages of reading matter in each number, and forming two volumes a year of six hundred pages each, or twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for ONE DOLLAR!

BalloU's Dollar Monthly is printed with new type, upon fine white paper, and its matter is carefully compiled and arranged by the hands of the editor and proprietor, who has been known to the public as connected with the Boston press for nearly fifteen years. Its pages contain from the best and most popular writers in the country. It is also supplied with a record of the notable events of the times, of peace and war, of discoveries and improvements occurring in either hemisphere, forming an agreeable companion for a leisure moment or hour, anywhere, at home or abroad, each number being complete in itself.

NEWS, TALES, POEMS, STORIES OF THE SEA, SKETCHES, MISCELLANY, ADVENTURES, BIOGRAPHIES, WIT AND HUMOR.

No certain subjects are admitted into its pages: there are enough controversial publications, each devoted to its peculiar sect or clique. This work is intended for THE MILLION, north or south, east or west, and is filled to the brim each month with chaste, popular and graphic miscellany, just such as any father, brother or friend would place in the hands of a family circle. It is in all its departments, fresh and original, and, what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive a copy gratis.

Sample copies sent when desired.
M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor.
Corner of Tremont and Bromfield Sts., Boston, Mass.

VIEW OF THE INSANE ASYLUM, NOW BUILDING AT NORTHAMPTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE, NORTHAMPTON, MASS.

The accompanying drawing of the Third Insane Hospital, now in process of erection for the western district of the State, may be relied upon for accuracy, having been taken expressly for us from the original plans in the possession of the architect, Jonathan Preston, of this city. It is being built in pursuance of a resolve of the legislature of 1855, which appropriated $200,000 for this purpose. And it is hoped that under the control of such men as Hon. Luther V. Bell, Lieutenant Governor Benchley and S. S. Standley, Esq., the commissioners, the most earnest and best wishes of the people of the State may be realized, that this be a "model hospital." The Elizabethan style of architecture, which has been chosen, will distinguish this edifice from the gloomy and prison-like styles in which public buildings of this character have heretofore been built. Its exterior aspect will be cheerful, that it may be pleasant and healthy to the sight of the inmates; and its interior will have a domestic air, that it may be as dear to them as the fireside of their fathers' home. The building is 512 feet long in front, and consists of a main building and wings that recede on either side. The main building is 200 feet deep and four stories high, surmounted by a tower 100 feet above the level of the ground. The wings are three stories high—each being 12 feet. It contains about 340 rooms, covers an acre of ground, and will accommodate 250 patients. The extensive circular stairs in the rounds; the number and size of the day rooms; the width and openness of the corridors; the complete domestic appurtenances; the capacity and open timbered roof of the chapel; and the ample provision for warmth and ventilation, are the characteristic features of the building. Strenuous measures were taken by a committee of the last legislature for suspending the work by reporting that another hospital was not needed, but the statistics of insanity were more reliable and convincing than the arguments of the committee, and their report was rejected, and accordingly on the 4th of July, 1856, the corner-stone was laid with all the honors and ceremonies peculiar to free masonry by the grand lodge of the State. Beneath the stone were deposited coins, local documents and a solemn address to posterity by the inhabitants of Northampton. The building is in rapid progress, and will be ready for occupancy in the winter of 1857—58. It is located in one of the most beautiful districts of western Massachusetts, a short distance from the village of Northampton, upon an eminence which embraces in its panorama the most pleasing varieties of landscape. The broad meadow lands of the valley of the Connecticut, with the villages that animate it with life; the majestic river winding its shivering lines through the level lands; the rival mountains, Holyoke and Tom, rising like sentinels to guard the vale below; the spots of interest, which, besides their natural beauty, have an association with the past,—these are the advantages of the locality for such an institution, and it is no matter of wonder that it allured the good taste of the commissioners. And if there be any power in the charms of natural scenery for restoring, by their silent influences, wandering reason back to its vacant throne, then this spot will be impressive with many a lesson of strength and health. The erection of this hospital is an exponent of the humane feeling that is entering the heart of our State government, replacing the cold and unchristian-like spirit which was formerly regarded these poor, unfortunate beings, from whose minds the light of intelligence has departed.

'75 AND '56.

On the next page we publish two fine large engravings from designs made for us by Champney, of a scene in the Revolution and one of our day. The first depicts the "Minute Men of 1776." The alarm has been given and the patriot soldiers are springing to their arms. The wild excitement and enthusiasm of the "sons of liberty" are vividly delineated. Their antiquated attire and arms carry us back, in imagination, to the past century. There are muskets and cartouch-boxes that have done service in the old French and Indian wars—swords that may have flashed in the sunlight before Louisburg, or glistened in the gray dawn at the Heights of Abraham, when the mother country did not disdain the aid of her offspring in her pursuit of conquest and glory. The idea of this picture was suggested to our artist by the following passage in Mr. Lincoln's "History of Worcester." "Before noon, on the 19th of April, an express came to the town, shouting as he passed through the streets at full speed, 'To arms! to arms! the war is begun!' His white horse, bloody with spurring and dripping with sweat, fell exhausted by the church. Another was instantly procured, and the tidings went on. [In a note the historian says: The passage of the messenger of war mounted on his white steed, and gathering the population to battle, made a vivid impression on memory. The tradition of his appearance is preserved in many of our villages. In the animated description of the aged, it seems like the representation of death on the pale horse, careering through the land with his terrible summons to the grave.] The bell rang out the alarm, cannon were fired, and messengers sent to every part of the town to collect the soldiery. In a short time the minute men were paraded on the green under Captain Timothy Bigelow. After a fervent prayer by Rev. Mr. Macarty, they took up the line of march. They were soon followed by as many of the train bands as could be gathered, under Captain Benjamin Flagg. On that day 110 men marched from the town of Worcester for Concord." In contrast with this picture we have a military pageant of the present day. Before a general and his staff, a brigade of citizen soldiers is passing in review. The serried ranks, the well-dressed muskets, the rich uniform, the rustling banner, the "pomp, pride and circumstance of military array," are here in strong contrast with the rusty arms and diverse accoutrements of our fathers. But the spirit which animates the men of to-day is the same. There is the same attachment to our common country—the same devotion to our flag—the same valor, the same zeal, the same readiness to encounter danger and brave death at the call of their country. There are some men who are always fond of harping on the degeneracy of the days in which they live—who are always flinging the past in our faces. They are false philosophers. Such men, when the Mexican war broke out, shook their heads and said that the present generation were mere holiday soldiers, that they had become enervated by peace, and that they would make a poor figure in the field. To such crouching the answer was given from tongues of flame and tones of thunder at Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, at Monterey and Buena Vista, at Cerro Gordo, at Contreras, at Churubusco, at Chapultepec and at the Gantias. No—the old, heroic spirit has not died out—and the more we cherish and love peace, the readier we are to defend in the field the institutions that secure and guarantee it. The nation that shall presume upon our love of peace to insult our flag will surely rue its fatal error. It is most certain that while the love of military glory is not a passion with us, as it is with the French, as it was with the Romans and some peoples of Greece, a readiness to bear arms in self-defence is one of our national characteristics. The necessity and habit of using the weapons of war sprang up with the earliest civilization of the wilderness, and has been continued through our foreign and our Indian wars, so that whenever occasion requires us we become at once a nation of warriors.

THE MINUTE-MEN OF 1776.

MASSACHUSETTS MILITIA OF TO-DAY AT REVIEW.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE NEWPORT BELLE.

BY FRANCES M. CHESBRO'.
~~~~~

"I SHALL not remain in the city another week. I am resolved to have my own way in this matter. It is a shame to be shut up in this furnace, when all my friends are enjoying the seashore. Yes, I shall leave the city on Saturday. My mind is made up, and when I resolve upon a plan, I never yield."

This spirited speech came from the lips of a pouting beauty, and was intended for the ears of her husband, who had been for the last half hour absorbed in his newspaper and cigar. He had not heard the first of the speech, but was forcibly reminded of the latter clause, by the energy with which it was uttered.

"To the seashore, Clara? I have a plan in my mind, that I was to propose this evening, which I think you will like better."

"What is it, Charles?"

"To board in the country during the three warmest months."

"In the country! For mercy sake, Charles, do not talk about the country! A place as gloomy and quiet as a churchyard, and swarming with mosquitoes. I should die of loneliness, to be banished from society three months!"

"But I shall be out every evening, Clara, and we shall have Sundays to enjoy together, while if you go to the seashore, I shall not be able to be with you at all; besides the enormous expense of watering-places, with the fashion and style kept up there, would be a serious obstacle in the way."

"It need not be, I am sure, Charles. I know you can afford this little extra expense; and then, too, I had rather spend a fortnight at a genteel watering-place, than three months in the country. 'Live while we do live,' is my maxim."

"I hoped, Clara, you would be pleased with my plan, for I have taken great pains to secure an agreeable home for us in a pleasant family, in the midst of a fine country, where there are plenty of trees, woods, and handsome summer residences. You cannot possibly be lonely there."

"Nobody goes into the country, Charles, only those who cannot afford to go to the seashore. All my acquaintances have gone to Nahant or Newport, and I am going, too."

Charles knew there was no use reasoning with his spoiled wife. She had been indulged too long to be influenced by reasonable arguments now. There was no other way to do but to let her have her own way, and work the harder, and sacrifice the pleasure he had planned for both.

Clara was wilful and selfish, without knowing it. Before her marriage, this trait took a very charming form. Cupid often puts out the eyes of lovers, or so distorts the sight, that black becomes white, and white black. Clara was exacting then; but Charles fancied he loved her all the more for it. It was too late now to teach her reason, so he resigned himself to his fate, and began to devise means to gratify his wife.

Fifteen dollars a week at a fashionable hotel on the beach, with three or four more for extras, was not a small matter to a young man just starting in business, and depending on every day's hard labor for success. But he determined he would let Clara go, and give up the three months in the country. He would economize in the city, that his wife might live in luxury out of it.

Clara saw she had gained her point, and rejoiced over it, with a selfishness that shocks us all, when written out in plain terms, but often fails to excite a breath of disapproval, when witnessed in real life. Charles knew very well what the next request would be, and was not surprised when Clara said she positively must have a new summer, fit out. She was altogether too shabby to appear in fashionable society. All her friends had bought new and expensive wardrobes, and she must do the same.

Charles thought to himself that all this expense might have been spared, had his plan been adopted; but he said nothing, not caring to bring about a family quarrel, with the prospect of being worsted himself in the combat. A hundred dollars was none too little to prepare for the summer's pleasure, but it was cheerfully given, with no allusion to the sacrifice he was to make.

Clara was right in her predictions. Saturday night found her at the most fashionable hotel in Newport. Charles did not regret the effort he had made to gratify his wife, when he saw how happy she was made by it.

Clara was pretty and exceedingly charming in her appearance, a woman just fit to be petted and spoiled, as long as there are people to do it. The same amount of energy and perseverance that made her so wilful, if turned into another channel, would have made her a noble, unselfish woman. Her faults had been engrained into, not born in, her character. God had given her this great gift of beauty, and her parents, her associates and instructors felt privileged to assail her young nature by praise and flattery; to check every generous impulse, by constantly pampering to her childish whims and desires. When she grew up, she was more beautiful and winning, and as she developed in grace and beauty, just so much more was she spoiled by those about her.

Clara found many of her friends awaiting her at Newport, who, having gone before her, were ready to introduce her into the pleasures of the season. Her beauty and charming ways were exceedingly attractive to strangers, and she soon found herself surrounded by admirers. She had not forgotten during the two years of her wedded life, her little arts of coquetry, and knew very well how to control homage. Before she had been a week at the hotel, Clara was unanimously voted the belle of the season.

This was a very flattering position to sustain, and in the midst of this tide of admiration, she forgot what little good sense Nature had spared to her, and plunged headlong into fashion and pleasure. A crowd of attendants were pressing their services and devotions upon her. Her talent for music was brought into use, and no songs were so much applauded as those of the charming Clara.

In the midst of this homage, Clara was awakened from her dream by a letter from Charles. It breathed only kindness and love. He was happy because she was enjoying herself so much. He wrote in so cheerful a tone that it reassured Clara, and gave her courage to make new demands upon his exertions. Another hundred dollars was seriously needed to make the necessary change in clothing. The belle of the season must not appear two nights in the same adornings. To excite the pride of her husband, she sent a paper containing an account of the last fete, in which her name shone most conspicuous of all the bright stars in that galaxy of beauty.

Charles received this letter in his counting-room, worn out with heat and overwork, and its contents were anything but gratifying to him. He had dismissed one of his clerks to lessen expenses, and was performing the extra labor himself. He had not even found time to leave the city for a day, but worked early and late and with renewed diligence, to make up for the unusual demands upon his purse. The hundred dollars was sent, accompanied by a gentle remonstrance, and a deep anxiety lest she should be injuring her health by this excess of dissipation in pleasure. He hinted at the time of her return, and proposed to go for her whenever she would appoint the day of her departure.

Clara had no desire to leave a place where she was winning such golden honors. It was not a slight thing to be the belle of Newport, and, consequently, the object of jealous envy from more wealthy and fashionable ladies than herself. A fortnight passed on, and the gay belle found no time to send a message to her husband, even to assure him of her health and safety.

Poor Charles! he was now reaping a small part of the retribution that was following upon the heels of his own misguided love. He had himself helped to make his wife what she really was. He had never uttered a word of kindly reproof, but every breath had helped to swell the tide of flattery, that for years had been bearing the poor victim far out into the sea of selfishness and frivolity. But he did not see this quite plainly yet. A still deeper experience was needed to open his eyes to his own part in the wrong. Clara was not wholly to blame. She lived as she had been taught to live, only on excitement and admiration.

Among the many admirers of the Newport belle, was an Italian count, who had lost all but his title and ancestral blood through some unlooked-for change in his native country, and came to America, resolved to prop himself up by hoisting the flag of his royal descent, and hoped by keeping this fact before the eyes of our people, to sail into high places of favor. He was accomplished and prepossessing in appearance, and like most of his countrymen, excelled in music. With these external advantages, he made himself very attractive to Clara. In fine, he was the favored attendant.

The fortnight at the seashore, extended to a summer at Newport. It was not possible for Clara to tear herself away from the enchanting round of pleasure. She became selfishly unmindful of the trouble she was bringing upon her faithful husband, and thought only of herself and her new friend. She was not aware of the dangerous ground on which she trod, as her fairy feet flew through the excited dance. She had never stood on this giddy pinnacle before, and knew not how a slight misstep would plunge her from the dizzy height. She was borne on by the great whirlpool of fashion far out into deep, dangerous places. But she was as ignorant as a child of her danger.

Count Lennarto was flattered and gratified by his power over the beautiful woman. His ambition was first excited to become the victorious champion, and in pampering to this passion, he aroused more subtle feelings in his nature. He became greatly enamored, and with the impetuosity of his national character, gave evidence of his love by the most untiring devotion. Clara was blinded by her own life of excitement, and did not understand or believe the import of the count's attentions.

While these events were transpiring at Newport, Charles Le Grange had ample time and opportunity for reflection. At first, he was quiet and submissive, more for the love he bore for his wife, and from a natural desire to gratify all her wishes, than from any weakness of character. As the weeks passed by, he grew restless and miserable, and, at length, out of his deep experience, his resolution was formed. He saw the danger to which his wife was exposed, as no other person could, and he resolved to save her from the sorrow that might fall upon her unsuspecting head.

After mature reflection, Charles Le Grange took upon himself a disguise that afforded him perfect security, and made his way to Newport. Here he would mingle with the crowd, and watch his treasure from a distance, and yet be near to ward off danger if any should approach. His jealous love colored with the brightest tinge every little act, and the homage rendered to his fair and beautiful wife, seemed to him the foulest insult. He knew better than Clara, the real character that lay beneath the pleasing exterior of her many admirers.

On arriving at Newport, Charles made but little effort to gain acquaintances. His purpose would be better accomplished by a retired seclusion. He feared Clara might recognize him, should he be brought into her immediate presence. He stood afar off, listening to the remarks of the bystanders, and endeavored to learn from the popular current of conversation, the esteem in which she was held. He had never seen her in such a blaze of glory and beauty, and was bewildered by the splendor of her appearance. Had he not felt a painful interest in her, he would hardly have been able to suppress his feelings of admiration.

Charles Le Grange was a good man, and he believed in his heart that Clara was true to him, although he knew full well her weakness of character that required, and even exacted, constant homage from others. But now he saw, as he never before did, his own part in the fault. If danger fell upon her, he was partly responsible. What had he ever offered her but this same doating, blind devotion? Never had he opened his mind, with its wealth of knowledge and practical experience, to her, and taught her to prize it above flattery. For the first time in his life he saw his mistake, and with his generous nature resolved to atone for it.

This quick, jealous eye soon fell upon Count Lennarto, and unnoticed, he watched his path every hour when it was possible to gain access to him. He heard, as if by some supernatural power, the tender word of parting, and the delicate flatteries addressed to Clara on the balcony, after the dance had ceased. He followed her like a guardian angel, and never for a moment lost sight of the great purpose that inspired him.

Charles fancied he had often noticed a strange look on Clara's beautiful face, at times when she had been engaged in conversation with Count Lennarto. It expressed a vague fear, a slight foreboding of distrust and a breaking up of confidence. It indicated the power to which she was fast becoming subjected, and her inability to rise above and conquer it. He saw at times the bright smile instantly disappear, and a look of half reproach steal over her face, as if some word had been spoken she had no right to hear.

One evening a party were strolling together towards the beach. It was a moonlight evening, and nothing could surpass the beauty of the sea, with the soft light falling upon the water, and the white sails of little skiffs resting upon the waves. At a distance, one solitary wanderer paced up and down the beach, or occasionally seated himself by the rocks.

The gay party went down to the very edge of the water. For some time the conversation was general, but the beauty of the night tempted them in different directions, and in smaller groups the company separated and loitered slowly away in quiet strolls.

Clara and Count Lennarto were left alone, standing on the sand by the shore. For a few moments there was a silence between them, Clara being impressed with the glory of the moonlight sparkling upon the smooth sea, and her companion equally absorbed in his own contemplations. Then taking her arm, the count led Clara to a secluded seat under a shelving rock.

Charles followed the steps of his companions, without appearing to do so, and soon found himself so near as to distinguish their lowest tones, and was yet secreted from their view. He blushed when he thought of his position. It seemed mean and dishonorable to be dodging the steps of his own wife. But the thought of the danger surrounding her was the motive that prompted the act.

The influence of the evening was particularly inspiring, and the impetuous feelings of the count burst out into extravagant expressions of love and tenderness. Now for the first time did the scales fall from Clara's eyes, so that she saw clearly her position. Her vanity and ambition had been gratified, but her nature had remained faithful. She resented the words addressed to her by her companion, and with all the dignity of her outraged woman's nature threw back the insult offered to her wedded love.

But it was vain to strive to check the fountain pent up in the breast of the young count. In vain did she entreat and even command him to cease the expression of words that burned her very soul with shame. She found, too late for her influence, that her will was powerless, and that unconsciously she had been yielding to his stronger nature. He entreated her to fly with him to his beautiful Italy, and pictured in the most glowing colors the splendors of that rich, luxurious country. Clara would have torn herself from him, had she the power to do so; but her companion had clasped her arm, and, as if fearing to lose the prize, held her almost frantically in his strong grasp.

At this moment the sound of carriage wheels was heard approaching the beach. A terrible fear came over Clara. The carriage stopped at a near point, and Clara felt herself hurried across the sand of the beach.

"All stratagems are fair in love, my pretty Clara," said the insulting count. "I have prepared this little surprise for you."

At this moment a strong arm was laid upon the count, and a powerful grasp wrested the lady from his hold, and bore her swiftly on toward the carriage. The count was unprepared for resistance, and the surprise of the attack so unsettled him as to leave him no chance for regaining the lady.

"Take this lady to the — Hotel!" said the stranger, with a voice that carried authority with it. "She has fainted, and must be taken immediately to her own room."

The coachman hesitated, not understanding the turn matters had taken.

"Go," said the rescuer, "and your most extravagant demands shall be satisfied."

At the promise of better remuneration, the coachman enlisted in the stranger's cause, and without further delay hurried the horses over the road. The count saw with deepest chagrin, the failure of his stratagem, and to avoid any personal exposure, left Newport in the early morning boat.

When Clara became again conscious, she raised her head that had been pillowed in her husband's arms, and joyfully gave vent to her feelings.

"O, Charles, my dear, true husband! from what danger have you rescued me? Take me home with you, and teach me in future how I can best prove myself worthy of your love."

"Do not reproach yourself, Clara; your danger is past. I am guilty in a participation of the wrong brought upon you. We will now begin a new life together, and God give us strength to persevere in it and be made better by the experience through which we have passed."

Clara was soon able to accompany her husband home to the city. The bitter trial through which she passed has taught her that there is something more noble for a woman to receive than admiration and flattery.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

LINES WRITTEN BY MY MOTHER.

BY BLANCHE D'ASTOIRE.

Flushed with life but late I saw thee,
 Spirits buoyant filled thy breast;
 Visions gay of childish fancy
 On thy bosom hope impressed.

But ere yet thy heart was tainted
 With the love of vicious way,
 Death had marked thee for a victim,
 And thou fell his certain prey.

Then the flush of life forsook thee,
 Paleness settled on thy brow,
 And corruption plainly showed us
 Man is mortal here below.

But the page of Inspiration,
 Like the sunbeam lights our gloom,
 And reveals to fainting nature
 Scenes that lie beyond the tomb.

When the flight of time is finished,
 Death no more can hold his prey,
 And our nature's foul corruption
 Quick as thought be purged away.

Life immortal! bloom celestial!
 Then will animate the frame;
 And throughout eternal ages
 Live and bloom in heaven the same!

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE ADOPTED CHILD.

BY CLEMENT ARNOLD.

"Among our passengers are Mr. Morton, his wife and infant daughter."—
Log of packet ship G—, on her voyage from the West Indies to London.

DEAR reader, that "infant daughter" is the subject of the present sketch, and numberless are the young ladies who have been made heroines, whose claims to the honor were far less than those possessed by Ernestine Morton. True, at the time I first saw her she was a mere baby, and the most unimpressing one I ever beheld; but a few years made a wonderful change in the little creole.

Born at Demarara, of English parents—the last of a large family of children who had fallen victims to the climate—the child looked as if a whole lifetime of trouble were impressed on her brow, and her great sorrowful black eyes were almost unearthly in their wild melancholy.

Sallow and deathlike from the effects of the yellow fever, from which she had recovered as by a miracle, the poor infant was an object of compassion to all on board our vessel; and as the violent sea-sickness of Mrs. Morton prevented her from paying it proper attention, our lady passengers vied with each other in performing offices of kindness for the unfortunate little one.

For myself, I may as well confess that I took more pleasure in listening to Mr. Morton's flate, than I did in attending to the wants of his little daughter, who always impressed me with the unpleasant idea of being some fairy changeling or half-spiritual being, employed, as my best-loved books informed me, in continually plotting evil. She never laughed like other children, and the low, pitiful wailing in which her sorrows were made known always made me shudder.

I loved music, hence my attachment to the instrument on which Mr. Morton so exquisitely performed; but my childish instincts all taught me to dislike the man himself, long ere I was old enough to understand his character. As I shall have occasion to mention him once or twice more, I may as well give a brief history of him at once.

I have said before that he was English. He had been a band-master in one of the regiments then in the West Indies, but owing to his fondness for liquor he had been obliged to leave; he was a heartless, cruel man, as his treatment of his poor wife gave evident proof. She, though born in England, was of Irish parentage and a Catholic—circumstances which appeared to furnish him with an endless theme for reproach and ridicule. This conduct on board the ship was so disagreeable, that more than once our captain felt called upon to remonstrate with him; and even the ladies at times interfered to protect the helpless invalid from his unmanly insults.

Mrs. Morton's whole happiness appeared to be centred in the little infant Ernestine; and all who showed it kindness were thanked with a warmth that told more than words the depth of her feelings. The one on whom she particularly bestowed gratitude was young Vernon Ashford, the only son of one of our passengers, a fine boy of eight or nine years, and who became deeply attached to the little girl. For hours he would sit on the deck with the child in his arms, telling stories and singing songs; while she would look up in his face with her great dark eyes, until it seemed as though a more than mortal intelligence animated the glance. Mrs. Ashford, Vernon's mother, had lost her only daughter in infancy, and it was whispered on board the vessel that she had solicited Mrs. Morton to allow her to adopt little Ernestine—a request the mother had refused.

But poor Mrs. Morton did not live to complete the voyage. In very poor health when she came on board, the violent sea sickness utterly prostrated her; a severe cough came on, and hemorrhage of the lungs put a speedy end to a life there was every reason to believe had been an exceedingly unhappy one. Mr. Morton did not refuse the request that Mrs. Ashford renewed on his wife's death; and when our voyage was ended, the same carriage that came for the mother and son, also bore away the little girl to her new home.

During the six years that I remained in England, I had frequent opportunities of witnessing the happiness of the child, who had come, as it were, to take the place of the lost daughter; and not on her own child could Mrs. Ashford have lavished more tenderness and affection. As my vacations were always partly spent at Ashford Manor, I also met young Vernon, and had every reason to believe that his boyish regard for little Ernestine was growing with his years. The little girl herself appeared to have but one care in the world, and that was the thought that her father had forgotten her. Of course she did not remember his looks, but his history was known to her, and she evidently grieved at his silence and apparent carelessness.

I imagined that Mrs. Ashford's fair brow grew clouded whenever the father's name was mentioned; and during the last visit I paid them previous to returning to my home, she scrupled not to tell me her fears lest he should some day return and claim her darling. Very imprudently, she had taken no legal means to make good her title to the child, knowing his utter inability to provide for it at that time; but now when years had rendered her unspeakably dear, and also unfolded and developed a surpassing intellect, joined to great promise of beauty, the adopted mother lived in continual dread of losing her, and bitterly bewailed her own imprudent neglect. It needed no very sharp sight to discover that the beloved stranger was to be trained up after her own heart, as a wife for her scarcely more beloved son. Alas! the hopes of the daughter, and the fears of the mother, were to be realized sooner than either dreamed of, and in a manner more distressing than either could have imagined.

As I did not learn the following particulars until long after they took place, I shall give them as they happened, without reference to the time that elapsed before they came to my knowledge. But before I proceed further with Ernestine's history, I must give some clearer idea of the position of the family into which she had been admitted. Mrs. Ashford was the widow of a gentleman of large fortune, and who, with his handsome estate, inherited an unstained name and very popular reputation. For many generations the family had dwelt in the old manor house, and the property had gone down from father to son, if not much increased, certainly not diminished.

Mrs. Ashford had been left by her husband sole guardian of the little Vernon; and not having those occasions for outlay that would have been necessary had there been a master at the mansion, and also having considerable property of her own, there was a fair prospect that the youthful heir would some day inherit a far richer estate than had ever heretofore been in the family. Their style of living was in accordance with the lady's good taste and love of refinement, but always with a due regard to unnecessary outlay; and a more elegant and happier home could scarcely have been found in all England, than the one in which little Ernestine dwelt until her tenth year.

It was but a short time before Vernon's summer vacation, and the household were busy in preparing all possible pleasant surprises for his enjoyment, when every one was astonished by the appearance of Mr. Morton, and dismayed by the announcement of his intention of removing the young lady from her kind friend's care. With mingled sorrow and anger, Mrs. Ashford remonstrated on the injustice of thus depriving her of one on whom she had bestowed so much; but her grief availed naught, and her anger had only the effect of provoking the cruel father to add to her trouble by proclaiming his intentions. Ernestine was destined to become an actress! Immovable in his resolution, he tore her from the arms that would have detained her; and three days after this unwelcome visit, Vernon returned to find his darling sister gone, and his mother dangerously ill.

He was now in his seventeenth year, and the boyish look of earlier days was changing into the deeper feelings of the man. It was therefore with a settled determination and unchangeable resolution, that he avowed his intention of never giving up the search or resting until he had found his lost sister; and deeply as the mother regretted his departure, she never by word or look gave him reason to change his purpose.

But time passed on, and disappointed, almost disheartened, he returned again and again to his home, and the result was still the same. True he had several times been on the eve of succeeding in his endeavors, but it seemed as if fate was determined to thwart him.

And Ernestine, how had she fared during all these years? Sadly enough. Thrown into society repugnant to her every feeling, pining for the motherly love that had become part of her very existence, and forced to undergo ceaseless drudgery, or suffer ill treatment at the hands of her unnatural parent, the poor girl had endured extreme misery. Mr. Morton had endeavored by every means in his power to overcome the horror his daughter experienced at the unlicensed conduct of those with whom he constantly placed her in contact; and enraged at her obstinacy, he refused to allow her to have the slightest communication with her friends, unceasingly striving to elude the pursuit of young Ashford.

For five years they had dwelt in France and Italy. Ernestine's musical education had been followed up, but never had Mr. Morton been able to induce her to appear in public. The best judges had pronounced her voice magnificent, and the most tempting offers had been made to her father by those whose business it is to cater for the public taste, to secure the services of his talented and beautiful daughter.

But threats and promises were alike unavailing in inducing the young girl to depart from her resolve. She would study, would eagerly seize on every opportunity of improving her talents, of adding to her knowledge, and perfecting herself in all graceful accomplishments, but never would she display those talents to the public, and the father threatened a fearful vengeance.

A constant frequenter of the gambling-houses of the city where he dwelt, Mr. Morton was frequently reduced to absolute poverty. After borrowing and begging all he could, he found himself one night in a Parisian saloon without one sou in his purse, and five hundred francs indebted to his antagonist. His antagonist, the Viscount M—, a young English nobleman of immense fortune, had the reputation of being one of the wildest young men of his time, and Mr. Morton had frequently heard the reports of his utter disregard of expense where his feelings were interested, and he immediately formed a diabolical plan, which he lost no time in carrying out.

I have not the inclination to give the particulars of the vile contract, whereby Mr. Morton, in return for a withdrawal of the young nobleman's claims on himself, and a large sum besides, freely and fully sold his child. The subject is too horrible to contemplate; and had it ended as the unnatural father expected, I should never have written this history of Ernestine Morton. But in him who had thus purchased her, the poor girl found a friend when she least expected.

Filled with horror at the conduct of Mr. Morton in thus sacrificing his child; charmed with her loveliness and grace, and deeply impressed by her and history, Lord M— made her an offer of his hand, with the assurance that in their short acquaintance she had won his heart already; but finding that the regard was not mutual, and that her feeling for himself was simply gratitude for his kindness, he placed her in a safe refuge, and returned to England to attend to his somewhat disarranged affairs at home, and also to be the bearer of good news to Ashford Manor. It was a strange coincidence, and served to enlist the young nobleman's sympathy for Miss Morton, that his own mother was a Vernon, and nearly related to Mrs. Ashford.

Words are incapable of describing that lady's feelings on learning from her young cousin the sufferings endured by her adopted child; and if Lord M— had felt some disappointment at the termination of the affair, he was amply rewarded by his estimable relative's warm gratitude—a gratitude that was all the more valuable from knowing he deserved it. And the satisfaction was complete when he witnessed Vernon's unfeigned joy, and received warm thanks from one hitherto very shy of his society.

Mrs. Ashford, not being well enough in health to undertake the journey, despatched two of her most trusted dependents to bring home her long lost favorite, and every arrangement was made to ensure comfort and convenience to the stranger. It was with almost painful anxiety that her arrival was awaited by the mother and son, who came far on the way to meet her; and this anxiety gave way to astonishment at beholding the object of so many years and hopes. In the beautiful woman before her, Mrs. Ashford could find no trace of the very plain child she had so fondly loved in other days—save that those glorious eyes still seemed to read her very soul, and in their expression told of the unchanged heart of the affectionate girl.

To Vernon the wonderful change in his beloved was of little importance compared with the joyful knowledge that she was restored to them. He had loved her as an almost repulsively plain infant, he had loved her as a very ordinary looking child, and he could have loved her had she returned to him without one feature changed, so true was the sentiment with which he regarded her. But nevertheless he felt a glow of very natural pride, as he realized that in his bride the long line of Ashfords would receive an addition unsurpassed in beauty or elegance, if not of such patrician birth as some of his grandmothers had boasted.

They were married; and need I add that all Mrs. Ashford's hopes were realized—more than realized, and she never found reason to repent of having indulged her fancy by adopting a child of humble birth. Ashford Manor became the resort of a select circle, who took delight in flying from the gay vortex of fashionable society in the capital, to enjoy peace and repose in its romantic shades. And when Vernon beheld his lovely wife entertaining their guests, entrancing them with her magnificent voice and finished execution on her favorite harp, or with quiet dignity leading the conversation, while all listened deferentially to her sweet, sensible words, he ceased to regret the painful trial through which she had passed, since it had been the means of developing mental treasures, a calmer existence might never have brought forth. For more than a year after her marriage, Ernestine heard no tidings of her parent, and then a simple announcement of his death at an obscure lodging house in Paris was all that told his fate.

Among the most welcome guests at the manor, Vernon and his wife always included the young nobleman who acted so conspicuous a part in the latter's history. He had drunk deeply of the delusive draught misnamed pleasure; but having once experienced the happiness of performing good actions, even at the expense of selfish motives, he resolved to follow up the experiment, and found his efforts crowned with success. An almost broken-hearted mother restored to happiness, a conscience at peace, and an estate restored to its wonted prosperity, were some of the fruits of this most desirable change.

But satisfactory as was this result, a still more precious reward was in store for the truly reformed young man. An early and most suitable marriage had been broken off by the fair lady, in consequence of the well known habits of her intended; and when all was over, he found too late that his dearest hopes had been sacrificed to his folly. Now, however, the case was different; and the lady, finding that her reformation was complete, bestowed her hand on one to whom she had long before given her heart, thus completing his happiness and insuring his future well doing.

When I meet with any that write obscurely, or converse confusedly, I am to suspect two things: first, that such persons do not understand themselves; and secondly, that they are not worthy of being understood by others.—Colton.

FREDERICK S. COZZENS, ESQ.

The accompanying engraving is from a drawing made expressly for us by Barry, from a painting by Elliott, and is the portrait of a gentleman who has won an enviable position as a humorous writer, and whose name alone is suggestive of a thousand pleasant reminiscences. To be named as the "author of the Sparrowgrass Papers," would insure a warm reception from almost any circle within these broad United States; for both in its serial and book form, that happy compound of genial humor, acute observation and good-humored satire, cemented by eloquence, and even pathos, has penetrated every nook and corner of Uncle Sam's territory, disarming criticism, and provoking Homeric laughter in its triumphant progress. Mr. Cozzens hails from New York, and is one of the many men who have demonstrated the possibility of uniting commercial with literary pursuits. He is at once a man of business, a wit, a poet and humorist. Like many other literary New Yorkers, he has made his home on the banks of the classic Hudson; and it is from actual experience that he has presented us with the comic phases of a country life—those phases which develop themselves with peculiar richness to the man of the city when he becomes smitten with the love of green fields, and exhibits a corresponding verdancy in his first experiments of rural life; when he finds that urban sharpness is no match for the sharpness of rustics, and that Arcadian simplicity does not bear entire and controlling sway in the "rural districts." In his sparkling journal, the "Wine Press," Mr. Cozzens had given many proofs of his genius, his sparkling wit, his playful fancy and his quaint lore before becoming a contributor to Putnam's Magazine, in which he made a reputation by the "Sparrowgrass Papers," that will prove enduring. There is the greatest variety in these papers. Humor enters largely into the fabric, but there are the golden threads of poesy, and sentiment, and pathos, intimately blended and interwoven with the whole. The story of the "New Godiva" is a specimen of some of the higher-toned episodes in the book. But above all, the truthfulness of all its pictures of life is particularly praiseworthy. What amateur that has ever dealt in horses, does not acknowledge that the following sketch of the horse-trading portion of humanity is to the life? "I have bought me a horse. As I had obtained some skill in the manège during my younger days, it was a matter of consideration to have a saddle-horse. It surprised me to find good saddle-horses very abundant soon after my consultation with the stage proprietor upon the topic. There were strange saddle-horses to sell almost every day. One man was very candid about his horse. He told me, if his horse had a blemish, he wouldn't wait to be asked about it, he would tell it right out; and if a man didn't want him then, he needn't take him. He also proposed to put him on trial for sixty days, giving his note for the amount paid him for the horse, to be taken up in case the animal was returned. I asked him what were the principal defects of the horse. He said he'd been fired once, because they thought he was spavined; but there was no more spavin to him than there was to a fresh laid egg—he was as sound as a dollar. I asked him if he would just state what were the defects of the horse. He answered, that he once had the pink-eye, and added, 'now that's honest.' I thought so, but proceeded to question him closely. I asked him if he had the bots. He said, not a bot. I asked him if he would go. He said he would go till he dropped down dead; just touch him with a whip, and he'll jump out of his hide. I inquired how old he was. He answered, just eight years, exactly; some men, he said, wanted to make their horses younger than they be—he was willing to speak right out, and own up that he was eight years. I asked him if there were any other objections. He said no, except that he was inclined to be a little gay; 'but,' he added, 'he is so kind, a child can drive him with a thread.' I asked him if he was a good family horse. He replied, that no lady that ever drew rein over him would be willing to part with him. Then I asked him his price. He answered, that no man could have bought him for a hundred dollars a month ago, but he was willing to sell him for seventy-five, on account of having a note to pay. This seemed such a very low price, that I was about saying I would take him, when Mrs. Sparrowgrass whispered, that I had better see the horse first. I confess I was a little afraid of losing my bargain by it, but out of deference to Mrs. S., I did ask to see the horse before I bought him. He said he would fetch him down. 'No man,' he added, 'ought to buy a horse unless he saw him.' When the horse came down, it struck me that, whatever his qualities were, his personal appearance was against him. One of his forelegs was shaped like the handle of our punch-ladle; and the remaining three legs, about the fetlock, were slightly bunchy. Besides, he had no tail to brag of; and his back had a very hollow sweep from his high haunches to his low shoulder-blades. I was much pleased, however, with the fondness and pride manifested by his owner, as he held up by both sides of the bridle the rather longish head of his horse, surmounting a neck shaped like a pea-pod, and said, in a sort of triumphant voice, 'three quarters blooded.' The above extract, selected almost at random, will serve as a taste of the humorous quality of our author, which, as we have observed, is but one element of his versatile genius. We look upon Mr. Cozzens as one of our most reliable writers. He is still young, and we trust that it will be our pleasant task to chronicle, in succession, a series of volumes from his gifted pen.

FREDERICK S. COZZENS.

Hardly a man, whatever his circumstances and situation, but if you get his confidence, will tell you that he is not happy. It is however certain all men are not unhappy in the same degree, though by these accounts we might almost be tempted to think so. Is not this to be accounted for, by supposing that all men measure the happiness they possess by the happiness they desire, or think they deserve?—Greville.

THE CITY OF CAIRO, ILLINOIS.

The city of Cairo, Illinois, of which we herewith present an accurate view, drawn recently for us by Mr. Kilburn, is situated at the mouth of the Ohio River, and at the junction of that stream with the Mississippi. This is a place much sought after by travellers on the river—more from the celebrity of what it was to be, than what it is at the present time. Great disappointment will, therefore, be felt in taking the first view of Cairo, and learning that it has a population of less than two hundred souls. The levee or bank in front of the town is several miles long, and artificial, and is said to have cost a million of dollars. The Rothschilds, the celebrated bankers, were deeply interested in the success of this place. There is no question but this is a most admirable site for a large city, being in the centre of the great Mississippi valley, about a thousand miles from Pittsburgh, at the head of the Ohio, and the same distance from New Orleans and the Falls of St. Anthony. The great obstacles that hinder the growth of Cairo are the extreme lowness of the ground, and the consequent unhealthiness of the place. It is greatly in danger of being overflowed, the Ohio having been known to rise sixty feet. It is the southern terminus of the Illinois Central Railroad, the depot of which is seen in our picture. The state of the water was moderate at the time of our sketch; at high water it rises to the top of the levee or bank.

ROMANCE IN REAL LIFE.

For some time past, Mr. Isaacs, a dealer in dry goods, on the corner of John and Nassau Streets, New York, has been annoyed at intervals by the disappearance from his establishment of pieces of costly ribbons, silks, satins, velvets, and other rich goods. A few days since, one of his customers—a lady "of the highest respectability," residing in Jersey City—called in her carriage, accompanied by a little girl, and, after making a number of purchases from one of the clerks, was on the point of leaving, when another lady, who was in the store at the time, informed Mr. Isaacs, who was busy in another part of the store, that she had seen the Jersey City lady purloin and secrete three pieces of costly ribbon. A short time previous to this, Mr. Isaacs had discharged an employee for accusing this same lady of theft, and he was consequently considerably startled at this new charge against her. He was still doubtful, however, and addressing his informant, he said: "You must be mistaken. It cannot be possible that Mrs. — would descend to so low a crime as theft! Why, she belongs to one of the first families in Jersey City!"—"I can't help that," said the informant, "I saw her secrete the ribbon."—"Will you accuse her to her face?" asked Mr. Isaacs. "Certainly; I am never ashamed of the truth." Approaching the Jersey City lady just as she was about entering her carriage, Mr. I. touched her upon her shoulder, and requested her to step back into the store for a moment. She unhesitatingly complied with his request, and when they reached the spot where the accuser stood, Mr. I. said, addressing his customer, "Mrs. —, this lady accuses you of having purloined and secreted three pieces of that costly ribbon at which you were looking." For a moment the lady seemed startled, but instantly regaining her self-possession, she replied, "Well, Mr. Isaacs, I did steal them, but I hope you will not expose me." Isaacs could scarcely believe his ears. He then accused her of having committed numerous former thefts of a like character. "I have," said she, bursting into tears, "but don't expose me, and you shall be compensated for your losses. The desire to steal has become a monomania with me, and I cannot help it." Then, placing her hands behind her, she took from the opening of her dress the ribbon, together with a number of other articles, saying, "Here is your property, and if you will say nothing about it, I will pay you $1000 to cover my past indebtedness." Mr. Isaacs told her he only wanted the goods which she had stolen. These she agreed to restore as far as she could do so, and accompanying her to her home in Jersey City, she brought forth goods to the amount of $700, which she had from time to time stolen from him.—New York Despatch.

VIEW OF CAIRO, JUNCTION OF THE OHIO AND MISSISSIPPI RIVERS.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

MY BROTHER'S STAR.

BY FRANK FREELove.

[Early, very early, this morning I arose, and the first object that attracted my attention was the bright morning-star, peering down the calm ether in silent majesty: my thoughts naturally reverted to my brother.]

Wake, boy awake! thy day-star bright is beaming,
 Hung in the zenith, like a lamp afar:
 Wake, boy, awake! the morning light, on-streaming,
 Devours with glory thy bright matin star!

Wake, boy, awake! its mellow lustre, dying,
 Like softest gleam of moonbeam, floats afar:
 Wake, boy, awake! or thy bright glory, flying,
 Will wane, as beams away thy morning star!

Wake, boy, awake! prepare for days of glory;
 Arm thee for passion's tempest—duty's war!
 Wake! boy, awake! let no ignoble story
 Be mine to tell, boy of the golden star!

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE BLIND BOY.

BY WILLIAM B. OLIVER.

"TAKE care, Harry!" said Bella Verner, to her little brother, as the child grasped a branch of a tree nearest him. It was in a violent thunder storm, and the two were out together in the field near their father's house. The tree was a large one, but there were one or two branches growing very low down, and to one of these Harry clung. "Take care, dear," repeated Bella, "I have heard that it is dangerous to touch a tree or to be near one." She spoke too late, for already the flash had struck the tree, and shrivelled up the leaves, and charred the branches, and even split the huge trunk.

For a moment Bella staggered, and then she ran up to Harry. Apparently he was unhurt, but he had a strange, bewildered look upon his face that frightened her.

"Harry, Harry, speak to me, love; tell me if you are hurt?"

"I cannot see you, Bella. Where are you?"

Not seeing her, with his eyes fastened directly upon her countenance! How could that be? Into her mind a thought, terrible almost as death, suddenly darted. She had heard of people struck blind with lightning, and the dreadful truth took possession of her faculties. She threw herself on the wet ground sobbing aloud.

"Where are you, dear Bella?" again repeated that little mournful voice; and she roused herself up to take the child to her arms.

It was with a sense of oppressive awe that she led him carefully home. His touching questions upon the nature of his calamity, pierced the heart of the affectionate sister. She could not tell him that he was never again to behold the green carpet of the earth, the soft blue of the sky, the flowers and the stars. She could not bring home to him the sad truth that henceforth he must be dependent on other eyes—that his own would never again gaze on the friends he loved, or the pleasant scenes which had been so precious to his young heart.

She turned heartsick as she came within sight of the house; she had no mother to go to with this sorrow, for her mother had long since died—died when Harry was born. She alone must bear this trouble until her father should return from his long voyage. No relation, competent to advise or assist her, could she remember to summon to her aid. She laid Harry down upon the couch, and sent the servant for Doctor Morris. When he came, his look told her all that she had foreboded. Her lip quivered, but she tried to be firm, and the doctor promised to befriend her.

"You have got your life's work planned out for you, Bella," said the good doctor; "but I know you will do it bravely and well." To the child he gave soothing and tender words, and then Bella was left alone to finish the task of self-sacrifice—to weave the first flower into the chaplet, which should adorn her youthful brow with greater honor and glory than a queen's diadem.

It was up-hill work at first, and Harry grew fretful and peevish under his terrible privation; but he soon became calm and reconciled. Bella at first devoted night and day to him, and almost wore herself out with the constant watching which this involved. Subsequently she learned to save herself, bright and fresh, for those hours when he most needed her. She drew around him little companions, whose society was pleasant and refreshing to him; and when they were near, availed herself of the opportunity of changing her employments, or varying the scene for herself.

There was a boy in the village, who was bound by ties of gratitude to Captain Verner's family. This boy offered his services for a certain number of hours every day to relieve Bella. He was engaged in an occupation which left his morning hours free; and Bella gladly engaged him for a term of months, promising that when her father returned he should lose nothing by the sacrifice.

It was sweet to see the unselfish surrender which the sister made of herself to the blind child. No persuasion could induce her to be absent a single day without him; and as any change of place annoyed him, she forebore to visit. Still, she gathered around her the friends in whom the child most delighted, and the hours devoted to music, reading and walking or riding in the open air, were as happy to Harry as to the rest.

To cultivate his musical talent was now Bella's desire; and even before his father's return, he had learned to play and sing very sweetly. One person, who had stayed for some time in an asylum for the blind, and had eventually recovered her sight, offered to teach him various little arts, which contributed greatly to his happiness.

Things were in this state when Captain Verner arrived. The good ship anchored with flags all streaming in the harbor, but the blind child saw it not. The father went hastily to his home, and clasped the children in his loving embrace. His cheek was sunburnt and brown with exposure, and Harry's soft hand played with his hair, now turning to silver, but the child saw neither silver nor brown. He only heard his father's voice, and felt his tears when he told him that he was blind—for with all Bella's bravery, she could not tell him.

It was a hard thing for the father to hear, but men shake off these things sooner than women; and he was laughing with Harry long before Bella had recovered herself from her weeping.

"I will take him to London or Paris," said Captain Verner, "and I believe they can cure him there." He did so, but with no success; and the voyage wearied the child to no purpose.

"Leave him to me, dear father," said Bella. "I can manage him best." And he gave up interfering with her quiet, simple mode of making Harry happy.

Among Captain Verner's passengers was a gentleman, whose name was Christie, to whom he felt obliged to extend an invitation for a visit of several days. He accepted it, had his trunks brought, and established himself without ceremony. The first two days Bella was absent with Harry from six o'clock in the morning until seven in the evening, and consequently did not see Mr. Christie. The third morning they met at breakfast, and the young man was evidently struck with her beauty, and her attention to her brother. It made an impression upon him that could not be effaced without an effort that he did not seem disposed to make.

Captain Verner evidently thought very highly of his guest, and it must be owned that Bella was not indifferent; and yet she treated him somewhat distantly. She knew not why she did this, except that ever since he had been received on such intimate terms into the house, he had appeared jealous of her attentions to poor little Harry. She had tried to think that this was not the case; that her affection for Harry made her think this—but it was too evident. He invented every possible excuse to get her away from the boy, who clung to her more than ever since his father's unsuccessful attempts at getting him cured. He seemed afraid that he was meditating another, and the very sound of the sea made Harry sick at heart; but still more he seemed to dread leaving Bella with Mr. Christie. He had an intuitive sense that he wished him away, and, childlike, he resisted him with a pertinacity which very much provoked their guest.

"You do not wish me to go, Bella, do you?" he whispered to her, one fine afternoon, when Mr. Christie had been urging him to go out into the garden with little Julia Arnold, the child of their next door neighbor.

"No, indeed; stay love, if you wish to," she answered. She was vexed to see that Christie's brow grew dark as she said this.

"You will spoil that boy, Miss Verner," he said, after a pause. "Already he is out of your power to manage."

"I do not manage Harry," she said, proudly; "there is too good blood in Harry's veins to manage or to spoil."

Christie saw that she was offended, and probably he thought that this was no time to urge his suit; but when Harry was in bed, he sought her again, and told her his purpose.

"I cannot be your wife, nor that of any other, Mr. Christie," she said, anxious to make her refusal as easy as possible. "I am married to Duty, already," she added, smiling.

"Your best years have already been sacrificed," said he, "to this idle phantom, duty. Have you no heart—no feeling to provide for? Is your whole life to be a sacrifice to this child?"

"If God sees fit to make it so," she answered, "I will never voluntarily separate myself from Harry. No other love can be to him what mine is. No other love has yet been to me like his." She closed her eyes tightly, but a few tears came between the shut lids and overflowed them.

Christie's brow darkened again. His resolution had been taken that morning to win her love before the day was past, and separate her from Harry through that love. He was angry to find himself baffled by her firmness; he had not counted upon it. Indeed, he had deprived himself of the best claim he, or any one else, could have had to her love; for had he not so obviously wished her to discard the child from her care, she might have returned his love.

There was a struggle in Christie's breast between selfishness and generosity, and the latter prevailed, only because the former was likely to be benefited by it; and he very magnanimously offered to let Harry remain with her. But the concession came all too late. Her rejection was positive—definite; nothing could alter her determination.

And yet, when he was gone, Bella did sink down into a state of loneliness, which was very trying to a spirit so buoyant by nature as hers. She covered her eyes with her hands, and the tears fell fast over them; she thought of her future lonely life, with scarce a tie, save this little child. "And what would he be, bereft of his sister?" she thought—and in a moment sunshine sprang goldenly and warm upon her vanishing hopes. "Dear Harry," she murmured, "you are more to me than a thousand lovers, after all!"

"What is that, dearest Bella, about lovers?" said Harry, whose quick ear caught the sound of her voice.

"I love you, Harry," she said, affectionately, as she drew his arm within hers. "Come, let us go down to that sweet dell again." And the two went away together, Bella glad that she had resisted this temptation. For she could not deny to herself, that anything that called her from the monotonous life which she was living was a temptation; although, under different circumstances, it might not have been difficult, or even any effort to resist it. But for a moment she had thought that it might be pleasant enough to be Horace Christie's wife; to travel, as he proposed to do, in those far lands where her imagination had often wandered; to be for a while the protected, instead of the protector.

She had but to feel the weight of Harry's little hand upon her arm for a moment, to make her think that she was wicked and unprincipled to harbor such a thought. She could and would banish Horace Christie forever from her heart—almost from her memory. At least, she would not weakly sit down and repine. Harry's life must be made as happy as his state would admit; and in all the vicissitudes of his pilgrimage, as they were likely to occur, whose hand could tend him like his sister's? So that dream passed; and Bella turned her eye steadily towards duty, and called it happiness.

"Are you weeping, dearest Bella?" said Harry, one evening, when they sat by the deep bay window, so heavily garlanded with roses and honeysuckle. The full round moon was looking down upon Harry's sightless eyes, and she was thinking of his future, and how sad it was that, of all this returning of the season's glorious beauty, those eyes could never behold a single ray.

"Not for myself, darling," she murmured, as the bright tears flashed in the moonlight, and fell upon Harry's white hand.

"For me, then, is it?" said the boy. "O, dearest sister, do not weep for Harry. Do you not know what beautiful sights I have of heaven? I can see mother there, and our little sister, and the holy angels; and once, Bella, I thought I saw another—far more glorious—I cannot tell you who it was, but some time you will see him, too."

Bella checked him. "It is not good for you, my love, this excitement. Be quiet now, and I will sing you to sleep." And she sang the "Evening Hymn;" and the boy leaned his head upon her arm and slept heavily, until she roused him to retire for the night.

As she laid him in his little bed, and kissed his fair, pale cheek and waxen eyelids again and again, she reproached herself for ever thinking of any other life than to watch over him. Still she was lonely. Captain Verner was again far over the sea, and her only companions were Harry and the two servants; for Lawrence Gaffield, the boy who waited on Harry, had now taken up his abode with them entirely, as she needed some one in her father's absence besides Alice.

The summer was intensely hot, and Harry's weak frame seemed to droop beneath its salubrious influence. Doctor Morris advised sea-bathing; and as his own family were going for a few weeks to a watering place, he proposed that Bella should take her whole household and accompany them. The change was both pleasant and beneficial to Harry. It was the first time that he had shown pleasure at being away from home; but he had heard Doctor Morris say that Bella herself looked pale and worn, and he was delighted to have her go to the seaside, as a means of comfort to herself. So, with his usual unselfishness, he declared that he really wanted to go, and that he would not shrink at all when Lawrence should put him into the sea, if only Bella would go too.

They went to the seaside, and the clear, bracing air strengthened Harry's feeble limbs, and brought back the rose hue to Bella's cheek. Harry was very brave in the water, and did not struggle when Lawrence let the great waves rush over them. But one day, Lawrence was seized with cramp, and lost hold of the boy, and Bella and Alice were powerless to save him. In that moment of time, all of sorrow that life could give seemed concentrated in the breast of the devoted sister, and had not some one caught her, she must have gone down.

Borne senseless to the beach, she lay without motion until Harry had been rescued and lain beside her. Then she opened her eyes and saw Harry's preserver standing over the lifeless boy, and trying to restore him. It was a face that she could never forget, the one she saw now. Twice she had seen it in her dreams. At any rate, it was a face worth remembering. The head was crowned with a wealth of shining curls lying wet and heavy around the forehead; while the eyes seemed to look into Bella's very soul. Alice was rubbing Harry's limbs, and the gentleman turned to support her in rising. At the thought of the wet, cheerless-looking group which they presented to the view of the gazers on the rocks, Bella could not forbear laughing, now that she knew all was safe.

"I am Howard Preston," he said, as he bowed to her at the door of the bathing-room.

"And I am Bell Verner," she rejoined, and they parted.

Evening brought Mr. Preston. Bella had recovered entirely, and Harry partially, from the effects of the morning adventure. They were better acquainted now than they could have been by a month of fashionable calls. Mornings passed on the beach, and afternoons devoted to Harry's amusement, soon made them intimate; and when at the end of a fortnight they separated, it was with the promise of a week's visit at the doctor's in September.

"I wonder what has become of Preston?" said the doctor, when the twentieth of September arrived, and he had not come.

"Hush," said little Harry, "Mr. Preston is coming up the gravel walk this very minute."

The trees hid his form from their eyes, but Harry's nice ear had distinguished his footsteps. Bella blushed and withdrew to the shadow of the heavy window curtain, where she sat playing with the tassels, and trying to look unconscious of his approach.

Preston's eyes were full now of a soft light as he approached her, and one look into that face told her a new history. Howard Preston loved her, and he told her so that very night, as they wandered off upon the smooth beach together. It was late when they returned, but all was settled. They were to be married when her father returned, and Harry was never to leave her.

How sweetly did Bella's life flow on now! Was Horace Christie forgotten? He was; or if remembered at all, it was with such memory as we give those about whom we are perfectly indifferent. This friend was Harry's friend also, and to none other could she give her heart. Who loved Bella, must find room also in their heart of hearts for Harry, too.

Foreign Items.

WHOLESALE AGENTS.—S. French, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. White, 115 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; A. C. Bagley, 102 Vine Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Smith, 107 N. 2d Street, Philadelphia; J. H. Woodard, corner 11th and Ches-

SKETCHES IN JAPAN.

The interest felt in every thing relating to Japan has received a new spur from the recent publication of the History of the Expedition, by Dr. Hawks. We therefore continue our pictures of Japan scenery with which we have from time to time presented our readers. The first is a scene on the road to Jeddo. The primitive habitations scattered on the route are quite characteristic and note-worthy. On the road are seen a couple of pack-horses. The horses seen by the officers of the expedition, were much inferior to European and American horses in size and spirit, but far better than the Chinese. There is a sketch of a horse, by a native artist, in Dr. Hawks's book, which, though rather faulty in drawing, conveys probably a correct idea of the style of animal in general use in Japan. If this is one of their model horses, their cavalry cannot certainly be well mounted. In the interior, however, the Americans were told that great attention was paid to the growth of horses and fine cattle, and that in the vicinity of the Nonoga lake, a mountainous region in the north part of Nippon, the chief occupation of the inhabitants was stock-raising. At their annual festival, which they call Sang-natz-Sanuitz, horse-races are common. It appears that the Japanese care less for speed than for endurance in their animals. The race track is a complete circle, and the competing horses are started by the riders at full speed. The horse which performs the greatest number of circuits within the period allowed for the trial, and is pulled up at the close in good condition, is declared to be the winner. It is enough that a single horse outlasts all competitors—if he is blown by his exertions the prize is never decreed to him. Hence the riders study to be acquainted with the bottom of their nags, as well as their speed. Racing one horse against another, neck and neck, for the supremacy, rarely occurs, and then not designed, but when the horses themselves are excited by the spirit of emulation voluntarily engage in the contest. The riders display a good deal of skill in riding, bending low down over their horses' necks in order to catch the wind as little as possible. But they do not dress in what we should call jockey style; on the contrary, they wear flowing robes. The Japanese peasantry ride and manage their horses very well, but the upper classes seem to have lost that fondness and appetite for equestrian exercise which formerly led them to engage in hunting and hawking on an extensive scale.—Our second engraving is quite an extensive view of the imperial city of Jeddo. Its aspect is very peculiar. The rectangular manner in which it is laid out is particularly note-worthy, while the curved roofs and piled up stories of the buildings have a singular effect. This view of Jeddo is not the one usually given, but is taken from a different point, showing part of the Palace of the Kobo, which is built in the middle of the city, and which consists of five smaller palaces or castles, and has large gardens and enclosures around and behind it, said to be ten miles in circumference. Jeddo, altogether, is almost forty miles in circumference, and the largest city in the empire. In populousness, activity and bustle, it is said to much resemble the great commercial cities of the civilized nations. A large river runs through the town and encloses the imperial palace, and over this stream there are thrown several picturesque bridges. Niponbus, the principal bridge, is also called the Bridge of Japan. The houses are chiefly constructed of timber and bamboo, in consequence of which the city is frequently visited by terrible conflagrations. In consequence of all the nobles of the empire being obliged to live at Jeddo the year round, the city contains many fine palaces and gardens. These, in connection with the long ranges of trees planted along the canals that traverse the city, make Jeddo the handsomest city of the empire.

SCENE ON THE ROAD TO JEDDO, CAPITAL OF JAPAN.

WESTERN VIEW OF JEDDO, CAPITAL OF JAPAN.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 6, 1856.

$3.00 PER ANNUM | VOL. XI., No. 10.—WHOLE No. 270.
6 CENTS SINGLE

VIEW OF HOBOKEN, NEW JERSEY.

The view of Hoboken, presented in the engraving on this page, was sketched for us by Mr. Hill, from the deck of one of the famous yachts belonging to the New York Yacht Squadron, this being the anchorage ground of the club. On the right are the ferry ways. The steamers that cross to New York every quarter of an hour, running to Barclay, Canal and Christopher Streets, are very different affairs from that in which the hero of Halleck's "Fanny" made the excursion, when —“he had dined, by special invitation,

On turtle, with the party at Hoboken,
And thanked them for his card in an oration,
Declared to be the very shortest ever spoken.”

In those days the “perilous stream of the North River” was navigated by horse-boats, the motive power being supplied by horses, traversing an endless circle, like the unfortunate animals who do duty for the proprietors of bark-mills and brick-yards. We believe these horse-boats have entirely disappeared from the waters of New York, steam, everywhere, supplying the place of quadrupedal power. Above the ferry are the Otto cottage and gardens, and beyond are the shipyards of Commodore Stevens, who, before his death, which occurred recently, owned nearly the whole water front of Hoboken, and immensely valuable property in the city, including the estate bounded by the river. In these yards is the great iron floating steam battery for the defence of New York harbor. This battery has been a long time building. It was a favorite hobby of the late commodore, had the support of government and the approval of the ablest scientific men. On the left of the ferries are the Battery Hotel and gardens. Here, enjoying the cool south wind, many congregate of an evening to watch the crowded spires, the forest-like shipping of the New York docks, the arrival and departure of various crafts, from a steam frigate or Collins liner to a towboat, from a Canton clipper to a mud lighter. An unrivalled view of New York is thus obtained.

“Tall spire, and glittering roof, and battlement,
And banners, floating in the sunny air,
And white sails o’er the calm blue waters bent,
Green isle and chelling shore are blended there
In wild reality; when life is old,
And many a scene forgot, the heart will hold
Its memory of this.”

On match days, the lovers of maritime sport assemble here in thousands to see the winning yacht come in. Hoboken is to New York what the parks are to London, Paris and Vienna, and to the children, a place of pleasure and delight that realizes their dreams of fairy-land. Hoboken! what a world of pleasurable associations there is in the word to a New Yorker, when, far away from his beloved imperial city, his memory reverts to its manifold fascinations—visions of summer gardens, rocks, fields, woods, strolls by the river side and in the “Elysian Fields,” military and target excursions, affectionate evening walks in the company of angels in silk or muslin, first declarations, picnic parties, and waltzes and polkas on the greensward! These and many more are the attractions of Hoboken. Pleasantly situated on the Hudson, at this spot about two miles wide, it has been supposed by some to have been the original Manahatta. That it was an island at no distant date, the extensive marshes on the west side abundantly testify. Now, these form the hunting-ground of adventurous Teutons, who, landing in New York, armed to the teeth for mortal combat with wolves, bears and other ferocious “varmint,” are reduced to the ignoble pursuit of sand-pipers and clipping birds. Beyond the marshes are the rocks rising in abrupt masses fully two hundred feet, the scene of many festive parties. But the shores of Hoboken have not been always sought by persons intent on pleasure, or the quiet enjoyment of the beauties of nature. Among those green shades, the death-shot has rung more than once. Many years ago, a monument marked a spot where one of these unfortunate encounters took place which resulted in the death of a man honored by the entire nation. This victim to the code of honor was no other than Gen. Alexander Hamilton, one of the brightest names on the record of America's great men, the friend and companion in arms of Washington, the soldier and the man of letters, the gentleman and the statesman, one who not only contributed by his sword to the success of the Revolution, but by his pen to the establishment and consolidation of the Union. His antagonist was also a man who filled a large space in the public mind, and who had won distinction as a soldier, a lawyer and a politician—Colonel Aaron Burr. There are many still living in New York who remember the wild excitement created in the city when the news of this duel and its fatal result were made known. The monument erected to the memory of Hamilton on the spot where he fell was removed by the authorities, from a belief that it would tend to perpetuate a terrible practice by a constant memento of an illustrious example. We believe that the spot is not now readily identified. Hoboken is a blessing to New York, as the Common is to Boston. Its accessibility and its numerous features of beauty, its extensive walks, its calm shades and its pure air are attractions that woo forth all classes. It is pleasant to see whole families straying about in the Elysian fields, or grouped in delightful little domestic picnic parties. On a holiday all its rural portions are crowded, and as you pass by the different groups, you hear, besides the familiar English tongue, the brilliant accents of the French, and almost every other European nation.

VIEW OF HOBOKEN, NEW YORK.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE LOST HEIR: —OR, THE— YOUNG AMERICAN SOLDIER.

A TALE OF 1812.

BY CAROLINE ORNE.

CHAPTER I.

THE FARM-HOUSE.

DURING the early part of the present century, a large, rambling, moss-grown farm-house, situated in the western part of New England, formed the central feature of a landscape, rich in rural beauty, and partaking in many instances of a wild and even gloomy grandeur. At one point, the swell of land on which the house was situated, swept downward with a gentle slope, till it melted away and was lost in a broad expanse of meadow, which margined a tributary to one of the larger rivers, while at another, by a descent more abrupt, it was gradually merged into bold undulations, growing still loftier as they receded, till they rose into heights which were mountainous. To the north, the view was terminated by a grand old forest, which towered in primeval pride, and which, in days gone by, re-echoed to the voice of the red hunter.

It was June, and the long summer day was drawing to a close. Above the setting sun hovered purple and crimson clouds, brightened by dashes of burnished gold, which, at first, lying in shapeless masses along the whole extent of the western horizon, gradually assumed the form of a pavilion, surpassing in splendor the fabled palaces of the East.

Seated near a window of the old farm-house, watching this gorgeous sunset, were two maidens—Edith Grosvenor and Bessie Hamlen. The same rich light which flushed the clouds with such brilliant and varying hues, streamed in at the open window and lit up with "a kind of golden gloom" the black and shining braids of Edith's hair, arranged with careless grace round her snub head, only a few wavy curls being suffered to hover round her smooth, white forehead, full of intellectual beauty. She was only eighteen, and yet there was something in the light of her deep, dark eyes, and in the curve of her finely cut lips, which showed that shadows as well as sunshine had fallen across her path.

Edith sat leaning back in her chair, with one arm passed lightly across Bessie's shoulders, who was seated near her so as to face the window. Though she and Bessie were cousins, they did not in the least resemble each other. The damask bloom of Bessie's cheeks varied with each changing impulse, and there was a bewitching uncertainty as to the color of her eyes, whose light was at one moment veiled by their long, dark lashes, the next flashing forth a sunny, almost dazzling brilliance. Her hair, which was suffered to float free and unconfined, and which, at the present moment, as she bent a little forward, fell in a shower of rich, nut-brown curls over the dark dress of Edith, being thus by contrast rendered doubly bright, was no less beautiful than her eyes. In some other respects many might have thought her plain rather than handsome, her features being far from regular. Her mouth, particularly, was too large, and yet it possessed great sweetness of expression, and the flexible lips were as red and fresh as the coral gleaming through the white foam of the wave.

"How beautiful!" broke from her lips, as spires and pinnacles rose silently upward from the magnificent cloud-palace.

The bloom of her cheeks deepened into a warmer and richer glow as she said this, but the next moment, as she caught the sad, almost mournful expression of Edith's face, it quickly faded.

"You are thinking of this dreadful war which is threatening us, I know you are, and of—"

She hesitated, and finally ceased speaking. She had been going to say, "Austin Sedley." Austin Sedley had for some time been engaged to Edith, and about six months afterward, owing to some wilful misapprehension, as was believed, had, while in an English port, been seized by a press-gang and conveyed on board one of the king's ships.

Edith apparently did not notice the abrupt manner in which Bessie left off speaking, and quietly remarked that it was hardly right to regret what could not be honorably avoided.

"I heard Mr. Thaxter say, the other day, that a war with England was as unnecessary as it was inexpedient," remarked Bessie.

"Better judges than Mr. Thaxter think differently," was Edith's reply.

Before Bessie had time to say anything more, a horseman swept round an abrupt bend of the road, the winding course of which had been concealed by a thick growth of trees. She bent eagerly forward, and then said, in a voice which betrayed considerable excitement:

"Look, Edith, and tell me if you know who it is."

"Wilton Richmond, I believe, though he is still so distant I can hardly tell," replied Edith.

In a minute more all uncertainty was at an end. It was, as Edith had said and Bessie's heart had told her, Wilton Richmond. He was a young man of four or five and twenty, finely formed, and with a dignity of mien somewhat above his years, while the ease and grace with which he managed the high-blooded animal he rode—alike remarkable for beauty and speed—showed him to be an accomplished horseman. He soon reached the broad strip of vivid green, crossed by foot-paths in various directions, which lay in front of the house, when, springing lightly to the ground, and removing the saddle and headstall from his horse—an attention which he acknowledged by rubbing his head against his master's shoulder—he left him to crop, at will, the short but sweet grass already silvered with dew.

The smile with which he greeted the two girls, who met him at the door, faded as Edith asked him what news he brought.

"The bill declaring war with Great Britain has been signed by the president," was his answer.

"Do you think it was right to declare war?" said Bessie.

"Undoubtedly. Were we to look tamely on and see our seamen impressed, our commerce plundered, and our great staples prevented from reaching their legitimate markets, in consequence of the unjust measures of the British parliament!"

"Certainly not!" replied Bessie; "yet it is so sad, to think of the misery war always brings in its train."

"And British injustice—hasn't that brought misery to many a heart and home? Edith could tell you it has," he added, lowering his voice.

"Yes, Sedley's fate is indeed cruel," said Bessie, in the same low tone. "When I think of him, it almost reconciles me to the war—that is," and her eyes sought the floor—"if I were sure you would be content to remain at home."

"That is a question, my dear Bessie, which is settled."

"Not in favor of your staying at home," said Edith.

"No, I have already accepted a captain's commission, and have succeeded in enlisting a few recruits."

"I knew that at such a crisis you wouldn't be willing to remain idle. I shouldn't have been very proud of your acquaintance if you had been."

"Edith, how can you say so?" said Bessie, with quivering lips, and turning hastily away, to conceal her tears.

"My own Bessie," said Wilton, encircling her with his arm, and drawing her towards him, "you must think of the glory, not the danger."

Bessie could not answer, for she thought how often the glory won on the battle-field sheds its light on the soldier's grave. They were prevented from pursuing the subject by the entrance of Mr. Grosvenor, Edith's father.

"Wilton," said he, grasping his young friend's hand, "I am heartily glad to see you—the more so, on account of what I have just heard."

"You have heard of the proceedings of Congress, then?"

"Yes, Mr. Thaxter told me, and he lamented in bitter terms what he considered the uncalculated measure. I couldn't help telling him that I was glad it had decided as it has. This temporizing spirit, when carried beyond certain limits, to me appears mean and cowardly. You are heating up for recruits, I understand."

"Yes—can I hope to obtain any in this vicinity?"

"Not within a mile. You must get beyond the Thaxters and the Bayntons before you'll find any."

"Then I must be off early in the morning."

"You must—there is no disguising the fact; though I think I may venture to say, that were it consistent with your duty, my niece and daughter would be glad to have you remain weeks instead of a few hours."

Edith confirmed her father's assertion, while the silence of Bessie was more eloquent than words.

CHAPTER II.

THREATENED DANGER.

WE will not dwell on the sad parting which took place in the morning, between Wilton Richmond and his friends at the farm-house. He devoted several weeks to the enlistment of soldiers, in which he was more successful than he had anticipated, otherwise, as far as he was concerned, the interval was unmarked by any incident worthy of notice.

At the end of that period, some service connected with his military duties required his presence some seventy of eighty miles from where he was stationed. It proved to be one of the sultriest of July days that he started on his journey, and when the sun had nearly reached the meridian, more for the sake of his weary horse than his own, he for a few hours sought the shelter of a wood. He found the rays of the sun to be as scorching as ever, when, at last, he felt compelled to resume his journey. It would, even then, be scarcely possible for him till several hours after dark, to reach the place where he had been instructed to pass the night. This was at a place of public entertainment designated as the "Wolf-head Tavern," in "honor" of the gallant general who fell on the Heights of Abraham, and not, as many imagined, because the surrounding country was infested with wolves.

It was after night-fall, when he heard a noise which sounded like distant thunder. A repetition of the sound left him no longer in doubt, and looking towards the west, he saw that a heavy mass of clouds lay low down, along the whole extent of the horizon, from which, now and then, broke a faint flash of lightning. The clouds were stationary, for there was not even air enough to rustle the light and glossy foliage of the birch which grew by the wayside.

In a little more than five minutes, however, the wind, with a deep sigh, broke the unnatural stillness, and then with a hollow and mournful wail, came sweeping down the road, driving before it clouds of dust and bending the sturdy trees of the forest, which bordered the right-hand side of the road. At the same moment, the sun was darkened, for the heavy clouds, driven by the wind, were rapidly surging upward towards the zenith. A few heavy drops of rain dashed against his face, then came a flash of lightning so vivid as to be almost blinding, and in the same breath, a crash of thunder. This, as he well knew, was ominous of one of those deluging showers so common at that season of the year, and he hastened to free from the fastenings which bound it to his saddle-bow, a short horseman's cloak. He had scarce time to throw it over his shoulders when the rain commenced pouring down, no longer in separate drops, but in continuous streams. He knew of no house where he could obtain shelter, and that which the woods would afford was fraught with too much danger, as he was warned by the zig-zag chains of lightning which were momentarily descending. The wind, too, being in a direction to dash the rain full against his face, it almost blinded him. He had proceeded in this manner ten or fifteen minutes, when, through an opening in the woods, he saw a rude dwelling. He checked his horse, and for a moment remained doubtful whether to proceed or to turn aside and seek such shelter as the building would afford. Finally, suffering the reins to fall loosely on his horse's neck, the animal without hesitation turned into the opening.

Wilton was soon at the door of the hut, for it could not be termed anything better. Back of it, he discovered a small shed partly formed by an excavation in a ledge of rocks. Leading his horse under its shelter, he returned to the door of the hut and ventured to knock, though, by the perfect silence which reigned within, he inferred that he was an unwelcome visitor. At first, such was the unbroken stillness, he thought the hut might be uninhabited, but he soon discovered indications to the contrary, such as a small pile of wood with an axe lying near it, and a few implements of agriculture.

Having knocked a second time, footsteps were almost immediately heard approaching the door, which, after a stout wooden bar was withdrawn, was opened by a woman, rather coarse looking, yet not without certain traits of countenance which might inspire a degree of confidence.

"Will you be so kind as to give me shelter till the shower is over?" said he.

"Yes—though you had better not accept it," was the woman's reply, who at the same time drew back that he might have a chance to enter.

"Why had I better not accept it?" inquired Wilton, as he stepped into a rather large room, which appeared to be the only one which the hut contained.

"Because danger worse than being exposed to a thunder-shower may overtake you here."

"Of what nature?"

"You are an American officer?" she said, interrogatively.

"Yes."

"Need you ask, then, the kind of danger you're exposed to? The gold of the British, as you must know, is every hour drawing to their standard the red men of the forest."

"Am I more exposed to danger on their account than I should be on the road?"

"You are. Their way would lie through the forest, and you might pass along the road undiscovered, or if not, the speed of your horse might enable you to escape—but what can you do here against seven of the fierce Iroquois?"

"Does that question mean that you are expecting that number here?"

"It does."

"You have no fear on your own account?"

"No, or I shouldn't have, if alone."

"You are on friendly terms then with your expected guests?"

"I have never seen them, but they know that here they will find food, and dry boards to lie on. You may think this strange, but there are others besides Indians who accept bribes—and what can a helpless woman do, except as she is commanded?"

"I will leave you then, at once. The worst of the shower appears to be already over, and I've no right to remain, if it will bring you into danger."

Instead of answering him, she placed her finger on her lips in token of silence.

"Did you hear that?" said she, as a long-drawn, piercing cry cut through the duller sounds made by the wind and rain.

"Yes—what does it mean?"

"That in a minute more the Indians will be here. It is their signal, and I was commanded not to unbar the door to any except them."

"I may yet elude them."

"It is too late. If you go forth, it will only be to meet your death. Even here your life isn't worth a single whiff of a tobacco-pipe, if he—the owner of this place, is with them."

While speaking, she had pulled forward a ladder which leaned against one side of the room, and placed it against an opening overhead.

"You must go up into the loft," said she, "and then pull the ladder up after you. You must then cover the open space with some pieces of board you'll find lying near. All you will have to do then will be to lie as still as death, for these Indians have quick ears."

Without saying a word, Wilton snatched his cloak from the back of a chair, the sight of which might have excited suspicion, and ascended the ladder, which, as she had directed, he drew up after him.

"Even if Dorson comes, you'll be safe enough now, as far as he is concerned; that is," and she turned pale at the thought—"if his dog isn't with him. If it is, we are both lost."

A trampling of feet was at this instant heard near the hut. She unfastened the door and threw it open, then seating herself in a corner of the huge fire-place, constructed of blocks of granite, she took a pipe, lit it and commenced smoking. As she did this, one of the Indians, entering the shrill, whooping cry which had told of their approach, bounded nearly into the centre of the room. The others followed, the whole number, as she had expected, being seven. In the meantime, the woman sat, apparently unmoved, smoking her pipe.

"We cannot frighten the white squaw," said he who had first entered.

Could he have known how wildly her heart thrilled, and in what heavy drops the perspiration stood on her forehead, she would have sunk many degrees in his good opinion.

"Why should I fear?" said she, constraining herself to speak calmly. "The corn is ground, and the venison steaks are ready for the coals."

Even as she spoke, a new fear assailed her. Dorson, though he had not yet entered, might have come with the rest, and, attracted perhaps, by some noise made by the stranger's horse, had gone to the shed to ascertain what it was. As this thought flashed into her mind, it was with difficulty that she assumed an appearance of indifference, as she inquired if Dorson had come.

"The white hunter finds plenty of game," replied one of the Indians, "and woe return to his lodge till another moon."

This answer caused her to breathe more freely, and, laying aside her pipe, she rose and commenced preparing supper for her hungry guests.

Meanwhile, Wilton could easily see what was going on through one of the numerous broad cracks in the loosely laid floor of the loft. With the exception of one of the Indians, whom the others appeared to look upon as their leader, they were not very favorable specimens of their tribe. They, however, undoubtedly would have looked much better, had their dress been confined to the Indian costume, instead of being incongruously intermingled with various garments, and of cast-off British uniforms, among which a discolored scarlet coat showed conspicuously. They still retained their hunting knives and tomahawks, but the gun supplied the place of the more picturesque bow and quiver.

At first, any slight noise he made by changing his position for one more comfortable, was lost in the noise of the descending rain. It was not long, however, before the rain, from beating violently upon the roof, began to descend softly and silently, and soon entirely ceased, so that the least movement was in danger of being overheard.

Once, when his limbs became so cramped, from having long remained in the same posture, as to be almost unendurable, an attempt to assume one that was easier drew upward the glances of seven pair of keen, piercing eyes. The hostess also gave a nervous start, which, fortunately, was unobserved. The Indians listened a few moments to see if the noise would be repeated, though, in accordance with the habitual taciturnity ascribed to them as a people, they forbore to make any remark on the subject to each other. They did not forget it, however, as was shown by a stealthy glance being from time to time directed towards the loft. More than once, it seemed to Wilton that their glittering eyes met his, though reason told him that this could not be the case, as the flickering light emitted from the pine-knot placed in the corner of the broad fire-place and from the coals where the steaks were broiling, was not strong enough to dissipate the darkness of the loft.

At last, the simultaneous movement which followed the announcement of the hostess that the hoe-cakes and venison were ready, enabled Wilton to wind round him an old browe coverlet which he found near, and to press himself closely into the narrow space where the sloping roof met the side of the house. His next care was to draw towards him some unswinging flax, a large quantity of which was piled in the centre of the floor, and so arrange it as carefully, though lightly, cover him. He then, with as much composure as he could assume, awaited in his wretched place of concealment, the time—for he well knew it would come—when search would be made to find the cause of the noise which had excited suspicion.

The meal was despatched, when the faint hope indulged in by the hostess, that the noise heard in the loft would not be recalled, was destroyed by the laconic question:

"Who's up there?"

The Indian who made this inquiry, pointed to the loft as he spoke.

"Those, which a great part of the time are my only company," replied the woman, with an appearance of indifference.

"I asked who?" said he, with angry emphasis.

"The rats."

"The white squaw is jeering me," said he, a ferocious light kindling in his eyes.

"I speak the truth," she answered.

"We will see."

As he spoke, he sprang upon the table and quickly shoved aside one of the loose boards overhead. As many others followed as could find a footing on the table, with cries full of an eager thirst for blood, which caused the cold drops to start from every pore of him, who now bitterly regretted that, instead of leaving the hut when he first became aware of the approach of the hostile Indians, he had consented to follow the woman's advice and availed himself of so precarious a place of concealment. He reproached himself the more severely on account of the inexcusable thoughtlessness which caused him to leave his pistols in the holster, which still remained fastened to the saddle. Had they been ready to his hand, he believed that even yet, there would have been a chance for his life.

Standing on the table, their heads and shoulders reaching above the floor of the loft, the Indians peered round on every side. The hostess knew their silence to be a good omen. She had before entertained a faint hope, and now she felt certain, that her stranger-guest was, at least temporarily concealed from view. As her own life, she believed, as well as his, hung on this chance, the self-control may be appreciated, which enabled her to preserve an appearance of calmness.

"You see that I told you the truth," she ventured to say.

"There's something under this flax," was the reply. "Maybe the rat is caught in a trap."

The next she expected to hear was a savage cry of exultation, and she turned away to conceal the paleness which, she knew by the sudden faintness which came over her, must have overspread her countenance. They had immediately commenced overhauling the large pile of flax in the centre of the floor. As they took it up in large handfuls, they threw it back where Wilton lay, thus more effectually concealing him. When they found that there was nothing beneath it, they looked at each other for a moment, and then, without saying a word, sprang from the table.

"We will rest till midnight," said one of them. "The moon will then be up, which will guide us to the camp of the white chief."

"I will spread skins for you to lie upon," said the hostess, taking some from a pile in one corner of the room.

Having conveniently arranged them, the red-men, meanwhile, looking gravely on, she withdrew to a distant part of the room, where, leaning back in her chair, she was to all appearance fast asleep. What was feigned on her part, was real as regarded her tawny guests; who, lying in various attitudes, in a few minutes had sunk into a profound slumber. When satisfied of this, she softly rose and stole through a back entrance by which she could gain access to the shed, for more than once Wilton's horse, which there had been no opportunity to attend to, had given audible signs of impatience. She returned and resumed her place in the chair, but the agony of fear through which she had passed had driven away all inclination to sleep. That of the Indians continued to be deep and heavy, as one tedious hour after another wore away, without anything to indicate their silent lapse to either of the impatient watchers.

The fire had gone down and was nearly out, though a faint uncertain glimmer would now and then, for a moment, play on the smoke-stained walls. At length a soft, silvery light shone in at the high, unglazed window, and fell full upon the face of one of the sleeping Indians. It roused him, and half rising from his recumbent posture, he rubbed his eyes and looked round. The noise he made, slight as it was, awoke the others.

"The moon is up and will show us the trail," said he, who first awoke. "We will go."

They all started to their feet, and the next moment they were gone. The woman did not move till the noise of their receding footsteps was lost in the distance. She then rose, fastened the door and placed something against the only window which the hut contained, so that a light could not be seen by a person without; she lit a pine knot, which she placed on a ledge of the rudely constructed fire-place, in default of anything which might serve as a candlestick.

Wilton, who, in the meantime, had crept from his confined and uncomfortable quarters, found himself so benumbed, that even if the low roof had permitted, he would at first have been unable to rise to his feet.

"Come," said the hostess, when she had lit the torch, "you must prepare to be away. Day will break in less than two hours, and then, if not before, more of the redskins may be here."

"Why should you expect them?"

"They know that here they can have food. Dorson has so agreed. Be quick, and let down the ladder."

Wilton obeyed, and having descended, remarked that he must go and see to his horse.

"Your horse has been cared for," she replied, "though it will be well for you to look to him yourself."

She had already kindled a fire, and by the time Wilton had returned from the stable, some choice slices of venison which she had purposely reserved, were nearly ready. These, with a wheaten loaf and a cup of excellent souchow pretty liberally dealt from a canister of lacerated ware, produced from some mysterious corner, constituted a meal, which by Wilton was highly relished after an absence of twelve hours, notwithstanding the peril to which he had recently been exposed.

"Do not think me actuated merely by a spirit of curiosity," said he, when, having finished his meal, he rose from the table, "if I venture to express a wish to know the name of one to whom I am indebted beyond what I may never be able to pay."

"My name is Burmann—Christina Burmann, and my parents came from Germany when I was only two or three years old."

"You are not the wife of this Dorson, then, that you have spoken of?"

"No—he is my step-brother, and is a bad man."

"Why not leave him then?"

"How can I? I have no home except the one he gives me."

"This can hardly be called a home."

"That is true—but where else can I go?"

"Some day it may be different."

"There is little hope of that. Do you return this way?"

"Yes."

"And yet I dare not ask you to call."

"Should you wish to know my fate hereafter, if you have an opportunity, inquire for Wilton Richmond."

"I shan't forget."

Thanking her warmly for her kindness, Wilton now took leave, having first placed a piece of gold in a place where he knew she would be sure to find it. In a few minutes more, he was again on the road, with an unclouded moon to light his way, while the air, rendered cool and balmy by the late shower, revived and exhilarated his spirits.

CHAPTER III.

A STAGE-COACH ACQUAINTANCE.

WHEN Bessie Hamlen's father found that hostilities had actually commenced between the United States and Great Britain, his wife, by his request, wrote for her to return home. His views with regard to the expediency of the war being entirely different from those of his brother-in-law, Mr. Grosvenor, he was not willing that his daughter should prolong her visit. He probably would not have consented to her going, had he been at home, but an annual visit, ever since they were children, had been interchanged between her and her cousin Edith, and as the usual time for her going had arrived, Mrs. Hamlen had permitted her to make the visit, as she knew of no reason for non-compliance with a long established custom.

Some ventured to whisper among themselves, that a constitutional love of ease, rather than, according to his own assertion, a love of country, gave a bias to his political principles. This might or might not, have been true. At any rate, those best acquainted with his disposition and habits, would not have imagined that his patriotism was of so ardent and active a nature as to make him wish for an opportunity to be "set in the forefront of the battle," the place assigned to Uriah, the Hittite.

Mr. Hamlen's home was on the northern shore of Chesapeake Bay. It was a fine old mansion, and situated in the midst of extensive and highly cultivated grounds, which bore ample testimony to the opulence of the owner.

Bessie was expecting to stay, at least, four or five weeks longer with her cousin, when she received her mother's letter. It informed her that Mr. Marshton, an elderly gentleman, with whom Bessie was well acquainted, was on a visit to his daughter, residing only a few miles from her Uncle Grosvenor, and that an arrangement had been made for her to return in company with him.

"Is your letter from home?" inquired Edith, when Bessie had finished reading it.

"Yes, it is from my mother, and she says that father wishes me to return home."

"Why, you haven't staid half as long as usual! Has anything happened?"

"Mother doesn't say that there has."

"How soon must you go?"

"I am to start next Monday morning. Mr. Marshton, a near neighbor of ours, who is on a visit to Mrs. Olney, his daughter, is going then, and he will take charge of me."

"Wilton thought he might get a chance to ride over, and spend an hour with us, next Monday evening."

"I know it. But I shan't see him now. I may never see him again."

Edith felt that what Bessie said was only too true, though her answer was cheerful and full of hope.

It was one of the brightest and balmy of summer mornings that Bessie waved her final farewell from the coach window, to her uncle and cousin. For some time, the pain of parting with Edith, who was more like a sister to her than a cousin, added to which, as must be confessed, was many a sharp regret at the necessity that compelled her to return home without once more seeing Wilton Richmond, prevented her from taking any notice of her fellow-passenger. She only knew that besides Mr. Marshton and herself, there were but two, a middle-aged gentleman and a lad of fourteen, who was his son.

Bessie had the whole of the back seat to herself, the gentleman and his son occupying the middle one, and the forward one having been taken possession of by Mr. Marshton. It was not long, however, before there was a fifth passenger to share it with him.

He was a tall, slightly built man, about forty-five years of age, or a little older. His countenance was singular, and, in some respects, strongly marked. His brows were heavy and projecting, denoting a pretty strong development of the perceptive faculties, a trait of countenance rendered more observable by the low, receding forehead. His hair, black as jet, was of that lank, oily kind which claves together in flakes, and is often found in connection with a corresponding facial unctuousness; a combination which, in accordance with some hypothesis more easily realized than explained, is thought to impart to their owner that peculiar look of meekness, which is often taken for cunning and hypocrisy.

For the first half hour all the passengers remained silent, when the man just described, abruptly addressed Mr. Marshton.

"Did you ever happen to hear of a gentleman by the name of Hamlen?" said he.

"I have," was Mr. Marshton's answer. "The house of a gentleman by the name of Geoffrey Hamlen, is within a short distance of mine."

"Ah—indeed—that is fortunate, as it gives me the promise of your company during the whole of my journey. The Hon. Geoffrey Hamlen is an old friend of mine."

Bessie, at the mention of the name of Hamlen, raised her eyes for the first time after entering the coach, and looked towards the speaker. They quickly fell, however, for they encountered his, which were fixed on her face with a look of unequivocal admiration. Judging by a few of his next questions, he did not suspect that she was a daughter of the Mr. Hamlen he was on his way to see.

"I have been told," said he, "that Mr. Hamlen is immensely rich—that he owns land enough for a principality in Germany. Have I been rightly informed?"

"He is, without doubt, very well off," was Mr. Marshton's answer.

"Has he any children to inherit his wealth?"

"He has only one child."

"Ah, yes, I have heard that he has a daughter."

In order to put a stop to being further questioned respecting what, in consideration of Bessie's presence, was rather an awkward subject, Mr. Marshton was about to make known to the inquisitive stranger, that the young lady present was Mr. Hamlen's daughter. Bessie, however, who divined his purpose, gave him a significant look to prevent its execution, for she was curious to know in what manner the catechism would proceed.

"Is the daughter single?" was the next question.

"She is."

"But is spoken for before this time, I dare say."

"Likely enough."

"An answer which I suppose means that she is. Who may the fortunate man be?"

"Really, sir, I cannot take it upon me to say. Though Miss Hamlen and I are very good friends, I don't pretend to be her confidant."

"It's my belief that the name of the young man, or boy, I might rather say, is Wilton Richmond," said the stranger, casting an oblique glance towards Mr. Marshston.

"I don't often attempt to shake any one's belief," Mr. Marshston replied, "as it commonly proves to be labor spent in vain."

And turning his face to the window, he appeared to be intent on viewing the scenery. Bessie followed his example, partly for the sake of avoiding being stared at by the disagreeable stranger, whose name, she subsequently ascertained, was Ishmael Withers.

Bessie did not arrive at her father's house till Wednesday evening. During the whole of the intermediate time, as far as Mr. Withers was concerned, she had preserved her incognito. Mr. Marshston having, by her request, avoided having called her by name. As she expected, Mr. Withers called in the morning, but she took care to be out of sight. Although in the course of a few days, he was on such intimate terms with her father that he called without ceremony at any time he chose, she continued to avoid meeting him. It was not long before her father spoke to her on the subject.

"Mr. Withers," said he, "has promised to take tea with us this afternoon, and I shall expect you to be present. I was not aware that you had always been absent from the room when he called, till this morning he expressed a wish to be introduced to my daughter."

"I've seen him, if I haven't been introduced to him, and I don't like him."

"You shouldn't say that of any person I call my friend."

"O father, do you call Mr. Withers your friend?"

"Certainly I do. Why shouldn't I? He is a man of influence, as I have heard, and belongs to a good family."

"I'm afraid that he doesn't resemble the family he belongs to then."

"You will please make no more remarks of that nature. And there is another thing that I may as well warn you against, now that I have a good opportunity."

"What is it, father?" said Bessie, finding that her father hesitated a little. "What do you wish to warn me against?"

"Against your any longer corresponding with Wilton Richmond. It is my desire, that from this time the correspondence be entirely broken off."

"I thought that you liked Wilton, and that you were willing we should write to each other."

"If I was willing once, I'm no longer so."

"I may at least write him a few words of explanation."

"Not a single syllable. I didn't suppose that he would be among the first to take up arms in an unjust war."

"He doesn't consider it unjust—neither does Uncle Grosvenor."

"Your Uncle Grosvenor's opinion needn't be cited. We all know how headstrong he is."

Bessie attempted to reply, but he silenced her with an angry gesture.

"We won't enlarge upon the subject now," said he. "You will bear in mind, that you are to assist your mother and me to entertain Mr. Withers, and that you are to do it cheerfully too,—or, at least, with an appearance of cheerfulness."

Mr. Hamlen had been called an easy, good-natured man, and Bessie was not only deeply grieved, but almost frightened at his angry manner even more marked, than his words. The truth was, he was apathetic, rather than good-tempered, and when roused, his illy disciplined passions were not readily controlled. Bessie sought her mother, and told her what had passed between her father and herself.

"It is what I've been expecting," said Mrs. Hamlen. "You won't make any attempt to elude your father's commands."

"O no, but it is so hard not to be allowed to explain to Wilton why our correspondence is to be broken off."

"Write to Edith, and she can tell him."

"Yes, but then I should so much prefer doing it myself."

"Bide your time," my daughter. Be careful to do right, and all, so we may hope, will come out right in the end."

Mr. Withers did not fail to make his appearance at an early hour in the afternoon. Mr. Hamlen met him at the door, and conducted him to the presence of his wife and daughter. He entered the room in a kind of stealthy, gliding manner, and there was that in his whole appearance, which excited still more in the heart of Bessie that feeling of repugnance produced by the first sight of him, so that it now nearly amounted to loathing.

He started a little, as he recognized in Bessie the young lady he had met in the stage-coach, and for a moment—for the questions he had asked Mr. Marshston flashed upon his mind—he was a little embarrassed; but instantly recovering himself, for notwithstanding the meekness of his looks he was not a man to be easily abashed, he met her the same as he would have seen her before.

Bessie and even Mrs. Hamlen were at a loss to account for the uncommon attention, and even deference, with which Mr. Hamlen treated him. It seemed impossible not to imagine that he was not actuated by some covert reason.

Bessie sat by a window, busy with some needle-work, and Mr. Withers soon drew his chair near hers. She involuntarily shrunk back, as preparatory to speaking, he bent towards her, and assumed a confidential air.

"You may depend on my discretion, Miss Hamlen," said he, looking at her from the corners of his eyes, the same as she had seen him look at Mr. Marshston, when in the stage-coach.

"Sir?" said she interrogatively, for a moment raising her eyes to his, with a look of unfeigned astonishment.

"You don't take my meaning."

"I certainly don't."

"Wilton Richmond [his voice dropped still lower as he pronounced the name] was mentioned the first day I had the felicity to travel in company with you."

"Yes, I believe you mentioned him."

"And from a certain remark I made, you must be aware, that I knew this Richmond was a sweetheart of yours; a circumstance which I suppose you wouldn't wish to have come to your father's ears, seeing he is so hard against the young man on account of his political principles, and so I came to the very natural conclusion that as your father and I are hand and glove as it were, you might suffer some uneasiness, lest I should turn informer against you—betray you, as one might say. But you needn't be afraid, Miss Bessie, the secret shall rest between ourselves."

This was said in a soft, wheedling way, which to Bessie, as well as the proposition of sharing a secret with him of any kind, whatever, was inexpressibly disgusting. He probably mistook the expression of her countenance, for he immediately added:

"You needn't be afraid—I am making no attempt to deceive you—I mean precisely as I say. As I've already said, you may depend on my discretion."

"I certainly shall not dispute your assertion," she replied, "but as there are no concealments of any kind between either of my parents and myself, there will be no occasion for the exercise of your forbearance."

"I'm truly glad to hear it. What you say about not having any concealments between yourself and parents, has raised you a hundred per cent., as it were, in my good opinion. I might have known, that an angel like you must be incapable of entertaining even a wrong thought. And so, after all, perhaps this Wilton Richmond and you are not on the good terms I supposed you to be."

"You will pardon me, Mr. Withers, if I venture to remark, that though there may be no concealments between my parents and myself, as respects Wilton Richmond, or any other person, I know no reason why I should bestow my confidence on a stranger."

She rose as she spoke, and took a seat by her mother, as the best means of putting an end to a conversation, equally impertinent and disagreeable.

CHAPTER IV.

THE COTTAGE OF DAME ANSTIS.

SOMETHING like a week afterward, Bessie, as she often did, went to carry some cakes and other delicacies, such as are not attainable by the poor, to a woman who lived in a little house nestled down in a hollow of some wild and craggy hills, at the southwest extremity of her father's domain. She found Dame Anstis, as she was called, sitting just outside the door, at her wheel, spinning linen. The sun was getting low, but through a break among the hills, a broad belt of sunshine fell across the little moss-grown cottage, and her whose home was beneath its roof. All around was in deep shadow, making the sunshine look brighter, and the bit of blue sky overhead seem softer and more delicious. Bessie stopped a minute at the entrance of the glen and listened, for Dame Anstis was singing an old New England ballad, commemorative of Lovell's fight, in low, chanting notes, to which the humming of her spinning wheel formed no inappropriate accompaniment. She was singing the subjoined stanza, the words of which Bessie could plainly distinguish:

"When gone, my Mary, think of me,
And pray to God that I may be
Such as one ought, who lives for thee,
And come at last, in victory."

When she had finished the stanza, Bessie, finding that she did not see her, stepped forward.

"I was thinking of 'Bright Bessie,'" said Anstis, without ceasing to turn her wheel.

"Were you? Well, I've come on purpose to bring you some of those cakes and tarts you are so fond of."

"Thank you. But how is this?" said Anstis, peering into her face. "You are not the 'Bright Bessie' you were the last time you were here. You smile the same as you did then, but there is a mournful light away down in the depths of your eyes. I know what has done it."

"What has done it, good mother?"

"Let me see your hand, and I will tell you."

It was not without a slight thrill of fear that Bessie held out her hand for her inspection. Anstis took hold of it, and for a few moments followed with her eye the delicate tracery of the lines, which, with many a graceful curve, crossed the soft, rosy palm.

"The lines lose themselves in such a way," said she, "I can make nothing of them. But, last night, I looked at the stars. They were as golden letters to me, on the dark blue sky. I read them."

"And what did they tell you?"

"That the shadow of an evil and a dark-minded man has fallen across the path of 'Bright Bessie.'"

"What more did they tell you?"

"That the same shadow would darken the path of him of the heart and open hand, who is gone to fight the battles of his country."

Bessie felt a chill creep over her as the hateful form of Ishmael Withers rose in imagination before her.

"Even now," resumed Anstis, "he is weaving villainous plot in the dark chambers of his brain, which, if successful, will cost the young, noble-minded and generous man his life, and make yours miserable."

"May they not be hindered?"

"They might, if the boy Hammett were here, for I can weave as cunning plots as Ishmael Withers. Hammett has a true heart cool head and swift foot, and can execute them."

"Your nephew is absent now?"

"Yes—this is the twelfth day since he left me."

"When will he return?"

"He should have been here the tenth. If, with the close of another day he comes not back, I shall know that some misfortune has befallen him."

"And must I remain passive? May I not do something to avert the danger which you say is impending over Wilton Richmond?"

"Not yet. Your path is dark. Wait till the light breaks in upon it. In the meantime, keep your heart pure and your tongue from uttering evil."

As she finished speaking, the sun's broad disk sunk below the horizon.

"You must go now, Bessie," said she. "If Hammett were here to guide you across that dreary moor, you might stay till the stars shine. Now, if you wait till dark, you may miss the firm path, and then, though your steps are light and free as the fawn's, they might sink in the black, soft mud of the fen."

"I shall be across the moor long before dark," said Bessie, taking the basket which Anstis handed her, after removing the contents.

"If you should meet Ishmael Withers, let him see that you don't fear him. He carries a coward's heart in his bosom, and will quail before the light of a calm and fearless eye, even if its light shine upon him from beneath the smooth, white brow of my 'Bright Bessie.'"

"I don't think I shall meet him," said Bessie. "No one but mother knew that I was coming here."

"In two days come again."

"I will if I can. Good-by, Dame Anstis."

"Good-by, Bessie, and don't let thoughts of that evil-minded man trouble you, but be cautious and circumspect."

"What you say gives me courage," said Bessie.

And tripping lightly along, she turned at the entrance of the glen, and once more bid Anstis good-by. She soon came to the moor, but the sinuous path which crossed it was firm, though so narrow that she needed all the light afforded by the fading twilight to avoid stepping aside. The rest of the way was through broad, open fields and flowery lanes, except a narrow belt of woodland. She had crossed it half way when she heard some one coming towards her. She was prevented from seeing who it was by the gloom of the woods, but fearing that it might be Ishmael Withers, she turned to go back. The next moment the person addressed her.

"Don't be afraid, Miss Bessie, it is I," said a clear, pleasant voice.

She was not afraid, for she knew very well that the voice was Hammett's, the nephew of Anstis.

"It's getting dark now. Let me go with you till you arrive in sight of home," said the boy.

Bessie gladly accepted his offer, and she felt still more grateful to him, when, on emerging from the woods, she saw Ishmael Withers dart quickly behind a clump of trees.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

DEATH OF CAPTAIN DEATH.

Perhaps history cannot afford a more remarkable instance of desperate courage than that shown by the officers and crew of an English privateer, called the Terrible, under the command of Captain Death, of twenty-six guns and two hundred men. On the 23d of December, 1757, he engaged and made prize of a large French ship, from St. Maloes, after an obstinate battle, in which he had his brother and sixteen seamen killed. He then secured his prize with forty men, and directed his course for England; but in a few days he had the misfortune to fall in with the Vengeance, of thirty-six guns, a privateer, off St. Domingo. Their first step was to attack the prize, which was easily re-taken; the two ships then bore down upon the Terrible, whose mainmast was cut away by the first broadside. Notwithstanding this disaster, the Terrible maintained such a furious engagement against both, as can hardly be paralleled in the annals of the British navy. The French commander and his second lieutenant were killed, with two-thirds of his company; but the gallant Captain Death, with the greater part of his officers and almost his whole crew having met with the same fate, his ship was boarded by the enemy, who found no more than twenty-six persons alive, sixteen of whom were mutilated by the loss of a leg or an arm, and the other ten grievously wounded! The ship itself lay like a wreck upon the water, and the whole exhibited a scene of horror and desolation. The victor itself was so shattered that it was scarcely able to tow the Terrible into St. Maloes, where she was beheld with astonishment and terror. This adventure was no sooner known in England, than a liberal subscription was raised for the support of Death's widow, and that part of the crew which survived the engagement. There was a strange combination of names belonging to this privateer—the Terrible was equipped at Execution Dock, commanded by Captain Death; his lieutenant was named Devil, and the surgeon's name was Ghost.—Chronicles of the Sea.

I have observed that most ladies who have had what is considered as an education, have no idea of an education progressive through life. Having attained a certain measure of accomplishment, knowledge, manners, etc., they consider themselves as made up, and so take their station: they are pictures which, being quite finished, are now put in a frame—a gilded one, if possible—and hung up in permanence of beauty!—permanence, that is to say, till old Time, with his rude and dirty fingers, soil the charming colors.—Foster.

INTERIOR OF CHURCH OF ST. CATHERINE.

INTERIOR OF THE CHURCH OF ST. CATHERINE.

The engraving on this page represents the interior of the church belonging to the Greek convent on Mount Sinai, one of the most celebrated spots in the Holy Land, being that where the law was communicated to Moses by the Almighty. The convent is enclosed on all sides by lofty walls; and being in the midst of a population inimical to the Christian faith, it was built on the brow of a precipice, the only means of access and egress being by a basket raised and lowered by ropes and pulleys. It is one of the most interesting places which the traveller can visit. The massive and simple style of the interior architecture is peculiar. The effect of those ponderous pillars and heavy arches is very solemn, as seen by the "dim religious light" which fills the interior, lighting up the prominent points of the architecture, and casting heavy shadows from the columns and projections. The peculiar situation of the church gives it additional interest.

WILLIAM SMITH O'BRIEN,
THE IRISH PATRIOT.

The accompanying head is an excellent and authentic likeness of William Smith O'Brien, who is now, after his tedious exile, returned to his native land, and the home of his fathers. He is the second son of Edward O'Brien, baronet, of county Clare, Ireland, who sat for several years in the Irish parliament. Born in 1806, he was educated at Harrow School and Cambridge University, and in 1827 was elected a member of parliament for the borough of Ennis. Though sometimes acting with the whigs, he did not consider himself a party man. He spoke occasionally with effort, and as he exhibited an aptitude for business, was placed on several important committees. In 1837, he voted against a measure introduced by the whig ministry; and his vote having placed the government in the minority, the ministers were forced to resign. Mr. O'Connell denounced him on that occasion, but he was sustained by his constituency, and returned to parliament from Limerick. In 1843, he opposed the passage of the Arms act for Ireland, and received the thanks of the Repeal Association for his vote. He became an active member of that association, but withdrew with others on the passage of Mr. John O'Connell's peace resolutions, joining in the new party organization that resulted therefrom. After the French revolution of 1848, he was very bold in the expression of his views, both in parliament and in Ireland, and was brought to trial with Mr. Meagher for sedition. The government failed to convict him, and he was liberated. He was afterwards arrested, tried for treason, and sentenced to death; but his punishment was commuted to transportation to Van Diemen's land. During the Eastern war he received permission to visit Europe, and latterly to return to Great Britain, of which it appears he has availed himself. He is a man of great ability, great resolution, and a sincere lover of his native land.

VIEW OF THE CITY OF MONTREAL.

We present on this page an accurate and pleasing general view of the city of Montreal, the principal city and second commercial port of British America, and connected by railroad with Plattsburg, Portland, Boston and New York. The facility of intercommunication has rendered its near neighbors to the good citizens of Montreal. The city is built on the south side of the island of Montreal, at the confluence of the Ottawa with the St. Lawrence, 420 miles north of New York, and and the houses, generally in the French style, dark and gloomy. The city is well supplied with water, and the streets lighted with gas. The principal public buildings, most of which are on the Rue Notre Dame, are the Town Hall, the Seminary of St. Sulpice, the Hotel Dieu, a large hospital for the reception of the sick poor, the convent of Notre Dame designed for female instruction, the General Hospital, two convents, English and Scotch churches, the court house, new jail, government house, Nelson's monument, the barracks, the new Roman Catholic cathedral (which is capable of containing from 10,000 to 12,000 persons, 255 1/2 feet in length, by 134 1/2 feet wide, and with six towers, three of which in front are 220 feet high), and the Market House, a magnificent pile with a lofty dome, fronting the wharf. There are also a library and

VIEW OF THE CITY OF MONTREAL, CANADA.

600 miles from the sea. Latitude, 45 deg. 30 min. north; longitude, 73 deg. 55 min. west. The city occupies a narrow tract about two miles wide between Royal Mount, which is a beautiful eminence, and the river. It was founded in 1640, under the name of Ville-Marie, on the site of the Indian village of Hochelaga. In 1760, shortly after the surrender of Quebec, it was taken by the English. In 1849, the seat of government was removed to Quebec, a mob having burned the parliament house and the adjoining library. In 1852, a large part of the city was laid waste by a destructive fire. The upper and lower parts of the town offer a strong contrast. In the former the streets are broad and well lighted, and the houses handsome and commodious. The material chiefly used in building is a grayish stone; the roofs are covered with sheets of tin, and these glittering in the sun, and taken in connection with the numerous spires and towers, give the place a very attractive aspect when viewed from a distance. The main street, running on the centre of the ridge on which the city stands, is called Notre Dame Street. St. James Street, further west, is broader and more elegant. In the lower part of the town the streets are narrow and ill-paved, reading-room, a society of natural history, a mechanics' institute, the Canadian institute, Merchants' Exchange, mercantile library, and an agricultural association. The largest banking-houses in British North America have their head offices here, which are mostly situated on the Place d'Armes. The tubular iron bridge across the St. Lawrence will cost about $2,000,000. The harbor is fine, and the quays are said by some to be the finest in America. They extend for several miles, presenting a vast extent of beautiful masonry-work. The city is divided from the river by a terrace of gray limestone. The commerce of Montreal is very extensive, and it is the centre of the operations of the Hudson's Bay Company. Many manufactures are carried on within the limits of the city. The climate is very hot in summer, and very cold in winter. The educational advantages of the city are great. There are a French college, a university with five professors, open to persons of all religious denominations, a Roman Catholic theological school, a high school, and several classical and scientific academies. The population, in 1851, was 57,715, composed mainly of French Canadians, English, Scotch, Irish and Americans. The French language is much spoken.

THE WORLD'S PROGRESS IN SCIENCE.

A writer in the North British Review, speaking of the wonderful advances science has made in the past quarter of a century, thus comments: "It is curious and deeply instructing to observe how much of the advance which mankind has made in some of the most essential branches of material improvement has been effected within the last quarter of a century; and on the other hand, in how many departments human intelligence reached its culminating point ages ago. It is not likely that the world will ever see a more perfect poet than Homer, a grander statesman than Pericles, a sublimer or more comprehensive philosopher than Plato, a sculptor equal to Phidias, a painter superior to Raphael. In the fine arts, and in speculative thought, our remotest ancestors are still our masters. In science and its applications, the order of precedence is reversed, and our own age has been more prolific and amazing than the aggregate of all the ages which have gone before us. Take two points only, the most obvious and the most signal—locomotion and the transmission of intelligence. At the earliest period of authentic history, men travelled as fast as in the year 1830. Nimrod got over the ground at the rate of ten or twelve miles an hour. Napoleon could go no faster. Between 1830 and 1840, we raised the maximum of speed from ten miles to seventy. The first six thousand years did nothing, or next to nothing—the next six years did everything, reached the limits of possible achievement in this direction; for no one imagines that any greater speed is attainable or would be bearable. Again: it is probable that Abraham sent messages to Lot just as rapidly as Frederick the Great, or George III. transmitted orders to their generals or admirals. In 1794, the old wooden telegraph was invented, and made a certain though a partial and a slight advance. But, with this exception, the rate at which intelligence could be conveyed had remained stationary at that of ordinary locomotion on horseback up to 1840. In 1840, we communicated at the velocity of twelve miles an hour. In 1850, we communicated over immeasurable distances in inappreciable infinitesimal subdivisions of time. The experiment was made, and a message was transmitted from Belgrade to Liverpool instantaneously. Here, too, at a single leap, we have reached the 'plus ultra' of earthly possibility. In ten years—nay, in five—we have reached the vast space between the speed of a horse and the speed of lightning."—New York Journal of Commerce.

SMITH O'BRIEN, THE IRISH PATRIOT.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

APOLOGY TO MY BROTHER,

On my apathetic reception of his Commission in the Navy.

BY BLANCHE D'ARTOISE.

Forgive thou my gross selfishness! my heart was fraught with grief;
But my neglect has burned until it laves thus in relief.
I mused upon my own tame lot, nor thought of glorious thine;
I pray thee, brother, now forgive that strange neglect of mine.

Hand now the parchment; let my eye its finest traces scan:
Hast this 'warded unto thee? my brother now a man?
Methinks but yesterday we twined damp algae in our hair,
Toeing our tresses on the wind, we sported, childlike, there:

There, by the seashore; where the waves dash up with hollow moan,
Forever singing to the heart in strange sepulchral tone:
There, where great ships flit to and fro, like spirits voyaging on Time's sea unto eternity—a moment here—and gone!

Methinks we stroll upon the sand; the wavelets kiss our feet;
The sea breeze fans our throbbing brows with saline odor sweet;
Beside us wreaths of stolen pearls—the nerails shells, forgot;
He while old sea rolls thundering on, making the old rocks rot.

And thou hast won this! ay, by toil: toil of that brain of thine!
And oft hast dreamed of this proud day, and of a smile of mine;
When lo, it lies neglected by! like shells upon the sand—
That parchment, which enrolls thee, boy, among a patriot band!

Go! don thy "navy blue;" my boy; gird on that sword of thine;
And poise thy chapeau gallantly, to please me, brother mine.
Now dost thou deem no thrill awakes thy sister's bosom core?
Lend me thy chapeau and thy sword, comrade! Salut au la gloire!

There is no curse upon this earth; no, not one under heaven
Worse than affection's apathy—or living unforgiveness:
I'd rather be the thing I am—devoured with fierce emotion—
Than calm and coolly reign the queen of earth, and air, and ocean!

But there is that upon my tongue, within my heart, to-day,
That never have I said or sung; but now, 'tis time to say:
Life is a lesson hard to learn—harder for some than other—
But long as ocean thunders on, I'll love thee, O my brother!

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

THE FOOTFALL ON THE STAIRS.

AN OLD-TIME HISTORY.

BY RICHARD CRANSHAW.

ONLY in the hour of grief and sorrow—only when desolation and death had fallen upon the house, and when another soul was about to quit its hold on life,—then it was, and then alone, that the footfall was heard upon the stairs. Generation after generation had passed away, and for the space of nigh two hundred years so said the records handed down—it had existed, throughout the huge old hall, echoing and re-echoing a solemn, slow and ghostly footfall in the ancient mansion of the Grandons.

Always the forerunner of a death to one of the name. When the wind howled around the house, and the rain dashed wildly against the windows, like some invisible, troubled spirit seeking for an entrance; while the thunder rolled above and died away in low mutterings afar off, and while the wailing of bending trees swinging to and fro in the strong grasp of the spirit of the storm could be heard without, then, if death hovered over the ancient mansion of the Grandons, it echoed through the huge old hall.

When sunshine and brightness smiled in the summer sky, and the sweet voices of wood songsters making music beneath the tabernacle of heaven, filled pleasantly the air; when nature was decked out in her robes of verdure, and aught save joy and cheerfulness seemed strangely out of place, then, too, if death hovered over that house, it echoed through the huge old hall.

In the stillness of night, in the broad glare of day, whether death approached beneath the shadow of the home-wales, or far off in a foreign land—no matter; when the destroyer's hand rested on the brow of one of that family, so surely resounded that footfall, slow, solemn and ghostly, echoing and re-echoing throughout the huge old hall within the ancient mansion of the Grandons.

And its history was said to have been this: Long, long years ago, Geoffrey Grandon was holder of the name and possessions of the family. A stern, swarthy man, upon whose brow evil passions had left their deep impress, and in whose glittering black eye might be read a cruel and malignant disposition. Mabel his wife was one of those gentle beings whom fate at times sees fit to tie for life to some such extreme opposite as was her husband, Geoffrey Grandon. She had sweet blue eyes and golden-braided hair, and her voice was like unto music wafted over the waters on the breath of the evening wind.

The marriage of these two had been like many of old, and even some of the present,—an ambitious father's will overruling the feelings and happiness of his child. Possession soon tired Geoffrey Grandon of his sweet young wife, and he scrupled not to display towards her his indifference—nay, even his aversion of her patient and enduring nature. And as day after day passed by and years rolled on, she became that most sorrowful of beings—a scorned, a martyred wife!

The time drew near when she was to become a mother, and she looked hopefully forward to the birth of her child, in the fond thought of its being the means of her gaining from her husband a tythe of at least his respect; his love, she knew now, she never had possessed. So she would sit in her own chamber looking out upon the sea, and watch the golden sun as he dipped his red beams into the waves, slowly disappearing beneath them, and would lose herself in glad visions of this pledge given to her to calm her tortured heart, and dreaming on and on, would rouse at length with a start to find that she had lingered unconsciously until gloom and darkness had gathered over the earth, seeming to mock the air-formed visions of brightness in which she had thus indulged.

And so he came at length—the lovely infant boy, with his mother's blue eyes and her own soft golden hair, and as she held him up before the gaze of her stern husband, she watched eagerly his face as he took him from her. It was plain to see that he was pleased after his own rough fashion, and that he looked with something of pride upon the helpless little creature that he held with such unwonted gentleness within his arms. But, alas! there was no change in his manner towards herself; the little comer was no bond to draw his one iota to herself. She gazed long and fixedly upon him as he stood playing with the child; and as she read her doom of a lifetime of further wrong and indignity, she sunk helplessly back upon the pillow with a sigh of utter woe.

She saw it still more when, some time after, he brought into the house a woman who seemed to rule all things by the power of her will, and before whose, not even her husband deigned to bow. It was a long time before she even dreamed in her guiltlessness of the deep wrong transpiring beneath her very eyes. But it was all laid open before her at last.

This woman—how she shuddered to meet her gaze fixed upon her when she chanced to meet her, for she seldom left her own apartments since the birth of her boy, scarce leaving him from her sight for even a moment, and heeding nothing that was else transpiring around her. But the wrong so openly displayed could not be hid forever from her, and the half-dropped hints of a favorite domestic at length aroused her from her sleep. As she listened to the woman's words, the light dawned faintly at first, and then burst suddenly upon her like a flash, and she knew herself not only as the scorned wife, but as the deceived and dishonored mother of his child.

And she refused indignantly—for the first time throwing aside her blind obedience—to appear again at the board where sat this woman, who, by her husband's sanction, so disgraced the roof beneath which she alone was entitled to sit as mistress. Entreaties and commands were alike unheeded in persuading or compelling her to countenance this last and greatest indignity, and so she was at length suffered to rest in peace. On the last occasion of her husband's attempting to gain her to his point, he had been brute and coward enough to use even violence; but fluting it would be as easy to move a rock from its solid bed within the earth as coerce her in this matter, he had left her with a red spot on his swarthy brow, and a heavy black frown settled on his countenance, dashing the door fiercely with a terrible imprecation.

"Now Heaven support me in my hour of need," murmured the unhappy lady, as she listened to his heavy footstep echoing along the hall until it was lost in the distance. Heaven support thee, indeed, poor lady, for this is but the beginning.

Another chamber in the mansion.

"I tell thee, Geoffrey Grandon,"—it was this woman whom he had brought into the house that spoke,—"I tell thee that the veriest school boy hath more courage than thou showest in this matter."

He sat in the shadow of the room, with his cheek resting upon his hand, and his heavy eyebrows were knit together as though he pondered deeply on some weighty thought that occupied his mind. She had risen as she spoke, and approached him, laying her hand upon his shoulder.

"Thou wert not always wont to be so fearful in removing from thy path an object which offended thee. Why, then, dost hesitate now?"

"Must blood again stain the walls of the house of Grandon?" murmured he to himself, musingly. "I had thought there was enough shed within them now."

"Then what matter for a few drops more or less? If that there be a perdition for past crimes, this cannot sink thee deeper in its gulf, Geoffrey Grandon!" And as she spoke, she laughed with a low mocking laugh that sounded drearily and echoing throughout the darkened chamber, as though a troop of demons had caught it up and repeated it merrily among themselves.

"This deed," said he, after a moment's silence, "is to me a more fearful one than has ever before reddened these hands. It would seem as though some dread calamity would befall our house should it go on. I know not what mean these fancies, but they do weigh most heavily upon me."

"Then shake them off, and be thyself. What!—art then turning easter thus late in life, Geoffrey Grandon? Now, out upon thee! I grow a-weary of this silly feeling. Since thou art no longer a man as once thou wert, mine shall be the hand to accomplish the task."

A pitying angel, hovering over that guilty pair, approached and whispered in his ear a word—it was of his boy. The spark of mercy laying deep within that man's stern bosom was fanned into a gentle life, and he murmured forth:

"She is the mother of my child!"

"And if she is," hissed the temptress in his ear, "he shall not need her care, for I will be to him all that she should, and more. Enough! Choose, Geoffrey Grandon, and quickly, between her and me. See, my hand is on the door; once past its threshold, and I return no more. Speak, thy choice!"

Tearfully the angel pleaded, "She never harmed thee in word or deed, but was all that a loving wife should ever be to thee!"

Yet the words rung in his ear, "Thy choice!"

"She hath lived a pure and gentle life, and all who know her bless her name."

"Thy choice!"

"By withholding now thy cruel hand, there will be hope for thee in the dread hereafter."

"Thy choice—thy choice!"

He sprang to his feet, and between his clenched teeth cried out: "It is made! Do with me as thou wilt, devil that thou art. I am thine!"

And he felt a presence pass swiftly by him, and could have sworn the sound of a whispered voice echoed through the room: "A curse, then, rests upon thee and upon thy house forever!"

And the tapestry upon the walls swayed mournfully to and fro, as though in wailing for this anathema that had descended on the house. The night-owl shrieked without, and the sullen roar of the sea afar off seemed to repeat it, while the winds bore it to his ears again: "A curse, then, rests upon thee and upon thy house forever!"

In one of the vast chambers in the proud mansion of the Grandons, and extended in all the sublimity of death, lays the gentle woman who had borne the empty title of its mistress. None knew assuredly the cause of her death; but the servants exchanged frightened glances one with another, as though each bore a fearful suspicion in his or her mind, but yet dared not give it tongue. For while she had lain upon her dying couch, and while they sorrowfully watched her fainting breath and the dews of dissolution gathering upon her fair brow, they had all been startled by hearing at intervals a slow and solemn footfall on the stairs, echoing dimly through the hall without. And as they went to discover who this intruder might be thus pacing to and fro in the dead stillness of the night, they gazed in one another's faces in blank dismay at finding no soul visible.

And yet the door once more closed, and silence reigning through the apartment, again was it heard—that solemn, slow and ghostly footfall. And until the family vault received the form of the unhappy lady, it was constantly heard pacing to and fro. Then once more all was quiet, and the guilty couple who had listened to it in undefined terror, breathed again with a feeling of deep relief.

They were married—the dark-eyed woman and he whom she had incited to crime, and there was royal feasting and drinking in and about the mansion. But though shouts and cheers greeted the pair as they appeared together, it was but the mocking semblance of joy that met their ears. No soul, as they passed by, murmured forth the cheering "God bless them!" None heheld in Geoffrey Grandon a benefactor, or saw in her face the kindly heart that had beat within the cold breast laying so still beneath the burial vault of the Grandons. So the rude crowd feasted upon the good cheer spread out before them, but gave no thought of thankfulness for the hand that had bestowed the bounty.

And now it was late into the night, and the revels were hushed; the few invited guests departed for their habitations. In the chamber they stood together alone—the guilty pair now made legally one by the ties of holy mother church. Her point was gained, and she was satisfied.

He sat and leaned his head upon his hand; and as his wife approached and laid her hand upon his shoulder, his thoughts reverted to that night when they had thus sat in the stillness and gloom, and conceived their plans together concerning her who was now laid at rest. And as he felt her touch, he shuddered visibly, and fancied that once more he heard that whisper breathed within the room, "A curse, then, rests upon thee and upon thy house forever!"

Hark! Why do they thus start, and in the gloom strain their eyes to gaze in one another's blanched faces, while the blood is leaving their pulses, and their hearts beat with painful distinctness? He grasps her hand, and feels it ice-cold as his own, and half rises from his seat to listen.

Without the chamber, echoing through the huge old hall, and sounding ghostly and fearful in the silence reigning throughout the mansion, they hear it plainly—a solemn footfall on the stairs.

They had listened to it when watching by the death couch of their victim, and the sound had struck terror to their hearts as they heard it slowly pacing to and fro. What could it now portend? He arose, mastering with a powerful effort his emotion, and sprang to the door, throwing it open.

The lights still burned in the great hall, so that its remotest recess was visible; but as he gazed along it, a shudder shook his iron frame as he saw that there was no one there; the hall was quite deserted. And a deadly, undefined fear fell upon them both as they re-entered the darkened chamber, and sat down without uttering a word. Scarcely were they seated, when there again—that footfall, slow, solemn and distinct!

Now it was almost lost to the ear, as it seemed to ascend and grow faint in the distance. Anon it comes again, descending, and each moment coming nearer, until it is even close beside the door of the apartment. This it passes slowly by, and goes towards that portion of the building wherein the future heir of Grandon's name is sleeping.

He loved his child: it was the one bright spot in his heart, and as he listened to that dread footstep slowly approaching the sleeping place of his son, he cast aside all alarm, and hastened to him with a vague feeling of shielding him from harm. His wife followed, and together they entered the nursery.

A taper shed its faint light through the room, and fell upon the infant's face with a strange ghostly hue. He went softly towards it, and took gently with his grasp a little hand lying extended over the edge of the couch. Suddenly he reeled as though a fierce blow had been dealt him, as he felt that hand was cold as death. With a chill and terror at his heart, he looked closer on the little form, and the awful truth burst upon him: his child was dead!

Uttering a cry, he fell upon his bended knees beside the couch, while his wife looked on with a bewildered gaze. And as he thus sank down and buried his face within his hands, again throughout the hall reverberated that unearthly footfall, pacing solemnly to and fro. And now he felt in that dread hour that the words were coming true—"A curse, then, rests upon thee and upon thy house forever!"

Four children were born to the name and fortunes of Grandon—not the types of that child, his first-born who had possessed the blue eyes and fair-lined hair of the murdered lady reposing in the family vault. These resembled his own swarthy brow and glittering black eye, and his wife's handsome but evil countenance. These, even in their tenderest years, foreshadowed their after wickedness and vicious tendencies. These were living witnesses that the everlasting curse slept not, but lived daily in their young but baneful natures.

Alfred, the eldest, was now past his majority, and was now wandering in a foreign land. With some who love the beauties and novel sights, and with others the depravities which are not to be found at home, are the fascinations to this; with him it was decidedly the latter that urged him on.

They heard but little of him or his doings; for in those days man had not yet chained the lightning, bidding it journey to and fro as his messenger, and, save only when the heir of Grandon stood in need of money, his whereabouts was most frequently a matter of conjecture.

In an obscure town on the borders of the Rhine, a young Englishman is living in retirement, awaiting remittances from home to disembarass himself from some heavy liabilities that hang over him, and prevent him for the time from continuing his usual system of dissipated pleasure. His single servant informs the curious that he is a gentleman seeking health and quiet from too close an application to study, of which he is extravagantly fond. And he smiles grimly as he makes this last assertion, recollecting that his master would be somewhat puzzled to read even the title of a book—an accomplishment somewhat rare in those days, even for steadier minds than his. The simple peasantry see that the young man's face bears marks of what might well pass for nights passed without proper rest, and ask no further questions, but from their cottage door, and amid clouds of smoke give him "good den meinheer Alfred!"—the name given by his trusty servant—as he walks moodily past. This is Alfred Grandon.

In one of these same cottages dwells the daughter of a small farmer, holding a rank somewhat superior to the bondmen and villeins of the neighboring baron, by name Veinhardt. Alfred Grandon sees the pretty Ernestine, and struck by the extreme beauty of the simple maiden, contrived various devices with the aid of his unscrupulous attendant for meeting and conversing with her.

Dazzled by attentions from one so far above her, she listens to the insidious whispers he pours into her ear, believes his professions of eternal constancy and devotion, and—sins, as women oft have sinned before, led on by a false devil to her destruction.

Shortly after this, Alfred Grandon was missing from the quiet German village, and Ernestine Veinhardt awoke to the terrible truth that she had been the victim of heartlessness and treachery.

A few short months pass by, and there lies within the graveyard hard by the cottage wherein she had lived, and loved, and being deceived, perished, the cold form of Ernestine Veinhardt, and on her placid bosom rests the equally quiet figure of a little innocent dead babe.

But an avenger is on the footstep of the destroyer, and though long months, even years elapse before they meet face to face, the moment comes at last.

"I think there must be some mistake in the person. I would pass on," and the words are cold and haughty as he speaks. "And I know there is no mistake. Look you, Meinheer Alfred Grandon, you may perchance remember this. You mistook it on your sudden departure from the inn where you lived, when your vile presence blighted our peaceful valley."

He held up a small ivory miniature of himself to the view of the young man, and then taking a letter from his bosom, and opening it, displayed that it was from his father, and bore damning proof of his identity.

"Now, sir, your answer to the brother of the outraged Ernestine! Aha!" noting his start of surprise, "you thought not of such a champion rising to revenge the memory of the humble village maiden."

"I cannot fight you; we are not equal."

"No, thank Heaven,—we are not equal. Cruelty and villany can be but on a footing with devils, whose ministers on earth they are. But we lose time!" pointing to the sun, which was slowly approaching the edge of the horizon: "Before you setting light shall be hidden in the clouds of night, one or both of us will be in eternity. We are, in this green spot, safe from intrusion; and in the name of God and of my murdered sister, I challenge thee, Alfred Grandon, to mortal combat, and nerve well thine arm, for thou hast one to deal with in whose veins the blood is flowing in streams of molten fire!"

And in the quiet of the forest, with only one eye looking down upon them, these two stand foot to foot and face to face, in the fierce strife of deadly, mortal combat.

Another picture:

A youth of about seventeen sits at a gaming-table, his whole attention wrapped up in studying the game. From the size of his adversary's heap of gold, and the few pieces that are laying at his own elbow, it would seem as though he had been a heavy loser. A moment more, and with an oath he rises from the board, and, without his hat, rushes forth at mad pace into the street. On he dashes, his black locks streaming in the wind, nor pauses for a moment, until he stands upon the verge of the black and rushing river.

He murmurs forth in indistinct tones: "Dishonored and ruined, banished from my father's house, and, therefore, hopeless to look from him for the means of safety; an ignominious death in prospect on the discovery of the crime I committed to gain my last supply of gold, for the wretched Henry Grandon there is nothing left but this!"

Still another picture:

A child of twelve years old wanders by the verge of a cliff, overhanging an abyss of some hundred feet in depth. Its attendant, seated beneath a pleasant shade, takes little heed of his wanderings, nor notes his near approach toward the dangerous spot.

A noise of crumbling earth at length attracts his attention, and he sees with horror that his charges is but just sinking with the unstable earth, and as he gazes, spell-bound, on the sight, beholds him suddenly disappear from his view.

With wild cries, assistance is summoned, and the mangled form is borne to its home beneath the roof of Geoffrey Grandon, and laid tenderly upon a couch.

And now the last picture of them all:

Geoffrey Grandon and his wife lean over the couch of their child. All is hushed. Without, the golden hues of the sun are fading from sight in the far west, and the beams just rest for a moment on the sufferer's couch ere they are slowly lost and obscurity gathers over the earth. The labored breathing of the child on whose brow the dread seal of death is plainly laid; and the low sobs of the woman, whose offspring it is, alone break the stillness, when suddenly the well remembered sound reaches their ears: a solemn, slow and ghostly footfall echoing and re-echoing through the huge old hall in the ancient mansion of the Grandons. And as it strikes upon their terror-stricken ears, a faint sigh from the little couch announces that their child is no more!

Darkness has gathered over the two combatants ere their strife of blood is ended. The brother of Ernestine Veinhardt leans exhausted against a tree; and upon the ground, writhing in the agony of death, Alfred Grandon elbs out his life-blood. She is avenged!

A hollow plunge in the waters of the black and rushing river, and beneath their flood the crimes of Henry Grandon are ended in this world forever!

One infant lay remained, his fate to bear that name down, accursed as it was, to far posterity, and thus fulfil the dread anathema pronounced against it. This Geoffrey Grandon thought, as he received, one by one, the intelligence of his sons' deaths. He could have wished that this child, too, had died, but it was not so to be; the curse must still go on—the race not yet become extinct.

The last of the name is long since dead; but until the hand of the dread messenger was laid upon him, it was always heard in the hour when one that bore the name was passing away. It was always heard in the huge old hall, pacing solemnly to and fro, slow and ghostly, and echoing, ceasing not till the spirit had quitted its tenement of life; and the servants, as they heard it, told in whispers the story they had been told of its origin, and whispered forth with trembling lips the old-time anathema, "A curse, then, rests upon thee and upon thy house forever!"

LAFAYETTE.

In the third volume of the "Life of Washington," by Washington Irving, just issued, we find the following interesting statement in relation to Lafayette:—"During his encampment in the neighborhood of Philadelphia, Washington was repeatedly in that city, making himself acquainted with the military capabilities of the place and its surrounding country, and directing the construction of fortifications on the river. In one of these visits, he became acquainted with the young Marquis de Lafayette, who had recently arrived from France, in company with a number of French, Polish and German officers, among whom was the Baron de Kalb. The marquis was not quite twenty years of age, yet he had already been married nearly three years to a lady of rank and fortune. Full of the romance of liberty, he had torn himself from his youthful bride, turned his back upon the gaieties and splendor of a court, and in defiance of impediments and difficulties multiplied in his path, had made his way to America, to join its hazardous fortunes. He sent his letters of recommendation to Mr. Lovell, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and applied the next day at the door of Congress to know his success. Mr. Lovell came forth—in fact, was embarrassed by the number of foreign applications, many without merit. Lafayette immediately sent in the following note: 'After my sacrifices, I have the right to ask two favors—one is to serve at my own expense; the other, to commence by serving as a volunteer.' This simple appeal had its effect: it called attention to his peculiar case, and Congress resolved, on the 31st of July, that, in consideration of his zeal, his illustrious family and connections, he should have the rank of major-general in the army of the United States. It was at a public dinner, where a number of members of Congress were present, that Lafayette first saw Washington. He immediately knew him, he said, from the officers who surrounded him, by his commanding air and person. When the party was breaking up, Washington took him aside, complimented him in a gracious manner on his disinterested zeal and the generosity of his conduct, and invited him to make the headquarters his home. 'I cannot promise you the luxuries of a court,' said he, 'but as you have become an American soldier, you will, doubtless, accommodate yourself to the fare of an American army.'—New York Mirror.

THE GRAPE IN THE EAST.

The vineyards of Syria abound in the most luscious grapes imaginable, of which there are different kinds: one called the wabunt, takes its name from its size, being as large as that fruit; another is the long grape, and another is small and round. There are other kinds beside, which it is unnecessary to mention. The English hot house grape, good as it is, does not bear comparison with the Syrian grape. The quantity grown is enormous. Did the Syrians know how to make wine, Syria would soon become the wine mart of the whole world. What are not used as grapes, the natives dry into raisins, and the process is thus: The grapes are gathered in September, washed in a composition of lye, water and oil, after which they are spread on a mat to dry, and there they remain for about a fortnight in the open sun, sprinkled once or twice every few days with this composition; they are then gathered and put into sacks of hair-cloth, and sold as raisins. Some grapes are made into a sort of treacle, called Dibs, while the refuse thereof is made into wine and arak.—Dr. Baird.

If thou wouldst be borne with, bear with others.—Fuller.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

GLIMMA DE LYRA.

BY J. QUINCY ADAMS.

There's music in the flowing stream,
That through the valley glides
There's music in the moon's pure beams,
And in the ocean's tide.

There's music in the wings of birds,
In the whisper of the breeze;
There's music in the child's sweet words
That breathe felicities.

There's music in the heavens above,
And in the earth beneath;
There's music in the voice of love—
In everything but death.

ANECDOTE OF MR. LAYARD.

Austin Henry Layard found himself wandering about, on one occasion, somewhere near Bokhara, in the upper provinces of India, and here his funds ran short. He called on a merchant, and requested him to advance him some money. "Can't do it," was the reply, "as many fellows have imposed on me with fictitious drafts; I've been too often taken in and done for." "O, well," said Mr. Layard, "as you please. I have money at my banker's in London; and I will come and breakfast with you to-morrow." "Do so; I shall be happy to see you at breakfast." Next morning, who should walk into this merchant's compound but a Persian gentleman, in full oriental costume. "I have come to breakfast with you as I promised." "What?" said the merchant; "I don't recollect having seen you before." "O, yes, you have; you saw me yesterday, and I said I should return this morning." "You're Mr. Layard, are you?" he inquired, considerably astonished. "Yes." After breakfast, and when the traveller has told him his plans, and aroused the interest of his host in the discoveries he expected to make among the mounds around Mosul, in the plain of Shinar, where the ruins of ancient Nineveh are supposed to be, the merchant said, "I'll advance you money—five hundred pounds, if you like. How much do you want?" "O, I don't want so much as that; give me five pounds." "Yes." So he got the five sovereigns, put them in the sole of his shoe as the safest place while travelling, and having mounted his horse, rode away. On his journey down to Assyria, he had to pass through the territories of the hostile Khan, who had already taken away the lives of several Englishmen, and was now trying to get hold of our traveller, now roaming through his dominions. Mr. Layard knew this, and one day, when drawing near his enemies, he waited till the hour of tidin, when they were all in their tents at the forenoon meal, when, putting spurs to his horse, he dashed into the midst of the hostile encampment, rushed into the chief's tent, and plunged his hand into a bowl of salt, which he immediately put to his mouth, exclaiming, "Now I am safe!" "Well," said the chief, "you are safe." He admired the boldness and dexterity of the Englishman, but, above all, the faith thus reposed in "the covenant by salt." Having tasted the chief's salt, he had now a claim not only to his hospitality, but on his protection, and he was safely escorted on his way to the scene of his future discoveries.—Macphail's Magazine.

THE POLICY OF ENGLAND.

An intelligent Frenchman by the name of Lanoye, who has passed some years in travelling through the British provinces in the East, has recently published a very interesting little work upon India, which has excited considerable attention in Paris. The most important characteristic of the work, however, is the tone in which it discusses the British territorial acquisitions in that quarter of the world. Referring to the aggressive policy of the czars, the author observes that Great Britain alone has annexed four times more territory than Russia, in the last half century, and that the growth of the Indian empire is one long act of aggression against the English for a series of unprovoked aggression, marked at every step by rapacity, violence and broken faith. Comparing the English with the Mogul conquerors, infinitely to the disadvantage of the former, M. Lanoye avers that the government of the East India Company has been characterized solely by a desire to multiply their dividends, and that although during the last few years the people may be supposed to have gained something from the English rule, in the security of their lives and property, yet those slight advantages are as yet in their infancy, and there is no security against the relapse under the earlier system; and that at best the monuments of Mogul enterprise and civilization are, to the British, a perpetual reproach and shame.—Portfolio.

ANECDOTE OF DR. FRANKLIN.—A pleasant anecdote is told of Dr. Franklin. The town of Franklin was named for him. While in France, a gentleman of Boston wrote to him of the fact, and added that as the town was building a meeting house, perhaps he would give them a bell. Franklin wrote the characteristic reply, that he presumed the good people of Franklin preferred sense to sound, and therefore he would give them a town library.—Journal.

CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY.

Encouraged by the unprecedented success which this popular monthly has met with, and the rapidity with which it has increased its circulation, the proprietor has resolved to make it still more worthy of the patronage of the public. That this admirable work is a MIRACLE OF CHEAPNESS, is admitted by every one, containing, as it does, one hundred pages of reading matter in each number, and forming two volumes a year of six hundred pages each, or twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for ONE DOLLAR!

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY is printed with new type, upon fine white paper, and its matter is carefully compiled and arranged by the hands of the editor and proprietor, who has been known to the public as connected with the Boston press for nearly fifteen years. Its pages contain from the best and most popular writers in the country. It is also speeded with a record of the notable events of the times, of peace and war, of discoveries and improvements occurring in either hemisphere, forming an agreeable companion for a leisure moment or hour, anywhere, at home or abroad, each number being complete in itself.

NEWS, TALES, POEMS, STORIES OF THE SEA, SKETCHES, MISCELLANY, ADVENTURES, BIOGRAPHIES, WIT AND HUMOR.

No sectarian subjects are admitted into its pages: there are enough controversial publications, each devoted to its peculiar sect or clique. This work is intended for THE MILLION, north or south, east or west, and is filled to the brim each month with choice, popular and graphic miscellany, just such as any father, brother or friend would place in the hands of a family circle. It is in all its departments, fresh and original, and, what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive a copy gratis.

Sample copies sent when desired.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor.

Corner of Tremont and Bromfield Sts., Boston, Mass.

COURT HOUSE, ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

On this and the succeeding page we present accurate views of various points of interest in the city of St. Louis, drawn on the spot and engraved expressly for the Pictorial. These are some of the fruits of the recent artistic tour of Mr. Kilburn, undertaken for the purpose of obtaining fresh and authentic sketches of the most interesting features of the great and growing West. We have the utmost confidence in the accuracy of our artist, and know that his local drawings are pronounced excellent by competent judges. The city of St. Louis is a place of great importance, and constantly increasing in wealth and influence. Occupying the geographical centre of the Mississippi valley, its advantages as a commercial depot cannot be exaggerated. It is located on the west bank of the Mississippi River, 1210 miles by the course of the river from New Orleans, and 863 from the Falls of St. Anthony. The first settlement was made here about 1764, by a company of merchants on whom the French director-general of Louisiana had conferred the exclusive privilege of trading with the Indians on the Missouri. They built a large house and four stores, which, in 1770, had increased to forty houses, including a fort and a small French garrison for defence. In 1780, an attack of British and Indians was successfully repelled by the American forces under General Clark. St. Louis was formerly the seat of government of Missouri. Its site is lofty, and hence its proverbial salubrity. It rises from the river by two plains: the first, which is alluvial, being twenty feet above the highest water; and the second, which is a limestone bank, ascending forty feet higher than the first to the level of the adjacent country. From the river to the first of these terraces, the ascent is abrupt, but the second acclivity is more gradual. The prospect from the upper terrace is extensive and delightful. Situated almost at the focus to which the Mississippi, the Missouri, the Illinois and Ohio converge, St. Louis must in time become a mart of wealth and commerce scarcely surpassed by any in the United States. The trade of New Orleans alone exceeds it now. The river swarms with steamboats, baffling an attempt to number them. St. Louis is also a great depot and point of departure for the American fur trade, and for the lead mines of the upper Mississippi. Here hunters, trappers, miners, adventurers and emigrants meet in the prosecution of their various objects, and hence diverge to the most distant parts of the great West. Under the French and Spanish colonial sway, St. Louis was a mere village, and originally laid out on the first bank, consisting of three narrow streets parallel to the river's course. Under the auspices of the American settlers, it soon extended itself to the upper plain. This portion of the city is well laid out, with broad and airy streets, crossing each other at right angles. The city is built compactly for an extent of about two miles, with extensive suburbs. Many of the warehouses, public buildings and private residences are fine specimens of architecture. The limestone, which abounds here, furnishes excellent building material. Our first picture represents the Court House, not yet entirely finished. It is a massive structure, well and securely built, and thoroughly fire-proof. It is situated in the square formed by Fourth, Market, Fifth and Chesnut Streets. On the right of our picture will be seen part of the Planters' Hotel. The Mercantile Library Hall is the subject of our next illustration. It stands at the corner of Fifth and Locust Streets, has one hundred and five feet front, is twenty-seven feet deep and ninety feet high, and cost $140,000. The lower story on Fifth Street is devoted to stores. On Locust Street, it is occupied by the Young Men's Christian Association. The second floor contains the Library, which embraces eleven thousand volumes, selected with excellent judgment; also a neat Lecture Room, which will seat an audience of seven hundred persons. But the principal feature is the Hall, which will seat two thousand persons. It is most beautifully decorated, and is a credit to the city. The High School, the subject of another of our engravings, is situated on Olive Street, and is a substantial Gothic building. It has eighty feet front, and is one hundred and four feet deep. The basement is finished as a lecture room. It occupies an elevated position near the western limits of the city. The Medical Department of the University, shown in our next engraving, is situated at the corner of Myrtle and Seventh Streets, and is a fine building, of a pleasing style of architecture. Our next engraving delineates "McDowell's College," as it is familiarly called. It is a dispensary connected with the Medical Department of the University of Missouri. It is located opposite the Pacific Railroad terminus. Our view is taken from Seventh Street. The building on the right is the St. Joseph's Academy, by the brothers of the Christian schools. The Biddle Market, shown in our last picture, is a unique but not unpleasing building, situated at the corner of Biddle and Thirteenth Streets. Real estate in St. Louis has advanced in value with astonishing rapidity. An instance will show the extent of this rise. In 1835, the trustees of the Unitarian Church purchased a lot at the corner of Fourth and Pine Streets, 127 feet deep, and 60 feet front on Fourth Street, for $2000, or $33.33 per front foot. Two years ago it was sold for $24,000, or $400 per front foot, and in 1853 it was supposed to be worth $600 per front foot. Many persons embarking a moderate fortune in land have become immensely wealthy by the rise.

HIGH SCHOOL, ST. LOUIS.

LIFE IN A POWDER MILL.

Dickens thus describes a visit to the powder mill at Honnslow, near London:—"In this silent region, amid whose ninety-seven work-places no human voice ever breaks upon the ear, and where, indeed, no human form is seen, except in the isolated house in which his allotted task is performed, there are upwards of two-and-fifty work-people. They are a peculiar race, not of course by nature, in most cases, but by the habit of years. The circumstances of momentary destruction in which they live, added to the most stringent and necessary regulation, have subdued their minds and feelings to the condition of their hire. There is seldom any need to enforce these regulations. Some terrific explosion, here or in works of a similar kind elsewhere, leaves a fixed mark in their memories, and acts as a constant warning. Here no shadow of a practical joke or caper of animal spirits ever transpires—no witticism, or slang. A laugh is never heard; a smile seldom seen. Even the work is carried on by the men with as few words as possible, and these uttered in a low tone; not that anybody fancies that mere sound will awaken the spirit of combustion or cause an explosion to take place, but their feelings are always kept subdued. If one man wishes to communicate anything to another, or ask for anything from somebody at a short distance, he must go there; he is never permitted to shout or call out. There is a particular reason for this last regulation. Amid all this silence, whenever a shout does occur, everybody knows that some imminent danger is expected the next moment, and all rush away headlong from the direction of the shout. As to running towards it to offer any assistance, as common in all other cases, it is thoroughly understood that none can be afforded. An accident here is immediate, and beyond remedy. If the shouting be continued for some time (for a man might be drowning in a river), that might cause one or two of the boldest to return; but this would be a very rare occurrence. It is by no means to be inferred that the men are selfish and insensible to the perils of each other; on the contrary, they have the greatest consideration for each other, as well as for their employers, and think of the danger to the lives of others, and of property at stake at all times, and more especially in the more dangerous houses. The proprietors of the various gunpowder mills all display the same consideration for each other; and whenever any improvement tending to lessen danger is made by one, it is immediately communicated to all others. The wages of the men are good, but not too much so, considering the risks of life and limb to which they are always exposed, and their hours of labor very short. No artificial lights are ever used in the work. They leave the mills at half-past three o'clock, winter and summer."

MERCANTILE LIBRARY, ST. LOUIS.

THRILLING ADVENTURE.

Some of the episodes encountered during the search of Dr. Kane have wild interest. At one time it became necessary to send a fatigue party, with provisions, to assist the main party under Dr. Kane, in an attempted passage across Smith's Sound. This party was under the command of Mr. Brooks, first officer of the expedition. He was accompanied by Mr. Wilson and other volunteers. During their travel they found the ice completely impenetrable, and a snow drift swept wholly over the floes, and in the midst of a heavy gale from the north the thermometer, to their dismay, sank to fifty-seven degrees below zero. Human nature could not support the cold. Four of the party, including Mr. Brooks and Mr. Wilson, were prostrated with frozen feet, and with difficulty three or four of their companions, after encountering great suffering, reached the ship, and announced the condition of their comrades. Their chances of being rescued at this time seemed exceedingly small. They were in the midst of a wilderness of snow, incapable of motion, protected only by a canvas tent, and with no landmarks by which their position could be known. Even to drag these maimed men which have been, under ordinary circumstances, a work of difficulty; but to the slender party left at the ship it seemed impossible. Dr. Kane with the boldness and courage which justified the warm attachment felt toward him by all under his command, in less than one hour organized a recruiting party, leaving on board only those who were necessary to relieve the sick, and started off in the teeth of a terrible gale, and steering only by compass, to rescue the sufferers. After nineteen hours' constant travel, during which two or three of the party fainted, and others required to be kept from sleep by force, they struck the trail of the lost party, and finally, staggering under their burdens, one by one reached the tent, which was almost hidden by the snow. The scene as Dr. Kane entered the tent, was affecting beyond description. The party burst

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT, ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

WASHINGTON AND HIS FAMILY.

I had feasted my imagination, for several days, in the near prospect of a visit to Mount Vernon, the seat of Washington. No pilgrim ever approached Mecca with deeper enthusiasm. I arrived there in the afternoon of January 23, 1785. I was the bearer of the letter from General Greay, with another from Colonel Fitzgerald, one of the former aids of Washington; and also the books from Granville Sharp. Although assured that these credentials would secure me a respectful reception, I felt an unaccountable diffidence as I came into the presence of this great man. I found him at a table with Mrs. Washington and his private family, and was received in the native dignity, with that urbanity so peculiarly combined in the character of a soldier and eminent private gentleman. He soon put me at ease, by unbending, in a free and affable conversation. The cautious reserve, which wisdom and policy dictated, whilst engaged in rearing the glorious fabric of our independence, was evidently the result of consummate prudence, and not characteristic of his nature. Although I had frequently seen him in the progress of the Revolution, and had corresponded with him from France, in '81 and '82, this was the first occasion on which I had contemplated him in his private relations. I observed a peculiarity in his smile, which seemed to illuminate his eye; his whole countenance beamed with intelligence, while it commanded confidence and respect. The gentleman who had accompanied me from Alexandria, left in the evening, and I remained alone in the enjoyment of the society of Washington, for two of the richest days of my life. I saw him reaping the reward of his illustrious deeds, in the quiet shade of his beloved retirement. He was at the matured age of fifty-three. Alexander and Caesar both died before they reached that period of life, and both had immortalized their names. How much stronger and nobler the claims of Washington to immortality! In the impulses of mad and selfish ambition, they acquired fame by wading to the conquest of the world through seas of blood. Washington, on the contrary, was parsimonious of the blood of his countrymen, and stood forth, the pure and virtuous champion of their rights, and formed for them (not himself) a mighty republic. To have communed with such a man in the bosom of his family, I shall always regard as one of the highest privileges, and most cherished incidents of my life. I found him kind and benignant in the domestic circle, revered and beloved by all around him; agreeably social, without ostentation; delighting in anecdote and adventures, without assumption; his domestic arrangements harmonious and systematic. His servants seemed to watch his eye, and to anticipate his every wish; hence a look was equivalent to a command. His servant Billy, the faithful companion of his military career, was always at his side. Smiling content animated and beamed on every countenance in his presence. The first evening I spent under the wing of his hospitality, we sat a full hour at table by ourselves, without the least interruption, after the family had retired. I was extremely oppressed by a severe cold and excessive coughing, contracted by the exposure of a harsh winter journey. He pressed me to use some remedies; but I declined doing so. As usual, after retiring, my coughing increased. When some time had elapsed, the door of my room was gently opened, and drawing my bed-curtains, to my astonishment, I beheld Washington himself, standing at my bedside, with a bowl of hot tea in his hand. This little incident deserves to be recorded.—Men and Times of the Revolution.

BIDDLE MARKET, ST. LOUIS.

into tears. A blubber fire was immediately built, pemmican cooked, and the party ate for the first time after leaving the vessel. Ice was also melted, they having been to this time without drink. Worn out as they were, but four hours were allowed for the halt. The maimed of the frozen were sewn up in buffalo robes, placed on sledges, and dragged along by their companions, Dr. Kane walking in advance and picking the track. Cold of the utmost severity again overtook them. Bonsal and Merton, and even the Esquimaux boy, Ilance, sunk upon the snow with sleep. It was only by force that they were aroused and made to proceed, as the cold seemed to have destroyed all conception of danger. A large bear met on the way, was fortunately scared off by Dr. Kane, by a wave of the hand. They reached the ship after a walk of sixty-two hours, still dragging their companions behind them, but insensible. Dr. Hayes, the intelligent surgeon of the ship, from whom is got these particulars of this fearful adventure, received the returning party. Two of the number died of their injuries, and two others underwent amputation, and are now restored to perfect health. The condition of those who dragged the sick was most lamentable. Their memory for a time was entirely gone, and the ship in the midst of the muttering and delirium resembled a hospital. The surgeon and one remaining attendant were in sole charge of the ship. In this state of semi-madness, the sick remained for two or three days, but afterward they entirely recovered, and the party under Dr. Kane started three weeks afterward and resumed their labors in the field. Intrepidity like this has never been surpassed. It is spoken of with emotion, even now, by the stoutest hearts in the expedition.—New York Express.

A SPLENDID PRESENT.

When the Prince and Princess of Prussia completed their deux nuptials (Silberne Hochzeit), it was determined by the bulk of the people to present to them as a mark of the esteem and affection in which they are held, an offering which should be worthy the occasion and the exalted rank of the royal pair, and, at the same time, be of a perfectly national character. The Committee, which was formed at Cologne, adopted the idea of Herr von Schulaw, of completing an "Album of the Rhine," for which this part of the Prussian dominions furnished ample materials, both legendary and historical. In order to carry out the wishes of the Committee, and to render the "Album" worthy the acceptance of the august pair, application was made to the Academy of Painters, at Düsseldorf, who cheerfully responded to their wishes, and every one of the most celebrated contributed to the work.—London News.

MCDOWELL'S COLLEGE, ST. LOUIS.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

BANTAM STREAM.

BY H. WARD.

Upon thy flowery banks I stand,
Dear river of my native land;
And see thy crystal waters glide
Serenely to the silver tide
Of yonder lake, whose mirrored gleam
Rejoices still in Bantam Stream.

How oft in boyhood's sunny hours
I've wandered mid the woodland bowers
That overhangs thy banks so green,
And charm to joy each well-known scene;
While life was all an Eden dream,
As then I mused by Bantam Stream.

I sat beneath the cooling shade,
And every rural sweet surveyed—
The fragrant flowers in summer's bloom,
The whispering pine-tree's soothing gloom,
The vines that shut each darting beam
From glaring bright on Bantam Stream.

The wild-rose sheds its perfume still,
And daisies crown the sloping hill,
And all along the dewy meads,
The lilies hang their drooping heads;
And all the charms of nature seem
To revel wild by Bantam Stream.

The milk-white blossoms of the thorn,
The golden grain and emerald corn,
And sweetly-scented birchen groves,
Where birds rejoice to sing their loves—
All these, and more, I fondly deem
A paradise by Bantam Stream.

But, ah! long years have o'er me flown,
And I have wandered sad and lone
Far from my native scenes away;
And now again declining day
Disperses the sweet, enchanting dream—
Farewell, farewell, dear Bantam Stream!

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

TOO MUCH HASTE TO BE RICH.

BY EMMA CARRA.

AN old man sat in his large arm chair, with his soft, mixed locks flowing backward, and close by his side, on a low ottoman, was seated a fair young girl, her mild blue eyes looking upward.

"Father," she said, "are you well, this evening?"

"Yes, my child," answered the father, thoughtfully, "but—" He hesitated, and raising his hand, he wound his thin fingers among her brown curls, and leaning over, gazed steadily into her beautiful face, and then bending still lower, touched his lips to her forehead. "You are the type of your mother, Cecilia, and I feel that it is hard to give you away, even to one you love," and a tear trembled on the old man's silvery lashes for a moment, and then fell among the glossy curls of the daughter.

"But he is so good, father; and we are not going a great way off—only to the city home you have given us, in the street of your choice," and Cecilia looked thoughtful, and then added, while her lip quivered, and the words were spoken low, as if she feared he would confirm her opinion: "You do not like Walter. Is it because he is poor that you do not like him? Methought you had given up the idea of wedding me to a wealthy suitor."

"I care not for money, child, for the old farm has always been faithful to each generation, and I have enough for all; but I sometimes think that if you could be persuaded to give up this marriage, it would be better for us all. I shall be so lonely without you, and—"

"O, do not ask for such a sacrifice, father; besides, I probably should not be allowed to remain with you long, for by-and-by, you will want me to become a wife, and as you have often said, there are always plenty of suitors for the hand of a rich man's daughter. I know that Walter is poor, but he does not wish me to become his wife on account of my future prospects. No, he loved me when he did not know that I should ever inherit a farthing."

"Well, well, Cecilia, as you wish. I will say no more to cast a shadow over your hopes. Heaven is my witness that I wish no tear ever to dim your eyes, for you are all that I have left now. Your mother, brothers and sister all lie silently sleeping beneath the green turf."

Both now sat in silence a short time, the old man looking thoughtfully from the window, and the daughter watching his countenance and listening for one who, though expected before, had not arrived, until a ring at the front door announced a visitor. Cecilia did not wait for a servant to usher him, but bounding from her father's side, she met him while his hand was yet on the bell-knob.

"You are late," she said, and in her manner there was a mixture of reproach and playfulness.

"Yes, dearest, I am late, but I know that you will forgive me when I tell you that I was detained by an invalid mother."

"Certainly," said the trusting girl, and with her hand clasped in his they took seats at the window where still sat the father.

It did not seem strange that a fair young girl like Cecilia Grenville should love the noble-featured Walter Gorham, for his eye, though dark and flashing, told that it could appreciate what was good and true to the sight. The old man, too, seemed to feel a different influence when he was present; by degrees he lost that anxious reserve which threw such a shade over his countenance when Walter was not there, and he appeared now to think only of pleasing him who was so soon to be the husband of his only child.

"Would you like the country as well as you do the city?" inquired Mr. Grenville of Walter, as they sat by the window.

"I should be happy where Cecilia was," replied the young man gallantly.

"I think I should like the city better," said the daughter; "for if the air is not so fresh and pure, and if the birds do not sing so sweetly, there are other things to take the place of these in the city. But you, Walter, must have no companions to draw you away from home."

The young man bowed assent pleasantly, and so the hours passed by in agreeable chat, Mr. Grenville seeming to forget his previous regrets at the proposed departure of his daughter.

A week later, and Cecilia was the happy bride of Walter Gorham. The last good-by had been spoken, and the old man was left alone in his country home with his old house-keeper, servants and pets. This old homestead, with its broad acres, was where Mr. Grenville drew his first breath—where his parents lived and died, and where he had brought Cecilia's mother the day that he made her his bride. Every foot of land that surrounded the farm house was connected with some tender association wherein was linked the memory of his parents, or the loved image of his sainted wife. One after another, all had left him for that place from whence there is no return; but he had never felt how utterly desolate was a home without wife or child, until the light-hearted Cecilia left him to dwell with her husband in their city home. The father watched the departing carriage wherein sat his daughter, until the tall trees by the roadside hid it from view; then turning away he wandered from room to room, viewing the tasteful ornaments she had wrought and put in favorite places. There stood the low velvet ottoman, near his arm chair, on which she used to sit and listen to the fond tales he told her of her mother; for Cecilia was but an infant when her mother pressed her to her breast for the last time and said, "Be to her, Edward, what we both would have been, had it pleased the Father to have restored me and left to us our youngest born."

Mrs. Miller, the house-keeper, was a kind-hearted woman, and she left no means untried to make him who employed her happy; but her efforts were in vain; for to Mr. Grenville, the smile and silvery voice of Cecilia were ever wanting.

The new home of Cecilia was very unlike the farm house. None but caged birds sang to her in the morning, and the early zephyrs that floated into her chamber had not kissed the clover fields the last moment before entering, and the low of the herds as they lazily lagged on their way to the pasture was too far away to reach her now. Walter was ambitious, and he arose early and went to his business, for he wished in a few years to double the money that his father-in-law had given him. Cecilia knew that she should see him again at an early hour in the evening, so she strove to busy herself with her new duties, but when the noontime came, she thought what a relief it would be to her ennui during Walter's absence to have her father seated by her side as she was wont at the homestead; and yet she feared to ask for such a sacrifice, for if she had been disappointed in her expectations of the city's capacity to give enjoyment, it could never be a happy home for her father.

"You look pale to-night, Cecilia," said Walter, one evening, a few months after his marriage. "I hope you are not ill."

"No, Walter, I am not ill, but—"

"But what, Cecilia? Surely you are not afraid to trust me with your thoughts?"

The young wife laid her head on his bosom and burst into tears, and then when again interrogated, she said, half audibly:

"'Tis very lonely here—the days are very long when you are away."

"Well, dearest, I would dine with you," replied the husband; "but you know the store and home are a great ways apart, and I must not be remiss in business. You must try to become acquainted with the ladies of the society where we attend church—they will add to our respectability; and once acquire a taste for promenading and city society, and you will forget home and those little dumb pets you have left behind."

"But my father," said Cecilia, softly.

"Oh, it will not be long before he will be with us."

"He will never leave the homestead, Walter; for my mother's grave is there, and beside her sleep the children."

"But the dead cannot always influence the living. It is right that we should venerate the memory of our friends, but when they are beyond our reach we cannot benefit them, and our duties towards the living are greater. When I sought your hand in marriage, not knowing of your father's wealth, he asked me what business I intended to follow. I told him I had marked out a mercantile career, but that my capital was too small to enter into it largely. When I met with you I did not know that your father was rich, nor did I make any inquiries, for I was not looking for wealth in a wife. I only knew that I loved you, and determined that you should be mine; and for the keeping of such a jewel I resolved that my ambition should one day furnish me with a casket of befitting worth."

"And do you really think that father will ever consent to give up his country home to come and dwell with us?"

"I know he will, love, for I had a letter from him to-day, saying that he was so lonely now that the old farm house was no longer home to him, and since my business was such that we could not reside with him, he would, for the present, at least, let the homestead and live with us."

Cecilia's voice was more distinct now, and through her glistening tears shone gleams of joy, and soon her face resumed that cheerfulness which had won the heart of Walter when he wooed her in the paternal home. The next day, although Walter dined at the restaurant, did not seem so long as the previous ones; and when Mrs. Barton, a near neighbor, called to make her acquaintance, and Cecilia contrasted her fashionable manners with the manners of those around her father's home that she had known since early infancy, the dissimilarity did not appear so painful to her now, and she tried to render herself agreeable to her visitor.

Walter and Cecilia both wrote to Mr. Grenville to urge him not to abandon the design he had formed, and in a few days they received answer that he had decided to let the farm and live with them. The day was a sad one to Mr. Grenville when he parted from that home which had been the theatre where had been enacted all the scenes of joy and sorrow in the drama of his life. What wonder that the grass above the grave of her who could not go with him was moistened with his tears, or that the gray, moss-covered head stones that marked the earthly couch of his departed parents, were anew and firmly set, that no rude hand might remove them easily when the old farm burying-ground should be beyond his watchful care? But we will dwell no longer on those painful emotions that none can realize but those who have left some loved spot to the care of strangers.

Mr. Grenville in part forgot his mournful sensations when he met his happy child, for now that he was there, everything seemed in naivon with her mind. Walter was away most of the time during the day, but she knew that it was business that detained him; so by her father's side she sat as she was wont, and in listening to him and watching his every wish, she felt not how absorbed was her husband in his favorite pursuit, until the settled shade of anxiety that enveloped his features and the nervous answers that he gave to her inquiries, convinced her that he had ventured too far to retrieve his fortunes without some giant effort, which, if unsuccessful, must prove his ruin. Mr. Grenville had never been accustomed to a business life in the city; his had ever been one of quiet on a farm; so when he was informed by his daughter that Walter had almost from childhood been familiar with the business he had chosen, he thought there could be no risk in placing in his hands, beside the gift of the house to his daughter, a sufficient sum to enable him to carry it on successfully; and with the loan, or gift of such a sum, for he never intended it should be returned, he had surprised the young husband on the day that Cecilia became his bride.

A year or more sped by, and the farmer had now become quite at ease in his new home. His son-in-law had hired a larger and more expensive building in which to transact his business, rushing hurriedly onward, trying to keep pace with those who had more than double his experience and capital. Once or twice, Mr. Grenville attempted to question his son-in-law, and advise him not to make too much haste to be rich; but he soon saw that it did not meet with a welcome, and he said no more, contenting himself with his musings and the society of his child.

One evening, long after Mr. Grenville had retired to his room, Cecilia sat by her chamber window, waiting the coming of her husband, till the moon went down and the stars seemed to come out thicker, as if to make its place good by their glimmering. The wife saw a dark form beneath the window and heard a heavy tread on the steps, and, springing from her seat, she ran to meet the expected one; but when the front door was gently but quickly drawn backward, Walter was not there, but in his stead an officer of the law stood before her, and pronounced the fatal words:

"Your husband is a culprit. Nothing but the immediate payment of large sums of money can save him from a felon's cell, from which, after all is made known, nothing can save him. But the injured party have consented to release him, provided the payment of the goods that he has obtained by false pretences can be secured to them, either by the endorsement of a good name or the ready money."

Cecilia stood like one bewildered; for some time she had felt that Walter was too rash and hasty, but she was not prepared for this. She had ever thought him honest, almost above a dishonest thought; she had said but little to her father of her own uneasiness, wishing to spare him useless anxiety, but now when the crisis had arrived she could remain silent no longer. The picture presented itself of her Walter held a prisoner till the word should be sent back from her lips that would release him, or cause him to be retained among villains of the deepest dye. This thought was too much for the affectionate Cecilia, who, with heart-rending sobs, rushed to her father's chamber and begged him to save her husband. The cheek of the old man blanched when the required sum was named by the officer, and, with a quivering lip, he said, wildly:

"Two years ago I was a wealthy man, nor deemed it possible that I, with my simple wants, could ever lack; but if I pay this sum, nothing can save me; for I shall have to mortgage the farm, the homestead of my father." And turning to his daughter, he continued, while the ashen hue of his face showed his emotion: "Cecilia, shall I place my name to that paper and make beggars of us all?"

At this moment there were steps heard without, and in a moment more Walter entered, accompanied by those whom he had defrauded, they having become impatient at the delay of the officer. Cecilia sprang to his side and buried her face in his bosom, while Mr. Grenville stood as if transfixed to the spot.

"Is all lost, Walter?" he at length questioned, in tones sepulchral. "This house,—the money I gave you on the day you took Cecilia from me?"

"All," said Walter, firmly, with eyes bent upon the floor and his right arm supporting the feeble one that leaned on him. "To gain wealth that I might restore to you what I took, I played a deep game and lost. For my own sufferings I care nothing, but would that this dear one could be shielded! I cannot bear that she should share my misery and disgrace; so sacrifice no more for me, father; all I ask is for you to take her back to that home, from which, for her own sake, would to God I had never taken her—cherish her, and leave me to my fate. Should I ever retrieve the past, you will see me again; but if not, Cecilia, for your sake and that of your father, I will trouble you no more!" and, as if forgetful for the moment that others than themselves were present, he clasped her wildly to his bosom, and pressing a farewell kiss upon her face, turned hastily to the officers, and with a forced calmness, said: "I am ready to follow where it may please you to lead!"

With a groan the young wife reached her arms towards him imploringly, and then fell senseless at her father's feet. Mr. Greenville could not penetrate the future, he only saw the present. He had ever met with kindness from his son-in-law, and since he had lived with him, had become attached to him; he knew how dear he was to his child, and scarcely mindful of what he did, he seized the fatal document and placed his name where the net left him penitence; but Walter was free, and the world knew not why the homestead was sold, nor why the son-in-law hired a cheaper store and retrenched his expenses. Some surmised that there had been wrong and the father-in-law was a sufferer, and thus it was hinted from one to another, till it reached the ears of Walter, who felt that, though secrecy and prompt action had kept him from a convict's cell, he was none the less guilty; and if his devoted wife and her father could have been provided for, gladly would he have fled from a place where he was regarded with suspicion; and with thoughts like these resting on his soul, it seemed as if fortune had deserted him, until a small tenement in the suburbs was the only home of him whose name once stood so fair in that large city. Mr. Greenville did not sink under the accumulating trials he had to encounter, for his thoughts mounted upward to Him who gives peace to the suffering; though the homestead was gone, Cecilia still lived to bless him and nestle at his side.

One evening—it was just such an evening as that on which we introduced Cecilia and her father to the reader,—they were again seated side by side, talking of the past, but the father did not tell her how much brighter might have been her destiny had she listened to him; for he reasoned that the ways of Providence are mysterious, and if poverty had not been their lot, worse might have befallen them. Cecilia, with tearful eyes, spoke of the sorrow she had caused him, and yet she breathed not one reproachful word concerning him she loved.

"Where can Walter be, to-night?" said the wife; "he has not been out so late before since that night—"

Cecilia looked into her father's face, but she did not finish the sentence, for a sudden thought seemed to seize her; he might again be a criminal; and with this thought came the wish to know the worst, and taking her shawl and bonnet from a recess in the room, she started to go to the place where he was employed, but ere she reached it, she met him walking hastily towards his home. His face was all aglow with excitement and pleasure.

"Come, dearest," he said, "the old homestead shall be your father's again,—I will restore that and more!"

At first, Cecilia thought her husband's disappointments had made him mad, but by degrees he convinced her that he was sane, and that there was real cause for joy; for, on reaching home, he unfolded a newspaper wherein was an advertisement, saying that if any of the heirs of Amos Gorham were living, by establishing that fact they could learn something to their advantage. Upon inquiry at the place designated, Walter had found that there was a large tract of land in the vicinity of a western city which belonged to him, as he and his widowed mother were the only members of that family then living.

"I have known this for several weeks," said the now happy young man, "but I thought I would make all sure before I announced the fact to you or father, for fear that you might be skeptical; but now I can show you the letters I have received in correspondence, which establishes these possessions as belonging to my grandfather, which he purchased in early life for a trifling sum while a settler at the west, and when only a small town marked the spot where the city now stands."

"Did I not tell you, my child!" exclaimed the aged father, "that the ways of God are mysterious but wise?"

Cecilia wept for joy at this sudden release from poverty, and all concluded that the city was henceforth no place for them; so after the western affairs were all settled, the old homestead was repurchased, and together all returned. Even the mother of Walter dwelt beneath the farm house roof, and when the old man's measure of life was full, he blessed those who so faithfully watched over the winter of his life, and then was quietly laid to sleep beside her whose spirit had gone before. The son-in-law modernized the farm house, and with his surplus wealth he oftentimes rendered assistance to those whose inexperience led them to where, without it, they could not have been extricated, and by his advice he helped them to shun such temptations as he in former times had encountered.

PAUL DELAROCHE AND THE GIRONDINS.

Paul Delarocbe has just finished his new picture of the Girondins. The scene represents the twenty accused at the moment when the sentence of death is read to them. The twenty-first, Valaze has killed himself, and his body is carried away by the executioner's men in order to be dragged behind his fellow sufferers to the scaffold. The principal group comprises Vergniaud, Brissot and Gensonne standing in the foreground. Young Lasserre, staring fixedly on the floor, is seated at some distance. Fauchet, Boyer, Fonfrede, and a few more sit at a table in the background. On the right hand side stands the commissaire, calling out the names of the victims, and at his side the jailor. The picture is of small dimensions, but makes a grand impression by its composition, as well as execution. The general effect is treated with great art, and the character of the heads of the Girondins is well hit, and rendered with considerable delicacy.—N. Y. Times.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

MARY, MY SISTER.

BY WILLIAM D. OLIVER.

IN a far corner of Lempeter churchyard, is a tomb, covered by a broad slab of grey marble, on which is deeply cut these words: "MARY, MY SISTER."

Not a word more to tell who was the occupant of the silent house beneath—not a clue to the knowledge of the person who devised the simple but strange inscription. I had often wondered, as I looked wistfully at the words, which seemed to me so full of deep and sacred meaning, so full of tender devotion of memory to a sister, but whether coming from a brother's or a sister's heart, was a matter in which conjecture was perfectly vain. A single sweet briar shed its dewy roses over the tomb, and seemed to image the life of the fair tenant within. Perhaps she, too, held as frail and sweet an existence as the sweet briar's wild rose. But as well I might dream of the life of Cecilia Metella, by looking at her tomb!

